I have not been well for three years, tried almost every kind of patent medicines, and no less than seven doctors, one of Elmira, N. Y., now have done me any good. I finally tried your Hop Bitters, and found them just the thing. I have praised them so highly there is a great number here who use them with great benefit and satisfaction.

Very respectfully yours, E. HUM

Gentlemen,—The "Hop Bitters" meet with large sales and give general satisfaction, one on in particular you should know of. Mr. John F. Green, 730 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia, Pa., has been suffering from kidney affection, with superinduced rheumatism. He tried physicians and remedies in vain. He was obliged to take morphine to induce sleep, his trouble was so great. Reading your advertisement in the Christian at Work, he was prevailed upon by one of his daughters to try it. Three bottles effected a cure, and now he is an enthusiast for "Hop Bitters." He is one of the oldest residents in the locality named, and known as a gentleman of unsurpassed probity. HENRY TOWNS, 672 North 10th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

OFFICE JELLOWAY MF'G ASSOCIATION, JELLOWAY, O., March 18, '82.

Hop Bitters Manufacturing Co.:

I have been using your Hop Bitters, and find them what you recommend them to be for kidney disease (viz., superior to all others).

J. L. HENDERSON.

Vertigo, Dizziness, and Blindness.

OFFICE UTICA MORNING HERALD, UTICA, Feb. 18, 1882.

I have been troubled with vertigo since last July, and have suffered greatly every night after any considerable exertion from dizziness and blindness. I tried two bottles of Hop Bitters, and since then have been entirely relieved.

Respectfully yours, J. J. PLUNKETT.

Hop Bitters Co. June 13, 1881

I have been suffering five years past with neuralgia, liver complaint, dyspepsia, and kidney complaint, and I have doctored with fourteen different doctors, who did me no good. At last I tried Hop Bitters, and after using a few bottles I received a great benefit from them, and if I had used Hop Bitters regularly, I would have been well before. I know them to be the best medicine in the world for nervous diseases of all kinds.

JAMES COOPER,

Bethington, Barbee County, W. Va.

Wicked for Clergymen.

I believe it to be all wrong and even wicked for clergymen or other public men to be led into giving testimonials to quack doctors or patent medicines, but when a really meritorious article, composed of valuable remedies known to all and that all physicians use and trust in daily use, I should freely commend it. I therefore cheerfully and heartily commend Hop Bitters for the good they have done me and my friends, firmly believing they have no equal for family use. I will not be without them.

REV. D. R——, Washington, D. C.

A good Baptist clergyman of Bergen, N. Y., a strong temperance man, suffered with kidney trouble, neuralgia, and dizziness almost to blindness, over two years after he was advised that Hop Bitters would cure him, but was too afraid of and prejudiced against the word "bitters." Since his cure he says none need fear but trust in Hop Bitters.

My wife and daughter were made healthy by the use of Hop Bitters, and I recommend them to my people.—Methodist Clergyman, Boston, N. Y.

I had severe attacks of Gravel and Kidney trouble; was unable to get any medicine or doctor to cure me until I used Hop Bitters, and they cured me in a short time.—A distinguished lawyer and temperance worker of Wayne County, N. Y.

ALLEG

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1382.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

"THE KNEELING NUN."—From a Painting by David Neal.—[See Page 376.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found available, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $300; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is available, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOMETT have been published. That published in 1857 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

UNHAPPY "PROFESSIONALS."

IT is a significant fact that just in the degree that President ARTHUR'S course has been denounced by the professional politicians it has been acceptable to the country, and has produced a general feeling of confidence and respect for his administration. The professional or machine politicians in New York, for instance, complain that he does nothing for the party. They had anticipated a general turning out and putting in, and they are naturally amazed and despondent. Their expectation was certainly not unreasonable. They had seen Mr. CONKLING resign because Mr ROBERTSON was made Collector, and they had seen Vice-President ARTHUR zealously espouse Mr CONKLING'S quarrel, and hasten to Albany to secure his re-election as a rebuke to President GARFIELD. When the Vice-President succeeded to the Chief Magistracy, the machine, "hushed in grim repose," awaited its prey. There was doubtless a very general expectation that the new policy would be "thorough." But two years are nearly passed, and Mr ROBERTSON is still Collector, and although the Naval Officer has been unfortunately removed, there has been no clean sweep or re-adjustment, but instead of it Mr. CONKLING'S "snivel service reform" has become law amid universal public approval, and the President is honestly sustaining it.

It is now further alleged, to the inexpressible dismay and disgust of the "professionals," that the President proposes to consolidate internal revenue districts. It is believed to be indisputable that ninety collectors could collect the tax as efficiently as one hundred and twenty-six, and that a proportional reduction could be made in the number of persons employed in the service. This would be a saving which is an essential part of reform in the civil service. The spoils system naturally multiplies useless places and increases the expense of the service, because it treats places as rewards for henchmen and "workers." Honest official investigations into the details of the various branches of the service constantly show the wasteful excess of places and emoluments. Directly and indirectly this will be corrected as the reform is enforced. While the law is carried out by the Commission, the spirit of the law and the public sentiment from which it springs will be observed in every reduction of the force that can be made with due regard to efficiency.

It is because the President seems in many ways to be mindful of this fact that an administration which began amid doubts and grave apprehensions has gradually obtained the regard and trust of the country. The President is a strong party man, and the interests of his party are dear to him. It must be pleasant for him, therefore, to know that at least his administration has not weakened the hold of his party upon public confidence. His course, indeed, has illustrated the truth of the notable saying of President HAYES, that he serves his party best who serves his country most. It is a truth which, however abstractly obvious, administrative officers find very hard to put into practice. But they who resolutely do it have their reward. While the professional politicians sneer, the good sense of the people applauds, and the President himself must see that precisely as fast and as far as he disregards the wishes of party hucksters he commends his administration to an honorable place in American history.

AN EPOCH IN TEMPERANCE REFORM.

THE late meetings in New York for the promotion of temperance are parts of a movement which is worth attention as a significant incident in the history of the temperance reform. It is a movement not designed primarily to favor total abstinence or moderation, nor to procure the passage of prohibitory laws or license laws, but to secure by all proper means the enforcement of all existing restrictive liquor laws. At the meetings to which we have alluded the enormous number of drinking shops in New York was pointed out, and the great excess above those allowed by law, and the necessity was eloquently shown of concentrating a sound and effective public opinion upon the proper enforcement of the lawful regulation of such places. In Chicago this matter has already been taken in hand, and last June a Citizens' Law and Order League of Massachusetts was organized, limited in membership to 150 persons, and consisting of some of the most eminent citizens of the State.

The influence of such a movement upon the part of such citizens as composed the meetings in New York, or the Law and Order League in Chicago or Massachusetts, is obvious. It is a good work in which the Rev. Dr HOWARD CROSBY has been an intrepid pioneer in New York. The great practical difficulty hitherto in the progress of the temperance reform has been that it excluded from co-operation all who were not willing to pledge themselves to total abstinence. This tendency has been so strong that the phrase "temperance man" has become synonymous with total abstinent, and those who were temperate, but not "abstainers," have been branded as the chief allies of intemperance, and mainly responsible for drunkenness and all consequent crimes. This course has naturally divided the real friends of temperance, and has favored the violation of restrictive laws. But there was still no reason why the action of all should not be united in the enforcement of restrictions which all wished to see enforced. This is the object of the present movement. It welcomes every friend of temperance in every degree, and proposes that the main question shall be, not the erection of a standard of temperance, but the enforcement of the law, whether it prohibits or licenses.

The most foolish of objections is that law can not make people virtuous. But virtue is not the question. The object of penal laws is to prevent crime by the fear of consequences. If a trader learns by experience that he loses more than he gains by selling liquor unlawfully, he will refrain. His abstention may not be virtue, but it is obedience to wise laws, and it promotes public order. The objection to liquor laws has usually been that in severity they outran public opinion, and were therefore violated with comparative impunity. But public opinion everywhere favors temperance, even if it does not favor prohibition. Let the law represent that opinion, therefore, and it will be enforced like other laws. It is a question for the tax payers, and for good citizenship. The great mass of crime springs from drunkenness. The most feasible way to prevent drunkenness is to add to the moral appeal the enforcement of such regulations of liquor-selling as the law provides, and to improve the laws as experience suggests. The accounts of the good results of Law and Order Leagues in Chicago and elsewhere are most encouraging. They secure respect for the laws which forbid the sale of liquor to minors and by that service alone they save many a man from rum. All temperance men, whether abstainers or non abstainers, are agreed that some kind of regulation of the sale of liquor as a beverage is indispensable. But such laws when disregarded demoralise public sentiment by fostering contempt for all laws. In any case, therefore, let the liquor laws be enforced or repealed. The new law in New York is not a stringent law. But if such restrictive provisions as it contains were resolutely observed, especially the Sunday clause, not only would good order be promoted, but the consciousness that an intelligent and determined body of citizens proposed to secure the vigorous execution of the law against all offenders would have the most wholesome effect in preventing its violation.

THE AQUEDUCT BILL.

IN approving the Aqueduct Bill, Governor CLEVELAND undoubtedly did what his sense of duty required. We regret his decision without impugning his motives. Some of the most earnest original opponents of the bill were found warmly urging the Governor to sign it at last, and he might well be perplexed. We should be very sorry to think that their view was that of the "prominent merchant" who, upon being interviewed after the signature of the bill, said that he supposed that the tribute extorted from the tax-payers by the chances of jobbery hidden in the act was no larger than must be always paid for necessary legislation. We have had "government by deal," and now it seems we are to have government by rebate. It is unfortunate that this was not as evident to the Governor as it is to the tax payers of New York. It is undoubtedly a disagreeable truth for a Democratic Governor, but it is a truth nevertheless, that any bill involving great expenditure in the city and neighborhood of New York which proceeded from the late Legislature was for that reason to be regarded with the utmost suspicion. The task of showing that it was not a huge job lay upon those who advocated the bill.

Of the necessity of a new water supply there is no question. It was unanimously alleged by the preliminary commission of inquiry, and an admirable bill was drawn which provided the commission under which it was to be executed. This body was to consist of three ex-officio members—the Mayor, Comptroller, and Commissioner of Public Works—and four citizens to be nominated by the Mayor and approved by the Governor. These citizens would have been the permanent majority to serve until the work was completed and it was known that the Mayor intended to prevent jobbery by nominating proper men. This bill was set aside, and another substituted for it providing for the three ex-officio members, and for three instead of four citizens, who were mentioned by name. This bill, against the protest of a large and influential body of tax payers and the remonstrance of the Mayor, was passed. Its purpose was visible on its face. It distributed the patronage of the work between the County Democracy, Tammany Hall, and the Republicans, by giving each of them a representative. Of the three ex-officio members the Commissioner of Public Works is the only one who could devote much time to the duty, and he, with the three political representatives, will constitute the majority. The meaning of all this is obvious. It facilitates the jobbery which the tax payers earnestly wished to avoid.

Had the Governor vetoed the bill, it is true that the work would have been delayed until another Legislature could consider the subject. Not unnaturally he was unwilling to take the responsibility of delaying a work of the kind, which it was agreed a imperatively necessary. But this hesitation might have been overcome by two considerations that those most immediately concerned were willing to take the risk, and that the opportunity for jobbery offered by the bill would delay the work very much more than waiting until next year for a better bill. The Governor, however, decided otherwise, and his generally honest and independent course entitles him to the most honorable interpretation of his decision. The result throws upon the opponents of the bill the responsibility of the most constant vigilance, and the most unhesitating exposure of the jobs which they believe the bill now favors.

HONORARY DEGREES.

THERE will probably be no incident of the College Commencement season so striking and exciting as the decision of the Harvard Overseers to withhold the degree of LL.D. from Governor BUTLER. But cool reflection, we are sure, will justify the action of the board. Such an honor is essentially personal, and although a custom was established of treating it, in the case of the Governor of the State, as an official due, it was a custom which could not be defended, because it inevitably tended to degrade the significance of the distinction. The incident will doubtless lead to a more searching consideration of the whole subject of honorary degrees, and it will enhance their value by promoting greater care in awarding them. Such degrees are naturally and by custom of two kinds. They are either a certificate of special scholarship, or they are a tribute to eminent public services when the character or reputation of the recipient does not make such an honor from such an institution ridiculous. The personal element can not and ought not to be eliminated from the consideration. There are instances known probably in the boards of control of every important college in the country of men conspicuously accomplished in special branches of scholarship to whom the degree has been refused because of personal considerations.

There is good reason in this course, for there would be the utmost moral confusion if men whose lives and characters justly merited the severest reprobation were for mere scholastic attainment made the recipients of the highest honors of the most reputable institutions. The confusion would not be less if men whose public career had destroyed confidence in their political honesty should receive similar honors from those who distrusted and denounced them most sincerely. It might easily become a premium upon rascality. For to insist upon the other view is to hold that if a man contrives by the most corrupt methods to secure a nomination and election, he is entitled to the condonation of receiving a signal honor. It is useless to call it merely formal. It is, indeed, in every case only a form. But it is in every case also the form in which honor is expressed in precisely the same way. The saintly scholar, the upright and beneficent statesman, and the corrupt politician would all receive the honor together, and with the same apparent significance.

Honor, indeed, may be shown to an office and not to its incumbent. But this is a truth which may be easily stretched too far. It is well to remember the terrible answer made to the devotee who said that a bad man might be a good pope. "When Rodrigo Borgia goes to hell, what will become of Pope Alexander VII.?" Because an office may be properly honored, it does not follow that every kind of honor may be properly offered. A man may honor the office of President by bowing to the incumbent; but it is not necessary in order to show honor to the office to ask the incumbent to dinner. No institution of learning, as such, in any State, is called upon to offer its highest honor to the Governor in recognition of the office that he holds, but only as a tribute to what it thinks to be his worthy holding of it. If the habit of honoring the office in the person of what the institution thinks an unworthy incumbent has arisen, it must sooner or later lose its self-respect and the respect of good men, or do what Harvard has done—destroy the precedent.

THE OHIO REPUBLICANS.

The Republicans of Ohio have nominated Judge Foraker for Governor, a gentleman who is highly commended upon all sides, and who happily, in the lingo of Conventions, is a new and a clean man. His nomination, and the unequivocal declarations of the platform upon the State issue of the liquor question and the national issue of the tariff, will secure a distinct and intelligible expression of the Republican sentiment of Ohio upon those two points.

The liquor plank demands a reasonable legal regulation of the liquor traffic, and the tariff plank in terms repudiates the policy of a tariff for revenue only, and declares for protection. On the same day the lone Democrats declared for a tariff for revenue only. The Democratic party, however, will not, in our judgment, risk the national election upon that issue.

The Ohio Republican platform, although perfectly positive and emphatic upon the tariff and the liquor traffic, is evasive and vague upon the question of reform. It contents itself with saying that it "reiterates the declaration of previous Republican Conventions in favor of civil service reform, and welcomes every intelligent effort to make that measure practical." There is much an intelligent effort now making by the Republican Administration, but upon that practical effort the Convention was silent. This is unfortunate, because the time is not favorable for political nowadvice. No unmeaning phrase in a platform will ratify the Republican demand for reform. The most important work of the Convention, the nomination, seems to have been the best. The contest will be exciting and close, and the result will have an important bearing upon the election of next year.

MORE BRIDGES WANTED.

The experience of the Brooklyn Bridge since its opening seems to justify the sententious remark of a young passenger upon the second day, "What is needed here is more bridges." It is with the bridge as with railways: when they were first laid along routes upon which the scant travel seemed to make such a road ridiculous—it develops crowds of travellers. So the elevated railroads in the city are said not to injure the prosperity of the surface roads. The new bridge, indeed, does threaten the profits of the ferry. But upon the less it will undoubtedly greatly increase the travel between the two cities.

The catastrophe of Decoration-day, therefore, can not be regarded as due to exceptional causes. It was the result of inadequate provision for the safe passage of a throng which may be always expected upon a holiday, while upon other days it will be larger than was anticipated. The pressure will be somewhat relieved by the cars, but how great the relief will be can not be foretold. An ample and efficient police and instant telephonic or telegraphic communication will undoubtedly be provided at once, and the skill which constructed the bridge will be able to decide whether and how the way for foot passengers can be enlarged.

The bridge will long be one of the chief spectacles of the city, which hundreds of thousands of strangers will annually flock to see, and it is very possible that it may really prove to be inadequate for its normal purpose of communication between the cities. In any case it is doubtful whether it could serve as a vital bond between different sections of the same political community, which is already the dream of many sagacious citizens on both sides of the river. The one thing which is indisputable is that the continuous throng across the bridge was wholly unanticipated, and that the practical ability of the trustees to deal immediately with an unexpected and wholly important situation is put to the severest test.

"GIRL GRADUATES."

The trustees of Columbia College have arranged a four years' course of study for women, for which a strict preparatory examination will be required, and no girl under seventeen will be admitted. Those who pass the examination may study where and how they please, and will be examined by the college teachers as often as may be necessary. Upon a satisfactory examination at the end of the four years, or upon the completion of any prescribed course, the student will receive a certificate, which will be substantially the equivalent of a diploma granted to a graduate of the college.

What the distinguished citizens of New York who petitioned the trustees to facilitate the higher education of women have gained in this—and it is not an inconsiderable gain: the college sanctions a course of study little differing from its own; it places it under the care of its faculty, and it officially certifies its successful completion. What the college does not undertake is to open its class-rooms, lecture-rooms, and collections. The scheme is no "annex" without a local habitation. But it is possible that the habitation may be provided by the earnest friends of education, and means like what is done is a step forward which undoubtedly makes other forward steps easier.

One immediate good result of the scheme is obvious. As there is no especial school provided for the pursuit of the prescribed studies, the schools for girls already existing will enlarge, and raise their courses of study so as to satisfy the new situation. The standard of the education of girls will be higher. Moreover, as the industrial opportunities of women are constantly multiplying, it will be found, as in England, that in certain employments a certificate of the kind proposed will immediately give its possessor the precedence over all competitors. Nothing but good can be anticipated from the action of the trustees, and if it is not all that some of the more ardent petitioners hoped, it is yet the beginning of good things.

A DILEMMA.

It is now as plain that the Democrats will not contest next year's election on a free-trade party that the Louisville Courier-Journal must look with mingled feelings upon its late declaration that the election of Mr. Randall as Speaker "would be the dissolution of the Democratic party." It could be an only because the free-traders in the party might accede in case of his election. How many of them does the Courier-Journal suppose would take that course? Should Mr. Randall be elected Speaker of the Democratic House, should we see the Courier-Journal repudiating the House as betraying the party, and proceed to organize a new Democracy?

An Irish echo would reply to these questions, "Probably not." The Journal would pack its flint and try again. But it will hardly rally the old Democratic party as a free-trade party. The changes in industry in the Southern States are not favorable to the identification of that party with free trade, and no old party organization among whose members radical differences exist upon a vital policy can be made the party to represent that policy.

Mr. Randall's election as Speaker would undoubtedly mean that the Democratic party is not ready to declare itself to be a free-trade party. It would signify that the Democrats believe that the country does not wish to depart seriously from the present Republican policy, and that it is disposed to give a fair trial to the tariff as revised by the Republicans. There would not be much cheer for the Democrats, therefore, in his election, because if the country approves the present policy, it is not likely to invite the Democrats to carry it out.

THE "MAGAZINE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."

Miss Martha J. Lamb has become editor of the Magazine of American History, and entered upon her duties in May with an admirable number. Her series of papers upon "Wall Street in History" is exceedingly interesting, and the busiest broker in the street can find time to acquaint himself in it with the days when Wall Street was the lair of other bears and Broad Street a pasture for other bulls than those with which he is familiar.

Wall Street is not only the most noted but the most notable street in the country. Its association with historic events is close and constant, and Mrs. Lamb is probably the most accomplished student of the history of the city, her handsome and ample volumes showing both the research of the scholar and the picturesque literary skill of the author.

PERSONAL.

One of the most famous of young American authors was talking recently about his modes for writing. He made no bones of it. "As I tell the publishers," he said, "the less of money is the cost of all literature."

—There is a book-canvasser in this city who earned last year by commissions on his sales not less than twenty-five thousand dollars. He has done similarly well for several years, and has begun to spend the summer in finishing the construction of his beautiful house in the country, and the landscape gardening of its extensive grounds.

—That artists often fear being robbed by brother artists is well known to that honorable profession. Many of them, accordingly, are reluctant to show their sketches or designs, especially when a competition is on foot, lest the ideas should be stolen. "I broke me rule," said a New York painter recently, "and did show to a brother artist a competitive design for a public monument which I hope to get a commission for. After admiring the principal figure of the group, he remarked, naively, 'That's nicely done,' and then added, 'Hang it! there's no other way at all of doing it.' Now I know," observed the other, while relating the incident to a friend, "that there are twenty different ways in which I could have done it myself, and I am sure the fellow is going to steal my way."

—A French critic has been discussing the question whether a play should end cheerfully or despondingly—in other words, whether the audience should be sent away in good spirits or sad. He thinks that, so far as dollars and cents go, it is best to have the denouement a pleasant one, for plays with a doleful fifth act "seldom run long." Perhaps it was for this reason that a French adapter of plays once made Othello terminate merrily.

—A monument to the heroic Cairoli brothers, who perished in the struggle for Italian independence, has been erected on the Pincian Hill, Rome; but a more enduring one had already been raised to them another to those lines of Swinburne's song where she is called "four times blessed, as whose most lady breast four times a god like soldier-saviour hung," the mass of letters being more successful than the sculptor both in perpetuating the fame of the dead and in creating it.

—The persistence of the civic authorities of our suburban towns and villages in refusing to suppress the nuisance of dusty streets has never been explained. But the grocers and butchers of those charming resorts are now believed to be at the bottom of it, because there is on law against selling street dust on sugar, bananas, and leg of lamb.

—A simple and novel convenience may be seen attached to the front entrance to a house on Murray Hill. It consists of a small tin sign, placed just beneath the door-bell, and lettered as follows: "Gone to Europe; return in October."

—"The coronation of the Czar," remarks the Spectator, "was Asiatic in more than its accessories. If we were asked to state in a word the 'note' as central fact which differentiates Asia from Europe, we should answer, 'Immoderateness.' Nothing in Asia is sufficiently restricted. All things here in them a trace of immoderateness, as if gods and men had lost the sense of wise limitation. Forests in Asia cover kingdoms. Mountains occupy the area of large states. People are numbered, like the Chinese and the Indians, by their fractional relation to the whole human race. A cyclone devastates a province. A tidal wave sweeps away half a million of men. A famine slaughters out eleven millions. A wall bounds an empire. One sovereign is brother of the sun, another is Lord's Viceregent, a third is incarnate deity. This characteristic of immoderateness is the dominant one in the Russian coronation."

—Mr. G. Barnett Smith denies that Mr. Bonnycastle was the first writer "to remove Emily Brontë from out the shadow of her great sister's fame, and to put her in a place apart, fronting the sunlight." He declares that as long ago as 1873 he publicly asserted that, in certain respects, Emily was the most extraordinary of the three sisters, and that in being the author of Wuthering Heights she enjoyed the distinction of having written a book which stands as completely alone in the language as does Paradise Lost or Pilgrim's Progress.

—The Archbishop of Canterbury was presiding at a recent public meeting in Lambeth Palace when the head master of Harrow School offered the following resolution: "That it is expedient that there be a Church Central Church society, with the objects of promoting purity of life, and of preventing the degradation of women and children in accordance with the resolutions of the committee of the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury." Of course the head master did not mean precisely what he said.

—A picturesque feature of New York life fifty years ago was the guard with a blunderbuss, who mounted the box of Uncle Sam's mail wagons as they were leaving the Post-office, and took his seat beside the driver, with all the sense of vast responsibility to be expected of his station. The blunderbuss was a weapon about four feet long, funnel-shaped at one end, where it was large enough to let a man's fist in, and fired by means of a flint lock.

—The English people (according to one of their number) do not insist on the love of cakes and ale as in any degree a necessary one of popularity, and it is a great mistake to imagine that a frank love of the common pleasures of life is essential to popularity. What the democracy does dislike is any sense of superciliousness, what it does love is largeness and strength of nature made visible and conspicuous to the people, genuine character strongly displayed—as in the case of Mr John Bright, for example. No prig can ever become popular.

—We do not quite understand Mrs Patmore, when, in her Academy review of the Royal Academy exhibition, she speaks of "the charming, Quakerish simplicities of Mr Ilo's manner."

—A traveller in the frontiers of southern China saw a delightful young savage of sixteen or eighteen, graceful as a fawn, and with an English face, and dressed in a turban, a short jacket, and a blue cotton petticoat. "Her smile was pleasantly bright and cheery; but her voice—that most excellent thing in woman—was better than all. She watched us carefully, and seemed highly amused. A few minutes, and this vision of beauty stepped on to a small bamboo raft, with her companion—another young woman—and paddled rapidly across the river. She had gone, but her voice was heard by us like some pure bell sounding its silver music from the hill-side. Truly, if there be many such, I should vastly prefer being a savage in a civilized Christian."

—The Young Women's Christian Association of London has twenty-four auxiliary societies in the United Kingdom, besides forty London branches, with a membership of more than five thousand. The London members recently presented their friend Lord Shaftesbury with a silver inkstand and pencil-case, in acknowledging which Lord Shaftesbury said that if democracy could allow, the gift should go down as an heirloom to his posterity.

—"The exceptional nature of the feeling which has kept, and probably will keep, Lord Beaconsfield's memory green, may be traced," says the London Times, "to various causes, but all these may be summed up in the phrase that he impressed the popular imagination. Wrapped in a mysterious reticence—sometimes theatrically exaggerated, or broken only by flashes of rhetoric, but always when needed a panoply proof against hostile attack—Lord Beaconsfield inspired the belief that a part of his strength was held in reserve."

—From one of Mrs. Carlyle's letters: "When my husband is at work I hardly ever see his face from breakfast till dinner, and when it rains, as often even as when it does not rain, no living soul comes near me to speak one cheerful word, yet as long as I am in what the French call my 'room of reception' it never occurs to me to feel lonely. Send me to my bedroom for a day, to that great red bed in which I hate connected so many headaches, so many influenzas, and I feel as if I were already half buried."

—Several Russian prisoners have received severe sentences for alleged political crimes. A gentleman was condemned to lose all civil rights with hard labor in the mines for life, a student, the son of a priest, to fifteen years' hard labor in the mines; nine tradesmen to ten years' penal servitude; and Ekaterine Serebrana, the daughter of a lieutenant-colonel, was banished for life to the farthest settlements of Siberia.

—Thirty-nine lady students attended medical lectures in Paris last year. Eleven of them were English, five American, and one Indian.

—Sir Lyon Playfair, M.P., in a public speech recently reminded his hearers that it used to be observed that the English universities sought the upper classes to spend £1000 a year with dignity and intelligence, while the Scotch universities sought a man to make £1000 a year with dignity and intelligence.

—A recent traveller describes the Arabs of the desert as of a dark bronze shade, some almost approaching to black, but with nothing of the negro to their sharply cut features. Many of the goblins are extremely handsome. With scant drapery about their loins, they march in rude, proud and erect, each man armed with a lance and shield or a long two-edged sword. The hair is worn in a most peculiar fashion, with a crown tuft on top of the head, and then left to fall on either side to the shoulders at the back.

—The late French novelist Jules Sandeau lost his health some years ago on account of the untimely death of his son, a bright young naval officer. He used to sit listless for hours, staring vacantly at his son's uniform, which he always took with him when leaving Paris. "I call still flowers," he said, "from habit, but I no longer feel their beauty. It seems to me that I am bereft of perceptions and affections. I wish to live for my wife's sake, but if it were not for the loss of income which my death would entail, I should be glad to fall asleep forever beside my poor boy."

—The Westminster Review on Mr Thomas Hardy's novels: "Mr. Hardy's way of regarding women is peculiar and difficult to define, not because it is not a perfectly defensible one, but because it is to a great degree new. His women are creatures always fascinating, made up of more or less untrained instincts for both love and admiration, who can never help some degree of response when the satisfaction of those instincts lies open to them. They are all ultimately true, but with what intelligence, what an innate grace, at once delicate and frank, those instincts are manifested, may one known who has followed the history of Elfride Swancourt or Anne Garland. The charm of a woman for Mr Hardy is chiefly physical, but it is a charm which one may be interpreted by a subtle observation. to his stand point as regards art and the treatment of women there is occasionally what seems like an influence from Thackeray; but if Thackeray has the more range, eloquence, style, Mr Hardy possesses without question a more penetrating insight and a far finer sense of his art. He is never a Philistine, and he is no prude."

A BLACKVILLE SERENADE.—DRAWN BY SOL. EYTINGE, JR.—[SEE PAGE, PAGE 374.]

"Her gray eyes were gazing into vacancy."

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MATRIMONY," "MDLLE DE MERSAC," "NO NEW THING," "HEADS OF MONEY," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

DUNCE IS ARRESTED.

The dining-room at Thirlby was by far the most imposing room in the house. With its oak panelling, its family portraits, its antlers, and its high carved chimney-piece, for which a fashionable lady of the present day would be ready to give any amount of money, it was worthy to take rank with anything of its kind in the county, and we were justly proud of it. It was, however, a draughty room at the best of times, and a disagreeably vast one for two people to sit down to dinner in, therefore, when the weather was cold, and when we had nobody staying with us, my uncle and I used to dine together comfy in the library. A table was wheeled in while we were dressing, and when we came down there it was, ready laid, within comfortable distance of the fire. The claret stood in the fender, the coals and logs made a cheerful blaze, and Cooper, the butler, was waiting in all the dignity of office to remove the cover from the soup-tureen.

Cooper did not approve of this practice, which he considered a shocking and unworthy one, and being an old servant, he made no secret of his disapproval, but he was brought to countenance it—at a purely temporary arrangement—when it was pointed out to him that my uncle, who always suffered a great deal from the cold, could not dine in the larger room without risk of injury to his health. "Dinner will be in the library this evening, sir," Cooper would inform me day after day, with a perfectly grave face, "as Mr. Le Marchant is not feeling quite the thing." The repetition of this phrase eased his mind, and marked the protest which he felt bound to enter against any disturbance of established custom.

He went through the usual form on that spring afternoon which was made forever memorable to me by my encounter with Maud Dennison, and which was ordered so good an imitation of a winter afternoon as could be desired—spring being a season practically unknown in East Norfolk.

"Was the Rector here to-day, Cooper?" I inquired.

"He was, sir, and he left a bundle of manuscrip' and two right 'and gloves behind him."

"And—er—Miss Dennison?" I continued, asking the question for the more satisfaction of mentioning her name.

"Miss Dennison was here likewise, sir. Should we send a lad down with the papers and gloves?"

"Yes, I suppose so. Or rather, as I'll walk down with them myself after dinner."

It was, I believe, the great ambition of Cooper's life to acquire that impassive demeanor which characterizes the more fashionable members of his profession; and he surrendering diligence and study of the few good models who came in his way he had schooled himself into a very fair imitation of the soi-disant type of London butler; but nature will prove too strong for the best of us sometimes, and when he heard me express my intention of doing this very unusual thing, he so far forgot himself as to burst into a short laugh.

"I don't know why you should laugh, Cooper," I said. "I suppose you think I want to go down to the Rectory in order to see Miss Dennison."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the abashed Cooper.

"Well, you're perfectly right; that was my reason. Though, on second thoughts, I don't know that I will turn out in the cold to-night. Miss Dennison and I used to be like brother and sister, and of course I am no more in love with her. There's nothing to grin at in that."

"Nothing at all, sir."

"And you needn't take it into your head that I'm in love with every young lady whom I speak to."

"Oh dear no, sir," answered Cooper. "I hope you won't have no troubles of that kind for many years to come. You're too young, sir, to think of such things yet, if you'll excuse my saying so. Time enough for that when you leave school, sir."

And with this observation—which, I need hardly say, offended me far more than he laugh had done—Cooper withdrew.

When I went down to the library I found my uncle turning over the leaves of an old book with a amused smile on his face. "The Rector has been up to London," he said, "and see what he has brought me back! The dear old fellow must have taken a great deal of trouble about it."

My uncle was a bit of a bibliomaniac, and his love for rare editions was well known to his friends. I examined the little pile of brown volumes that lay on the table at his elbow. There was a Huddibras among them, I remember, and a dilapidated Fool of Quality. "Their book awfully old," I remarked. "I suppose they're worth a lot of money?"

"Well, no," answered my uncle, laughing outright. "To tell you the truth, they are worth very little as a pecuniary sense. But the value of a gift doesn't depend upon what it will fetch, you know, and the Rector, I suppose, thought as you do, that they were awfully old." Don't let him suspect that they are anything but pearls of great price. By-the-way, he has brought something really rare back with him in the person of Miss Maud, who has developed into one of the loveliest girls I ever beheld."

"I know she has," said I, nodding. "I met her this afternoon down by the Broad."

"You did, did you? Charley, my boy, you must beware of Cupid's darts. Upon my word, when I saw her to-day, I felt sincerely thankful that you were still only a school boy."

It was really too bad to be reminded of that humiliating fact twice within the course of half an hour. "I am in Upper Division, you know," I could not help saying.

"Yes, very true. Still, you have not left school yet."

"But why should you be thankful for that, Uncle Bernard?"

"When you are my age, and have sons of your own, you will know why," answered my uncle. And then we sat down to dinner and spoke no more of Maud Dennison.

That I thought of her all the time that we were talking about the lateness of the season, the disgraceful condition of the roads, and other similar topics of interest, as a matter of course; but I kept my thoughts to myself, and it was not until the dessert was upon the table that I remarked, in an off-hand manner, "I was thinking I would just stroll over to the Rectory presently. Mr Dennison has left some things behind him, as usual."

It was quite true that the Rector, who was one of the most absent-minded men that ever lived, rarely paid us a visit without forgetting to take away something that he had brought with him, but I was uncomfortably conscious that never before had I proposed to restore his property to him in person. My uncle, however, neither laughed nor made any comment upon my announcement beyond the perfunctory one that it was rather cold for evening walks. But by and by he disconcerted me very much by saying, musingly,

"I suppose we may take it for granted that you will lose your heart to this pretty Miss Maud; but, after all, that will do nobody any harm."

"I don't know why anything of the sort should be taken for granted," returned I, rather annoyed that a matter of so much importance should be so lightly treated; "but if it did happen—"

"What if it did?"

"Why, if it did, I think it might easily do me a great deal of harm. That is, if she refused me."

"Oh," said my uncle, "I imagine that there is very little fear of that."

"What do you mean?" I asked, surprised and flattered by this confident expression of opinion.

"Well, you see, Charley, I take it that by the time that you are of an age and in a position to make proposals of marriage to any lady, Miss Dennison will be Mrs. Somebody Else and the mother of several children. Besides which, you will probably have fallen in love with many other people before then. I don't mean to sneer at your feelings or your strength of purpose, my dear fellow," added my uncle, hastily; "I am only assuming that you are like myself and everybody else. Which is an unwarrantable assumption, you will allow."

I did not, of course, think that I resembled everybody else, but I let it be inferred that such might be the case, and my uncle went on to point out that young men who had to make their own way in the world were usually very fortunate if they could begin to contemplate matrimony about the age of thirty. That I was one of the class of young men alluded to had always been understood thing. In the course of nature it seemed probable that I should some day be the owner of Thirlby, but my uncle had never said that he intended to make me his heir, nor had I any right to expect that he should do so. The General undoubtedly had a prior claim, and there was no reason at all why the General should not marry and have sons of his own. Nevertheless, I was generally treated as though I had been the heir, and my private impression was that I should only be expected to earn my own living until the day when I should be called upon to enter into my inheritance. It was my earnest and honest wish that that day might be very far distant. I was young enough to regard death as a remote contingency so far as those whom I loved were concerned; young enough also to trouble my head very little about the future or the choice of a profession; young enough, finally, to be over head and ears in love with Maud Dennison, and to be free from any harassing sense of the responsibilities attaching to that condition. What makes love's young dream so sweet is that it is so thoroughly and delightfully selfish.

After what my uncle had said, I thought I would not go down to the Rectory that evening, but I went on the following morning, and from then to the end of the holidays—only a poor three weeks, alas!—not a day passed without my spending several hours with Maud. We soon became close and intimate friends, but I did not know then, and do not know now, whether she suspected the existence of any warmer feeling than friendship on my part. She treated me like a younger brother, and with that I was fain to be content. I was an innocent and inexperienced youth. There must have been a good deal of timidity mixed up with my boyish vanity, a considerable amount of awe and respect underlying the easy familiarity with which I was accustomed to approach my lovely neighbor. I remember thinking that I had done quite a bold and magnificent thing when I presented her with a fox-terrier pup, and it was not without blushing up to the roots of my hair that I ventured to ask her for a flower out of the Rectory garden on the last day before my return to Eton. She granted my request at once, laughing, and begging me to take my choice, and I chose a forget-me-not, which made her laugh the more. And I shouldn't wonder if I still had the same forget me-not in a box of moss which contains certain objects of value. But, to tell the truth, I have not looked into that box for some little time. What should I find if I were to open it? Dust and ashes, nothing more; withered flowers, scraps of ribbon—I don't know what odds and ends of rubbish, which would say nothing to me.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1311.

During the period which I am endeavoring to recall (and over which I fear I may be lingering too long for the reader's patience) life was very fresh and glorious to me. It may be, and I have no doubt it is, an extremely fine thing to be Prime Minister, or Lord Chancellor, or Archbishop of Canterbury; but I think all reflective persons will agree with me that, for unalloyed gratification of personal ambition, to be Captain of the Boats is better. My last summer half at Eton would have been saddened by reason of my approaching emigration of that proud office if I had not been in rather a hurry to get on to Oxford, and become a man. Mr Mackie, yielding to my entreaties, came down on the Fourth of June, and brought the Rector and Maud with him; and if they did not admire me in the fantastic nautical costume which tradition ordered me to wear on that occasion, they must have been less appreciative people than I took them for. We had a brilliant and delightful day indeed, I should be almost inclined to say that that Fourth of June was the happiest day of my whole life, only that one must really be a little cautious about what one commits to print, and there are persons living who might not take such a statement in good part.

When I arrived at Thirlbe in the beginning of August, bearing my sheaves, in the shape of a large box full of leaving books, with me, I was met at the station by George Warren, who had then been about ten years at Oxford, and had acquired all the privileges and adjuncts of manhood, including a pair of whiskers. I never had any secrets from George, and I determined to let him know at once how irrevocably my affections were engaged, in order to prevent any possible complications from arising in the future. Certainly it would have been a tolerably cool piece of presumption on the part of poor old George to raise his eyes to the loveliest of her sex, but the extreme improbability that any one, however unworthy, could see Maud without falling in love with her had also to be taken into consideration, and so while we drove along the dusty roads and lanes I told my bore tale as well as the brown mare, that was almost pulling my arms out of their sockets, would let me.

"Rather quick work, isn't it?" was George's comment, after I had come to the end of my narrative. George was a man of few words.

"That sort of thing always is," I answered.

"Is it? Well, I don't know, I'm sure."

"My dear fellow," I said, "if you had seen her, you would not be surprised—"

"Oh, but I have seen her," he interrupted, quietly.

"You have! Why in the world didn't you say so before? Well?"

"Well, she is certainly very pretty."

"I should rather think she was. Anybody could see that with half an eye. But she is a great deal more than pretty. Surely you must have found that out if you spoke to her at all."

"I thought her very pleasant."

"Very pretty!—very pleasant!" I repeated, impatiently. "You are the best fellow in the world, George, but you haven't a spark of romance or imagination in you."

"I suppose not."

"I told you about this, you know, because I was half afraid that you might fall in love with her yourself, and I thought it only fair to—to—"

"To warn me off. Thank you, Charley; that was very thoughtful of you," said George, who sometimes permitted himself a touch of gentle irony.

"But really I don't think it was necessary."

"No. You see, Charley, it is just as well for me that I happen to be unromantic and unimaginative, for I couldn't afford to fall in love with people just because they were pretty and pleasant. If I am lucky, I may be getting enough briefs by the time that I am five-and-forty to justify me in noticing the fact that there are women in the world, but for a great many years to come I shall have to ignore them—unless, indeed, some fascinating heiress should throw herself at my head."

The idea of such a piece of good fortune happening to homely old George was so funny that it sent me off into another fit of laughter, in which he joined quite good-humoredly. George Warren was the eldest of a very large family—of a family so large that his father was wholly unable to make distinctions between him and his younger brethren. It was believed that after Mr. Warren's death Hutchens would have to be sold, and that the amount of personal property to be divided among his children would be very modified. George had been originally destined for the Church, there being a family living which might have afforded a tolerably comfortable provision for him; but, after careful consideration, he had found that Art. XVII. was too hard a nut for him to crack; and so as soon as his University career should be completed he was to try what he could do for himself at the Bar, while the living was to be held in reserve for some younger and possibly less scrupulous member of the flock.

I can not explain the wonderful transformation which had come over all common and familiar persons and things with Maud Beaumont's retinue, nor could any one understand it who has not passed through a similar experience. As, however, nine people out of ten have a personal acquaintance with the phenomenon, this inability of mine is of no great consequence. Still, I can not allow every Jack to run away with the idea that his Jill is on an the equivalent of Maud Dennison. I am willing to admit that I might, at that early period of my career, have succumbed to the charms of an ordinary Jill, but, as it happened, such was not my fate.

Everybody acknowledged Maud's influence. She took our little world by storm, and, truth to tell, she ruled us somewhat supercously. The men submitted at once, and liked it. I am not sure that the gentler sex liked it quite as well just at first, but they submitted all the same. Lady Welby drove over in state to the Rectory, meaning to be very kind and patronizing, and to take the poor motherless girl by the hand, and so forth; and Maud, who did not like being patronized, was so dreadfully polite that she reduced that rather weak-minded old lady to tears. She had another manner with the humbler parishioners, but it was not less effectual, and in the course of a few months she had not only brought about an unprecedented zeal for cleanliness in the village, but had actually persuaded at least half of the women to abandon their Dissenting chapels and return to the bosom of Mother Church, dragging their astonished husbands after them. I myself had a fastidious dislike to entering the dwellings of the poor, of which I was rather proud than ashamed; but it pleased me to see my ideal flitting, like an angel of light, from one shabby cottage to another.

"I suppose it is a real pleasure to you to go about like that, doing good?" I said to her, admiringly, one day.

"It is nothing of the sort," she answered, tossing upon me in her quick way. "I utterly abhor it. The two things that I hate most in the world are bad smells and obstinate ignorance, but somebody must look after these people, and make them do what is for their good."

She had absolute confidence in her power to make them do anything that she pleased, and I am bound to say that her confidence was justified by results. To this day I can not understand how she managed to carry out the reforms that she did, without raising up for herself a host of bitter enemies. What proves her to have been no common person is that she made friends instead of foes. Even Mrs. Bunce, that stern Methody and ruthless disciplinarian, of whom the whole village stood in awe, and whom the great Bunce himself, despite his openly avowed contempt for all women-folk, secretly feared—even Mrs. Bunce, I say, softened into smiles at Maud's approach, and, "to please the young lady," consented to attend church for two or three Sundays, and give the Rector a trial. As far as I can remember, the Rector was weighed in the balance and found wanting; but that is neither here nor there.

In all these triumphs I took a pride and pleasure which were only tempered by the thought that the process of achieving them took up a good deal of time which might have been more agreeably employed. It is true that I saw Maud every day of my life, but it was not every day that she could or would come out riding, fishing, or sailing, hence arose disagreements which might have been called lovers' quarrels, only that, unhappily, the love was all upon one side. That she was on longer in ignorance of my entire devotion to her I was convinced; but she was pleased to treat me as a mere boy, and evidently did not take me seriously. This was discouraging, but I consoled myself with the reflection that there was plenty of time before me; and that, if I had not succeeded as yet in touching her heart, I had at least no rival to dispute the prize with me.

George Warren's behavior left nothing to be desired. His admiration for Miss Dennison was as great as it ought to have been, but not any greater. He worshipped her from a respectful distance, seldom spoke to her unless she first addressed him, and although he was our constant companion, generally contrived in a discreet manner to leave us practically alone. Considering how much annoyance he might have caused me by simply ignoring the fact that he was an occasional incumbrance, I could not but feel that this was very gentlemanly and considerate conduct on his part, and I blated as much to Maud one afternoon when we were lazily reclining in a punt on Thirlby Broad, pretending to fish. George had, as usual, left us, upon the pretext of trying fon pike. He had armed himself with a fly about the size of a tom tit, and of resplendent colors—no insect which one would fain hope has its counterpart in nature, but in which he had a lively faith. To the best of my recollection on pike was ever induced to look at it; but my friend was nothing if not persevering.

"What a good fellow George is!" I said. "I often think he is the best fellow I know."

"He seems to be very good-natured," Maud remarked; "but he always was that."

"Yes; and he's better than good-natured; he's a man whom you can thoroughly depend upon, don't you know—always sure to be at hand when he's wanted, and not of the way when he isn't. That's the sort of man whom I like."

"I dare say you do," said Maud, laughing; "but I don't think he is a very good friend for you."

"Why not?" I asked, in some surprise.

"Well, I think he encourages you to be selfish, and encouragement in that direction is not what you require. You and Mr Le Marchant have lived together like a couple of old bachelors, till you have got into the way of thinking that everybody and everything must give way to your convenience. It is extremely bad for you."

"Oh, come! You are not going to call Uncle Bernard selfish, I hope," said I.

"Perhaps he is not; I don't know him well enough to say. But I have no doubt about you."

"You are always finding fault with me," I sighed.

"I only do it for your good. Bunce, isn't it true that Mr. Charles is an uncommonly selfish young man?"

"Very like, miss," answered Bunce, who was seated at the other end of the punt, watching our floats, to which neither of us was paying any attention—"very like. They mostly is so. Come to that, so is young nonsen."

"Bunce, what do you mean?"

"Not you, miss, exceptions there is to every rule. I was a-speakin' in a general way, and in a general way o' speakin' you won't find much thought for others, nor what I call sympathy, on less 'tis in here and there a man o' the world, sim' lar to myself. Though p'raps I didn't ought to say so."

Bunce was fond of describing himself as a man of the world, and, indeed, he had seen a good deal of the world, in a geographical sense, having enlisted when a lad, and having served his Queen and country in India, at the Cape, and elsewhere. He had brought back with him a large stock of varied information, and also, I am sorry to say, a sublime contempt for his native country, the inhabitants of which, he was wont to declare, had neither "edification nor manners."

"You'll find Mr Chawls improve to be grown older, ones," he continued, with perfect gravity. "There's a deal o' truth in what you say about livin' in a dead-and-alive place like this. 'Tain't good for a man—makes him what I call narrer in his views. Times I feel it creepin' on me myself."

"You don't say so, Bunce?"

"I do, indeed, miss. Though, with my onsens and my large fam'ly, 'tain't much chance that I get to be self-indulgent."

"Exactly so, you are obliged to consider other people. Now, if Mr Charles will only have the sense, when he is old enough, to marry a nice managing woman like Mrs Bunce, there will be hope for him."

Bunce grunted, and muttered something about a deal of experience being wasted to manage a managing woman, but I thought he had already monopolized rather too much of the conversation, and I now turned my back toward him, and leaning forward, with my elbows on my knees, began to describe to Maud the sort of person whom I should like to marry. Bunce was never any restraint upon the privacy of our intercourse. He commonly stationed himself at the opposite extremity of the punt, and heard on more of what we were saying than we intended him to hear. Maud listened to me with a slight smile upon her parted lips, but her gray eyes were gazing into vacancy, and I am afraid that her attention was not diverted from the current of her own thoughts by my delicate remembers.

"No household ought to be without a woman," she said presently. "I am sure you and Mr. Le Marchant would be a great deal happier if you had one at the Hall. By-the-bye, how is Mr Farquhar?"

"Very bad," I answered. "My uncle thinks he won't get over it. He said this morning that unless there was better news to-morrow he should have to go down to Scotland."

"Mr father says," Maud went on, "that if Mr. Farquhar dies, perhaps Mrs. Farquhar will come and live at Thirlby. I do hope she will; it would be such a good thing for everybody."

I was about to express my dissent from this view, when Bunce anticipated me by giving a long growl, and shaking his head violently. "We don't want she!" he said.

Bunce prided himself upon having shaken off what he called the "outlandish lingo" of his forefathers; but in moments of emotion he would occasionally lapse into broad Norfolk. "We don't want she!" he repeated, emphatically.

We both looked at him in some surprise. "You don't like Mrs. Farquhar, Bunce, eh?" I asked, after a short pause.

"I do not, sir," he answered. "More than that, I can't abide her. Talk about a managing woman—O Lord! She come down here once, years ago—time when poor Squire was in the thick of all his and trouble; and what with her tettes and her sermons, she worried him that way that I'd like to have took and wrung her old neck for her—if I may make so free for to speak my mind, I don't say," continued Bunce, meditatively, "but what there was room for argyment, but to cast it up to Squire that he was to blame for all as happened—why, 'twas what I call neither kindness nor truth. 'Your house is left unto you dissolute,' says she. 'And more chance to you,' thinks I, 'for sayin' so!' Quotin' Scripter' agin your own flesh and blood!—'tis sheer blasphemer!" No, we don't want to see that lady at Thirlby on more."

This outbreak astonished me not a little. Once and only once before had Bunce alluded to some mysterious trouble which had fallen upon the family; but I had not liked to question him about matters which my uncle had not chosen to reveal to me; now, in all probability, should I have received an answer if I had done so. Maud, naturally, knew of no reason for being so scrupulous.

"What trouble are you talking about, Bunce?" she asked.

Bunce recovered himself at once. "Lor! dear me! if there an't a bike!" he exclaimed. "Ah, he's off, and took the bait with him, too! That's where 'tis, you see; you can't talk and catch fish at the same time."

I think he was a good deal vexed with himself for having been betrayed into saying as much, for he relapsed into an obstinate silence, and was barely civil to Miss Dennison when he wished her good-evening.

"Is it true that Mrs. Farquhar is so dangerously ill?" Maud asked me, presently.

"I don't know anything about her," I answered, "but it doesn't much signify, for I think I am on with some confidence that she won't come to live at Thirlby. I dare say she wouldn't come if she were asked, but she won't be asked."

"How can you tell? After all, she is Mr Le Marchant's mother."

"Yes; but they have seen very little of one another for the last twenty years. The fact is, I don't think they hit it off particularly well. Anyhow, I agree with Bunce—as don't want her."

Maud was beginning, "I feel sure that she is a very nice old lady," but at this juncture George rejoined us, soppy headed but cheerful, and Mrs. Farquhar escaped further discussion.

When I reached home I found that my uncle had already started for Scotland. A telegram had appeared, had arrived to say that Mr Farquhar was dying, and he had just had time to pack his portmanteau and leave, in order to catch the night mail. In spite of what I had said to Maud, the news made me a little uncomfortable. I knew that my uncle's inclinations would be strongly against inviting a third person to share his powerful and monotonous manner of existence, but I also knew that his own inclinations were the very last thing that would be likely to weigh with him, and I am sure that on one breathed more heartfelt aspirations that night for Mr Farquhar's recovery than I did.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE SERENADE.

[See Illustration on Page 373.]

TENOR (beneath the window):

Cum' shinin' out, me fairest lub,
De stars am in de sky,
But soon dey'll fade dere vanquished hosts,
If you jus' wunk yo' eye.
De katydids am callin', lub,
From ebb'ry willer tree,
An' de katydids'to hollos back—
Cum' out, me lub, an' see.

ALTO (at the window):

Oh! ain't it sweet to listen at Him singin' by de moon,
Wid crickets and grasshoppers
A-goin' in de tune!
"Me fairest lub"—Oh, golly, now,
Dat's me!—Jane Ann Melin.
Be still, me heart, an' let me hear
Dem bonny words agin.

BASS (under the shed).

Go on, young nigger, chirp away,
Yo' beachbird from de Souf
I'n 'fraid dat soon yo'll sing a tune
De odder side yo' mouf
Yo' wouldn't be so chipper, guess,
About "me fairest lub,"
If yo' knowed de ole man war nowa',
A-waitin' wid a club!

THE SECRET OF A LARCH-TREE

A LADY, young, pretty, blonde, sparkled with diamonds as she danced, herself the magnet of all eyes, amidst the tassic, light, and revelry of the August night at Silver Spring. Diamonds twinkled in the fair hair, poised there as a butterfly; diamonds trembled like dew-drops about the snowy throat, and formed a blazing pendent medallion amidst the flowers of the satin corsage; diamonds flashed in the tiny ears and on each dimpled wrist.

"What a lucky fellow Delancey was to secure such a prize!" said the masculine voice unanimously.

"I wonder she dares to carry such jewels about with her; it is very bad taste to wear them at a hotel hop," was the feminine verdict.

"Professor Horton, do you see the lady with the diamonds?" inquired the Colonel, with his soft, good-natured laugh.

"Yes, I see her. What then?" retorted the Professor, grimly.

"Oh, nothing to all, only the Silver Spring will be regarded as a fashionable resort, after all, now our own Bellevue Hotel and such guests. Next year we shall be able to hold up our heads with Saratoga and Newport, if we can add a racecourse and club-house, sir." Here the Colonel rubbed his hands together with a gesture which has become traditional with the hotel proprietor of all ages.

"Silly women, decked with diamonds—ridiculous race-courses!" echoed Professor Horton, contemptuously. "Our Silver Spring will be ruined by such follies, and all respectable habitués will quit the spot forever. I have been here every season for fifteen years, and—"

"Will come fifteen years more, I hope," interpolated the Colonel, adroitly. The fat landlord adjusted the collar which imprisoned his own not pretty face, a countenance most suggestive of the proprietor of Silver Spring.

The face of Professor Horton was lean, sallow, and dolorous, on the contrary, and was clouded by the discontent of one who has a grievance to lay at the door of circumstance.

"Fiddlesticks!" he retorted, sharply. "I will engage the state apartments of Caron Hall or the Ocean House sooner than return here. Mrs. Ocean knows me, and I am a man, eh? Are the diamonds genuine?"

"Real! They are of the purest water, and cost seventy-five thousand dollars, I am told. She was an heiress, you know, and when she married last year, the accumulated interest of her minority was invested in those jewels." Such was the Colonel's glib explanation.

"Who is her partner?" pursued the Professor.

"Oh, the French Marquis de Ratti. They say he followed Mrs. Delauney here, after being all about in society at New York and Washington last winter."

"I do not believe in foreign noblemen," grumbled the Professor. "They prove as dry tablets and barbers more often than not."

Professor Horton's benevolent bulbous nose acquired a satirical aspect, his shrewd gray eyes twinkled behind a rim of his spectacles, while his humorous mouth twitched beneath the grizzled tent! He surveyed the animated scene much as a naturalist inspects an insect under a microscope. The Marquis de Ratti was not at all the typical Frenchman in appearance, although well dressed and easy in bearing. He was a large, powerfully built man of uncertain age, with cold light eyes and irregular massive features, his hands and feet were large, muscular, and powerful, despite the sheathing of kid and leather.

"He looks more like a prize-fighter than a gentleman; but perhaps the prize-fighting element is the highest evidence of blood among the nobility," mused this republican spectator. "Humph! I should not care to meet him on a dark night. He might crack my skull like an egg-shell between finger and thumb. Oh, the customs of fashion! That young husband, leaning against the wall, permits the Marquis de Ratti to waltz with his wife, instead of knocking him down for his impudence."

At this moment a pretty girl appeared behind the Professor and the landlord, with round fair face and hair meekly brushed back from the temples, and ingenuous blue eyes. The pretty girl smoothed her neat apron and lowered her eyes demurely as the dreamland, in the softest of voices, "If you please, sir, may I have my tea?"

"Mrs. Delauney's English maid, Alice," explained the Colonel, when he had granted the request.

Why did Professor Horton follow the English maid, so young, so genteel and demure, with his eye? He could not tell. He saw her pause outside another window, where the Marquis de Ratti was taking the air, the dance being over, and it seemed to the observer that the two exchanged a glance, a smile, a swift signal, before the girl disappeared around the corner of the house.

"We only lack the gallantries of noblemen and ladies' maids to complete the ruin of our Silver Spring," muttered this stern moralist, whose ideas were as very old-fashioned. He sought his own chamber gloomily, for in addition to perturbation of mind, owing to having his private retreat invaded by the Philistines of fashion, he was literally broken by bodily fatigue. He had rambled many miles that day, botanizing in the valleys, and seeking geological specimens on adjacent hills. His shoes were dusty, his raiment bore-tree, his loose sack coat freighted with the "rubbish" previous to the advent of the olds external pockets, while rheumatic twinges in knee and back reminded him that he was no longer young, thereby increasing his exasperation. Then to return to a hotel where all the world was dancing, and one woman was decked like an idol with seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of diamonds. The Professor's cup of bitterness brimmed over at these reflections. The room was stiflingly hot, but he lighted his lamp, and forced himself to read an extract from Dr. Dollinger, while moths thundered about the flame, fiving themselves to a condition of unpleasant crispness, and mosquitoes sting his temples. His watch marked midnight, and still the monotonous of the ball room and the twang of musical instruments reached his ear, precluding the possibility of sleep.

"Squeak, squeak, fiddles! Boom away, bass viols! Keep it up until morning, for all means I wonder if that is the music of the future? Ah-h!" Here the listener clinched his teeth, with a truly diabolical expression of countenance, as the violins clamdered over his nerveless system, snatched up his broad felt hat, and strode out-of-doors, actuated by the impulse of escape.

The night was sultry and oppressive. The Professor breathed a sigh of relief on he quitted the vicinity of the hotel, which sparkled with many lights through the trees like an ogre's eye. Darkness and the obscurity of shrubbery welcomed him abroad in this unusual hour. He strolled about the gravel paths, feeling himself with his hat, and paused beneath the projecting roof of the ornamented kiosque of the Silver Spring.

"There will be a thunder-storm before morning," philosophized the Professor, replacing his hat.

All was deliciously still here, and far below, guarded by the encircling beam, bubbled the Silver Spring, cool and limpid, source of health, on the Professor firmly believed. Had not the nymph of the fountain spread her wings in startled flight in the disastrous change from rural tranquillity to a fashionable resort? The Professor leaned on the parapet, and peered into the crystal depths of the spring, musing in this vein. As he did so he perceived two persons advancing from opposite directions to meet a few yards distant from himself. They proved to be a man and a woman, and they scarcely passed before separating again with the same rapidity of movement as they had met.

"Wait for me," said the woman. "I shall have to manage, to get away at all."

"I will wait until morning," replied the man.

"She is sure to dance to the very last, you know," added the woman.

"Don't lose your head, that's all," admonished the man.

"I lose my head, indeed!" retorted the woman, whose voice and bearing were youthful.

The Professor moved slowly away, scarcely heeding these words wafted to his ear by a passing breeze. As an angle of the path was o rustic bench beneath a larch-tree, known on Professor Horton's favorite seat. Hither he directed his steps in an irritated mood, and sank down on it in sheer weariness. The scent of flowers reached him, while the foliage seemed to spread above him "fragrant robes of darkness." Grateful repose succeeded noise and light, lulling all his senses to soft oblivion; he fell asleep.

He was awakened by a horrific peal of thunder, and opened his eyes with a bewildered uncertainty as to surrounding objects. The trees swayed wildly in the rising wind, a few large drops of rain fell heavily among the leaves; lightning quivered on the horizon. Suddenly a female form bent over him, some small object was thrust into his hand, and a voice whispered in his ear:

"I am early. She had a headache. Quick! take them, or I shall be missed."

The thunder rolled, the trees swayed, the woman vanished. Professor Horton combed several times, and opened his mouth to speak, then closed his lips without sound. The object thus unexpectedly consigned to his care was a small leather bag, scarcely more than a tobacco pouch, and heavy. Mechanically he thrust it into one of the side pockets of his loose coat. Hark! A heavy footstep crushed the gravel on the path to the right. The Professor rose to his own feet as if moved by a spring, his knees shook, his teeth chattered, a deadly fear smote him.

Fear of what end? He did not know. To shrink to the left, gain the next clump of shrubbery, and conceal himself, was the work of a moment, and accomplished with the more ease that he knew every inch of ground from long familiarity. Had he not planted many of these trees, which soon proved friends? The hiding place gained was a larch surrounded by stiff little fragrance cedars, and forming a sort of labyrinth. Scarcely had the Professor glided into this shelter than a vivid sheet of lightning illuminated the whole country side. He saw himself seated on the rustic bench beneath the larch-tree! He could not believe the evidence of his own senses; the breath remained suspended on his lips. Had he been a devout Catholic he would have crossed himself, invoking the protection of a calendar of saints, a chill of superstitious dread certainly stagnated his blood. Was he to believe that his hour had come? There sat his own image on the rustic bench, the soft felt hat pulled down over the brow, the broad shoulders, the slouching semidescript attire; nothing was lacking to complete the resemblance. Was he still asleep, victim of nightmare, as had he gone mad? He pinched his flesh and rubbed his eyes violently. The figure under the larch-tree did not vanish. Swift realization of the truth dawned on the dreamy scholar. He was alone, at a distance from the now silent hotel, and he had in his pocket a bag which belonged to the other. What if the unknown had found him still on the knoll? What if he emerged now, accosted the stranger, and gave him the bag?

"I should be murdered as surely as there is a Heaven above us," shuddered the man of letters, with a conviction for which he could give no reason.

At this juncture the wind freshened, and the rain fell in torrents, while the lightning became less frequent. Professor Horton quitted the larch tree, reached the hotel with surprising agility, found a window of the recent ball-room unfastened, groped his way through that deserted apartment, and gained his own chamber. The bag was gone. He had lost it from the wide pocket, probably in his flight. His watch marked two o'clock. The Professor extinguished his candle, opened the shutters of the window, and seated himself with his arms fixed on the eastern horizon. He was a prey to the most exciting emotions.

Professor Horton was the first votary of the Silver Spring abroad next morning. If he was feverish and haggard, with a steadily, even furtive aspect, the boy at the fountain did not notice the circumstance. Always an early riser, the Professor sipped a glass of the sparkling water, and then walked along the upper paths of the grounds. Unmindful he skirted the rustic seat beneath the larch-tree, and approached the larch. A short, dry laugh of triumph escaped the lips of the usually undemonstrative student. A leather bag, half pouch, lay, concealed by the long grass, beneath the spreading boughs. The larch tree had kept its secret well. The bag remained where it had fallen from the Professor's wide pocket. He clutched it, returned to his room, and proceeded to investigate the contents. The little bag held the Delauney diamonds. Necklace, bracelet, butterfly ornament—nothing was lacking in the precious heap swept hastily from cumbersome case and casket.

Five minutes later the mayor landlord was seized by the collar, dragged into his private office, and confronted by Professor Horton, whose agitation verged on sheer heresy. The latter took from his pocket a little bag, and poured out the Delauney diamonds, telling a wild and incoherent tale meanwhile about a larch-tree and midnight rambles.

"Nobody would believe it, you know," said the Colonel, coolly. The hotel proprietor is never surprised in this world.

"Take the trinkets, and restore them in your own way. Do not mention me in the transaction" retorted the Professor. He stooped and plunged his fingers once more into the rainbow of precious stones with a sort of intoxication; the starry rays of rose and blue dazzled, blinded him. "Beautiful and fatal gift to man!" he murmured, with parched lips.

The Colonel closed one eye, with the aspect of a sagacious bird.

Professor Horton sought his bed, and slept heavily until four o'clock in the afternoon. He was awakened by voices, and peered through the shutters of his window. A carriage waited outside the Delauney party to the steamboat at the lake. Mr. and Mrs. Delauney were already seated, while Alice, the maid, had paused to reply to the hand waiter, after which she re-entered the hotel. At this moment Professor Horton's door was opened, and the Colonel entered with the bouncing swiftness of movement peculiar to fat men in haste. If the candour of the Professor had been extraordinary in the morning when he had restored the jewels, that of the Colonel was not less so or the afternoon. He locked the door, made a warning gesture to the Professor, and stole on tiptoe to a second door at the extremity of the large room, where he lay down on the floor and applied eye and ear to the crack. Voices became audible in the adjoining chamber.

"I was there at one o'clock, and gave it you," said a woman.

"A lie! I waited all night, and you did not come," said a man.

"I gave it to a person under the tree, and he took it," gasped the woman.

"Fool! Then the game is up. Get yourself dismissed at Newport, and cut to New York. If I believed you were tricky, my girl, it would be the worse for you."

There was a sound of footsteps, and immediately afterward the Delauney carriage rolled away.

The Colonel rose to his feet, chuckling at the success of his stratagem.

"Set a thief—when?—I come a woman to catch a woman. My wife thought of having the English maid sent back in search of a missing bag, in order to give her a chance to communicate with her accomplice in the hotel, if she had one. The bag was dropped in the empty room next to you, for the purpose, and a man joined her there. Your story is amply corroborated, you see, by the few words exchanged."

"I believe the Marquis de Ratti is the accomplice, and no more a Frenchman than you are," exclaimed the Professor.

"So do I; but how to prove it?" rejoined the Colonel.

"You should have them arrested," urged the Professor.

"What is the charge? Your adventures of the night? The noble Marquis caught whispering with a pretty girl? No, sir; I gave back the diamonds to Mr. Delauney—with a suitable explanation—and he has carried them away in a money belt. We close know the whole truth."

"And the larch tree," added the Professor, "it was the noble larch tree that kept the secret, my friend. Well, well, I hope you are pleased with the fashionable elements attracted to our Silver Spring. Doubtless the Marquis de Ratti and the demure English maid Alice belong to one of those bands of English thieves who are said to keep a map of country seats with reference to the plate chest, and are now trying their fortune in America. How beautiful they were—those diamonds!"

The Marquis de Ratti departed by the nine-o'clock boat that same evening. His foreign accent was never more apparent than when he took leave of Silver Spring.

"THE KNEELING NUN."

This beautiful picture, by Daniel Neal, an American long resident in Munich, was painted in 1881, and exhibited at Munich, Hamburg, and Berlin with marked success. Critics of the German press were eloquent in its praise. It was purchased in 1882 by an American gentleman for a private collection, and we believe it has not been exhibited in this country. The original study for the picture was later finished to the order of an American purchaser, and was briefly exhibited at the Century Club last spring.

Our illustration, which is from the large picture, represents a young and saintly "bride of heaven" at her devotions in an under-ground chapel of the tenth century. The subject was suggested to Mr. Neal by the ballad of Uhland, in which he beautifully illustrates the vivifying powers of faith in a ray of light penetrating down into a crypt—"O Sankt des Lichts," etc. From the back of the altar before which the nun kneels the "gladsome light" falls upon her face and form with illuminating effect, which the artist treated in a most skilful manner. It is real morning sunlight, but somewhat subdued by the somber place in which it falls. The pose of the figure in perfect in harmony with the spiritualized expression of the radiant upturned face. The rapt soul in her fervor hails the life-giving sunbeam as Heaven's messenger to her spirit. It brings no discontent with her imprisonment. No list-away flower breath stirs her heart, or remembered bird-song thrills back on her memory. She seems absorbed in a religious ecstasy. This is purely portrayed, without the slightest tendency to the weak sentimental; rather it is severely true.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

"Whether can't play ball," says a Philadelphia newspaper. Although the pertinence of the observation is not apparent at this distance, its truth can not be disputed, and the remark is autonomity as being almost the only favorable thing about can be truthfully said about the liquid in question.

Journals along the Southern coast are congratulating the Secretary of the Navy on the fact that he fails not the slightest uneasiness while riding across the East River Bridge.

Some specialist should turn his attention to ascertaining the degree in which the manifestations of alcoholism are affected by the sensational topic which happens to be uppermost in any given community. Since the occurrence of this season's cyclones in the West and Southwest the most remarkable stories are told by persons of those regions concerning the cyclones they claim to have seen in the air. An Illinois man reports that while standing on the top of a hill he saw "five distinct cyclones" to the west and south, "travelling in a northerly direction at a terrific rate of speed." They resembled "huge balls of cloud," and appeared at times to come to the ground, and then bound to a great height. When near the earth they were of a greenish color, and as they arose they became illuminated.

"No boiser in fourse!" screamed one of three Chinamen who entered a noble street car in Philadelphia, staring wildly ahead.

"No boiser tarkee!" yelled another, rushing toward the rear of the car.

"No subee," remarked the third, waving his self and crossing his legs, "go fine ev'lything, allee same."

It is estimated that at least a hundred dozen as many ladies from the United States visit the Old World as there are European ladies who visit this country.

The Emperor of Brazil is going to visit Europe again. It is recalled that to the cosmos of his last visit to England he used to make appointments to inspect public institutions at five or six o'clock. The custodians supposed that he meant in the afternoon, but found to their great dismay that he meant five in the morning, and that he was always punctual.

On the evening of the East River Bridge opening two residents of Ohio Grove, in that State, went to the top of High Point, one of the Catskill peaks, to see what anything of the fireworks would be visible at that distance. They obtained their bearings before darkness came on. They report that they were rewarded by seeing a number of the rockets, dimly, but still quite distinctly. High Point is some 4400 feet above tide-water, and about one hundred miles from New York.

Residents of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, are awakening to the fact that they have a historical relic of considerable interest in the midst of them. Surrounded by dilapidated tenements, and itself occupied as the domicile of a poor family, is the old Fort Duquesne block-house. Steps have been taken to open a public park around the relic.

"General Longstreet believes that the sixty-five thousand colored voters of Georgia are slowly gravitating toward the Democratic party." Gravitation and heroigration are responsible for almost all the increase that has come to the Democratic party in late years.

It is announced that Lieutenant Schwatka, the arctic explorer, has offered to join Commander Cheyne in his proposed trip to the north pole by balloon. Commander Cheyne recently visited this country for the purpose of enlisting an interest in his scheme. He did not succeed so far as to obtain offers of pecuniary aid sufficient to materially assist him, and he took his departure. The outfitting out of the Nordenskjold expedition for Greenland has incited Commander Cheyne to renewed exertions, and there seems to be a probability that his plan will be tested.

The little city of Bucharest, the capital of Wallachia, is polyglot in respect to its newspapers. Besides its several Roumanian papers, there are four printed in French, two in German, and one each in Italian, Greek, Hungarian, and Bulgarian.

One of the results of a lawsuit recently tried in California is to give definiteness to the phrase "a right smart chance." A witness testified that he saw a right smart chance of hogs invading the plaintiff's field. The Court asked him to put this into figures, and he testified that in Arkansas and Missouri "a right smart chance" meant fourteen. The judge instructed the jury to consider the phrase equivalent to fourteen, and damages to the full amount claimed were awarded the plaintiff.

The final case to come before the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March, 1863, relative to seized and abandoned property in the Southern States, has been adjusted by that tribunal. The records of the court show that nearly all of the property taken possession of by government agents, to which this act applied, was cotton. Seventeen hundred and seventy-eight claims to parts of this property were filed, and the total amount claimed was $77,785,962. The government realized $31,722,446 from its sale, of which $6,551,000 were to pay the cost of selling and collecting. The amount paid to persons from whom property was taken was about thirteen million dollars, leaving a balance, after deducting other expenses, of between ten and eleven millions in the Treasury. This will remain the property of the United States.

JUDGE FORAKER.

The Hon. Joseph Benson Foraker, the Republican candidate for Governor of Ohio, is a native of that State. He was born near Ramsheugh on the 6th of July, 1846. He entered the army when only sixteen years old, as a private in the Eighty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, having much difficulty in passing muster on account of his youth. He was rapidly promoted to the rank of Captain, and accompanied his regiment through the war, being most of the time with Sherman's forces. For some time he was attached to General Slocum's staff.

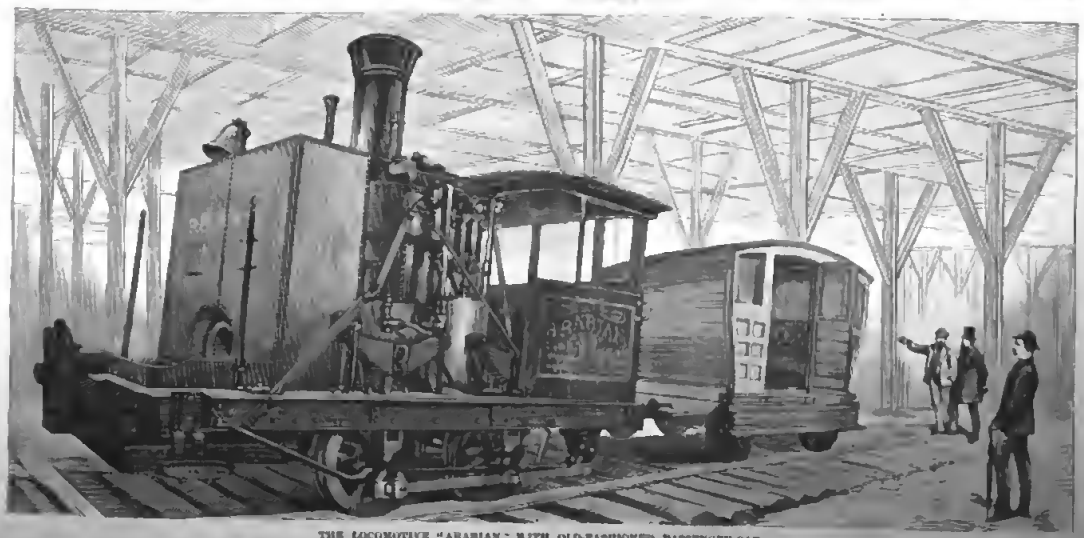
On the cessation of hostilities he entered the Ohio Wesleyan University, but completed his studies at Cornell, where he graduated in 1869, and was soon afterward admitted to the bar at Cincinnati. In 1878 he was elected Judge of the Superior Court, but resigned last year because of temporary ill health.

Digitized by Google

STEAMER DAY IN NEW YORK—THE GRAND SUMMER RUSH FOR EUROPE.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 370.]

THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.

INTERIOR OF THE BUILDING.



THE LOCOMOTIVE "ARABIAN," WITH OLD-FASHIONED PASSENGER-CAR.

THE RAILROAD EXHIBITION AT CHICAGO.—From Photographs by Cowlin.—[See Page 379.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

AUTHOR OF "KITTY," "EXCHANGE NO ROBBERY," "HOLIDAY IN EASTERN FRANCE," "DR. JAMES," "THE SILVERTONS; OR, THE OUTSIDERS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

PRECISELY at twelve of the clock Miss Bumstead ushered Arthura with due form and ceremony into Mr Constantine's bed-chamber, there to receive an impression she never forgot as long as she lived. If he were marvellous to look at by daylight, his complexion then wearing the smoothness and lustre of polished ivory, how was the effect heightened by the dim light of shaded lamps and rich shadows of crimson bed hangings? Under a spacious canopy lay Mr. Constantine, not vulgarized by the orthodox night-cap of our grandfathers, but having for head-gear a finely spun shawl or cuffah of Oriental silk, twisted round his head turban wise, and shewing gorgeous interweavings of scarlet and gold. His night gown, if it is permitted to describe such a garment, was on less peculiar, having an outer covering of soft Persian silk, warm in color as the rubies, whilst the lining was of finest linen, with elaborately embroidered wristbands and collar, and underneath this was yet another and a still finer and softer garment, worn for comfort, and not for grace. Thus beautifully apparelled, Mr Constantine might well receive midnight visitors without scruple, and being accustomed to see one fair reader after another, offered an apology when Arthura made her appearance. Her own dress was too striking to be passed by without comment. She wore a loose gown of crimson satin, wadded after the fashion of the olden time—a gown so simple, so stately, and withal so matronly that whilst it added considerably to her beauty, it also is at added years and gravity. The sumptuous woman was surely no mere girl of character and spirit, but a tragedy queen.

"Place yourself quite at your ease," said Mr Constantine, "and—let me see—what can we have to-night? Read me the titles of the books before you, my dear."

Arthura read: "Vathek, The Bride of Lammermoor, The Mysteries of Paris."

"Ah," sighed Mr Constantine, "would there were a novel such! I love a story, but I never can find one nowadays. Your writers have no imagination. Yet hath this age produced one novel. You must know it, my dear—the book writ by the parson's daughter?"

"Jane Eyre?"

"You have said it. Now I am no lover of parsons, but I am ready to forgive all the pig-headedness of the race, from Calvin downward, for the sake of that little witch's performance."

"Oh, why call her a witch, sir?"

"My dear, 'tis the finest compliment I can pay her. Who were the witches and wizards of the Dark Ages but the knowing ones, the inventors? The parsons burned 'em all, and if that little Yorkshire girl had written her book four hundred years ago, she would have gone to the stake with the rest. Her own father would have set fire to the faggots. The first woman who invented a gown was sewed up in it and drowned, dropped on it, and the first man who baked a loaf of bread shut up in his oven and baked too. No wonder we are all so stupid, seeing that we are begotten of the asnales and dunderheads who never invented anything. But the reading—well, let us have a chapter of the Mysteries of Paris, unless you know a good ghost story. Think"

Arthura thought. Yes, she knew one or two, she said.

"Close the book, then, my dear, and tell me the first. We must keep the other choice morsels for to-morrow. When you have done the story, you will find my imagination thoroughly alert; I shall then require only the marvels and horrors that are dear and familiar. These always soothe me to sleep."

Arthura could not resist a smile.

"You are amused at the nature of my soporific, my dear? Well, there is an accounting for tastes. Now for your story Pile portent upon portent, mystery upon mystery. Be not afraid of making the hair to stand on end. Freeze the blood if you can So begin"

Arthura told her story—a family ghost story—and Mr Constantine expressed himself much gratified.

"A very pretty horror, my dear, and it does great credit to your house. A good ghost story is an aristocratic as a long pedigree. Now for the reading You tell me you are an musician. Are you versed in the music of the muse?"

Arthura looked blank.

"Can you discern betwixt an a snort and a snore? We snort wide awake; we only snore when asleep. As soon as you hear the latter sound, turn down the lamp and steal softly away. But you must not mistake the prelude for the performance, the tuning of the instruments for the melody itself."

Arthura took up the book and began to read. And long she read, for Mr Constantine seemed unusually alert, and even restless.

"The fact is, my dear," he said "your voice is new to me. You'll do its work better to-morrow. And I can't help looking at your wonderful gown, fit for a female Prospero, a beautiful sorceress Where did you get it, my Prospero?"

"Miss Hermitage gave it to me as a birthday present, sir," Arthura made meek reply

"I wish I had a diamond star to give you. It wants a diamond star I had one years ago. That little bunny Polly got it from me" He hair lain his head on the pillow, with closed eyes, but one started up uneasily. "Good heavens! what have I been talking about?" he said. "I do lose the thread of my discourse, I know, sometimes. What have I just said, my dear?"

"You said something about Polly, sir," Arthura replied, demurely.

"No misdirection, I hope? Polly—yes, it was Polly. The rascal mine! But continue, my dear. Don't let me talk. Give me to drink of mandragora."

Arthura went on, and for a long time Mr Constantine lay in a half drowse, with a smile on his lips, the picture of a placid contentment Every word did not reach him, but he caught the meaning hrokenly, as the scenes of a summer garden reach us through a door that is opened and shut. And at last the voice did its work, Mr Constantine slept indeed, and Arthura left him, herself to read of no mandragora The next day and the next were spent in the same way—a happy afternoon with Steppie and the children, and a midnight reading and colloquy with Mr. Constantine Arthura soon found out that he liked to lead up to the reading by a little talk; and strange yet fascinating were Mr Constantine's nocturnal discourses, the books on his shelves hardly more so.

"Observe," he said, on the third night, "the order and contents of my library—my midnight library. You will soon become acquainted with an older one, I'll warrant. To the completest in the world. There you may find Segur's Dream That holds a foremost place. And the visit of Ulysses (they've changed his name since I went to school) to the phantoms of those who fought at Troy And the Magic Doctus of the great Spanyard (his name escapes me) And the ghost-seer of the greater Germun. How names slip from me! Visionaries, Illuminati, dreamers, necromancers—not a poet or prose man who has written of the unseen world but is here. I have them all. We have no better teachers"

"Do you believe, then, in ghosts, sir?" asked Arthura, innocently.

"You misunderstand me, my dear. The belief in ghosts has nothing to do with it But thnth, now, who but those men and women lift the veil from the palpable and the familiar, which for the most part is gross and mean? A touch of the supernatural reminds us that we are part spirit, and all flesh. We should, must be, mysteries to ourselves, or life has no meaning Will, take up what book you will. Wave your wand, my Prospero, and conduct me into the land of shadows."

"Frankenstein lies on the table, sir"

"Read that. Twas writ by the daughter of one seraphic spirit, the wife of another, herself a rare genius. And the ancild—that is, the parson's—would fain have harmed 'em all three. But read, my dear, read."

And once more Mr. Constantine listened for an hour or so, with a placid smile upon his lips, fairly slumbering at last. By the fourth night Arthura had grown accustomed to her task, and found it pleasant enough She herself loved a ghost story, and delighted Mr Constantine with one or two, which, being family traditions, he now heard for the first time.

"On my word, you are a promising disciple. The other ladies, one and all, poor creatures, used to quake with fear when they came into my room, as Bumstead told me, and were afraid to creep upstairs alone afterward. Segur's Dream and The Visions of Horns they did not mind, Frankenstein drove them mad, and The Ghost Seer lost me many readers. They would rather beg for bread than read such things at midnight, they declared You are always in the humor. Well, what book lies open before you?"

"'Tis a volume in manuscript, sir, and the first page opens with 'Pompey's Vision.'"

"Ah! my manuscript volume My posy! my plaid of chintz! 'Tis a collection of choice fragments and pieces, my dear, that I have myself culled from authors of all countries, ancient and modern, and translated for the delectation of my old age We will begin to-day at the beginning, and each our way gradually to the end. Stop, however: I had something to ask you What might it is? Ah! I remember now" Mr Constantine now raised his head from the pillow, and sitting up, put the following question: "Would you tell me exactly what you think of Valerian?"

CHAPTER XXV.

"I know really nothing of this young man," added Mr Constantine. "You have lived under the same roof with him for upward of a year You should be quick at reading character, unless I misread your own. Appraise him."

"Was ever a man read by a woman, sir?"

"On my word, a spirited reply. But something of Valerian's disposition and nature generally you must have learned We find out if a human being is good or bad, amiable or sour just as we can tell the color of his eyes or hair. I am particularly interested in Valerian just now, not on his own account, I confess, but on Stephana's."

Arthura, ever heaven of the brave, truest of the true, made quiet answer. She had heard nothing, she said

"What manner of man is this Valerian?" continued Mr. Constantine. "Has he understanding—a heart?"

"None if he marries Stephana," Arthura said

"And why?"

"Because he does not love her, sir, nor will she ever love him"

"I feel pretty certain of that too. But, my dear, wedlock need not presuppose love. People marry for position, for advancement, for a thousand motives besides love"

"The more's the pity"

"Ah! you are romantic, I see. Well, for Valerian. Is he amiable?"

"Not if he marries Stephana without loving her, sir"

"True. Stephana is adorable. But if she, of her own free will, marries Valerian in order to advance his fortunes, what then? is he worthy of the sacrifice?"

"He would prove himself worthy beforehand by accepting it."

"I protest she has an answer for everything. There was a French king, my dear, who loved wit better than war He would have divorced his dull Barvoard and made room his queen."

"That would have been a pity, sir."

"Why a pity? Have you an ambition?"

"Once his queen, sir, he would have had no more wit out of me"

Mr Constantine laughed heartily

"True again 'Tis wonderful how one and custom unite us all. The philosopher is ever a bore to the wife of his bosom. But not one good word for Valerian?"

"As many as you please, provided he does not marry Stephana. She is a rare woman!" cried Arthura, passionately.

"And he is not rare by any means. Clever, nevertheless, versatile, accommodating, and, as far as I have been able to judge, kind-hearted and agreeable."

Arthura was dumb.

"Poor Valerian Then you really have nothing to say on his behalf?"

"Everything if we do not couple his name with Stephana's," Arthura now said, gravely. "She is a noble, almost an unearthly being. There is nothing worldly about her He has many excellent qualities, but he is ordinary flesh and blood."

"And in Stephana's veins flows the true ichor. Well, what more?"

"To place us beside giants dwarfs us even if we too full sized," Arthura went on. "Valerian must not, dare not, marry Stephana She would but appear more magnanimous, he more ordinary, by comparison And Stephana could never influence him, never reach him from her high spheres. They would dwell aloof. It would be isolation for both."

"Just my own conclusion My dear, the fact is (putting the Stephanas aside), there are only two kinds of women in the world, the woman who can flirt and the woman who can not. Ten generations of female legislators may evolve a third species, but 'tis yet in the germ. Now Valerian must marry among his equals, and leave the goddess alone. But anny walk realtuse Into the calm gray world of phantoms where I feel more at home, my Prospero! How opens the page?"

"We have come to 'The Sensitive Plant,' sir"

"Ay, I know every line by heart; but on matter Stephana reminds me of the lady who tended the flowers, and like her she should vanish mysteriously. Read, good Prospero."

Arthura read in spite of that sinking of the heart she had so valiantly concealed. She was shocked and disconcerted, but she said to herself For the moment only. Do what they might, Valerian would, must remain true to her Foolish fears! Unworthy trepidation! A dozen Stephanas could not alter the fact that he loved her, and was her own Valerian—in hers, she admitted, but good enough to love and be loved, he'rie enough to be true Nevertheless, Mr Constantine's reversion haunted her Valerian's loyalty was being put to the proof. The secret security of yesterday was rudely disturbed. Not doubt, not misgiving, only uneasiness, crept in, where all before had been serene confidence and perfect understanding. What made her position most trying was the fact that she dared not write to her lover. One brief note had come from him, in which he said that he should contrive a visit to London soon for the purpose of seeing her Barring its brevity, the love-letter was perfect, every word breathing confidence and chivalrous devotion And she should see him soon It was therefore childish, nay, unreasonable, to dwell upon the chimeras thus conjured up. Valerian marry Stephana, indeed! Stephana marry Valerian! Who that knew the pair could for a moment contemplate such a possibility? There was no lien between them, and Valerian's best and most genial qualities but seemed to separate him from her He loved the world, and never showed to more advantage than when displaying his urbane character. Stephana loved all that was not the world, and evidently regarded Valerian's social power as so much energy misapplied. Stephana cared for none of the things to which Valerian excelled, whilst to Valerian Stephana's self was all unapproachableness and mystery. But why this battling with windmills? Valerian loved her Valerian was true. Nothing more was said on the subject, and the days passed uneventfully. No Valerian, on falling off in lover-like little notes, on tidings of a nature either to allay or disquiet. They were preparing for a grand entertainment on New Year's Day, Valerian wrote. Would she were there! He was more than busy; he was really harassed by all the details that had to be gone into, and on one to help him. "It was really unkind of my cousin to send you off just when you might have been so useful to me," wrote Valerian, his letters, to a line, a mirror of himself. "But it was a kind of fresh I am ever prepared for. Who knows but that I may be cast adrift next? Though—forgive the scribbling, dearest—you were not docile, you disobeyed my prayers and injunctions (I am the dark looks, the impatience, the frowns, as well as Christian). Would it not have been better—a thousand times better—to remain, putting on a little gayety when required? We at least saw each other, spoke to each other—even once perhaps in a week whispered five words to each other Now many things I fain would whisper I can not write, and 'tis all (can you deny it?) your fault. Well, I love you as dearly as ever any man loved a woman, so forgive me If I did not love you, should I dare to let you see the real state of the case, which is that your own Valerian is sadly out of patience, spirits, and temper at this especial moment? Is he an angel when I write to me ever?"

That letter put Arthura in spirits, and she went through her duties with unwonted gayety and gayety Why was the word dare? Every moment of her life under Mr. Constantine's roof was pure unalloyed pleasure. Her daily visits to Steppie made an heavenly through snow and fog, the nocturnal confabulations with her queer old patron. For the sweetness of age is better than the sweetness of youth, and Mr Constantine possessed it in a rare degree. Youth, indeed, in the German proverb, has not virtue, but the same nature, like choice wine, reckons in the keeping

"What is the day, my dear?" in mid-ni of Arthura as the dark December drew to a close.

"Two more, and so come to the last of the year, sir."

"So soon? Well, I'll bid the young emperor welcome, and not shed a tear for the old one misdeeds, though he has not used me badly And a few days more or less, dark or fair, for me, then welcome the great democrat, the only true exponent of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity—Death"

"I hope you will not die yet, sir," Arthura said, cheerfully.

"I am not in a hurry, my dear, though quite ready to take my rest. I only regret that I leave the world no little better than what I found it"

"But you have done your part in making it better, they say, sir"

Mr Constantine smiled. "True—true. I have worked manfully for man, woman, and beast. I can say that for myself. I have stood up for the rights, and, what is more, for the wrongs And much my words, my dear Dwell not too much on the exercise of kindness throughout your life, but seek rather to be just. Let modern, impalpable, unswerving justice be your guide in small consequences as well as great, not shepherd, purblind benevolence ever plucking at your gloves. By justice only shall the world be mended. Well, your wand, my Prospero, your magic rule! I am weary of the world and its nostrums. Into the land of shadows, away, away!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

FAR and wide on New Year's Eve flashed through the dusky heavens Miss Hermitage's festive windows Her house stood on a hill, dominating three outer hills, valley within valley and sea, and a beautiful spectacle it then made, blazing like a beacon fire amid countless lesser lights For no sooner was the brief winter twilight over than the lamp lighter's enchanting business began A will-o'-the-wisp here, a twinkling light an of a glow-worm there, now a cluster of little stars like the beads of a broken necklace, and, lo! on a sudden, as if by magic, from east to west the earth and broad span of heaven are set with fiery crescents. Not a span the size of the palm above or below without its lamp shining out of the Ethiop blackness of the night. On this marvellous panorama, however—glorious illuminations that people would have flocked from all parts to see had it occurred once in a lifetime—neither hosts nor guests had time to dwell to-night. Miss Hermitage's spring entertainment was to be splendid. Nothing that it had ever been seen in those parts, people said. All as yet was mystery and alert looking forward, but on one point there could be no doubt —Miss Hermitage's promises to surpass herself would be made good Valerian indeed promised those things for her, but was not Valerian Miss Hermitage, and Miss Hermitage Valerian? The truth, of course, soon leaked out. As here after bevy of fair guests alighted at the door, a sigh, a whisper, a wave of the hand in a certain direction, indicated what was in store for them. The spacious entrance hall had been turned into a ball fet and reception room, but when the company on arriving broke up into little knots to tea and gossip, they caught suggestive glimpses from the wide doors of the salons as that were stealthily opened and shut. Now an soon flitting to an airy figure in white and silver, whose feet hardly touched the ground, unmistakable votary of the dance; now an equally unmistakable gnom of melodrama, dressed in the fashion of the ar Sounds, too, reached the ears of the guests impossible to misunderstand—tuning up of musical instruments, according of violin and viola. No need for the matter of ceremonies to read about the programme. The entertainment was to begin with a fairy marque and end with a play. And soon appeared Colette, bearing an armful of little flying sheets, disclosing what already every one knew. Yes, a drawing room ballet—unpreachable, of course, in the matter of accessories—was to lead the way to a charming little melodrama performed by competent actors. "A delightful bill of fare," was the general exclamation, although in so pleasant a meeting place, and armed each good company, nothing in the way of professional amusement seemed necessary It was the old story of Valerian passing the lily and gilding refined gold.

Miss Hermitage was in excellent spirits. It afforded her a world of comfort to find that she could do airiness Arthura, that, indeed, Valerian made up for everything. In her secret heart she half suspected Arthura of some unconscious feeling for Valerian. What could mean some in a girl but fallbag in love? So she was well out of harm's way, and as for Stephana and Valerian, they might do as they pleased by and by "How much happier people are without fetters," thought Miss Hermitage—" with only capacities for enjoyment! Now all the feeling in the world could not serve me in such stead as the faculty for enjoying myself—a faculty that does good all round without the cant of philanthropy. I like a room with pleasant folk, I spend money like a queen in entertaining them, and like a queen I am made much of" That she was, indeed. The cynosure of all eyes on this especial night was the

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1275.

Boric person in lemon-colored brocade, trimmed with rich modern lace. "None of your dingy, inodorous, dilapidated old point for me," was Miss Hermitage's dictum. "New wine in new bottles. To each generation its own finery." The green she wore was really becoming in a spare little old lady with the compactest figure, still perfectly agile and upright, features hard but neat, hands and feet to match, beautifully arrayed in fine silk mittens and fancy stockings and little sandaled slippers after the fashion of fifty years ago.

With one hand resting on Valerian's arm, she now made the circuit of the hall, greeting her visitors as radiantly as any bride acting the part of hostess for the first time. Satisfied and even delighted with Valerian in his capacity of steward who had ever been, but to-night she glanced at him almost fondly—at any rate, more than approvingly. And none could have failed to notice or the pair thus lingered arm in arm the strong family likeness between them. Not only did the likeness exist in build, feature, and outward appearance generally, but in voice, expression, gesture. Warkling for warkling, idler for idler, optimest for optimist, were here, both animated with a cordial liking for life and humankind, both ready to take and leave things as they found them—a philosophy which certainly answers in so far as one's own internal peace is concerned. Such similarities, bodily and mental, we are accustomed to look for among kinsfolk, and perhaps no one would have noticed it now but for the curious link that bound Miss Hermitage and her protégé together. For if Valerian possessed absolutely nothing of worldly goods, Miss Hermitage was a pauper in those things with which fortune had so cruelly endowed him. Here was the wealth, less his capacity for making wealth desirable. They depended on each other, her necessities being greater than his own.

"Where is Stephana?" asked Miss Hermitage, accustomed now to appeal to Valerian with regard to Stephen's movements.

Valerian's face clouded. "Stephana is not always to be depended on," he answered, briefly. "She made us promise to come, remember."

"One frivolities absorb her, I dare say," Miss Hermitage made good-humored reply. "I want her company nevertheless. She can be mighty agreeable."

The musicians now began to play, the doors of the reception-rooms were opened, and at a signal from Valerian the hundred and odd guests took their places. A few minutes more, and the curtain rose. Our drawing-room ballet—many dance of cyphs, nymphs, and fairies keeping time in strict music—is like another, and there we no special. He about this one except its grace and gayety. The very spirit of the dance seemed incarnate in these sportive fays and sylphs, human creatures they could hardly be, whilst the measures were or garmonne that they set the heart beating quickly from mere pleasure. Nothing could be prettier, daintier, of its kind, and when the roundelay ended, and the dancers vanished quickly as they had come, there was a ring of applause. What would Valerian think of next?

What indeed?

What Miss Hermitage was receiving the compliments of her guests, and they were speculating among themselves upon the next entertainment, Stephana rode in, unobserved except by Valerian. Beautiful exceedingly looked Stephana or she now made her way by groups of modish beauties, starry night flower amid the garish glimes of day! All her dress was of the cold yet subdued silveriness of moonlight, and like a cloud on a mist the silveriness seemed to wrap her round, lending mystery, something unearthly, even even, to features and form ever free from human sedirinesses. Was she human, indeed? "A spirit and a woman too?" or all spirit of the kith nor kin of seraph?—no conquer of those who toil and moil in the work-a-day world?

Valerian, feeling a spell of this kind, almost shrank from her casually advances. He whined nothing re much or to please her, but the orator they approached each other in daily intercourse, the closer he are what a gulf divided them.

Hitherto Stephana had made on further allusion whatever to the future or it concerned Valerian and herself, but to-night she seemed to verge on confidences, in need of a confidential listener. In the midst of the general hubub of voices they were alone, and she said, without leading up to the subject,

"You will smile when I tell you what really brought me here to-night."

"Not a love of gaiety or drawing room comedy," Valerian answered, lightly.

"I like re are a beautiful deare and a pretty play well enough, but my errand to-night is not diversion."

"Have you been peering into your magic crystal? Come you as a wraith bidding me, or one of my neighbors, be ready to die in three days' time?" Valerian again made sportive answer, although a lacking uneasiness made itself heard in his voice.

"I came because I felt instinctively that I was wanted. You may laugh at my presentiments, as you call them," pursued Stephana. "They mean, after all, at least in this case, no more nor less than the sympathy that binds kinsfolk together. Christie is the nearest relative I have in the world. What wonder that I should be irresistibly drawn toward her in a moment of peril?"

Again Valerian smiled, although not quite naturally.

"I trust that your presence may ward it off, then. Our cousin was never in better health and spirits in her life. Look at her!"

Stephana glanced round, and true enough, gay out of the gay, almost sparkling in her overflow of good humor and geniality, was their hostess of seventy and odd summers. Age has no key day as well as youth, and very likely Miss Hermitage had never appeared to better advantage than now with the cold brilliance of her eyes and faint flush on her thin cheek. The time of disillusions and checks was past. Flatters meant nothing, but hopes could no longer flatter, and she could at last take life and the world for what they were worth.

"Strange," mused Stephana, aloud, "I notice for the first time that Cherstan must have been handsome in her youth. For the first time, also, I see a remarkable likeness to yourself."

She turned her penetrating eyes inward Valerian, who shrank from their gaze.

"Have you never noticed it?" she added, looking at him curiously and speculatively.

"I am no physiognomist," Valerian said, carelessly, yet with some slight embarrassment.

Stephana saw it, and immediately changed the subject. A moment more and the curtain rose.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

STEAMER DAY.

It has recently been pointed out with authoritative emphasis that good Americans do not go to Paris before they die unless they have first seen all the wonders of their own land. Niagara, Chicago, the Big Trees, the Mammoth Cave, the Yellowstone Park, and the Brooklyn Bridge must all have been visited by the conscientious tourist before he is entitled to look up the effete hotels and cathedrals of the Old World.

This is a most patriotic position, even if it is offensive taken by naturalized citizens, who have seen the folly of Europe in their childhood, than by native-born Americans. These latter shorn the universal human tendency to take the unknown for the magnificent, and hold the familiar fountains of Saratoga cheap in comparison with Vichy and Carlsbad, waters of Damascus. The trouble about this patriotic prescription is that comparatively few persons lie awake nights thinking what disposition of their holiday will best conduce to their own mental and moral improvement, and to the general welfare of the race. They merely go travelling for amusement or for rest, and they seem to find both in Europe. Rest at sea, barring the physical motion, is complete. Nobody can bother you with telegrams, although some misanthrope is supposed to be experimenting with "paying out" a light wire, to the outer end of which the worried of mankind must hope that he will be affixed. Intellectual strife is somehow interdicted by the conditions of the voyage, so that famous persons who set out with the fond notion of getting up a subject between New York and Liverpool fish out their books for the first time, with a feeling of sheepish rumorse, in a London hotel.

"No mat," remarked the inexhaustible Dr Johnson, "in a hypocrite in his pleasures." If people continue to go to Europe instead of taking to the hotels of Indiana and Idaho, it is at least to be inferred that, greeting the baseness of their motives, they like it. And the steady increase in the efflux of tourists about that they bring back favorable reports of some, at least, among the effete institutions. Greater steamers are built year by year, in which more attention is paid proportionally than ever before to the accommodation of cabin passengers. In fact, the differentiation of Atlantic steamers into passenger ships and freight ships, which has already begun, is likely to go on until there is a fleet of great steamers dedicated to the use of the pleasure traveller of the summer season alone, and to abandon the sea in winter in less pretentious craft, which shall carry freight and engineers. In fact, we are not far from this consummation already. The City of Rome, which has just re-appeared to and disappeared from New York has not been known before since the last season of winter travel, and which has accommodations for over a thousand cabin passengers, seems to be an approach to one of these ships of the future; and the quick passages of the Servia and the Alaska have distinctly been evolved out of the demand of passengers, and especially of tourists, for comfort and for speed. Size is an indispensable factor both in comfort and in speed. The Great Eastern was a monster born out of due time, and far beyond the demand for "great carrying capacity" in freight or satisfy which she was built. But it seems that ship-builders and ship-owners will very shortly find their account in reproducing or exceeding the dimensions of "that sea-beast leviathan," biggest of all that swim the ocean stream", and the demand which the new leviathan will be launched to meet will not be of the nervous traffic, but of the pleasure travel of the two continents. She will be made simply to meet the views of tourists who fancy that it is of immense importance to them to save a day, and to avoid a fit or two of seasickness in the passage between New York and Liverpool, and who can afford to pay for this fancy.

This fact of the continual increase of great steamers built more and more expressly for pleasure travel is as conclusive proof as a column of statistics could furnish of the increase of the travel itself. The great fleet of great steamers which leave for Europe with the regularity and almost with the frequency of express trains for Chicago are far more crowded than the smaller fleet of smaller steamers was ten years ago, and there is earlier and more eager competition for a choice of quarters on favorite vessels. The volume of travel to Europe increases every year by a considerable ratio,

> "And something earlier every year
> Our singing-birds take wing."

The hard working business or professional man who can only snatch August from his occupations to setting to the fact that Europe is the best thing he can do with his time, even if half and more of his holiday must be spent at sea. But he shops his wife and daughters all very early in June, or even in May, when the winter season is over, and the summer season of the American watering-places has not yet begun. They have eight or nine days, which they would delight to shorten, in which to recruit themselves for a campaign that is to last until the coolness and the hurry of late September shall make the cities of the sea-board habitable once more by those sensitive and highly civilized females of the species of the American business man, who for his own part regards an occasional evening on Coney Island as rather more than all the relaxation which a rational creature ought to want.

The existence of Jersey City need to be accounted for upon the hypothesis that it was a place where people went to see other people go to Europe. It is now deprived of even that melancholy function. Nearly all of the great lines now have their wharves in New York, and the exceptions are chiefly, if not altogether, to be found in Hoboken. The crowds of serious friends are rather increased by this change, although they are for the most part friends who would not take the trouble to see the same person take a train for San Francisco that they take to bid them a fond farewell on the less perilous voyage. It has been suggested that the voyagers might discharge their social duties before leaving by issuing cards for "steamer receptions," and cheering their peculiar friends with champagne furnished by the ship's steward, and constructively "in bond."

A RAILWAY EXPOSITION.

The National Exposition of Railway Appliances now being held in Chicago is exciting an amount of general interest wholly unexpected by its projectors. Not only are railroad men in large numbers attending the exhibition—sometimes the entire force of from five to ten thousand employés of a great trunk road visiting it at the expense of the company employing them—but the outside public, whose only connection with railways is by travellers, crowd the buildings day and evening. This, however, is not surprising, when the character of the exhibition and the interests, or vast as to be almost incomprehensible, that it represents, are considered. If we undertake to enumerate the hundreds of thousands of men in the employ of American railway companies, the unnumbered thousands engaged in the construction of railways and railway supplies or appliances, the millions who are directly benefited by these iron roads, and to estimate the untold wealth invested in them directly or indirectly, we find that our figures represent at least two-thirds of the population of the United States and one-half of its wealth. Fifty years ago what imagination could conceive the present greatness of this country? and to-day its condition without railroads is almost equally inconceivable. But for them the Mississippi would probably be the Western limit of Eastern civilization, and the vast stretch of prairie and mountain between it and California would still figure on the maps or "The Great American Desert." Of the countless ships now thronging our seaports not one in a hundred would visit them. Goods would be conveyed between markets by wagon-trains or canal boats, and passengers would travel by steamboats or stages. Immigrants would, of course, find their way to the country; but those who came would be as rivulets compared with the mighty tide of immigration now sweeping westward over the land, and filling its waste places with abounding life. Therefore, when it is remembered that the very life of the nation is dependent upon the successful maintenance of its railway system, it is not wonderful that an exhibition of the appliances of railways should attract so universal an interest.

The Chicago exhibition is the largest and most complete of its kind ever attempted. It is held in its Exposition Building, on the lake front of the city, and also occupies numerous other adjacent buildings that have been temporarily erected for its accommodation, the whole covering more than eleven acres of ground.

In the main building, illuminated at night by colored electric lights, is a bewildering array of iron and wood working machinery such as is used in the construction of railways and their rolling stock. Here is also displayed an infinity of smaller railway appliances—couplers, draw-bars, station indicators, brakes, frogs, switches, etc. Beyond these are rare and exquisite woods such as are used in the luxurious finishing of palace-cars. Here are woods from Persia, Turkey, India, South America, and from every portion of the world from whence woods of finest grain and coloring, and susceptible of the highest polish, are obtainable.

In the galleries is a most interesting exhibition of railway inventions which are still in embryo, or have not yet succeeded in inspiring the confidence and attracting the capital necessary to their success. Here is also an electric railway, the first ever constructed in the West. It runs outside the galleries, entirely around the building, a distance of a third of a mile, and in its cozy little cars visitors are invited to take the trip at five cents apiece.

In the West Annex are the locomotives, standing each in a separate stall, burnished and gilt-toning like the thorough-bred, highly groomed steeds to which they are likened. Every firm of locomotive builders in the country is represented, and every style of work turned out by them is exhibited, from little narrow gauge passenger engines weighing less fifteen tons, to huge "Mastodons" of over ninety. While each of these is a perfect specimen of its kind, and well worthy a careful examination, the remembrance of features of each are lost to view in the great number of exhibits and the general excellence of the whole, consequently only those which are remarkable for size or for novelty of construction attract unusual notice.

The locomotive attracting and retaining the largest share of public attention is a "Mastodon," built by the Cooke Locomotive Works of Paterson, New Jersey. It is the largest locomotive or the world, and with its tender weighs 93 tons. Its cylinders are 20 inches in diameter, with a 30-inch stroke; it has eight driving-wheels 5 feet 3 inches in diameter, with a four-wheeled truck forward. The boiler is 60 inches in diameter; tubes 2¼ inches in diameter and 13 feet long. The tank has a capacity of 3000 gallons of water, and the tender carries 12,000 pounds of coal. The length over all of this monster is 64 feet. It was built for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and upon the closing of the exposition will continue its way to the scene of its future labors in Southern California.

Another locomotive which proves a centre of attraction to railroad men is that known as the Snow locomotive. It has two cylinders on each side, instead of one. These are of 10½ inches in diameter, and have a 24-inch stroke. They work in combinations, there being two cross-heads, two piston-rods, and two connecting and parallel rods on each side. The locomotive has four 3 feet 9 inch driving wheels, weighs, fully equipped, 60½ tons, and has on a trial trip drawn two cars at the rate of 76 6 miles an hour.

In the South Annex are the greatest attractions of the whole exposition—relics of the past, of the very earliest infancy of steam railways, now figuring in "the old curiosity shop." Here may be seen the first locomotive built by Jesse Stevenson, the old "Locomotion No. 1," built in 1825, and outdistancing the famous Rocket by four years, the boiler of the Stourbridge Lion, the first locomotive ever run in this country, the old Samson, built in 1839 in England, and imported to Nova Scotia for use between Pictou and the Albion coal mines, where it is still worked; and the grasshopper locomotive Arabian, the first successful venture in this line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. It was designed and built by Mr Phineas Davis, in the company's shops, and went into service in June, 1836. It is still in active service at the Mount Clare yards, and is as useful as when first put on the rails. In all its long career it has met with but one accident, but this was sufficiently remarkable to be worthy of record. Of it the Washington Republican gives the following account:

"Before it"—the Arabian—"was finished Mr Davis persuaded the workmen engaged in the shops, some three hundred, to take them and their families on the train drawn by the Arabian as far as it went, then to go to Washington, and have dinner at Brown's Hotel. The Washington branch was then open nearly to Hodenburg. The trip was made, William Dunn being the engineer. Just west of Jessup's Cut, thirteen and a half miles this side of Baltimore, the Arabian ran off the track. Mr Davis was sitting with Mr Dunn when the accident occurred. The engine rolled on its side. Neither the engineer nor anybody else on the train was hurt in the least, but Mr Davis; he was killed. There seemed to be a special fate in the matter. Nobody could ever tell why the Arabian ran off the track. There was no obstruction ever known, although the fullest investigation was made, but any cause existed to throw it off. At the Baltimore press, which the first time it was put to work caught its furniture and printed him ten its first impression, or the Arabian on its first trip killed its designer and maker."

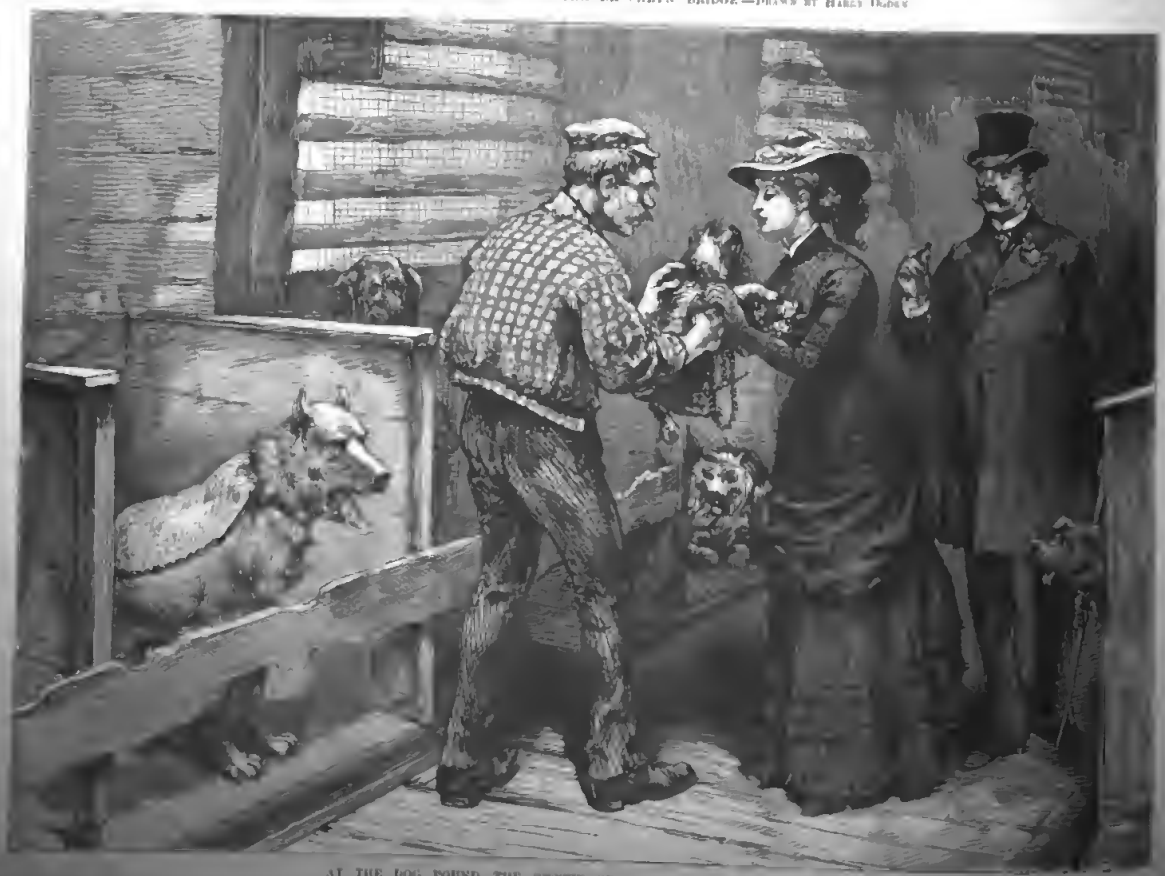
The Arabian was run in Chicago by Tom Galloway, who is now eighty years of age, and has been in the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company for fifty years, or ever since 1833. He is the oldest locomotive engineer in this country, and probably in the world.

The Samson, from Nova Scotia, is also accompanied by a man who has devoted to it the service of a lifetime. He is the engineer who ran the first train in charge of it, in 1838, and who has run it daily ever since, although at present he is nearly eighty years of age. The Samson is a standard-gauge "inverted direct action engine," with four foot drivers. Its cylinders are perpendicular, and are at the back of the engine on each side of the engineer. The piston-rods shooting up and down act on the bind wheels, which are connected with those in front of them. The farmers door is or front, and the tender with the fireman aboard runs ahead. A car that accompanies this primitive locomotive is also a curiosity, being one of the old-fashioned double-bodied coaches with the seats each accommodating two persons placed opposite each other, in each section the doors are at the sides, and on outside step runs the entire length of the coach.

The Stourbridge Lion, of which the bellow is shown in "the old curiosity shop," was the first locomotive ever brought to and run in this country. She was built in England in 1828 for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, and on the 8th of August, 1829, was placed upon the tracks of the railway owned by that company, at Honesdale, Pennsylvania, and run fifteen miles, by Mr Horatio Allen. The engine weighed seven tons, which proved to be too great a weight for the road as it was then constructed, and after a few experimental trips was laid aside. Mr. Allen is still alive, and very proud of the honor of having driven the first locomotive in America.

One of the [illegible] and veterans of the exposition is Mr David Matthew, who was engineer of the DeWitt Clinton, the locomotive that drew the first excursion train, its portrait in silhouette, over the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad, between Albany and Schenectady, on the 9th of August, 1831. This picture is erroneously called "The First Steam Train in America," for train had been run in South Carolina six months before this date, and Mr Allen's trip from Honesdale had been made two years before. Mr Matthew therefore only claims to have been engineer of the first locomotive run [illegible]

THE CARS AS THEY WILL BE ON THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE.—DRAWN BY HARRY OGDEN



AT THE DOG POUND.—THE RESCUE OF A PET.—DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS

J. EDWARDS SIMMONS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY SARONY.

THE HON. J. B. FORAKER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY HOWLAND.—(SEE PAGE 378.)

GRAND MASTER SIMMONS.

MR. J. EDWARDS SIMMONS, who has been elected Grand Master of Masons of the state of New York for the ensuing year, is a native of Troy, New York, where he was born on the 9th of September, 1842. He graduated from Williams College in 1862, attended the Albany Law School, and was admitted to the bar in 1863. After practicing law for two years, he abandoned his profession for trade. He subsequently came to this city, and became a banker and broker. In this business he made a fortune, and retired before the panic of 1873. Mr. Simmons is a member of the Stock Exchange, a director and trustee of several corporations and institutions, a Commissioner of Education, and on some of the most active committees in that body. His home is at No. 28 West Fifty-second Street, and he has a cottage on the shore of Lake George. He was made a Mason in Mount Zion Lodge, No. 311, of Troy, in 1864, and affiliated with Kane Lodge, No. 454, of this city, ten years afterward. In 1877 he was elected Master of that Lodge, and re-elected in 1878. He is a member of Jerusalem Chapter, No. 8, Royal Arch Masons, and of Coeur de Lion Commanders, No. 23, Knights Templar; of the latter he became Eminent Commander in 1881. Grand Master Joseph J. Couch appointed him District Deputy Grand Master of the Sixth Masonic District, and General Rosnic made him Grand Marshal. He represented the Grand Lodge of Missouri near the Grand Lodge of New York, but resigned in favor of WILLIAM P. MONTAGUE, after he was elected Deputy Grand Master last year.

OPENING OF THE FREE BATHS IN NEW YORK.—DRAWN BY HENRY [illegible]

THE HORSFORD ALMANAC AND COOK-BOOK mailed free on application to the Rumford Chemical Works, Providence, R. I.—[Adv.]

THE PEOPLE'S WORLD-WIDE VERDICT. Dr. Benedict's Consumption has been sold in every civilized country, and the public have rendered the verdict that it is the cheapest and best Hair Dressing in the world. Dr. Benedict's Flavoring Extracts are invariably acknowledged the purest and best.—[Adv.]

The most efficacious stimulants to excite the appetite are Angostura Bitters, prepared by Doctor J. G. B. Siegert & Sons. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article.—[Adv.]

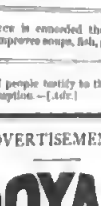
SWEET BREATH.—Dr Jas. T. Knight's Stomach Powder makes the breath as sweet as a rose. 50 cts. by mail. P.O. Box 1665, N.Y. Cutlerites, Agent, 115 Fulton Street, N.Y.—[Adv.]

Halford Sauce is conceded the standard relish. Halford Sauce improves soups, fish, gravies, meats, &c.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL



BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N.Y.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invigorating and palatable tonic to all cases of weak digestive and debility. "In a recovering and a soon to which nutrient should be given."—Medical Press. "Lancet," "Invaluable." "Best preparation of meat."—British Medical Journal. &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States and Canada, DAVID & CO., 8 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Also for sale by PARK & TILFORD, New York; ALEXR. MEDHALL, & SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, MORRISON & ROBBINS, H. A. P. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SHIFFELIN & CO.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made. Saves its cost. The springs are so arranged as to adjust themselves automatically to the weight of the load, thus giving an easy motion. They carry lightly and steadily. Manufactured per order and to suit the fancy of purchaser. Descriptive circulars mailed by the manufacturers.

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Manufactured by the CHICAGO, ILL. ABBOTT BUGGY CO

Universally prescribed by the Faculty

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculte de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces pain.

Price Catalogue, 1st quarter, Photo. Apparatus & Stereoscopic Views, 10c.

MAGIC LANTERNS WITH VIEWS $5

MAGIC LANTERNS A SPECIALTY. Wholesale and Retail. Catalogue free. Send stamp. McALLISTER, Manufacturing Optician, 49 Nassau St., Philadelphia.

PORTRAITS Agents Wanted to canvass for Crayon Portraits. Large profits. Outfit free. Address with stamp, CRAYON PORTRAIT ASSOCIATION, 36 Bond St., N.Y.

$66 a week. Address H. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for home use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, a delicious article.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet for children.—Vienna Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

The New England Laboratory

FIREWORKS

Are the Standard.

OUR BOX COLLECTIONS

For Private Exhibition Displays

Are all differently assorted, and include many FIRE-WORK NOVELTIES, at prices within the limits of all, viz.: Collection No. 1, 50 cents. No. 2, $1 00. No. 3, $1 50. No. 4, $2 00. No. 5, $3 00. No. 6, $4 00; No. 7, $5 00; No. 8, $6 00. No. 9, $8 00. No. 10, $10 00. No. 11, $15 00; and No. 12, $25 00 net. CASH ON THE RECEIPT OF MAIL OR EXPRESS OF FIVE DOLLARS OR UPWARDS, BY MAIL SAVE TO ANY PART OF THE COUNTRY FIRST OF MONEY ORDER. EXPRESS CHARGES PREPAID BY US, EQUAL VALUE OF ASSISTANCE on the assorted prices above! in collections to selected, and purchased, purchase by dealers. Each article is and otherwise any of the collections sent C.O.D., to be paid by purchaser.

These collections are original, comprehensive, and attractive, are all safely packed, and in them the purchaser obtains the best Fireworks made for private use at about one half of retail prices, with full directions for firing.

Send for the Descriptive List.

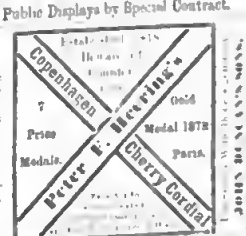
And order early to save disappointment.

On receipt of this we will send a full list of various FOURTH OF JULY GOODS in Flags, Lanterns, Balloons, Wicks, Paper Caps and Plastols, Fire Crackers, Torpedoes, &c. Paper Price List and Catalogue for 1879 is now ready and will be mailed free—to all applicants.

MASTEN & WELLS, Manufacturers,

Salesroom No. 10 Hawley St., Boston, Mass.

Public Displays by Special Contract.

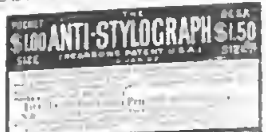


And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.

JOHN DE KUYPER & SONS, Rotterdam, Holland, and New York.

The NEW DEPARTURE

Makes Edison's [illegible] easy for both Ladies and Gentlemen to study, quiet and practice at home and in street carriages at the same time. It is a quality by system. May be learned in a few hours by a child. Send by mail on receipt of $2.00. Circular free. Liberal terms. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Agents wanted. E. R. PRESTON & CO., 25 BOND ST., NEW YORK.



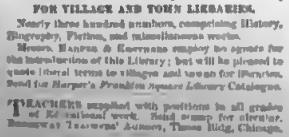
Buffalo Lithia Water,

A powerful solvent of [illegible] the Bladder [illegible] Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, [illegible] and Rheumatism; highly [illegible] Gravel, Calculus, &c. Endorsed by Dr. J. Marion Sims, Dr. A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General U. S. Army, Wm. A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General U. S. Army, and other eminent medical men. Water, in cases of one dozen half gallon bottles, $6 00 per case at the spring. Circular pamphlet sent on any address.

W. H. SHIFFELIN & CO., Agents, 78 Maiden Lane, New York City.

CASWELL, HAZARD & CO., New York City.

THOS. F. GOODE, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Virginia.



HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, FOR VILLAGE AND TOWN LIBRARIES.

Nearly three hundred numbers, comprising History, Biography, Fiction, and miscellaneous works.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers employ no agents for the introduction of this Library; but will be pleased to quote liberal terms to villages and towns for libraries. Send for Harper's Franklin Square Library Catalogue.

TEACHERS supplied with positions in all grades of Educational work. Send stamp for circular. Bonnwell Teachers' Agency, Times Bldg, Chicago.

$12 A week, $3 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address Augusta, Maine.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES, EDENIA AND MARECHAL NIEL ROSE.

RIDLEYS',

Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N.Y.

DRESS SILKS.

24-INCH BLACK GROS DRAIN $1 00
POSITIVELY WORTH $1 50.

60 PIECES REAL BROCADED SATINES (ALL SILK) ..... .91 00
HAVE BEEN $1 50.

BLACK SATIN RHADAMES.

1200 YARDS AT ....
FORMER PRICE $1 25. 95c.
3000 YARDS AT. $1 00
FORMER PRICE $1 25.
4000 YARDS AT. $1 00
FORMER PRICE $1 25.
2700 YARDS AT. $1 00
FORMER PRICE $1 25.
3000 YARDS AT $1 00
FORMER PRICE $1 25.
2000 YARDS AT .... .91 00
FORMER PRICE $1 25.

SUMMER SILKS,

&c., &c., &c., &c., and &c.

FOULARDS AT THE SAME PRICES.
6000 YARDS, IN ALL THE NEW SHADES IN FOULARDS, EVERY PATTERN IN DOT, FLOWER, AND FIGURES, AT &c.

Examine Our Colored Rhadames and Gros Grain Silks; also, Our Black and Colored Brocaded Silks, All at Equally Low Prices.

E. RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 313 to 321 Grand St.,

36, 34, 36 TO 70 ALLEN ST., N.Y.

ARNOLD,

CONSTABLE, & CO.

UNDERWEAR.

Gauze and Merino Weights in Silk Shirts and Drawers for Gentlemen.

Cashmere, Merino, and Silk and Wool Materials for Ladies.

A great variety of Balbriggan, Lisle Thread, and Fancy Hosiery for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children.

Broadway and 19th St.

"PICKER'S BUTTONS." [illegible] Buttons [illegible] Price List [illegible] Price, L. PICKER, 78 John St., P. O. Box 1179.

PURE INDIA TEAS.

From the Districts of ASSAM, CHITTACONG, CACHAR, KANCHA VALLEY, DARJEELING, DEHRA DOON, And Others

Also choicest Pure, Superior Flavor. THE MOST ECONOMICAL TEA. Requires only half the usual quantity.

SOLD BY ALL GROCERS.

JOHN C. PHILLIPS & CO., Agents for the Celestial Tea Syndicate, 130 Water Street, New York.

THE NEW SWEET BOUQUET Cigarette. Delicate, Mild, and Fragrant. A Dainty Whiff for Connoisseurs.

LADIES!

Newton-Pillsbury, [illegible] Regulating Pennyroyal Pills. A safe [illegible] Superior to [illegible] Female Remedies. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail, $1. NEWTON-PILLSBURY CHEMICAL PREPARATION CO., Druggists, Wagner Chemical Laboratory, 609 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED 6 OR 10 BOOK AGENTS

Quick as lightning to operate in [illegible] ALBUM. AGENTS, do [illegible] and [illegible] others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great salability. Profits are over $1,000 to $2,000 a year. Address, stating full particulars of experience, etc., RICHARD BROS., 30 Chemical St., Phila. Pa.

40 New Styles Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

NEW STORE,

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Of 23d Street.

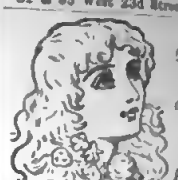
SPECIAL BARGAINS IN BLACK SILKS, COLORED SILKS, SUMMER SILKS, GRENADINES, GINGHAMS, SUNIVERSAL LAWNS, SUITS, HOSIERY, SILK GLOVES, MENS' UNDERWEAR, SILK JERSEYS, LADIES' UNDERWEAR, KNITTS, COACHING, SILK PARASOLS, &c.

We cannot here enumerate prices, but give purchasers the full benefit of some great bargains we are now able to offer.

Prompt and careful attention to all Mail Orders. SAMPLES SENT IF IT WILL PAY YOU TO SEND BY MAIL.

Please note the address:

LE BOUTILLIER BROS., Of 23d Street., 21 & 23 West 23d Street, New York.



"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of the 19th Day

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Humors cured by the Cuticura Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, eliminates the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly clear Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is unsurpassable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and rough, Hard Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers. Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.

POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE ..... $ 4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR..... 4 00
The THREE above publications..... 10 00
Any TWO above named..... 7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE..... 1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE } HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE } 5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers) ... 10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the Young People with the first Number in November, and the Volumes of the Magazine with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of Harper's Young People sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, of issues ranging from 10 to 64 cents per number. Part 10 of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Two Cents in Postage Stamps.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

Applies self-cleaning principle to pipe-smoking. Prevents [illegible] by further burning other tobacco. Consumes all the tar and nicotine in the tobacco, leaving it pure and wholesome. Illustrated circulars mailed free. Sold by all dealers, or sent postpaid, ready for use, without [illegible] receipt of price. Liberal inducements offered to agents. Address, SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE CO., Philadelphia, Pa. Or 56 Fleet Street, London, England.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1880, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best and [illegible] sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Keene, N.Y.

Lady Agents [illegible] Address Crystal City Soap Co., St. Louis, Mo.

$10 and upward can be invested in [illegible] Address STODDART & CO., 10 A and B, Phila. Pa.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE COUNTRY. Will [illegible] A can make from $5 to $10 a day. Send for circulars and terms. WM. HEBB, Artist for Gallery, Newark, N.J.

SITUATIONS Furnished teachers, [illegible] and [illegible] Address National School Supply Bureau, 36 Park Avenue, [illegible]

THE PREMIUM
to the Wives of Grocers has been pronounced by all who have seen it to be the handsomest and most valuable ever offered by a manufacturer to make the trade familiar with his name. The Case is of a magnificent oak, and the Silver Ware elegant, of beautiful pattern, and of the finest quality

DONT BE A CLAM

CLAMS ARE NOT A PROPER MODEL FOR A HUMAN BEING TO COPY AFTER they are credited as their old clam-like notions:—they open their shells to rake in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS

AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS:—

TO GROCERS' WIVES
We offer a Special Premium of a beautiful set of Plated Silver Knives and Forks, for simply giving The Frank Siddalls Soap a thorough trial

A Clam is not a good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after:—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after:—is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after:—

A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will TRY new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers:—

A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Butter Worker or a Grain Binder:—

A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for:—

Of course if a woman lives every new thing that she hears of she will often be duped:—Not those to an sensible man or sensible woman Who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such sanctimonious use of their papers for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they did not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways!

SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the Linen.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it is a subject to assert fact and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothing and Linen kept White, even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water or fuel is scarce remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets re-suit as when New!
The most delicate Colored Laces and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired?
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes:—It is the only Soap that leaves the dish rag Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be relied upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag dont blame your servants; it is not their fault; for you have given them soap made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish-rag; use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dishrag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paints, Windows and Mirrors, Wire-gloves, Goblets, and all other Varnished and nearly soap, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass; while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for this purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Bureau Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantlepieces, etc.—It is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat or be troubled with sores of any kind when bathing but The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, its ingredients being so pure and mild.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles as gum soles—does soon scald them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease, and without causing a scratch, the soap does not have to be rinsed off.

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Father of the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy, will all magnify beyond the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is so different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost incredible, the lime water forming a soft soap, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how closely shaved, and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be used:—nothing.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE:—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce, remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Sores, Galls, Scratches, and Abrasions of the skin, it is unequalled:—No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable, while for washing cars and car windows, cleaning the running-gear and bodies of fine carriages, it is without a rival, by its use paint is not varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps with be as clear as crystal.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is eligenat for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and so far, we know, no shocking accidents by fire often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children use Amateur Printing Presses should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for immediate use, and will take the ink readily.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient, its importance is becoming more and more widely known and appreciated, and it is rapidly superseding Imported Castile and similar Soaps for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE-NAILS

in place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing Old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns; for washing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults; for use by persons suffering with Salt-Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face, and for children afflicted with Scaly Incrustations, it is without any of the injurious effects often experienced when other soap is used, while for washing Underwear it is a most valuable aid to the Physician, by its thorough use with a view to remove the exhalations from the skin that would otherwise counteract the action of his medicines by fixing up the pores, and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, lie on our desk of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for Washing Sores on the Feet, caused by walking or wearing tight shoes.

Always leave plenty of the lather on—dont rinse the lather off.

For washing Graduate Measures and Mortars it is better than anything else.

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the Skin; The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients, that is always pleasant, even to an invalid, it never leaves any odor on the Skin; the lather never has any of the disagreeable smell that other soaps produce; it should always be used for washing the hands and face of those troubled with Chapped Skin.—a child will not dread having its face washed when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, as it does not sting the eyes as with the dreaded intense thing that even Imported Castile Soap often causes, it always leaves the skin soft and smooth.

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it.

A little on the tooth-brush makes the mouth, teeth and gums perfectly clean.

It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath, and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted for toilet use with the hard water of the East and in Lake-water.

PERSONS WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE or WASH-RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. When never either a Sponge or Wash-rag has a disagreeable smell. It is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soaps that is such a favorite with you; it is the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash-rag sweet and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any occasion to expose it to the air at all.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing; plenty of the rich, white lather should be left in the hair and washed out; it entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic, Bay Rum, Dandeline, Pomade, or any hair dressing. Until this way it recovers dandruff the hair will not collect dust, and there will also be no itching of the scalp.—Coat Collars, Hat Linings and Rock-wear will keep clean much longer.

—Try it for washing your Eye-Closhes and Spectacles.—

The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior to Benzine or Acetonine for Cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing Grease Spots, etc., and is guaranteed not to injure the garment

ODD USES—QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

Eminent Physicians claim that skin diseases, such as Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., are caused by Soap made from rancid grease; use The Frank Siddalls Soap and avoid all such troubles.

Artificial Teeth and Artificial Eyes will retain their original brilliancy unimpaired when kept washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap.

It Washes Telescope Lenses and Photographers' Plates without a possibility of scratching them, while it is boiled and with the most gratifying results in Schools of Design he washing the expensive brushes used by the pupils.

For Washing Pearls, Coral Diamonds, and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Plate, and for cleaning Watch Crystals, it is considered by Jewelers superior to any powder or other preparation.

Wash your Dog with The Frank Siddalls Soap; lots of plenty of the lather in his hair, and you will be surprised at the improvement: a dog washed with this Soap will be too clean to harbor fleas

Use it for tarting grease spots out of fine carpets and for cleaning rag carpets; also for cleaning garments of every description. It is better than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning clothing, and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

Use it for wiping off oil cloths, linoleums, &c.—IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT, and we it does away with scrubbing them. They will of course last much longer,

The hands of those on farm work, when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, will not chap from washing sore driving teams and other out-door employments, but of course other-made soap, toilet soap or any other kind will of NOT DO THIS! And even Castile Soap!

It is invaluable to farmers for washing wool before carding it, or before selling it.

Milk Pans, Churns and Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be so clean and sweet as now, and the DUT require scalding or putting in the sun. It also THOROUGHLY removes the smell from the hands after milking.

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY

at Places where it is Not Sold at the Stores

Send the retail price in cents in money or Postage Stamps. Say the name of the advertisement in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" Only send for One Cake, and make these 2 promises

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash-day after receiving it and that every one of the family wash shall be done with it

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that a printed direction for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular 10-cent cake of Soap will be sent, postage prepaid; it will be packed in a way from box to make it carry safely, and it costs in Postage Stamps will be put on. All this is done because it is believed that it is a cheaper way to introduce it than to send salesmen to sell it to the stores.

If your letter gets no attention, it will be because you have not made the promises, or because you have send for more than one cake.

Make the promises very plain, or the Soap will NOT be sent

A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister if the above TWO promises are made.

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

A Person of Refinement will be glad to adopt a new, easy, clean way of washing clothes, in place of the old, hard, sloppy way

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

A Person of Intelligence will have no difficulty in understanding and following the very easy and sensible directions

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

A Person of Honor will scorn to do so mean a thing as to buy the Soap and not follow the directions strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

Sensible Persons will not get mad, but will feel thankful that their attention has been directed to better methods.

And now dont get the old wash boiler out and, but next wash-day give one honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for; but when trying it, dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses to accommodate you, or you can order direct from the Factory

You must NOT send for more than one cake; if a friend wants to try it, she must send in a separate letter.

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions—any child over 12 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used NOT A PAN! HEAT THE WASH WATER, and as the wash-water is not only to lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the Atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in The Frank Siddalls Soap

Be sure be heat the water in the tea-kettle

THE FIRST TIME, no matter how cold it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure at always make the first water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap; but will be as sweet as it never soap, and stated that have been previously in washing will bleach out white during, and the clothes will look paler.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the stirred; it makes the rinsing easier, and the clothes handsomer

The Frank Siddalls Soap washed freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; dont use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap in any of the wash.

FIRST—Rub one of the garments in a tub of lukewarm water, draw it out on a wash board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to scrub it, being particular not to mix soaping any of the rolled pieces,

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as you would a towel. If in sprinkled for ironing, lay it to the bottom of the tub under the water and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes or one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board AND THE DIRT WILL DROP OFF; turn the garment inside out to get at the seams, but DONT use any more soap, DONT SCALDOR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DONT wash through two suds. If the suds-water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold for the hands add some hot water out of the tea-kettle.

If a Streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lake-warm water, AND IS FOR THE PURPOSE OF GETTING THE DIRTY SUDS OFF, and it is to be done as before. Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OFF. Any one of experience will KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold; Use little or no Bluing, be this soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A LAW UNTO HIMSELF.

SWITCHMAN CHANDLER. "Bother the signals! Every man has the right to judge for himself how to run the road."

NEW PRICES! $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50, $3.

Owing to the unprecedented excuses attending the sale and use of [illegible]

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC BRUSHES

at $3, and in response to a very general inquiry for cheaper goods, possessing the same superior quality, we have placed on the market a full line of these beautiful and invaluable implements, retailing at $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, $2 50, and $3 00.

Each Hair Brush has the same original design peculiar to our well-known $3 00 and $5 00 Brushes, the same electro-magnetic power — the difference being only in the size and number of the batteries. Each Brush is guaranteed to be as represented, and is accompanied by a silver-plated comb, by which its power can be tested. A handsome BOUDOIR accompanied by a silver-plated comb, by which its power can be tested. A handsome BOUDOIR accompanying cut is a reduced fac-simile of each Brush as sent out.

NOT WIRE BRUSHES,

THEY WILL POSITIVELY CURE Nervous Headache in 5 minutes; Bilious Headache in 5 minutes; Neuralgia in 5 minutes!! Falling Hair and Baldness!! Dandruff and Diseases of the Scalp!

Promptly Arrest Premature Grayness!! Make the Hair Grow Long and Glossy!! Rarely fails to produce a rapid growth of hair on bald heads, where the glands and follicles are not totally destroyed.

BUT PURE BRISTLES.

From the Venerable President of the New York Life Ins. Co.

I suffered every morning for years from headache; your brush relieves them at once. I heartily recommend it. MORRIS FRANKLIN.

From the Mayor of Saratoga.

It always cures my headaches within a few minutes. A beautiful Hair Brush well worth the price aside from its curative qualities. JAS. H. CAMPBELL.

From the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Wife suffered for years from headache, your brush cures them at once; it has now cured several times. I use it to remove dandruff; it works like a charm. My wife was getting bald; it stopped the falling out and made a new growth.

GEN. THOMPSON, Little Rock, Ark.

Every mail brings similar letters from all parts of the country.

EITHER KIND SENT, POSTPAID, ON TRIAL.

We will send [illegible] a kind preferred, on receipt of the price, with 20c. added for packing and registering. The price will be returned if not just as represented. Send by Express or Registered Mail, or Money Order, or Currency, payable to Geo. A. Scott, 842 Broadway, New York. We ask your druggist for them. These are not any Voltaic Magnetic Therapeutic Belts, but Dr. Scott's Flesh Brush, $3 00; Electric Corsets—new prices, $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, and $3 00, according to size and [illegible]. Agents Wanted. Dr. Scott's Electropathic Adjustable Belt, price $5 00. [illegible] Price [illegible] Electric Hair Brush and Belt, all prices and styles.

DECKER BROTHERS'

MATCHLESS

PIANOS

33 Union Square, N. Y.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER

SAYS OF

DR. TOWNSEND'S REMEDY FOR

Hay-Fever, Asthma, and Catarrh:

"I believe it will be sure in ninety cases in a hundred."

Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1882.

"I am happy to say that your remedy has served me a second season fully as well as the first year."

Pamphlets, with Rev. Beecher's full letter and other testimonials, furnished on application.

Prepared only by

DR. H. H. TOWNSEND, Prosbury, Md.

Price, 50 cents and $1 00 per bottle.

For sale by CHARLES DENNIS, First Pl. and Court St., Brooklyn, N. Y., and by all Druggists.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM ABROAD

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

738 & 741 BROADWAY.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK.

P&A

ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUMB, ATWOOD MFG CO.

WATERBURY, CONN.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large sizes for circulars, &c. Pay for themselves in a few days. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

Your STRONG PASSPORT SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model [illegible] Magazine [illegible] much finer, than any other. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

[illegible] naming county and state. Please [illegible] this paper.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or

KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

Blisters, Scrofula, Fevers, all vanish before Dr. Bosanko Skin Cure. Internal and external.

HOW TO MAKE PHOTOGRAPHS

A copy of the above with Descriptive Catalogue, given to any one who contemplates the purchase of an Amateur Photographic Outfit.

SCOVILL MANUFACTURING CO.,

423 Broome Street, New York.

W. IRVING ADAMS, Agent.

THE IMPROVED HORSMAN BICYCLE

A durable and easy running safety for men and boys.

28 in. 48 lb. 42 in. 52 lb. 44 in. 54 lb. 46 in. 56 lb. 48 in. 58 lb.

New York Agency for Horsman Bicycles and Instructory for Bicycle Riding, 204 B'way. Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

E. I. HORSMAN, Manufacturer, 80 & 82 William st., N. Y.

AUTOGRAPHS WANTED.

Collectors and others having Autograph Letters and Documents to sell or exchange should address

BEN. W. AUSTIN, Mount City, Iowa.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Asbestos Fire Proof Paint for Iron Roofs.

H. W. JOHNS MFG CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE N.Y.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to No. 2 to 6 CRITTENTON, Nos. 100 to 106 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. O. CROTTY & CO. except for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for our other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE BEST THE QUEBER WATCH CASE

TELESCOPES [illegible]

for terrestrial Observation. A. A. [illegible] Philadelphia.

Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

"Dr. Benson's Celery Pills improved my system."—Rev. B. F. Taylor, Lawrence.

The White Sulphur Springs Hotel,

COTTAGES AND RESTAURANT,

GREENBRIER CO., W. Va.,

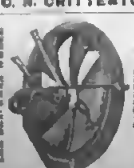
[illegible] most celebrated resort in the South. [illegible] eight d., weather wonderful in June. [illegible] to Tourists $3 50 per day, [illegible] week, and [illegible] month. Circulars, [illegible] all [illegible] Washington and Hygeia [illegible] Special [illegible]

H. FOOTE, Lessee.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CRACKERS IN THE BEST [illegible]

CONGRESS WATER.

[illegible] A specific [illegible] Kidneys, or acrid [illegible] drangbt.



BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to

HOWARD & BEEBE, 45 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

From Pennsylvania and the Southern States, to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 27 North 6th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PAVARA PILLS.

These Pills are the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. No pain, nausea, or purging. New and perfect remedy. Is constantly used by physicians. Send by Druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents.

O. N. CRITTENTON, General Agent, 115 Fulton Street, New York City.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS.

No 08 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 25c. in stamps.

Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

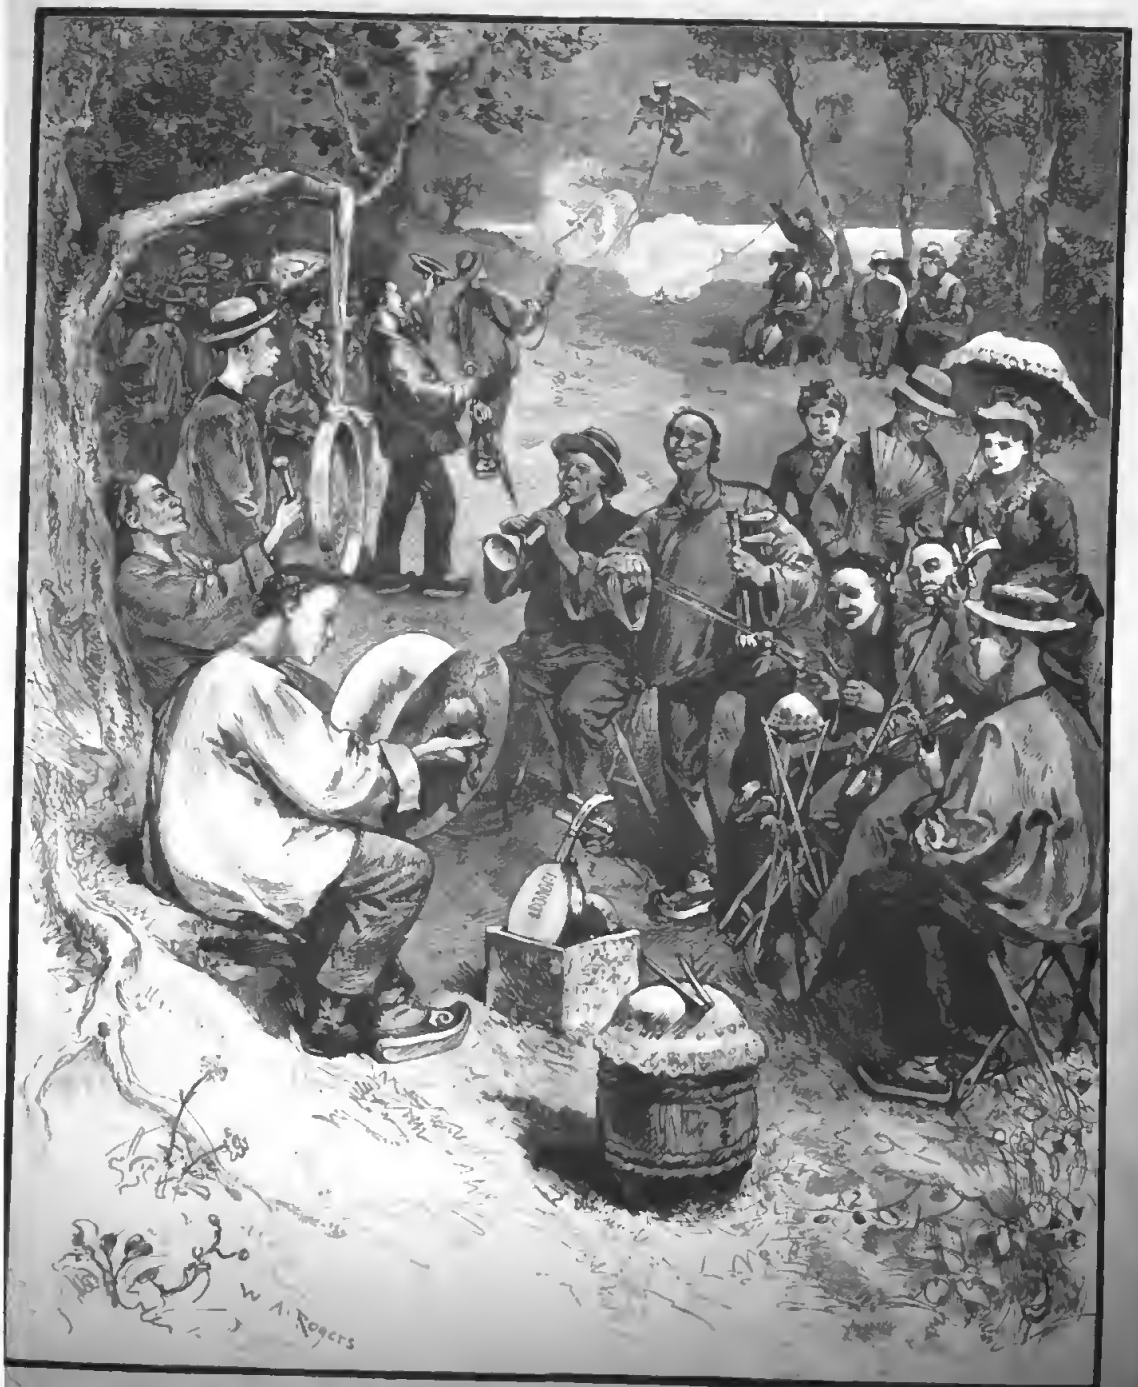
LEOHEVI COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1382. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



THE CHINESE PICNIC, IONA ISLAND—CELESTIAL MUSICIANS.—DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBBIT'S "Christmas Hymn" —the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study as one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $2000; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $2000; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $1000.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is available, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBBIT have been published. That published in 1857 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE BATTLE OF CANDIDATES.

THE preliminary canvass for the Democratic Presidential nomination is proceeding vigorously. With equal vigor proceeds the discussion of the principles or policy which the party shall profess in its platform, and it is a very warm contest. The free-trade Democrats insist that the party shall declare unequivocally against protection. But not only does Kentucky, the State of the chief free-trade leaders, dodge the question, but the Democratic protectionists argue substantially that the free-trade Democrats are fools. A leading free-trade Democratic journal asserts that the election of MR. RANDALL as Speaker will dissolve the Democratic party, and a Democratic protectionist paper insinuates plainly that a free-trade platform will defeat the party. The policy proposed by the Democratic protectionists is the careful avoidance of all "questions," and reliance upon the cry of Republican misgovernment and corruption. This is a plan not without cunning, for it enables the Democrats to conceal the startling fact that the Democratic party represents no principle or policy whatever, and no reform but "change," while it attacks the Republican party at every weak point of its record.

This plan will be probably adopted. It is a make-shift which better suits the Democratic situation than the promulgation of a great national policy and its lively debate before the country. New York is undoubtedly the seat of the strongest free-trade sentiment. Yet it is in New York that the strongest Democratic expressions are heard against a free-trade platform. Indeed, is the city of New York the ablest and most influential advocates of tariff reform are Republican journals, while the Democratic journals, with Queen ELIZABETH'S Chancellor, "smiling, put the question by." As we have said, the action of the Democratic Convention in Kentucky, where the most strenuous free trade organ is published, and where the free-trade chiefs live, undoubtedly forecasts the action of the National Convention. But if this be so, the canvassed candidates has one most serious defect. If the favorite plan be, as we think, to offer the Democratic party to the country as a great agent of political purification and reform, however comical the proposition, the evidence that it is so must be sought in the candidate. Yet nobody is seriously mentioned as a candidate except the "old stagers," the war-horses whose names are perhaps too familiar, and General BUTLER. The most popular suggestion is said to be that of the old ticket, meaning TILDEN and HENDRICKS. The mere proposition is another illustration of the hopeless fatuity of the party. A Democratic campaign with the cipher dispatches as the gonfalon of reform would be the most side-splitting comedy in our political history.

The total want of sincerity in the Democratic preliminary performance which is now going on is shown in the fact that the one conspicuous public man in the Democratic party who is at once a Democrat and an honest seeker of honest administration is not only not prominently mentioned among the candidates, but is especially snubbed and rejected by the most earnest advocates of the "reform" campaign. We mean, of course, Governor CLEVELAND, of New York. He is a Democrat whose acts we have not always approved, and who is undoubtedly a strong party man. But he is the one Democratic leader in high position who plainly aims at honest administration for the sake of the public and not of his party. He especially represents what the party is going to profess to desire, and that he should be practically repudiated as a candidate, because he has fought jobbery and corruption in his own party, is conclusive proof of the hollowness of the Democratic pretense. Senator BECK evidently knows that there is not much general confidence in the virtue of the Democratic party. But if that party means to contest the election upon the ground of superior virtue, it should stop talking about candidates who were leaders when it lost its virtue, and about the old ticket, which recalls one of the most unscrupulous of personal campaigns.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF HARMONY.

HARMONY has not yet been completely established in either party. The plan proposed by the Republican sub-committee has not yet been approved by the central committee, and it is by no means commended by all sides of the party. There is always this difficulty in treaties and compromises and accommodations, that something must be given up, and each of the high contracting parties is always apprehensive that it has yielded more than its share. In the proposed scheme of Republican reorganization in the city the Stalwarts surrender the district associations as permanent caucuses under their control, and also the pledges which necessarily kept them under their control by excluding vast numbers of self-respecting voters. The Half-Breeds surrender an entire release from pledges by agreeing to a pledge to take part in no other party caucuses during the year. The weight of the surrender is obviously from the Stalwarts. But this is only fair, because it was under the Stalwart "primacy" that overwhelming defeat befell the party.

It is complained that the associations were the life of the party, and that to abandon them is to drift into inefficiency. The constant and unanswerable reply to this complaint is that under the system founded upon associations, as now constituted, the party was beaten by two hundred thousand majority. To call such associations indispensable and the life of the party is ludicrous to the last degree. It is not proposed to disband the associations, but to deprive them of their monstrous and illicit power, and to enable the great body of Republicans to vote at the primaries if they wish to vote. If the central committee should reject the new scheme, or seriously modify it, a very important issue would at once appear in the State campaign. The question of reorganization would become vital, and the party would be very gravely imperiled. The Republicans of New York showed plainly at the last election that they no longer acknowledge the authority of the existing organization. This is not solely because of the personal character of some of its leaders, but because of its vicious system. To continue that system is to defeat the party.

We do not say that to adopt the new scheme is to insure success. Success is not to be foretold. But to adopt it is to remove the obstruction which experience has terribly demonstrated to be fatal to the party. It is not worth while to accuse and recriminate. If anybody thinks himself to be a better Republican than somebody else, let him think so in peace. If anybody is comforted by describing somebody else as a kicker, a dodger, a shirker, a scratcher, a jayhawker, a cuss-waxer, a renegade, a traitor, a deputy Democrat, or a lizard upon a hill, by all means let him be so comforted. But as an while it is necessary to remember that if Republican success in New York be desirable, it can not be achieved by a discredited leadership and a distrusted organization. It may be that intelligent and respectable Republicans will not take the trouble to be enrolled. We should deeply regret such indifference, and we should do our part in pointing out its culpable folly. But let all men and brethren remember that the possibility of such indifference is no reason for adhering to a system which gave the State to the Democrats by two hundred thousand majority.

THE GENERAL'S LITTLE GAME.

SOME of the reported leaders of the independent movement in Massachusetts which was lately announced have disavowed connection with it, but they probably do not disapprove its purpose. That purpose we suppose to have been to bring forward the name of a proper candidate for Governor against General BUTLER—a candidate who might be unwilling to resort to the measures which are usually necessary to secure a nomination, but whose character and standing would commend him to the anti-BUTLER sentiment of the State, while the certainty that he would be supported by the independent voters would have great influence with the Republican Convention. But as a Convention to nominate such a candidate would require a great deal of work, it is probable that the same work would secure a satisfactory Republican nomination. Unless, therefore, the purpose was to organize a new party—and for that we have seen no scheme—the reported meeting may be taken as an emphatic expression of the feeling that the paramount political necessity in Massachusetts is the defeat of General BUTLER in the autumn.

But is it clear that, under the circumstances, General BUTLER will be a candidate? He is hoping for the Presidential nomination of his party, and he has an understanding with JOHN KELLY. MR. KELLY has been to Boston, and General BUTLER is coming to New York to make the "long talk" at Tammany Hall on the Fourth of July. In this situation the General must make no mistakes. Now he has thoroughly touched the pride and aroused the indignation of Massachusetts, by trying to show her up to the country as hypocritically inhuman. The rebutting evidence and the report of Mrs. Leonard upon the Tewksbury business show that his course has been signally unjust, and that it was taken purposely to humiliate the State. Should General BUTLER be a candidate for re-election there would be an immense vote, and the chances of his success would be at least extremely doubtful. He wisely announced before he outraged the feeling of the State that it was very uncertain whether he should run again. Should he venture, against the plain chances, and be defeated, his political career would end summarily. The General is a political gamester, and will he not think that there is a more promising game?

In view of his probable defeat, why should he not stand aside upon the plea that he has never intended to be a candidate, and see a Republican elected? He could then modestly point to himself as the only Democrat who, by his personal weight, can carry Massachusetts. His friends could whisper that, without Tammany, Democratic success is impossible in New York, and that Tammany is deeply impressed with the greatness and availability of General BUTLER, who could carry perhaps half New England and New York. Would this not be a more promising game than that which involves a tolerably sure defeat in Massachusetts and the end of the whole matter? There were many Republicans last year who were willing to see what BUTLER would do as Governor. They have now seen, and they are probably satisfied. It is not possible that he has won any Republicans by his course, and it is certain that thousands of Republicans who stood at home last year will not stay at home this year. The number of new voters in the State who know nothing of the history and character of Massachusetts, and who have no pride in them, is undoubtedly very large, but unless the State is radically changed, its Governor has not pursued the course which leads to re-election, and he will hardly tempt his fate.

THE STAR ROUTE VERDICT.

THE result of the Star Route trials can not be said to have surprised the country. There has been a vague feeling that there were sinister influences which would probably prevent a conviction, but nowhere a feeling that the accused persons were innocent. The result is unfortunate for the Administration, and for the national good name. There is no more doubt in the public mind that great frauds have been committed than there was seven or eight years ago of the Whiskey Ring swindles, and it is a public misfortune that when such offenses are so vast they seem to involve interests which make conviction almost impossible.

But it is not for the whole country only that the failure is unfortunate. The miscarriage of justice in the Whiskey Ring frauds was a very serious blow to the Republican party. The similar miscarriage in the Star Route swindles will be of no advantage to it. A noted Democratic politician was heard to say the other day after dinner: "We've got 'em! we've got 'em! By —— we have only got to say nothing and do nothing, and we have 'em sure." In vino veritas, and it is worth while to see in this expression and in the tone of the Democratic press the probable line of the Democratic campaign.

It is useless to discuss the gossip from Washington in regard to the reasons of the verdict. But it is hardly probable that the case will be tried again. Two failures will be doubtless accepted as conclusive, and the result is that the government will have lost an enormous sum of money, and the country much of its confidence in a District of Columbia jury. Without meaning to disparage the efforts of any counsel connected with the cause, it may be truly said that MR. MERRICK devoted himself to it with a zeal and ability which merited a better fortune. The verdict is a sorry conclusion for the interests of justice and public honesty, for the country and for the Republican party.

LOCAL BOARDS OF CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINERS.

THE objection to the local boards of examiners under the civil service reform bill, that they were taken from the service, has been disposed of by MR. EATON, who states that the bill requires such selections. Besides, the experience of the examinations in New York during the last three years proves that such boards may be as efficient as those composed of members who are not in the service. The benefit of criticism from non-official persons has been obtained by inviting the attendance of intelligent outsiders at the examinations, and the Reform Association in the city has appointed a committee of its members to attend the examinations which will be held under the new law.

Such a committee will undoubtedly see the same honest and skillful conduct of examinations which has been observable hitherto. The local board in New York seems to have been carefully selected; MR. OSBORNE and General

Williams were members of the late board, and are perfectly familiar with the details and methods of examination and rating, and their associates, we believe, are gentlemen who will carefully co-operate in the work of the board.

The success of the reformed system depends in practice, of course, upon the good faith of those to whom its execution is intrusted. A merely perfunctory and evasive observance of the law would but intrench more securely the abuses which it is designed to correct. The work of the board is not extra, but the law makes it a part of the official duty of the members. That this was the intention of Congress must be inferred from the refusal to allow them extra compensation for their services upon the board. The service is therefore to be accounted part of the regular duty of the members selected under the law, to be discharged like other duties under the usual conditions. Any other view would imply that Congress intended to grant of public agents extra work without extra pay. Under the auspices of the President, who has shown no unfriendly disposition, there is no doubt that the work will be most honorably and efficiently done by the local board in New York.

QUESTIONABLE IMMIGRATION.

The British steam-ship Belgravia brought to New York last week seven hundred Irish immigrants who had been aided by the British government to reach this country, and on many more are upon the way, who will be followed indefinitely by others. A dispatch on the Evening Post says that only the needest poor are sent out to America by the government. Honest, intelligent, and industrious immigrants from all parts of the globe are always welcome, but this country should not be made the dumping ground of European crime, pauperism, and idleness.

Such things are no more welcome to America than to the countries which cast them upon our shores. There are laws which hold ship companies responsible for bringing criminals and paupers to this country, and they are laws which should be strictly enforced. Every ship which brings such passengers should be summarily compelled to carry them back again at its own charges.

It is a serious offense for one nation to throw its helpless or criminal population upon the care of another, and it should not be permitted. It is a peculiarly unfriendly act upon the part of Great Britain toward the United States, because she has colonies of her own to which she might send those for whose helplessness British legislation is largely responsible. Certainly reprisals in kind would amaze Englishmen. The whole subject is in an unsatisfactory condition, and Congress ought to investigate it fully, and secure the country against heavy burdens which do not belong to it.

PRESIDENT SHALER.

General Shaler has been appointed President of the Board of Health. It is an appointment which is most creditable to the Mayor, and it is satisfactory to Professor Chandler, the late efficient President, whose renomination the Aldermen refused to confirm. General Shaler is a well-known citizen, whose energy and ability have been tested and approved, and the public will naturally expect from him a vigorous and effective administration of the important duties of the Board. It is shameful, however, that the appointment of so fitting an officer should depend upon the approval of such a body as the Board of Aldermen of New York, and it is no wonder that every Mayor feels that under such conditions good municipal government is almost impossible.

THE NIAGARA FALLS COMMISSION.

The Niagara Falls Commission, having elected Mr Dorsheimer president, has decided, upon motion of Mr Sherman S. Rogers, of Buffalo, that a certain tract of land described in the resolution shall be selected and located as essential to the restoration of the cataract to its natural condition, and that, pending the final decision upon the subject, the State Engineer and Surveyor be requested to prepare a map of the tract, with the highways, buildings, and other erections upon the land.

It will be remembered that the duty of the Commission is to consider what land should be taken for the purpose of removing the disfiguring obstructions about the cataract which are fast destroying its beauty and grandeur, and to estimate the probable cost. It will then submit its report, and the next Legislature will decide whether the work shall be executed in accordance with the suggestion of the Commission.

Meanwhile there is the great satisfaction of knowing that here is a noble public enterprise, to which every New-Yorker has a natural pride and interest, confided to gentlemen whose character is the guarantee that no kind of jobbery or unfair dealing is possible, and that every just interest will be honorably considered.

QUACKS AND HERETICS.

The American Medical Association at its annual meeting in Cincinnati refused to consider the revision of the code. That is to say, it declined to review or amend the prohibition of free consultation. The old code contains a clause, as we have before stated, which was intended to stigmatize the homœopathic practice as irregular. This was adopted nearly forty years ago, and it was undoubtedly intended to "brush" homœopathy.

Meanwhile homœopathy has advanced greatly in popular favor. Many carefully trained physicians of the old school have passed into the ranks of the new, and whatever theoretical view a physician may hold of the practice known as homœopathic, it is that of many of the most accomplished physicians and of the most intelligent patients in the country. It is therefore simply a question of common-sense and expediency whether the fellowship of a medical society shall be refused to physicians who think that they can be serviceable in saving human life and in the relief of human suffering by conferring with other intelligent physicians.

This refusal seems foolish to the New York State Medical Society, which, as we lately stated, has been excited by a proposition to reverse its liberal action of last year, and restore the old prohibition. In reply to our recent remarks, a Western physician writes to ask whether honest physicians ought to recognize quacks. To such a question we reply that honest physicians ought to do whatever they think to be of use to save life or relieve suffering, and so that end they must be entirely independent. Nobody knows better than physicians how uncertain their own knowledge is, and how progressive is science. Quackery in medicine is a term very like heresy in theology. But it is always well to remember that both Luther and Calvin were heretics, and that the dissenting Puritans hung the dissenting Quakers.

GENERAL SHERMAN AT WEST POINT.

General Sherman's address at West Point was very pathetic, because while his tone was half jocose, and he told several good stories, it was plain enough that he knew that it was the last time he should speak officially as the head of the army to its youngest officers. But his heroic and picturesque personality will always be one of the cherished traditions of the army, on his great services will be always one of the patriotic traditions of the country. He is himself an admirable illustration of the folly of the half jealous suspicion of West Point and aristocratic nursery of "wasp-waisted wampires," of which he told an capital story.

Of that kind of wampire were Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Meade, Sedgwick, and how many more, whose names are national treasures. If, as General Sherman said, there was great danger that the West Point Academy would be abolished in 1840, there is no such apprehension in 1873. Undoubtedly, at certain times, there have been malign influences there, and some of its pupils turned the skill which they acquired there against the flag which has always flown over the school. But none the less the service of West Pointers was incalculable in keeping that flag flying over the whole country.

When the time shall arrive for General Sherman to withdraw from the command of the army he will find that he can never withdraw from the grateful regard of his country, which will follow him into his retirement undiminished and forever renewed.

THE INTERNATIONAL DINNER IN PARIS.

At the dinner in Paris to the International Commission of the Boston Exhibition the United States were admirably represented by Mr. Morton, the Minister, and Mr. George Walker, the Consul-General. In a few well-chosen words, spoken in his own language, Mr. Morton described the character and importance of Boston, and stated officially that Congress had especially sanctioned the Exhibition, and had remitted the payment of duties upon all foreign articles sent to it. Mr. Morton also briefly summarized the operation of the revised tariff upon French exports to the United States. It affected chiefly wines of art, but he mentioned a strong movement to secure a modification of this clause, and he concluded that the revised tariff was, upon the whole, advantageous to France.

Mr. Walker made a capital speech in French, citing Massachusetts and Boston as characteristic illustrations of the practical operation of American institutions, which the French Commissioners would naturally study. No government, they would find, can be more stable than a popular government. There is little fear of a revolution which could only overturn itself, as of a conspiracy against chiefs who are chosen by the conspirators. Yet proud and confident is his own method as the American is, he knows that many roads lead to Rome, and that in other ways than his national intelligence and liberty can be promoted.

Mr Walker gracefully finished a singularly graceful and appropriate speech by expressing a wish that the Boston exposition may be as brilliant, as instructive, and civilizing as those great French exhibitions which by their signal success have so greatly justified and stimulated the Boston enterprise.

PERSONAL.

An accomplished belle of this city, the daughter of an old merchant, remembers hearing her father say that he was the first person to lend the late A. T. Stewart one hundred dollars, and that his confidence in Mr Stewart's judgment in business matters was perfect from the first. "Stewart used to come to my store," he would say, "pass along the rows of bales full of dry goods, and predict in once which lots would sell and which would not. I never knew him to make a mistake about it. He was then just beginning his career, but if he said that a certain line of goods could not sell they were sure to remain unsold. He was a born buyer."

—A surgeon in the United States army who prided himself on his linguistic capacity learned some useful Chinese phrases one day from a Celestial in San Francisco. The next morning, being called to attend a Chinese patient, he determined to air his newly acquired knowledge, and on approaching the bedside of the invalid, addressed him with what he supposed to be the Chinese equivalent of our Anglo-Saxon "Good-morning to you." He was somewhat surprised to find himself picked up by the male relatives of the sick man and hauled unceremoniously to the street. His crafty instructor had taught him as a salutation one of the most insulting strong of epithets conceivable.

—The American wood engraver having received much recognition in England, and been pronounced the best of his kind in existence, has at length made a sensation at the Paris Salon, where that year there were more than four hundred wood-engravings of various nationalities on exhibition. A private letter from that city announces that Mr. Rodney Hoskes, of New York, who sent to the Salon a frame containing a dozen specimens of his excellent work, chief among which were the "Sunday Morning in Surrey" and the "Tronen Fountain," well known to the readers of Harper's Magazine, has won a medal. We congratulate the artist on a personal success which is an honor in the art of his country.

—Mr Ruskin confesses that having himself been brought up almost exclusively in fairy-land, he is almost tempted to say that "no story should be told to children which is not natural." At any rate, he is sure that no child will ever take so much delight in a real tale of history as in the story of the shipwreck of a walnut shell in a gutter; nor has any child ever made a pet of a mechanical mouse, or of a doll that walks by machinery, but "no ever-memorable little cousin used to pet the knob at my stick, and even made a night gown for it, finally asking her mother, in timid and confidential whispers, whether she had better make any sleeves, because as Biley has no arms, perhaps she wouldn't like it." The writer of this paragraph, however, knows several bright boys who, after listening to a fairy story, immediately inquire if it is true, and when told that it is not true, invariably ask for a story that is true. Are the tastes of the present generation more realistic than those of the last, or is the instance just mentioned an exceptional one?

—Goethe's moral character having received a whitewashing from Professor J. S. Blackie, the Pall Mall Gazette points out that Goethe did not marry Christiane Vulpius till some twenty years after her eldest child was born, and that his blackest mark was not his ill-regulated passion, but his very well regulated heartlessness. "He was one of the greatest of men of letters, he was also a very wise man; but to make him out a 'perfectly virtuous man,' to sweep away the evidence which shows him to have been anything but perfectly virtuous, is, we doubt, more than seven Scotch professors, furnished with seven maps, each consisting of a brand-new definition of virtue, can do in half a year or half a century."

—The legatees of the late Amasa Stone, of Cleveland, Ohio, have made themselves memorable. Having learned that one or two of the millionaire's relatives, to whom he had been very friendly, were overlooked in the will, they agreed to assess themselves generously to create a fund for them. This course does much better than to allow your father's name to be dragged through the mire of a lawsuit in a surrogate's court.

—Jeff Davis is described as speaking slowly, and "with great deliberation and elegance of language." He gives the sound a prolonged sibilant quality, which, however, is "soft and pleasant to the ear." His memory is excellent. "Soon after I had finished conversing with him," says the candid reporter, "he leaned his head down and went to sleep."

—The death of that honored New York merchant, Mr Nicholas White, still be widely regretted. Like the late Mr. William E. Dodge, whom sister he married, Mr. White was a philanthropist by nature, and a born manager of charitable enterprises. He had been the president of the New York Bible Society, and the vice-president of the American Bible Society and of the Union Theological Seminary, and he may be called the founder of the New York Sabbath Society. For several years he was the president of the Mercantile National Bank. He age was seventy-eight. Mr White represented a type of citizen that is fast disappearing.

—Referring to the recent efforts of some lawyers in this city to secure the discharge from an insane asylum of a rich inmate "whom a competent and impartial physician pronounced the most decided lunatic he had ever met," one of our esteemed contemporaries hopes that Judge Cullen will not dismiss the case without finding out who employed the lawyers, and how much pay the latter are expecting to receive. "If it appears that they employed themselves, a judicial decision on the question whether it is professional for lawyers to hunt up the dangerous wards of lunatic asylums in search of rich clients would be of general interest."

—The fame of Mr Ignatius Donnelly's Atlantis (Harper & Brothers, publishers) has extended to Spain, and one of the foremost of Spanish scholars is engaged in making a translation of this fascinating work for publication in that country. The book has passed through ten large editions in the United States, and has also had an extensive sale in England.

—Sir Henry Thompson, the eminent physician, writes that the greatest harm of cigarette-smoking arises from inhaling the smoke directly into the lungs, where it comes into immediate contact with the circulation, and produces an effect felt by a sensitive person in the tips of the fingers. He recommends the use of a cigarette-holder, or mouth piece, which opens transversely in the middle, containing a small cavity filled with cotton-wool. This wool, after an cigarette have been smoked, becomes "saturated with a brown fluid like treacle, of powerfully offensive odor, and disagreeable beyond belief. The wool then requires to be changed, and in this manner the evil of smoking is very greatly diminished," becoming, indeed, less than in any other form of tobacco-smoking.

—Says the Lancet, "Dram-drinking is bad, and excessive tea-drinking is bad, but we think that medical men may say a word now and then against indiscriminate aperient-drinking. An aperient is not, as many think, a cure for every little malady that death is heir to, and to introduce an aperient as a feature of one's daily diet is one step that should be lightly undertaken."

—Dr Gunson A Avery, inventor of the electric brush, sailed recently for Europe, accompanied by his father. It is his intention to make an extensive tour.

—Jenny Brown, the late servant of Queen Victoria, will receive from her Majesty the honor of at least four monuments, one of them a tablet in St. George's Chapel, another a shaft of granite at the head of his grave in Crathie, a third a brass plate in the mausoleum at Frogmore, where the Prince Consort lies buried, and a fourth a cairn on a mountain near Balmoral. How many other tributes of the Queen's affection will serve to keep the gillie's name in public remembrance it is impossible to predict.

—The grounding of the steam ship City of Rome in the channel of New York Harbor has led to a fresh and more serious consideration of a great peril to the commerce of this port, and Mr Thomas Hammond, Jun., of the Anchor Line, tells a reporter that the cost of putting the channel in a proper condition would be less than the sum already expended in deepening the river Clyde.

—Mr Henry Watterson is impressed by "the magnificent scale" on which Governor Talbot is reconstructing his house in Gramercy Park, a full description of which was given in a recent number of this journal. That the old library is still the same, "being held from the hand of despoiling splendor," is a token of the Governor's "affectionate remembrance of old times, old friends, and old books."

—Julia Benton's paternal heart must be greatly rejoiced over the professional success of his only child, the charming Madame Desjet-Benton, whose contribution to the present Salon is described in the Academy as "only a little less admirable than the work of M Jules Barres himself." The picture "represents the sandy and weed-strewn coast of some sunny and southern land, where a dark young mother sits on a hillock and handles a baby, while one or two other children, one of them with curious agility of figure and vivacity of dark brown eyes, sport, lolling naked in the breeze and the sunshine."

—During the last twenty years about two hundred new operas have been produced in Germany, only four or five of which, with the exception of Wagner's, have survived. Italy borrows half of her operas from Germany and France, and France, according to a leading German critic, is producing nothing worthy of being sung in Germany. But this is no reason why New-Yorkers should never hear anything new in the Academy of Music.

—Mlle. Julie, a French model, is described as possessing a slight, slippy figure, a well-set little head on an unusually beautiful neck, gray eyes, blonde hair rather d la Greuze, and the little feet and dumpy fingers with the pointed tips and the small, long nails that are so common with the Parisian model. She has a taste for dress, and knows it and shows it.

—There was an old custom in Bavaria that outside of the limits of the city of Munich not more than four horses may draw a carriage; so when the Princess Isabella of Bavaria was married to the Duke of Genoa she contented herself with a carriage and four and two outriders. The bride wore a dress of white satin embroidered in silver, with a court mantle of the same material, and a crown of myrtle, instead of orange flowers.

Digitized by Google

MR. JAY GOULD'S NEW YACHT, "THE ATALANTA."—DRAWN BY FRED B. SCHELL.—[SEE PAGE 384.]

"WITH ONE HAND HE WAS TIGHTLY GRASPING HIS FOREHEAD, WITH THE OTHER HIS KNEE."

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Far from the Madding Crowd," "The Return of the Native," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a-milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER I.

It was half past five o'clock, on the morning of the 6th of May. A dense white fog hung over the valley of the Sweon, and spread up the hills on either side.

But though nothing in the vale could be seen from higher ground, notes of differing kinds gave pretty clear indications that hustling phases of life had existence there. This audible presence and visual absence of an active scene was very peculiar. Nature had laid a white hand over the creatures concerned within the vale, as a hand might be laid over a nest of chirping birds.

The noises that ascended through the pallid coverlet were perturbed lowings, mingled with human voices in sharps and flats, and the bark of a dog. These, followed by the slamming of a gate, explained as well as eyesight could have done, to any inhabitant of the district, that Dairyman Tucker's under-milker was driving the cows from the mead into the stalls. When a rougher accent joined in the vociferations of man and beast, that same inhabitant would have distinguished that Dairyman Tucker himself had come out to meet the cows, pail in hand, and white pinafore on; and when, moreover, some women's voices joined in the chorus, that the cows were stalled, and proceedings about to commence.

A comparative hush followed, the atmosphere being so stagnant that the milk could be heard buzzing into the pails, together with the words of the milkmaids and men whenever they spoke above gossiping tones.

"Don't ye bide about long upon the road, Margery. You can be back again by skimming-time."

The rough voice described as Dairyman Tucker's was the vehicle of this remark. Then the barton gate slammed again, and in two or three minutes a something became visible, rising out of the fog in that quarter.

First, the shape revealed itself as that of a woman. Next, the gait, which was the gait of one young and agile. Next, the colors and other details of her dress—a bright pink cotton frock, because winter was over, a small woollen shawl of shepherd's plaid, because summer was not come; a white handkerchief tied over her head-gear, because it was an foggy, so damp, and so early; and a straw bonnet and ribbons peeping from under the handkerchief, because it was likely to be a sunny May day.

Her face was of the hereditary type among families down in these parts: sweet in expression, perfect in line, and somewhat irregular in feature. Her eyes were of a liquid brown. On her arm she carried a withy basket, in which lay several butter-rolls in a nest of oat cabbage leaves. She was, no doubt, the "Margery" of the verse, who had been told not to "bide about long upon the road."

She went on her way across the fields, not much perplexed by the fog, except when the track was so indistinct that it ceased to be a guide to the next stile. She carefully avoided treading on the innumerable earth-worms that lay in couples across the path till, startled even by her light tread, they withdrew suddenly into their holes. She kept clear of all trees. Why was this? There was no danger of lightning on such a morning as this: but though the roads were dry, the fog had gathered in the boughs, causing them to run up such a dripping as would go clean through the protecting handkerchief like bullets, and spoil the ribbons beneath. The beech and ash were particularly shunned, for they dripped more maliciously than any. It was an instance of woman's keen appreciativeness of nature's morals and peculiarities: a man crossing those fields might hardly have perceived that the trees dripped at all.

In less than an hour she had traversed a distance of four miles, and arrived at a latticed cottage in a secluded spot. An elderly woman, scarce awake, answered her knocking. Margery delivered up the butter, and said, "How is granny this morning? I can't stay to go up to her, but tell her I have returned what we owed her."

Her grandmother was no worse than usual; and receiving back the empty basket, the girl proceeded to carry out some intention which had not been included in her orders. Instead of returning in the light labour of skimming-time, she hastened on, her direction being toward a little neighbouring town. Before, however, Margery had proceeded far, she met the postman, laden to the neck with letter-bags, of which he had not yet deposited one.

"Are the shops open yet, Samuel?" she said.

"Ah no," replied that stooping pedestrian, not waiting to stand upright. "They won't be open yet this hour, except the saddler and iron-monger and little tucker-bonred machine-man for the farm folk. They downs their shutters at half past six, then the baker's at half past seven, then the draper's at eight."

"Oh, the draper's at eight." It was plain that Margery had wanted the draper's.

The postman turned up a side path, and the young girl, on though deciding within herself that if she could not go shopping at once she might as well get back for the skimming, retraced her steps. The public road home from the point to which she had arrived was easy of access, but devious. By far the nearest way was by getting over a fence adjoining, and crossing the private grounds of a picturesque old country house, whose chimneys were just visible through the trees. As the house had been shut up for many months, the girl decided to take the straight cut. She pushed her way through the laurel bushes, sheltering her bonnet with the shawl as an additional safeguard, scrambled over the wire boundary, went along through more shrubberies, and stood ready to emerge upon the open lawn. Before doing so she looked around in the wary manner of a poacher. It was not the first time that she had broken fence in her life, but somehow, and all of a sudden, she had felt herself too near womanhood to indulge in such practices with freedom. However, she moved forth, and the house front stared her in the face, unobscured by the fog because close at hand.

It was a building of the medium size, and unpretending, the façade being of stone, and of the Italian elevation made familiar by the works of Inigo Jones. There was a doorway to the lawn, standing at the head of a flight of steps. The shutters of the house were closed, and the blinds shutters of the bedrooms drawn down. Her perception of the fact that no county care-taker could see her from the windows led her at once to slacken her pace, and stroll through the flower beds coolly. A house unblushed in a possible spy, and must be treated accordingly; a house with the shutters closed is an inaccurate heap of stone and mortar, to be faced with indifference.

On the other side of the house the greensward rose to an eminence, whereon stood one of those curious summer shelters that are sometimes erected on exposed points of view, called as all the year-round. In the present case it consisted of four walls radiating from a centre like the arms of a turnstile, with seats in each angle, so that whatsoever way the wind came it was always possible to find a screened corner from which to observe the landscape.

The milkmaid's trackless course led her up the hill and past this erection. At ease as to being watched and scolded as an intruder, her mind flew to other matters, till at the moment when she was not a yard from the shelter, she heard a foot or feet scraping on the gravel behind it. Some one was in the all-the-year-round, apparently occupying the seat on the other side, as was proved when, on turning, she saw an elbow, a man's elbow, projecting over the edge.

Now the young woman did not much like the idea of going down the hill under the eyes of this person, which she would have to do if she went on, for on an intruder she was liable to be called back and questioned upon her business there. Accordingly she crept softly up and sat in the seat behind, intending to remain there until her companion should leave.

This he by no means seemed in a hurry to do. What could possibly have brought him there, what could detain him there, at six o'clock on a morning of dense mist when there was nothing to be seen or enjoyed, puzzled her not a little. But he remained quite still, and Margery grew impatient. She downed the track of his feet in the dewy grass, forming a line from the house steps, which announced that he was an inhabitant and not a chance passer-by. At last she peeped round.

CHAPTER II.

A FINE-FEATURED dark-moustached gentleman, in dressing gown and slippers, was sitting there in the fog without a hat on. With one hand he was tightly grasping his forehead, with the other his knee. The attitude bespoke with sufficient clearness a certain mental condition—anguish. He was quite a different being from any of the men to whom her eyes were accustomed. His hands and his face were white—to her view deadly white—and he heeded nothing outside his own existence. There he remained as motionless as the unrufled bushes around him, indeed, he scarcely seemed to breathe.

Having ingeniously advanced thus far, Margery's wish was to get back again in the same unseen manner; but in moving her foot for the purpose it grated slightly on the gravel. He started up with an air of bewilderment, and slipped something into the pocket of his dressing gown. The pair then stood looking blankly at each other.

"Who are you?" he at length asked, sternly, and with not altogether an English articulation. "What do you do here?"

Margery had already begun to be frightened at her own boldness in invading the lawn and pleasure-seat. The house had a master, and she had not known of it. "My name is Margaret Tucker, sir," she said, meekly. "My father is Dairyman Tucker. We live at Stickleford Dairy-house."

"What were you doing here at this hour of the morning?"

She told him, even to the fact that she had climbed over the fence.

"And what made you peep round at me?"

"I saw your elbow, sir; and I wondered what you were doing."

"And what was I doing?"

"Nothing. You had one hand on your forehead and the other on your knee. I do hope you be not ill, sir, or in deep trouble?"

"What difference would it make to you if I were ill or in trouble? You don't know me, and can not care for me."

She returned no answer, feeling that she might have taken a liberty in expressing sympathy. But looking furtively up at him, she discerned to her surprise that he seemed affected by her human wish, simply as it had been expressed. She had scarcely conceived that such a talk dark man could know what gentle feelings were.

"Well, I am much obliged to you for caring how I am," said he, with a faint smile and an affected lightness of manner, which, even to her, only rendered more apparent the real gloom he month. "I have not slept this past night. I m fer from sleeplessness. Probably you don't."

Margery laughed a little, and he glanced with interest at the comely picture she presented: her fresh face, brown hair, candid eyes, unpractised manner, country dress, pink hands, empty wicker basket, and the hands relief over her bonnet.

"Well," he said, after his scrutiny, "I need hardly have asked such a question of one who is Nature's own image.... Ah, but, my good little friend," he added, recurring to his bitter tone and sitting wearily down, "you don't know what great clouds can hang over some people's lives, nor what cowards some men are in face of them. To escape themselves they travel, take picturesque houses, and engage in country sports. But here it is as dreary, and the fog was horrible this morning."

"Why, this is only the pride of the morning!" said Margery, brightly. "By-and-by it will be a beautiful day."

She was going on her way forthwith, but he detained her—detained her with words, talking on every innocent little subject he could think of. The feint of this was so transparent that one thing was beyond question: he had no object in keeping her there more serious than his words would imply. It was as if he feared to be left alone.

While they still stood, the misty figure of the postman, whom Margery had left a quarter of an hour earlier to follow his circuitous course, crossed the grounds below them on his way to the house. First signifying to Margery by a wave of his hand that she was to stop back out of sight in the inner angle of the shelter, the gentleman beckoned to the postman to bring the bag to where he stood. The man, who recognized him, did so, and again resumed his journey.

The stranger unlocked the bag and threw it on the seat, having taken one letter from within. This he read attentively, and his countenance changed.

The effect was as if the sun had burst through the fog upon that face: it became clear, bright, almost radiant. The change was almost phantasmagorial; yet it was not a change that may take place in the commonest human being, provided his countenance be not too wooden, or his artifice have not grown to second nature. He turned to Margery, who was again edging off, and seizing her hand, appeared as though he were about to embrace her. Checking his impulse, he said, "My guardian angel—my good friend—you have saved me!"

"What from?" she ventured to ask.

"That you may never know!" he replied, solemnly.

She guessed that the letter he had just received had been the means of effecting this change for the better in his mood, but made no observation till he went on to say, "What did you tell me was your name, dear girl?"

She repeated her name.

"Margaret Tucker." He stopped, and pressed her hand. "Sit down for a moment—one moment," he said, pointing to the end of the seat, and taking the extremest further end for himself, not to discompose her. She sat down.

"I is to ask a question," he went on, "and there must be confidence between us. You have saved me from indescribable folly! What can I do for you?"

"Nothing, sir."

"Nothing?"

"Father is very well off, and we don't want anything."

"But there must be some service I can render, some kindness I can bestow, some restore offering which I could make, and so imprint on your memory as long as you live that I am not an ungrateful man."

"Why should you be grateful to me, sir?"

He shook his head. "Some things are best left unspoken. Saw think. What would you like to have best in the world?"

Margery made a pretense of reflecting—then felt in reflecting seriously; but the negative was ultimately as unhesitated as ever: she could not decide on anything she would like best in the world; it was too difficult, too sudden.

"Very well—don't hurry yourself. Think it over all day. I ride this afternoon. You live—where?"

"Stickleford Dairy-house."

"I will ride that way homeward this evening. Do you consider by eight o'clock what little article, what little treat, you would most like of any."

"I will, sir," said Margery, now warming up a little to the idea. "And where shall I meet you? Or will you call at the house, sir?"

"Ah—no. I should not wish the circumstance to be known out of which our acquaintance arose. It would be more proper—but no."

Margery, too, seemed rather anxious that he should not call. "I could come out, sir," she said.

"My father is odd-tempered, and perhaps—"

It was ultimately agreed that she should look over a stile at the top of her father's garden, and that he should ride along a bridle path without, to receive her answer. "Margery," said the gentleman in conclusion, "now that you have discovered me under peculiar conditions, are you going to reveal them, and make me an object for the gossip of the curious?"

"No, no, sir," she replied, earnestly; "why should I do that?"

"You will never tell?"

"Never, never will I tell what has happened here this morning."

"Neither to your father, nor to your friends, nor to any one?"

"To no one at all," she said, a little puzzled.

"It is sufficient," he answered. "You mean what you say, my dear maiden. Now you want to leave me. Good by."

She descended the hill, walking with some awkwardness, for she felt the stranger's eyes were upon her, till the fog had enveloped her from his gaze. She took no notice now of the dripping from the trees, she was lost in thought on other things. How had she saved this handsome, melancholy, sleepless foreign gentleman who had had a trouble on his mind till the latter same? What had he been going to do? Margery did not know. Strange as the incident had been in itself, to her it had seemed stranger even than it was. Contrasting colors heighten each other by being juxtaposed, it is the same with contrasting lives.

Reaching the opposite side of the park, there appeared before her for the third time that little old man, the foot-post. As the marpike road ran, the postman's beat was twelve miles a day, six miles out from Anglebury, and six miles back at night; but what with signags, devious ways, offsets to country-seats, horseshoe returns to farms, looped nurses and isosceles triangles to outlying hamlets, the ground actually covered by him was nearer one and twenty miles. Hence it was that Margery, who had come straight, was still abreast of him, despite her long pause.

The weighty sense that she was mixed up in a tremendous and tragical secret with an unknown, mysterious, and handsome stranger prevented her joining very readily in chat with the postman for some time. But a keen interest in her adventure caused her to respond at once when the bowed man of mails said: "You bin athwart the grounds of Mount Lodge, Miss Margery, or you wouldn't ha' met me here. Well, somebody her took the old place at last."

In acknowledging her route Margery brought herself to ask who the new gentleman might be.

"Guide the girl's heart, what don't she know? And yet how should ye?—he's only just a-come. Well, primary, he's a fishing gentleman, come for the summer only. Then, more to the subject, 'a is a foreign noble thee's lived in England so long as to be a kind of nean an to country; come of his letters call him Baron, some Squire, an thee 'a must be born to something that didn't come by reason. But to return to the real compass of this matter, whether 'a's a rich man in my eye and a poor man in's own, or a rich man in his own and mine too, I can't interpret no more than Pharaoh. 'A was out this morning a-watching thy fog. 'Postman,' 'a said, 'give me the bag,' quite easy like. Oh yes, 'a's a civil, genteel noble enough, that 'a can."

"Took the house for fishing, did he?"

"Well, that's what they say, and as it can't be for nothing else, I suppose it's true. But, in final, his health's not good, 'a b'lieve; and he's been living too rithe. The London smoke got into his keakburn, till 'a couldn't eat. However, I shouldn't mind having the run of his kitchen."

"And what is his name?"

"Ah—there you have me! 'Tis a name no man's tongue can tell, or even research, come by pen and ink and good scholarship. It begins with X, and who, without the machinery of a clock in's inside, can speak that? But look—from his letters." The postman with his walking-stick wrote upon the ground.

"BARON VON RADEK."

CHAPTER III.

THE day, as the local prognosticator, turned out fine; for weather-wisdom was bobbed along on their tailkaps by the children of Storm Tide. The impending meeting more of Margery deeply, and the performed her daily duties in her father's house with mechanical unconsciousness.

Milking, skimming, cheese-making, were done. Her father was asleep in the settle, the milkman and maids were gone home to their cottages, and the clock showed a quarter to eight. She trimmed herself with care, went to the top of the garden, and looked over the stile. The view was eastward, and a great moon hung before her in the sky which had not a cloud. Nothing was moving except on the minutest scale, and the removed leaning over, the night-jar sounding his rattle from the bough of an isolated tree on the open hill-side.

Here Margery waited till the appointed time had passed by three-quarters of an hour; but no foreign baron came. She was full of no idea, and her heart sank with disappointment. And then at last the pacing of a horse became audible on the soft path without, leading up from the water-meads, simultaneously with which she beheld the form of the stranger drawing near. He was riding home.

The moonlight so flooded her face as to make her very conspicuous on the garden top. "Ah, Margery!" he said, starting. "How come you here? But of course I remember—we were to meet. And it was to be at eight—good praise—I have kept you waiting."

"It doesn't matter, sir. I've thought of something."

"Thought of something?"

"Yes, sir. You said this morning that I was to think what I would like best in the world, and I have made up my mind."

"I did say so—to be sure I did," he replied, collecting his thoughts. "I remember to have had good reason for gratitude upon." He placed his hand to his brow, and in a minute sighed, and came up to her with the bridle in his hand. "I was to give you a treat or present, and you could not think of one. Now you have done so. Let me hear what it is, and I'll in as good a way as I said."

"To go to the Yeomanry Ball that's to be given this month."

"The Yeomanry Ball—Yeomanry Ball!" he murmured, as if, of all requests in the world, this was what he had least expected. "Where is a hot was call the Yeomanry Ball?"

"At Casterbridge."

"Have you ever been to it before?"

"No, sir."

"Or to any ball?"

"No."

"But did I not say a present?"

"Or a treat."

"Ah, yes, or a treat," he echoed, with the air of one who finds himself in a slight fix. "But with whom would you propose to go?"

"I don't know. I have not thought of that yet."

"You have no friend who could take you, even if I got you an invitation?"

Margery looked at the moon. "No one who can dance," she said, adding, with hesitation, "I was thinking that perhaps—"

"But, my dear Margery," he said, stopping her, as if he half divined what her simple dream of a cavalier had been, "is in sort odd that you can think of nothing else than going to a Yeomanry Ball. Think again. You are sure there's nothing else?"

"Quite sure, sir," she decisively answered. At first nobody would have noticed in that youth young face any sign of such decision; yet it was discoverable. The mouth, though soft, was firm in line; the eyebrows were distinct, and extended near to each other. "I have thought of it all day," she continued, sadly. "Still, oh, if you are sorry you offered me anything, if was let you off."

"Sorry! Certainly not, dear Margery" he said, rather nettled. "I'll show you that what said, rather nettled. "I'll show you that what I ever hopes I have raised in your breast I can honorably enough to gratify. If it lies in my power," he added, with sudden firmness, "you shall go to the Yeomanry Ball. In what building is it to be held?"

"In the Assembly Rooms."

"And would you be likely to be recognized there? Do you know many people?"

"Not many, sir. None, I may say. I have nobody who goes to balls."

"Ah, well, you must go, since you wish it, and if there is no other way of getting over the difficulty of having nobody to take you, I'll take you myself. Would you like me to do so? I can dance."

"Oh, yes, sir; I know that, and I thought you might offer to do it. But would you bring me back again?"

"Of course I'll bring you back. But, to the hye, can you dance?"

"Yes—reels, and jigs, and country dances like the 'New-rigged Ship,' and 'Follow my Love,' and 'Haste to the Wedding,' and the 'College Hornpipe,' and the 'Favorite Quickstep,' and Captain White's Dance.'"

"Not a bad list, but unluckily I fear they don't dance any of those now. But if you have the instinct, we may soon cure your ignorance. Let me see you dance a moment."

She glanced around, and sang softly. "I will promise not to tell, sir."

"Can you ask it? Have you not some secret of mine?"

She stood out into the garden path, the stile being still between them, and raising a side of his shirt with each hand, performed the movements which are even yet far from uncommon in the dances of the villagers of merry England. But her motions, though graceful, were not precisely those which appear in the figures of a modern ball room.

"Well, my good friend, it is a very pretty night," he said, warming up as the proceedings. "But you dance too well—you dance all over your person—and that's too through a way for the present day. I should say it was exactly how they danced in the time of the poet Chaucer, but as people don't dance like it now, we must consider. First I must inquire more about this hall, and then I must see you again."

"If it is a great trouble to you, sir, in—"

"Oh, no, no. I will think it over. So fas as good."

The Baron mentioned an evening and an hour when he would be passing that way again, then mounted his horse and rode away.

[to be continued.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Hindsight or Eastern Parade," "Dr. Jacob," "The Sylvestres; or, the Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

One drawing-room play, just like one drawing-room audience, is much like another, and as the present occasion there seemed nothing exceptional in Valerian's choice to the bulk of Miss Hermitage's guests. They were merely called upon to smile, shed tears, and applaud, which is within the limits of ordinary capacity. A prettier piece had never been written, said everybody, and of course scenery and accessories were beyond praise, and actors and actresses alike fascinating. Valerian's stage-management was a guarantee as far. What a pity that every Miss Hermitage had not a Valerian! Then opulence would no longer be allied to dullness and luxury—but another name for ennui.

That much for the popular estimation of Valerian's little play, that like an April day opened in clouds and rain, but toward sunset showed a smiling blue sky.

The early scenes were indeed moving in the extreme, but the most obtuse speculator could discern that all things were to turn out happily in the end.

There were four present, however, to whom the play seemed to mean some than graceful melodrama as vaudeville, and from the first a physiognomist might have found their faces an interesting study. It was evident that to Miss Hermitage, Stephana, Colette, and Valerian these pastoral and pathetic situations suggested something subtle and problematic, something as far removed from the distraction and ordinary compehensions of those around them as the inmost thoughts of one human being from another. They gazed, listened, became absorbed, with the air of those who are helping to unriddle the mystery of their own lives, to unravel some intricately woven knot of destiny that has hitherto defied all efforts.

Whilst Miss Hermitage and Stephana were spell-bound by the play, Valerian's interest remained divided. From time to time he glanced at Christina, watching every change in expression and every movement, taking care all the while that his scrutiny was not observed. So intently did he peruse her countenance at intervals that it was plain he sought there a comment on the plot while both those of the crowd had nothing to do. She was his audience. For her, if for no other, the piece should mean more than an hour's tears and laughter, a mere distraction added to so many.

Simple enough was the little drama which Miss Hermitage watched with apparent composure, yet wholly unusual eagerness, and in which Stephana, quartz also, but painfully intent, seemed to read a sibylline leaf, Valerian looking on, cold, vigilant, perturbed, but master of himself.

The story opened after the fashion of an idyl. An old farm-house in Kent, apple orchards and flower gardens round about, two pretty maidens, in the guise of our grandmothers, making hay in a pightel, an inclosed meadow. These are Molly, the rich farmer's daughter, and her bosom friend and constant companion, Letty, a poor orphan. Soon the prattlings of the girls are disturbed by a rustic swain, whose head appears above the garden wall, and whilst ostensibly making love to the portionless Letty, we soon discover that in reality he is the accepted lover of the rich man's heiress. For Farmer Maple is wealthy, and his only child is to marry a rich man of his own choosing—so he says—or none at all. The girl, however, has a will of her own, and, aided and abetted by her confidante Letty, contrives to carry on courtship with the lover she has chosen for herself. It is an Letty's suitor young Brierley, himself an orphan and undowered of fortune, comes to the house. So far all is bland, sunny, playful, but when the stern old Maple appears the situation becomes grim and tragic. To the old, old story even again—a rapid father resolved to bend a daughter's will to his own, the one determined to be obeyed, the other as equally determined on disobedience. Then come girlish confabulations, hurried schemes of deliverance, plan after plan, device after device, the friendless, motherless Molly turning in Letty only in her supreme dilemma. And soon a darling plot is laid and carried out. Letty informs her patron that her own marriage with young Brierley is decided upon, and begs as a special favor that Molly may accompany her home—that is to say, to the home of her nearest relation—in order to act as bridesmaid. "You are going to marry Molly to Farmer Grouse," she said, passionately, "and Jem is going to take me to Australia. Who knows if Molly and I shall ever meet again?"

The old man consents, first because he is extremely glad to be rid of Letty, whose influence over his daughter he resents, and most of all because Molly promises that on her return she will do anything he pleases. "Only give me this one holiday, father, this one little spell of liberty and happiness with Letty, and so long as I live I will ask no more of you," the entreats, not in tears and set knees—she knows her father too well for that—but with playful caresses and insinuations. So the trio set off, and of course we all know on what errand.

It is Molly, the rich man's daughter, who is married to young Brierley in Letty's place—Molly who is ready to accompany him to Australia, to give up fortune, native country, paternal favor, for love's sake. And most audacious of the audacious, bravest of the brave, Letty returns alone to break the news. "What harm can Farmer Maple do me?" she said, scoffingly; "as my woman she is not his wife no his daughter."

Of course the tempest was awful, but it passed harmless over her head. The old man could only rave and storm, and little cared she, a high-spirited, reckless girl, for Farmer Maple's wrath. What really constituted Molly's sin in her father's eyes was not the fact of her marriage being clandestine, but low. There are aristocrats in every society, and Farmer Maple looked down with supreme contempt on the son of a village barkster, a never-do-well, moreover. Young Brierley, although pleasant and comely (good enough for a girl like Letty, who had also to shift for herself), was not sedate, and as yet had followed no calling. What so clear as a mercenary motive in his part? This runaway match was at least an love affair on one side; but Molly had married for love, and on love should she fare.

Letty, finding that the old man did not turn her out, quietly staid on, she saw no good reason for going, and could thus best serve her friend by—and by. Meantime, Maple insists on secrecy concerning his daughter's marriage. She is away on visits. The neighbors are to know an more. Meantime, the young couple do not prosper. Brierley, whose chief fault is idleness, looking for a reconciliation with his wife's father, gives up the Australian project, gets employment as a clerk, and poor employment it is, suffices to keep body and soul together, no more. Molly's existence is not one to soften and to beautify as adversity. We must all pay for the foibles of our progenitors, and the indelible character of Maple the farmer now showed itself in the daughter.

Love disappointed her—whose woman does it not disappoint?—and even the joys of maternity were embittered. A boy was born to her, who should be heir to the rich man's wealth, and not her only, but the pride of his old age; as the very apple of his eye. Again and again Letty has acted the part of intercessor in vain, and she determines on a final and desperate effort now.

Not a hint is given beforehand of the child's coming, or of what else had happened, but when he is a few weeks old, Letty, ever fond of plot and shift, lays her trap. Molly has hardened toward her father, and refuses in plead her boy's cause, as the little thing is brought surreptitiously into his grandfather's house, where he is found by him.

The climax is terrible.

The old man turns from the cradled infant as from a serpent. "They think me a child, do they," he cries, in a frenzy of vindictiveness and resentment, "to be befooled into harboring those who sank to deceitfulness with mother's milk? Not I. Away with it! Hey! my girl, 'tis none of ours; 'tis nought to me. I have no children."

From the supplicating, insinuating Letty he turns sony too. Vainly she holds up the child, tries to make him look at it, touch it. Then, as a last expedient, she breaks forth indignantly:

"Then a line not deemed you to be childless. In calling yourself as you do but blasphemy," she cried. "Look at this boy, an exact copy of your self; and his mother is living, God be praised! is close by, is now awaiting your sentence."

Molly enters, not the soft, repentant maiden we first saw making hay in the pightel, but a pale, care-worn matron, all her father's hardness more written on her face. Fin the last few weeks have brought her complete disillusion. This marriage for which she had sacrificed so much has ended in an unlooked-for catastrophe. It was the fact of young Brierley's mean birth and ordinary character that more than anything else had set old Maple against him. "Base-born is base-born year out, year in," he would say. "You won't gather corn from chartock seed." The prognostications had come true. Molly is now an abandoned wife, with nothing but her child in the world.

"Father," she cried, surely and wildly, "you can not, you dare not, disown me now. I am no longer my man's wife, but once more your daughter."

"I see," answered the old man, with a white face—"if, as you say, you are my own daughter, send away the child. Let once know that he is yours, that your name is his father's. Then you shall be my daughter indeed."

There is a pause of silent conflict. How will it end? Shall the fearful bond be entered into—a child as sacrificed to the world, a mother's duty and affection stifled and trampled underfoot? Will love triumph and holiest instinct, as self indulgence and clinging to gross needs? No middle course is possible. No appeal will interfere. The mother must either be disowned to disown!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The curtain fell amid tremendous applause, and a second and a third time the artists were obliged to show themselves to the delighted audience, whilst Valerian was surrounded by his friends. A thousand questions awaited him at once. Who had written the play? Was had acted Molly as charmingly? And the rustic dresses and scenery? And the music of the intermezzo? Nothing could be daintier, more appropriate? Valerian, loosened in on all sides by these immoderate inquirers, struggled vainly to disentangle himself. He was compelled, whether he would or no, to smile thanks, make answer, explain, finally to indicate the direction in which supper was to be found. Stephana also, whose appearance had passed without notice in the early part of the evening, was now taken possession of by eager acquaintances. Like Valerian, she felt bewildered and unequal to the growing-room etiquette just then; but there was no help for it. She must behave as if nothing unusual had happened. In an assemblage of a hundred and odd guests a host as hostess can not be visible to all at once, and what with the pleasurable sense of relief from undue mental strain and the lively gratification of a goodly regale, Miss Hermitage's visitors forget to notice her absence. The banqueting chamber, indeed, was so royally adorned with flowers and tropic plants that it was impossible to see even your opposite neighbor. All the company, of course, took it for granted that Miss Hermitage was present, by which emperor snakes concealed none cared to ascertain. The ripe, sunny wines, the delicate cates, put everything else out of people's minds.

Where all this time was the faithful Colette? She had listened to the play with rapture, uncay gestures and fluttering movements, like a little frightened bird. Now she fanned herself, and now she plied her vinaigrette, but able for a moment to retain the same position as master her concern. No one noticed her. Miss Hermitage's guests were not in the habit of paying much attention to her quaint little musician in ordinary, and the play was found absorbing. When at last an unusually exciting moment came, and everybody's attention was riveted on the actors, Colette rode near and hastened to her room, there in throw herself on her bed to an agony of dismay.

Where was Miss Hermitage?

Stephana had come, disturbed in mind by vague foreshadowings of evil, but the conclusion that the play was to her, and the painful, coy, agonized convictions to brought, for the moment put away other thoughts. She felt dazed and staggered, blinded by the light that had flashed on a dark place. On recovering herself in some degree, the first thought was of Christina. That look of hers she had last seen was fresh in her mind, and she could but connect it with some fearful paroxysm. Love was it, or love like hate? Sorrow, anger, or the bitter vindictiveness engendered of both? Stephana now realized, as if by inspiration, what the inner warning of a few hours ago must mean. She had come to save Christina from danger, and now she realized its nature. A beam proved on Christina's face, and in one of her quick starts, the evil following her as a shadow was a shadow indeed, a real though intangible part of herself. The enemy, the destroyer, was here.

Impelled by these thoughts, one succeeding the other rapidly, Stephana now contrived to steal unobserved from the crowded banqueting hall. Unobserved also she reached Miss Hermitage's bed-chamber, dressing room, and boudoir, three rooms communicating by folding doors with the first story. The outer door stood open, and fire was burning brightly on the hearth, but there was no other light.

"Christina—cousin—are you there?"

Stephana paused for a moment on the threshold, then getting no answer, she moved forward and glanced round. The doors opening from one room to the other stood wide, and all three were silent and deserted, but in the bright fire-light her eyes were immediately attracted to a conspicuous object in the dressing closet.

This was the gorgeous lemon colored gown of richest brocade that Miss Hermitage had worn throughout the evening. It had been evidently discarded in haste, and scattered upon it, carelessly as if they were ordinary dressing pins, lay the rich woman's fantastic diamonds. On the cold sheen of the silk they glittered and sparkled dazzlingly, some adhering to it, others lying on the floor, the whole strangely contrasted with the dark purple shadows of the room; for Miss Hermitage loved warmth and sumptuousness, and this especial apartment was luxuriously curtained and carpeted by warm soft textures of crimson and violet. Only the fire glowed and the pale yellowish-green silk with its sprinkling of diamonds flashed through the prevailing gloom. "Christina," once more Stephana called, softly. Again all was silent, and Stephana now closed the door of the outer room and continued her search. But Miss Hermitage was not to be found.

Stephana very quickly continued her search, now going a story higher. As she climbed the broad staircase the confusion of voices below, strains of music, and all the various noises that are inseparable from a festive gathering grew fainter and fainter, till by the time she reached the second landing she seemed to be in a quiet place. Here all was equally deserted. A jet of gas burned dimly at each end of the corridor, but no one was moving about, and from the obscurity and stillness one might have supposed Miss Hermitage's numerous household to be already fast asleep. The servants slept here on the upper story, and at that moment they were one and all regaling below. Not a sound, not a sign of life greeted Stephana as, gray and spectral-like, she moved noiselessly from one place to [illegible]. There was yet a third staircase, dark, steep, and narrow, that led to [illegible] portion of the house, a small square tower, built by its original owner for astronomical purposes.

Stephana suddenly recollected the existence of this little winding stair as she was about to descend, and she now turned back in search of it. She knew that a door shut it off from the landing, but the exact position of the door she forgot time after another she opened, now a housemaid's closet, now a linen cupboard, now a bedroom, the right one, as usual, came last. When indeed she found the staircase, what was her horror and dismay to find herself forced back by a volume of smoke! The torch flashed upon her in a moment. The watch-tower had been fired. Stephana, to whose mind this dreadful conviction brought another more shocking still, now determined at any cost to reach the little chamber of the tower. How she contrived to effect her purpose she never knew, but well had it way. On the threshold she stood for a moment, blinded by the conflagration raging within. The pavilion was a light, airy construction, with wide door looking to the four quarters of heaven, and one saw fairly ablaze, whilst in the midst, seeming a loose white gown, her eyes wild and defiant, her lips moving incoherently, moved Christina. It was a fiend incarnate.

"Christina!" said Stephana—"Christina!"

The quiet mastery of Stephana's wonderful voice made itself felt, yet not all at once. Miss Hermitage, still holding a candle in her hand—the fatal torch that had worked such mischief—tried to resist the spell, to do her own evil will. Quick as a wild animal seeking escape from the trapper, she now sprang to the balcony, and had not Stephana divined her intention, would in another second have been past all help.

The balcony had never been used except by its original owner, and only an unsubstantial and tray-like parapet protected the outer space or balcony, removed sixty feet as least from the ground, with nothing in the shape of intervening buttress or roof as break the distance. On this terrible pinnacle, then, for a short but awful space long Christina and Stephana, evil spirit wrestling with the good.

Fury and anger brought face to face in supreme encounter. Hate and love at odds. Had there been lookers-on, they must have discerned something symbolical in the very appearance of the suspended pair, in indeed they seemed to hang like a couple of birds in mid air; above them the dark iron black sentry heaven studded with bright gold stars, below, almost iron black also, the quiet hills, the sleeping town and sea, all, like the skies, showing a thousand fiery crests behind them, a fiery envelope, the steadily gaining flames of the pavilion.

Stephana had never looked more radiant and spirit-like than now. The silveriness of her dress, the beautiful paleness of her complexion, the dark lustre of her eyes and hair, as contrasted with the pearliness of the skin, the indescribable serenity and sweetness combined with something severe in every look and movement—all threw made up an opposition at once startling and emphatic.

And what a contrast to the other! For if the superhuman companionship and inspired daring of Stephana had never shone forth more vividly than now, as a supreme moment of bodily danger, so Christina's real nature proclaimed itself in the strong light of desperation and cowardly fear. Her thoughts centred in herself only. Nothing mattered, nothing was present to her, but a danger from which death and death alone offered an escape. Whilst Stephana's mind was wholly bent on rescuing another from a self immolation purely egotistical, Christina realized only the misery and humiliation in store for herself if she lived. There was to-morrow—her own, and provided that could be eluded, the rest was not worth a thought. Stephana was tall and slender, and her bodily strength perhaps hardly exceeded that of her adversary, Christina, in spite of her three-score-and ten years, being wiry and agile to the extreme. But whilst the swiftness and elusive subtlety of the elder woman's movements were actuated by the frenzy of despair, Stephana was guided—nay, impelled—by a force stronger than any mad impulse. She felt, she knew, that she should conquer here, not by virtue of physical as even moral strength, but because she had come for nothing else. The day that presaged evil for Christina had brought also a mandate of deliverance to herself. Christina would be saved, and by Stephana only: how she could not tell.

"Loose your hold!" cried Miss Hermitage wildly, bent on the only kind of deliverance that seemed possible to her—a plunge into dark arms, oblivion, annihilation. The rose mattered little.

Stephana held her fast, though for a moment they swayed backward and forward in deadly peril, as if the next they must both vanish into the night below. No help was near. All on this side of the house was silent and deserted, and the flames within were gathering, yet Stephana's courage did not go.

"Loose your hold, I say!" reiterated Christina, "to I take you with me, and [illegible] are not ready! You are not ready!" she repeated, with a mocking laugh.

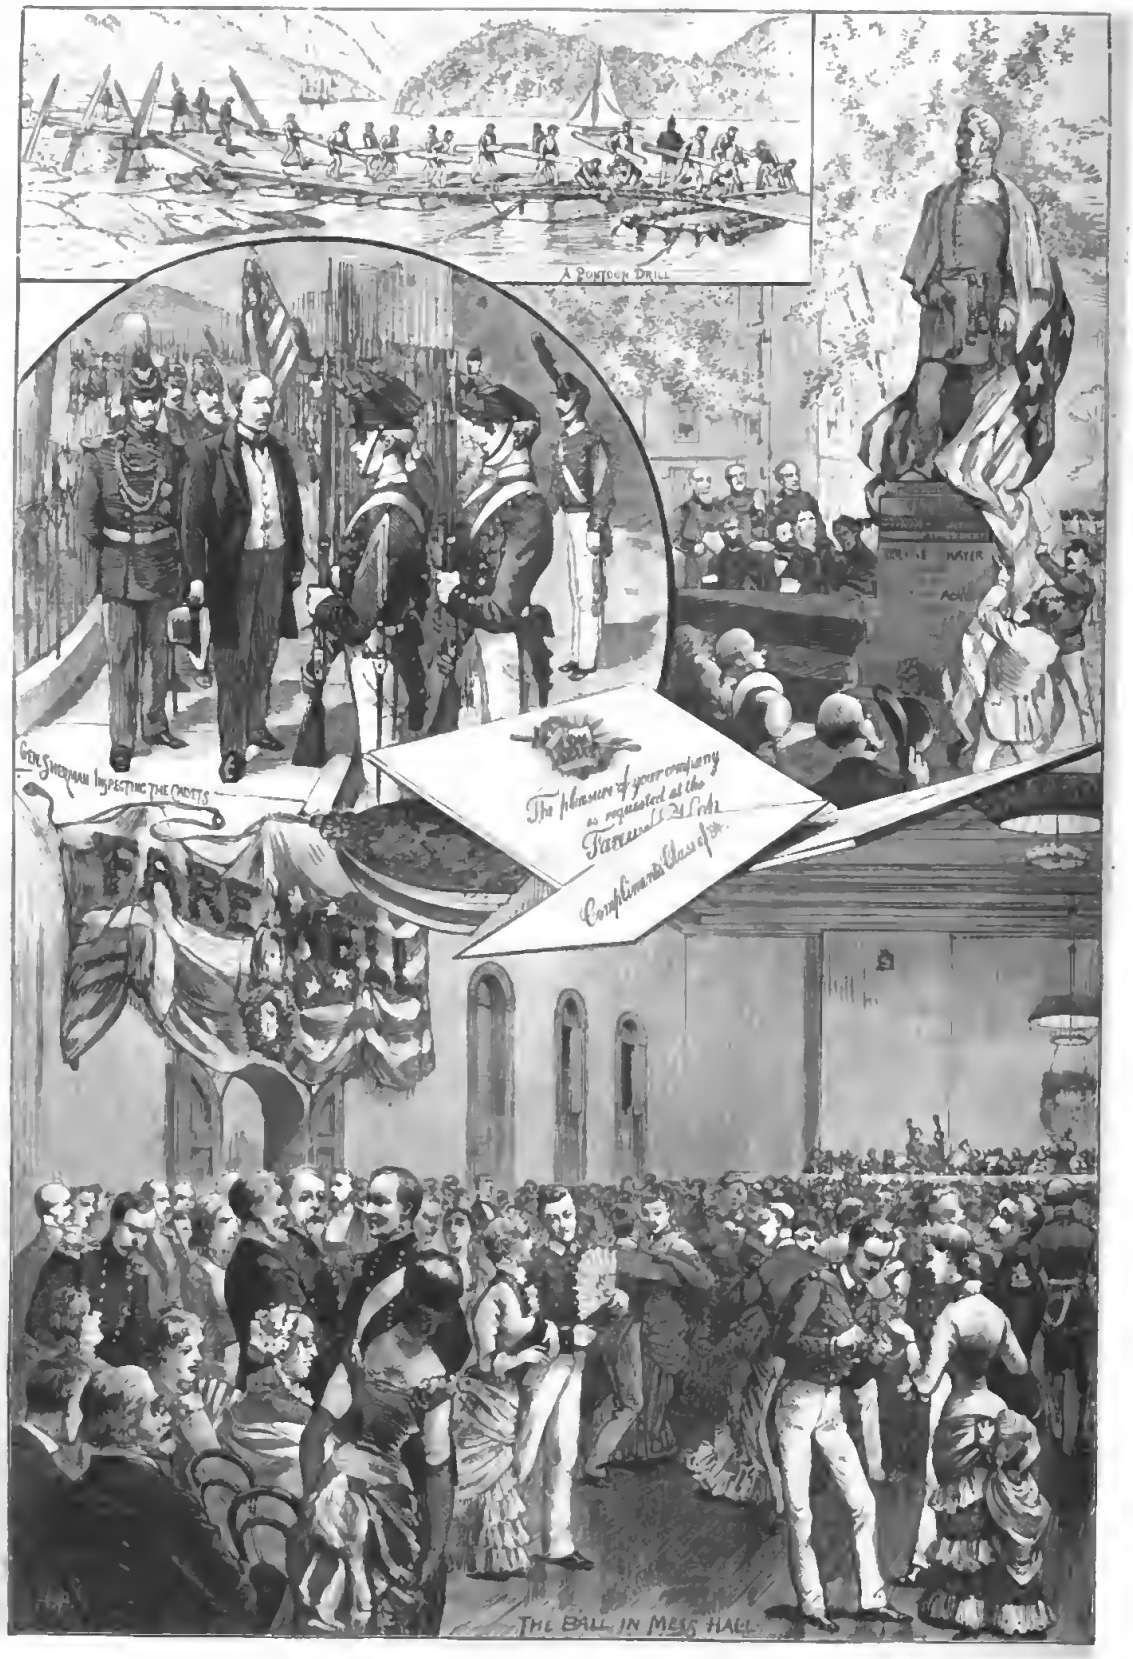
"Nor are you ready," said Stephana, with authoritative. "You must [illegible], whether you will or no. I have come to tell you so."

Christina's muscles relaxed. She gradually let herself sink into Stephana's arms, trembling and making low moans. Her fearful purpose frustrated, she neared the prey of a friend and ghastly terror; but of what, at whom?

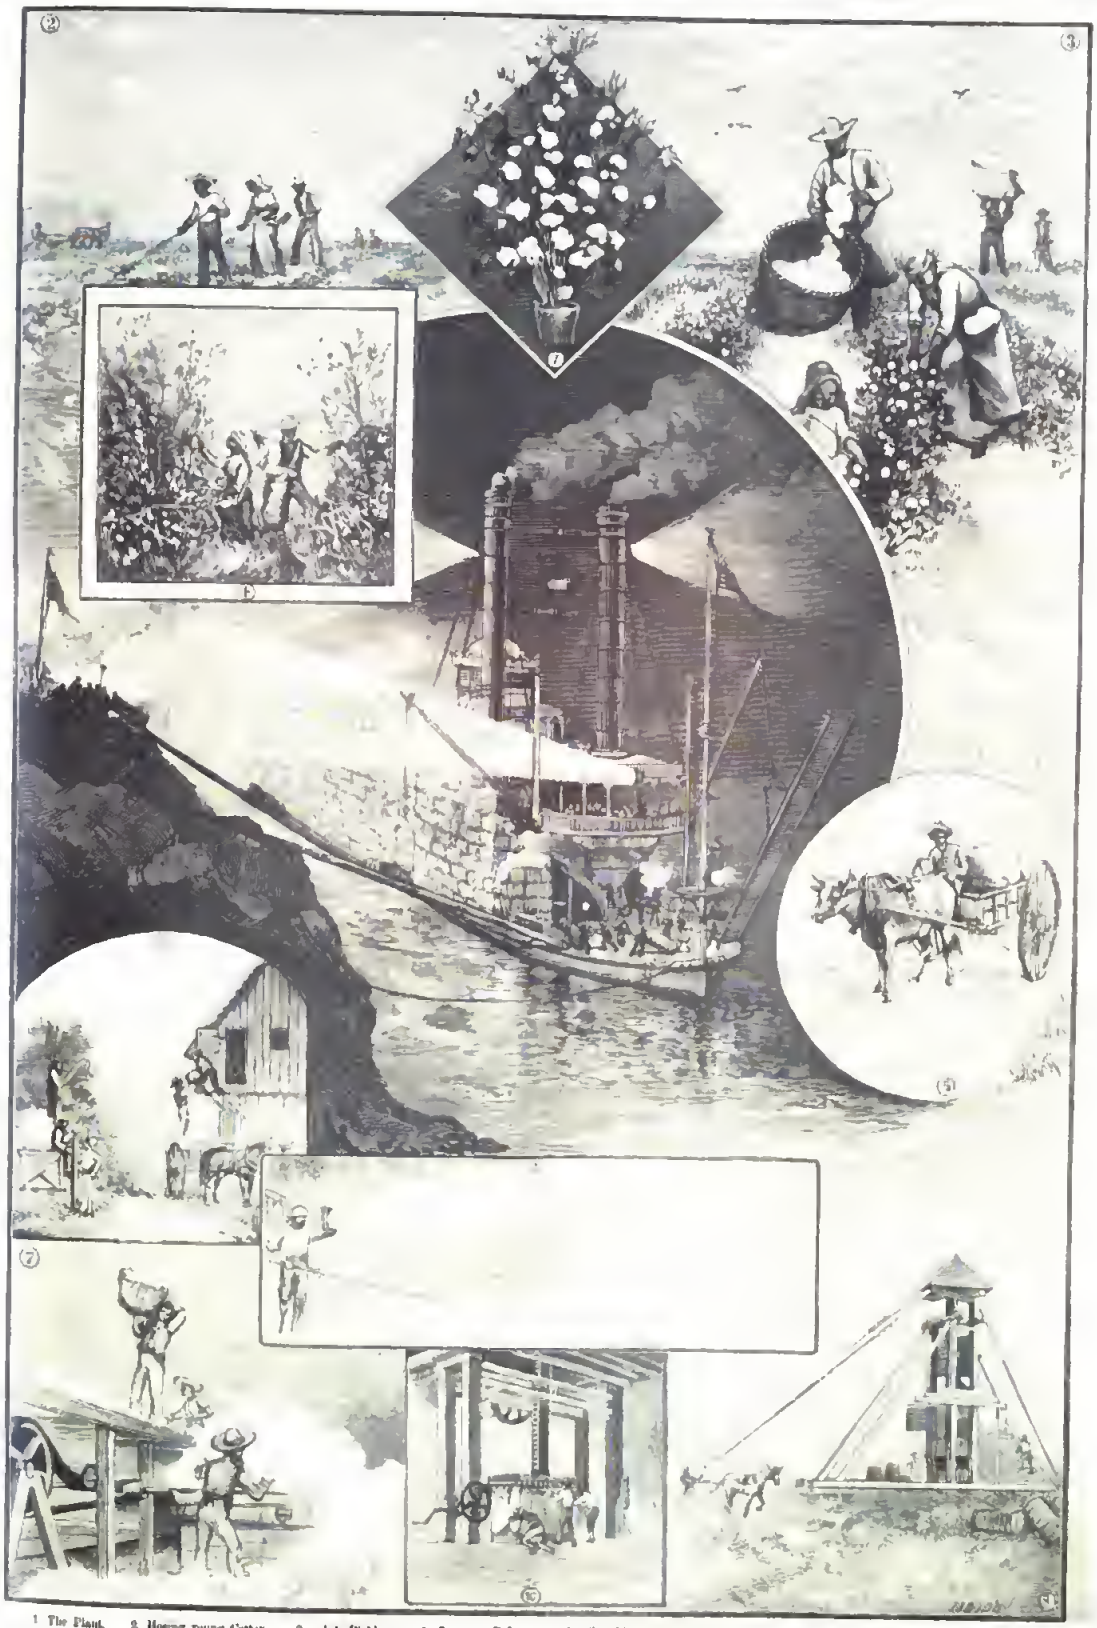
"Save me!" she cried, for [illegible] moment shaken with passion. "Save me, Stephana! [illegible] can! Save me from—from [illegible] a he [illegible] a [illegible] she whisper [illegible] from Valerian—my son

[to be continued.]

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1372.



THE FESTIVITIES AT WEST POINT.—Drawn by Harry Ogden.—[See Page 594.]



1. The Plant. 2. Hoeing young Cotton. 3 and 4. Picking. 5. Just one Bale. 6. Acadian Planters bringing Cotton to the Gin. 7. Ginning. 8. After Ginning. 9. Old-fashioned Press. 10. Baling. Centre, Loading Cotton Steamer.

COTTON CULTURE IN THE SOUTH.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 394.]

WEST POINT.

Besides their academic interest, the examinations at West Point constitute the first social event of the summer season for New York. The lovely nook among the Highlands is becoming more and more the fond rendezvous of our painted birds of passage before they disperse to their various summer haunts among the mountains or along the coast.

The academic exercises proper are not calculated to allure the fashionable mind. In fact, it is a considerable strain upon the intellects of many even among the official visitors to "inspect" an examination to trigonometry, and look or if they understood it. The class-rooms, indeed, are deserted, after the first visit of curiosity, by all among the young women who have no very special interest in any of the catechumens. "By Heavan!" to Byron did not observe—

> "By Heaven! it is a stupid sight to see,
> For one who hath no friend, no brother, there."

And the young ladies, who form the chief attraction of the Point in mid June, betake themselves while the examinations are in progress to the verandas and nooks of fiction. But there are exercises of more human interest than the examination. The daily dress parade, the cavalry drill, the light-battery drill, the mortar practice, have a picturesque attraction, and the young lady and the official visitor hall them or something that they can enjoy even if they only darkly understand. The young ladies have their revenge at the hop, which and professors of mathematics stand in the doorways ignorantly to admire, and which is socially the culmination of the festivities in the Academy.

The exercises this year derived a special interest from the unveiling of the statue of General Thayer, the Superintendent to whom the cadets look back or the man to whom is due, more than to any other, the high rank which West Point holds among the military schools of the world. It was under his tuition that most of the men who won distinction in the Mexican war, and many of those who were in places of high rank at the outbreak of the civil war, were brought up. The story of his career was told in an interesting address by General Cullum.

Even more unanswerity was the last official appearance at West Point of the General of the Army. General Sherman's services have been so illustrious, and his connection with the Academy since he succeeded to the Generalship in-Chief has been so intimate, that it is no wonder that he himself and all his audience should have been deeply affected at the few and simple words in which he took an official leave of the cadets and of West Point. He has the consolation of knowing that as man in the country is regarded with greater good will than the illustrious soldier who has never submitted his laurels to the chance of being smirched in the dusty conflicts of "politics."

COTTON.

FROM THE PLOUGH TO THE LOOM.

By W. M. BURWELL.

I.

We must refer to other treatises for the origin and history of cotton as a textile, and describe it as it is found in the Southern States of the American Union. Here it is cultivated from the shores of the Gulf of Mexico to the thirty-second degree of north latitude, comprehending an area of little less than a million of square miles, with an alluvion of great extent and inexhaustible fertility. The production is migratory, moving from the worn-out lands of the Atlantic States to the far more fertile and productive soil of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas.

The Southern Atlantic States have endeavored to counteract this advantage by the use of fertilizers, but with the exception of the Sea Island plantations, whose product is too valuable to fear competition, have lost their former pre-eminence. The far greater proportion of the crop is now grown in and west of the Mississippi Valley. This transfer of production has been greatly promoted by the Act of Emancipation, which has or has stabilized the colored labor that it required neither an advance of capital nor the permission of the owner to authorize its transfer from where it is worse paid, fed, and clad to where its compensation is more satisfactory. We may note here the error of computing the probable crop by the comparative area planted. The cotton plant of Carolina is often not more than three feet in height, and will average not more than 150 pounds of lint cotton to the acre, while that of Arkansas or Texas will produce more than double that weight, and grows, often with too much weed, as high or a man's head. It is, then, to the cotton culture of the Southwestern States that we confine our remarks and illustrations.

Cotton Seed.—The seed of Southern cotton has been derived from all countries. The soil and climate here have generalized and modified all these varieties so as to have produced a peculiar staple, better adapted to produce the stronger and heavier yarns and cloths than any other. The comparative qualities of cotton are shown thus: Indian and Egyptian cotton have an average length of fibre of one and a quarter inches, with a diameter of $\frac{1}{1200}$ to $\frac{1}{1400}$ part of an inch. The Sea Island staple is in length one and a half inches, with a diameter of $\frac{1}{2000}$ part of an inch. The upland American cotton is one and a quarter inches in length of fibre, and $\frac{1}{1400}$ of an inch in diameter. The superior strength of the American upland is shown by its price in the Liverpool market, being worth fully fifteen per cent. more than East India cotton, and by its preference for the body of long cotton goods and its capacity to bear a mixture of short and shoddy stock and heavy sizing has promoted its ascendency. The Sea Island cotton is produced from black seed, and the upland from green seed. While the planters may prefer in different localities some seeds or more prolific than others, the steady standard of uplands will sooner or later establish itself by a uniform grade of staple and staple. Precisely a similar result attends the introduction of American seed in India. It degenerates, and takes on the type of the native plant. The value of cotton seed has greatly increased within late years, and from being used to feed cows, at a risk of choking them, it is now used for oil, cattle food, and fertilizing. Its annual value may be estimated at $15,000,000. It has not been long since the remark was attributed to Mr Atkinson, of Massachusetts, that if cotton did not produce any lint at all, it would be worth raising for the oil contained in the seed.

Cotton Culture.—Land intended for cotton is broken up any time during the winter, according to the season and nature of the soil. It is thrown up into beds of from three to four feet apart. The seed is dropped by drill or hand, from the latter days of March to the 15th of April, according to the judgment of the planter. Within two weeks it may be "seen along the row," and in three weeks puts forth its third leaf. It is thinned out to "a stand" at ten, fifteen, or twenty inches "in the step," or from plant to plant.

In the earlier stages of the crop it is subject, like other plants, to injury by insects. The cut-worm attacks the germ. In soil which, as in South Alabama and elsewhere, rests upon the rotten limestone or marl, the cray-fish occasion an odd annoyance, cutting off the first plants which appear above ground to carry them down the "chimneys" or holes which lead down to the moist of the marl stratum. Once out of these dangers, the cotton grows with great rapidity. The hoes keep the plant free from grass, while the plough lets in the sun and air. Improved and laboring-implements have greatly facilitated and cheapened the culture of the Southern staple, supplying the place of the manual and animal labor formerly deemed indispensable.

We may say to this point that one hand will cultivate from six to eight acres, that the proportion of manual and animal labor is two men to one mule, and the product from half a bale per acre on poor land to a bale and a half on very fertile land.

It is, however, only when the cotton is in its full growth that the true value of the American cotton of African descent and his industrial affinity, the mule, becomes conspicuously apparent. No degree of heat or humidity affects either. To see from thirty to fifty men and mules defending the hopes of the harvest from the invasion of grass and noxious weeds in a fight which appeals to the sympathies and interests of every one who appreciates the comfort of an occasional clean shirt. While the ploughs glide with the certainty of a centre-board sail boat to the end of the furrow, some irrepressible mule, headstrong, perhaps, with a few rainy days' abstinence from labor, will rush along at a speed that drags the indignant freedman into perilous proximity to the cotton row, and exposes him to the contumelious abuse of the boss or overseer. Then occurs a conflict in which the congenital obstinacy of the Senegambian and the offspring of the "child ass of the desert" resounds throughout the field in eries and objurgations of the most profane character. The right to swear aloud is a privilege that many freedmen value next perhaps to their freedom. The moralist who anticipated that emancipation would bring in its train all the courtesies with all the virtues will be shocked, while the philanthropist who deprecates any violence to the feelings of the domestic animals will take the part of the outraged and obstinate hybrid.

About the 1st of June the first flowers of the cotton appear. They are at first a pale straw-color, changing during the day and night to a white, a faint pink, and a pink color. As the flower falls, the boll succeeds. It is soon in the angular shape—in "the square." It has leaflets at the base, like a hazel-nut, but in a short time assumes a spherical form. About the 1st of July the cotton crop is "laid by" from the hoe and plough. The danger is long past from the earlier enemies and infantile diseases of the cotton plant, when that of the cotton-worm commences. The progenitrix of their pest, bearing the highly entomological appellation of Noctua zylan, arrives in the night, and deposits her eggs in a surreptitious manner on the under side of the leaves. Being ornamental of the same color with the leaf, they escape observation until, warmed into life, the worms begin their ravages upon the leaf which has given them shelter. Having seen her terrible and rapacious progeny begin their destructive mission, stripping themselves of successive skins which impede their voracity, the mother of mischief, like some petroleuse or dynamitess, disappears. The worms pass over the fields as a conflagration over a prairie, sometimes destroying or entire crop in a few days. With the first appearance of the cotton-worm the whole world is excited. Telegrams pass under the sea; bulletins and dispatches adorn the dealers, manufacturers, and ship-owners. All these interests are called into council. The amount of mechanical and chemical science displayed, with the number of sovereign remedies for the scourge, can not be computed. The newspapers break out with eruptive communications; the diviners and soothsayers who have charge of the future state of the cotton plant talk nothing but cotton, inhibit cotton-worms in glass bottles, suspend votive branches denuded of their foliage in the cotton halls, and for a brief time the cotton worm is honored with an amount of fearful veneration corresponding somewhat with the serpent and scarabeus worship of old Egypt. In the mean time the worm, having satisfied his voracious appetite, quietly spins himself into a cocoon, in which he awaits the transition essential to an immortality of mischief. The national economologists have not suggested any remedy for this damage, except to enjoin upon the planter a close study of the domestic habits of the Noctua zylan; this having been done, the destruction of the larvæ becomes but a small affair. They have, however, ascertained the genus and species of the vermin, which is something, and have besides photographed both the mother and the progeny, or that, like any other malefactors who ornament the felons' gallery, they may be arrested to sight.

The boll-worm, which is arranged to play an engagement immediately after his more rapacious predecessor has retired to his virtuous cocoon, derives his origin also from a nocturnal moth, and belongs probably to the Heliothes family. This insidious wretch, like the "worm F the bud" immortalized by Shakespeare, feeds on the interior of the cotton boll, thereby destroying the staple formation entirely. For further information we must refer the reader to the literature of the Patent-office, and other instructive treatises. We can, however, advise the amateur planter that Paris green, molasses, vinegar, white flags, young turkeys, with the incidental aid of birds, spiders, ichneumon flies, and beetles, have their several advocates.

The picking season commences with the first opening of the bolls, about the 1st of August. At this stage the spherical case which contains the staple done up in three separate parcels, each containing seed with a compact skein of the fibre, bursts open, and each fibre expands, and depends some four or five inches around and below the pod within which it had matured. These scattering "locks," or they are called provincially, are watched with the more solicitude because the glory of sending to market the "first bale" is sought by every large planter, or it is rewarded with a first-rate notice for the buyer or the factor to whom it has been confided. White, then, the speculators and dealers are occupying the press, the telegraph, and the telephone with a contradictory clamor which reverberates in the alcoves of the exchange, the tailors, who have followed the fortunes of the crop with no less assiduity, appear in the fields to secure the consummation of their labors.

THE AMERICAN RIFLE TEAM

On page 392 we give the portraits of the riflemen who are to shoot in the forth-coming international match at Wimbledon. After their arrival in England twelve of these men will be chosen by the captain to form the team for the contest. The men have been very carefully selected, and it is hoped that they will give a good account of themselves on the other side.

THE MODERN "ATALANTA."

Ever since the first Atalanta, so fleet-footed that she outstripped the swiftest runners of Bœotia, was transformed into a lion by jealous Aphrodite, the name has been given to many models of speed and beauty, it has never been more aptly applied than to the new steam yacht that the Messrs Cramp, of Philadelphia, have just built for Mr Jay Gould. The keel of this yacht was laid on the 10th of last December, and her builders have promised to deliver her in New York on Saturday of this week, finished, complete in every detail, and ready for a cruise. Not only is the Atalanta the most gracefully modelled craft now floating in American waters, where beauty of model has more nearly attained perfection than anywhere in the world, but she is probably the strongest vessel of her size afloat in any waters, strength of construction having been demanded above everything else from her builders. Being one foot longer over all than Mr Bennett's Namouna, and having the same beam, this new yacht is the largest in the American fleet, and is well fitted to undertake the voyage around the world for which she is intended.

She is an iron vessel, 230 feet 3 inches long over all, 225 feet long on deck, and 213 feet 3 inches on the water-line. Her extreme beam is 26 feet 4 inches, and her draught is 13 feet. Her bow, uberp and high, has a very decided forward rake, which adds materially to her length aver all, and gives her a peculiarly easy entrance into the water. Her run is long and handsome, and her elliptical overhanging stern is peculiarly American, and is the feature which adds more than any other to the beauty of a yacht in American eyes. From keel to water-line the iron plates of the outer skin are lapped at the edges, the rivet heads being countersunk. Above the water-line they are laid flush, bonded inside, and the rivet heads being also countersunk here, the outer surface is perfectly smooth. The plating is continued uniformly to the top of the bulwarks, which are of a greater height than is usual, and which are surmounted by a heavy rail of solid mahogany. The hull is painted black, unrelieved save by the gilded eagle which forms her figure-head, and by the name in gilt letters on her stern.

The yacht is rigged as a three-masted schooner, with standing gaffs and log sails, and a square-sail yard on the foremast. Her canvas has been made expressly for her, and all her standing rigging is of the best charcoal wire. Her upper-deck is of iron, flush fore and aft, and overlaid with a flooring of clear white pine three and a half inches by three and a half inches. The waterways and plank-sheer are of solid mahogany, and the iron bulwarks are hidden by a light sheeting of the same rich wood laid in panels and highly polished. The deck is broken by a steam capstan windlass forward, the skylights and companionways necessary to give light and access to the quarters below, by a narrow house 80 feet long, and by more skylights and companionways aft. On each side are two sets of boat davits, from which hang a steam-launch 32 feet long, a dingy 16 feet long, a six-oared cutter 32 feet long, and a whale-boat, to be used as the gig, 32 feet long.

The deck-house is of iron, and built as solidly into the iron deck that it can be made safe to be carried away. The forward part of this house is a large many-windowed room known as the social Hall or smoking-room, and above it are the bridge and pilot-house. Abaft this is the steering-drum, and then comes the gallery, large and airy, or becomes its importance, the forward end provided with every convenience known to modern cookery. The pipe from the galley range discharges into the smoke-stack, thereby rendering to passengers a freedom from all culinary odors. Abaft the galley is the engine space, and still beyond this, at the extreme end of the house, is the captain's state-room. For its entire length the house is sheathed with mahogany in panels highly polished. The smoking room at the forward end is ceiled in oak carved in the most elaborate patterns, and is luxuriously finished with the richest of tapestry hangings, the softest of divans and lounges, and heavy Persian rugs. In the captain's room, to the other end of the house, the bed, when not in use, sinks out of sight, and is replaced by a velvet lounge. On the opposite side of the room the bath-tub is hidden from view by a similar device. This room is provided with a handsomely carved writing-desk and drawing-case, and about it hang all manner of the most improved nautical instruments. From the roof of the house projects the smoke-stack, which is double, there being a space of two inches between the inner and outer shells, which will preserve the paint from being burned off and the ventilators leading down into the engine and fire rooms.

From the smoking-room a broad staircase with rails, balusters, and newel posts of carved mahogany, leads down into a large vestibule which stands a cabinet armory of carved oak filled with a glittering array of small arms, rifles, shot-guns, pistols, etc., of the most improved patterns. From this vestibule to advantage behind doors of heavy bevel-edged plate-glass. From the front of the vestibule two doors open into the main saloon, while one opens on the starboard side into the owner's private room, and another, on the port side, into the steward's pantry.

The main saloon forward of the vestibule is 21 feet 3 inches long, and extends across the entire width of the yacht. The room is panelled throughout in oak, most elaborately carved, in two panels being alike. These carvings represent every variety of tropical flower and foliage, from which peer out, half concealed, curious birds or quaint animal heads. A frieze, two panels wide boards, and several plate glasses and fountains all built into the sides of the room, and on all masses of carving. Over the front of the piano is carved Mr Gould's well known monogram—a jay bird perched in a rustic G.

The gem of the ship is the owner's room, which opens from the after end of the saloon on the starboard side. It is 13½ feet long by 8½ feet wide, and opening from one side of it is an alcove 7 feet long by 4½ feet wide, in which is the bed. The sides of this alcove are lined with quilted silk, and a silken canopy and hangings cover the bed from casual observation. At the after end of this room is a beautifully carved mahogany wardrobe, half of which, upon the inside of a spring, swings aside and discloses a luxurious bath-room.

From the forward end of the saloon a broad passage leads toward the bows of the vessel, On either side of this, adjoining the saloon are two ladies' boudoirs, to double state-rooms, which can be used en suite, or can be separated by the drawing of tapestry hangings, those boudoirs are furnished with marble baths, plate-glass mirrors, exquisitely carved lodge-tables, lounging-chairs, and everything that wealth can provide of comfort or luxury. Of these suites one is occupied by Mrs Gould, and the other is also furnished in white silk and the other in blue. Forward of these, on either side of the passage-way, are two more state-rooms, or four in all, one of which could, in an emergency, accommodate two gentlemen with comfortable quarters.

Beyond the state-rooms, to each side of the passage-way, is a large bath-room for the use of guests, and beyond it in the collision bulkhead. Forward of this are the quarters of the head steward and the six cabin servants, which are reached by a separate companion-way from the upper deck.

The Atalanta is to be commanded by Captain Sinclair, formerly of the White Star ocean, and lately commander of the steam-ship Illinois of the American Line, between Philadelphia and Liverpool. Under him will be two mates, four quartermasters, two boatswains, captain of the men, one chief engineer, two assistant engineers, three oilers, six firemen, three coal-passers, one steward, three cooks, and six cabin servants; in all fifty two men in all. She is propelled by a two-cylinder, inverted, direct-acting, surface-condensing engine of one thousand horse-power, provided with two cylinders, one thirty inches in diameter and the other sixty inches. A small engine drives a dynamo-electric machine which supplies the electricity by means of which any passenger can reach from his silken couch, touch a silver spring, and flood his room with light, or press a bell and summon a servant. Every portion of the yacht is lighted with the Edison incandescent lights, and every portion is in direct communication with the owner or captain by means of electricity. By means of a steam ventilating apparatus connected by pipes with every room and compartment in the vessel the air in them is kept constantly fresh. In event of cold weather each room is also furnished with its coil of steam-pipes.

As Mr. Gould does not contemplate starting on his cruise around the world until autumn, the yacht will probably become owned and busy in New York and Eastern waters during the summer. She flies the ensign of the American Yacht Club, which is a white Maltese cross on a blue field bordered with red. The cost of the Atalanta has been more than a quarter of a million of dollars.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHINAMEN ON A PICNIC.

JOHN CHINAMAN is the object of so much derision, both innocent and incent, that we take pleasure in expressing our conviction that his picnic at Iona Island, North River, on the 11th of June, was a complete success. He organized it himself, and it was all his own, although he invited more than three hundred white Americans to accompany him, he saw to it that there was plenty of food, music, and fire-works; he feasted all the folks; he indulged in no rowdyism; and he brought back his whole party sound and happy. How many white Americans could be or done better?

That this was the most notable Sunday-school picnic ever held in the United States of America is, however, its chief claim to distinction. The hundred and fifty Chinese adults and children were exclusively Sunday-school scholars of several Baptist and Presbyterian churches in New York city, and the three hundred white Americans who went on invited guests were their Sunday-school teachers, or their Sunday-school teachers' friends. It must be confessed that some of the instructors who had been honored with invitations refused to go. They did not relish the idea of entering into social relations with the Chinese, much though they desired to save their souls. They feared the attacks of "heathens," which almost any gathering of Chinamen is apt to tempt. They distrusted John's capacity for organizing a picnic, especially a Sunday-school picnic. Many of them accordingly said at home, but gave their tickets to acquaintances, who were only too eager to accept them. It may be said that John's secretiveness in getting up the affair was very great, nobody seemed to know anything positive about the scheme until it was actually hatched; and had John been less sagacious in this respect, the steamboat Long Branch, which took the party up the river, might have been an undesirable place of resort.

A similar secretiveness exists with respect to John's motive for going to Sunday-school. His best friends do not suppose that in pursuing so excellent a course he is governed by the considerations which white Americans usually present to the attention of their youthful offspring. They freely express the conviction that, with rare exceptions, John attends Sunday-school because he desires to learn the English language.

"A few weeks ago," says the Rev. DAVID GANNO, pastor of the Reformed (Covenanters') Presbyterian church in Twenty-third Street, near Eighth Avenue, "while reading to the Chinamen in our Sunday-school the parable of the loaves and fishes, I noticed on some of their faces a smile of incredulity. When I had finished the passage, I turned to them and said, 'You do not believe what I have read?'

"'No,' replied one of them, frankly, while the rest shook their heads.

"'But if Jesus was God, He could have done all that,' I continued.

"The incredulous smile again appeared. 'When we were bread to eat, we have to earn it,' was the answer.

"'But look here,' I persisted, 'when you plant a grain of wheat in the ground, and it has sprung up and ripened, you can crumple the end of the stalk in your hand, blow away the chaff, and count sixty grains that have come from that single grain. Now, if God does that, He can do what is said to have been done in the parable of the loaves and fishes, can't He?'"

The almond-eyed listeners, says Mr GANNO, made no reply. "But it was easy to see that they had not become convinced."

Nevertheless, and for very simple reasons, the Chinese pupils in our city Sunday-schools have succeeded in gaining the respect of their teachers. Ever since the time when Miss GOODRICH started a class for them in the Presbyterian church, then in White Street, her luminous example being followed successively in the Spring Street Presbyterian Church, the Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church, the Twenty-third Street Reformed Presbyterian Church, the Baptist churches in Fifty-fifth and Fifty-third streets, the Reformed Presbyterian church in Thirty-ninth Street, and several other churches, John has been to the Sunday school teacher an object of esteem and often of affection. He is docile, attentive, grateful, appreciative; and he is generous. Several times he has invited his preceptors and their friends to entertainments furnished by himself in the Sunday-school rooms on a week-day evening, and consisting of ice-cream, lemonade, cake, and occasionally of dishes specifically Chinese. He is fond of testifying his sense of obligation by making presents to his teachers, and when the mood seizes him, acts as recklessly with his money as a boy. For his mother in China he entertains an affection that shows itself in obedience, even when he is of adult age, and it is no uncommon thing for him, at her call, to return home, marry the girl she has chosen for him, leave the new wife to be a servant to his mother, and come back to New York to earn money for both. A well-known business man in this city, who is also a Sunday-school superintendent, has four times signified his appreciation of John's loyalty and gratitude by lending him, without security, from fifty to one hundred dollars to start laundries with. In no instance has the money failed to be returned with interest at most as it was earned. "Why did you lend it?" he was recently asked. "Because," he replied, "it seemed to me to be a square thing for a man who professes Christian principles to show some Christian kindness. This is a test of our golden rule, I thought, and I will try it."

John learns very readily. Sometimes in a single evening in will master the English alphabet. The principal of the Twenty-eighth Street public school is said to declare that a Chinese pupil of hers is the most brilliant lad she has taught. Two Chinamen at the Beaver Falls College, near Pittsburgh, are studying to be preachers, but the Presbyterian mission authorities do not encourage the project of converting China by sending thence Chinese missionaries who have been educated in America. These missionaries would be more influential, it is believed, had they been trained at home in ignorance of American ways that are dark.

It was in his position as a pupil in a Protestant Sunday-school that the true significance of John's recent picnic lay. The externals of that festive affair much resembled those of any other Sunday-school picnic. Of course the music, being provided by a band with cymbals, "thunder-drums," copper gongs, and "yes-sing" fiddles, possessed an element of discordant specialty, but the fire-works, the swimming, the kite-flying, the boating, the foot-ball playing, the flower-gathering, and the "refreshments" in general, sounded no note of heathendom. It seems to us that our esteemed contemporaries of the daily press missed the meaning of this picnic.

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MATRIMONY," "MARIE DE MAUSAS," "NO NEW THING," "HEADS OF MOSBY," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

THE GENERAL COUNSELS PERSEVERE.

FERRARS Mand had not been for wrong when she accused me of expecting everybody and everything to give way to my personal convenience. Some justification for this curiously sanguine mental attitude might have been found in the fact that circumstances always had hitherto arranged themselves very nearly in accordance with my wishes; and I must confess that, from the moment that I realized his desirability, I began to believe in the recovery of Mr. Farquhar, who nevertheless died that same night. When the news of this melancholy event reached Thirlby I therefore felt myself slightly aggrieved. The deceased gentleman, having been upward of eighty years of age, could not justly be accused of having quitted the world with indecent precipitation, and I consequently blm from all blame in the matter; but I certainly did feel that Fortune had treated me rather ill. The more I thought about it the more the conviction forced itself upon me that we were destined to receive Mrs. Farquhar as a permanent inmate, and such a prospect did not require Jim Bunce's wrathful denunciation to fill me with dismay.

"The unfortunate part of it," I remarked to Miss Dennison, to whom I carried my anxieties and misgivings with some faint hope of consolation—"the unfortunate part of it is that the old lady will undoubtedly be left without a home. There is a step-son, who comes into the place, and I am very much afraid my uncle will think he ought at all events to ask her here."

"I should think that was the very least he could do," she agreed; "but I understood you to say that you were sure he would do nothing of the kind."

"He will, if he thinks it his duty," I answered, gloomily. "My only hope is that he may do shine. She could be sure to find it uncommonly dull down here; I build a little upon that."

"Perhaps she will think it her duty to come I should, in her place."

"Ah, if it were only you, instead of that old Irump!" I sighed, wistfully.

"It is very foolish of you to make up your mind that she is an old frump. Probably, if she does come, you will be devoted to her in a few weeks. I haven't a doubt that, a year ago, you would have thought it the greatest misfortune in the world to have a girl continually riding and sailing with you, yet you manage to put up with me. You are just the sort of person who hates all strangers at first, and then worships them, and then gets tired of them and hates them again."

I assured Maud solemnly that she little knew how cruelly she was maligning me. That I was disposed to be prejudiced against strangers might be true, though such a thing had never been said of me before, but that I was fickle toward those whom I—toward my friends, in short, was so unfounded a charge as could possibly have been brought. If I possessed any virtue at all, it was that of fidelity to my friends.

"So long as they don't rub you the wrong way or bore you," she said, laughing. Whereupon I became angry, and we had one of those quarrels which were made up as soon as ever she chose that they should be, and which I fear that she sometimes provoked out of nothing but that wanton love of exercising power from which not even the best of women are wholly exempt. I pain that occasion our quarrel did not last long, nor did the mists of depression into which I had been thrown by the thought of Mrs. Farquhar's possible descent upon us. After all, I reflected, there was a very good chance of her having other plans; and whatever was to happen, there was no use in making one's self miserable about it before the event. So I soon recovered my natural good spirits, and we had a very delightful week of fine weather and rural pursuits before my uncle, who had remained in Scotland to attend the funeral, came back.

My first glance at his face, when he did come back, showed me that it had that worried look which it always wore on his return from Scotland; but I hesitated to come out point-blank with the question which was trembling on my lips, and as soon as dinner was over he saved me the trouble of asking it by remarking, "We must get Mrs. Peters to put things in order a little; I expect my mother to come to us soon."

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1361.

"Not for good and all?" I exclaimed, aghast.

"Why not?" asked my uncle, smiling.

I was not exactly prepared, upon the spur of the moment, to say why not. I could only shake my head despairingly, and declare that I was sure it would never do.

"She is only coming on a visit at present," my uncle went on, "but I can't undertake to say that she may not finally decide upon making Thirlby her home. It would be a natural arrangement, Charley."

"It might be natural," I said, doubtfully; "but it don't follow that it would be pleasant."

My uncle made an rejoinder for some time, but sat sipping his claret meditatively, and drumming upon the table with his fingers. At last he resumed:

"So you think it wouldn't be a wise plan, Charley?"

"I don't think about it; I know it wouldn't," I answered, emphatically.

My uncle raised his eyebrows. "May I ask whether you have any particular reason for saying that?" he inquired.

I had, as the reader is aware, a particular reason, but I would not very well state it. My uncle and I were upon terms of such intimacy and mutual confidence that I seldom hesitated to express my inmost thoughts to him; but the line must be drawn somewhere, and it is hardly possible to tell my man that you have reason to believe his mother to be a canting old hypocrite. So I abstained from any allusion to Bunce and his revelations, and only urged the obvious objections that there must be to the introduction of a third person into the household. Was it not preferable that two were company and three none? And when two of the three had lived in the closest companionship for so many years, while the third was to all intents and purposes a stranger, and at the same time a very near relation, what hope was there of their being able to get on together? We should be obliged to explain all our stupid little jokes, and of course we should be made to feel how stupid they were by the process of explanation. We should bear to think before we spoke—a thing we had never accustomed ourselves to do. Conversation, in short, would be simply impossible.

My uncle listened to me patiently, with that faint smile of his which so many people disliked, thinking that he was laughing at them. I who was better acquainted with him, knew that he was not laughing at me, or that, if he was, it was in no ombinably spirit. So I proceeded, warming with my subject.

"There will be an end to all comfort; we may as well make up our minds to that at once. We shall not be allowed to dine in the library any more, and of course we shall not be allowed to smoke directly after dinner. All your books and papers will be carefully dusted every morning, and put away into places from which it will take weeks of patient research to disinter them. And then think of the people who will come and may ask us! Because naturally Mrs. Farquhar won't care about living in a howling wilderness. All the poke bonnets will come over the Border; and Deacon M'Tavish will ask a blessing before meat, and read us a long sermon on Sunday evening, preparatory to getting tipsy on whiskey toddy, and—"

My uncle apologized for interrupting me, but observed that I seemed to have formed a slightly mistaken notion of his mother. Her friends did not, as a rule, wear poke bonnets, she was not exclusively Scotch in her sympathies, nor was she a Presbyterian, although— Here he paused, and apparently decided not to finish his sentence. "In fact," he concluded, frigidly, "she is a very good, kind-hearted, and agreeable person."

It was not for me to contradict him, little as I was disposed to accept this definition of the unknown lady. "That may be," I answered, doggedly, "but she is a third person all the same."

"Which nobody can deny," remarked my uncle. And then there was a tolerably long period of silence.

"If my mother and I should agree that it would be best for her to remain on here," resumed Uncle Bernard, at last—"we have agreed upon nothing yet, but if we should do so—I think perhaps you would not find her presence quite as great a nuisance as you expect."

"Oh, I am not the one to be considered," I answered, hastily, feeling a little ashamed of myself. "I should not be the principal sufferer It was of you that I was thinking." This, I am afraid, was not strictly true; but I dare say I believed it to be so at the time.

"Well," said my uncle, "you were thinking of an both, probably. I was going to say that your objections don't apply with the same force that they would have done a few years ago. We have been very good friends, Charley, we have had many a happy day together, and we shall have many more, I hope, only they won't be consecutive. The pleasant old humdrum life which you regret, and which I most likely regret a great deal more than you do, wouldn't have gone on much longer in any case. I shall stick to it, but you will go away from it, and therefore it won't so much matter to you whether things progress in the old way at Thirlby as not. Have you been thinking at all lately of your career in life you mean to choose for yourself?"

I couldn't say that I had.

"I don't want to hurry you," my uncle continued; "but the time, you know, is getting short, and it would be as well to hear a definite plan —particularly as your field of choice seems to me to be rather narrow. The army, which I always fancied would be the profession that would suit you best, you declined."

"Yes," I answered, with a sigh. "I declined that." The truth was that I was quite of my uncle's mind as to the army, but as the time when it had been suggested to me I had declared against it simply because it would have entailed my leaving Eton and giving up Oxford—neither of which things was I disposed to do, seeing how promising an oar I was.

"So that the remaining professions will not require all the fingers of one hand to count. There is the bar."

"I don't think I should do ever and above well at that."

"The Church?"

"Good gracious!"

"Exactly so. Well, then, there is commerce."

"My dear Uncle Bernard!"

"Exactly so again. Do you know of any other way of occupying yourself and making a little money?"

I scratched my head and sighed, and finally observed that I thought farming would be rather jolly.

"But I'm afraid they haven't got a Professor of Agriculture at Oxford yet; and besides, with not flattering you, I think you have talents enough to fit you for something a little more ambitious than that. I am told that young fellows in government offices lead a pleasant enough sort of life, and it is one which might easily be made to serve as a stepping-stone to better things. What do you think? I have been such a recluse for the best part of my life that I have lost what little interest I had at one time, but Tom knows a great many big wigs, and of course he could put in a word for you."

Tom was the General, my uncle's brother, of whom I have spoken. I said I thought I should rather like a government clerkship, provided, of course, that it was in an office of the right sort, where one would be a chance of meeting other fellows whom one knew. What was the precise nature of the better things to which my uncle alluded I did not quite know, but I imagined vaguely that they might include a seat in Parliament, and it flashed across me that a member of Parliament would be a personage likely to stand high in Maud's estimation. I repeated that I thought that would do very well, and then we settled down to a discussion of the possible future, which lasted us far the remainder of the evening. Thus, whether designedly or not, my uncle led my thoughts entirely away from Mrs. Farquhar, whose name was not mentioned between us for several days afterward.

But when General Le Marchant (who, like my uncle, had been in Scotland visiting the widow in her affliction) came to stay with us, my prejudices received a somewhat unexpected reinforcement. The General, it seemed, held very decided convictions upon the question which was causing me so much uneasiness, and he took the earliest opportunity of expressing them to me.

"Charley, my boy," he said, "you mustn't allow this—you really must not allow it. I'm an older man than you, and I suppose I may say that I know a little more of the world and the nature of mankind than you do, and, believe me, there couldn't be a greater mistake than for Bernard and my mother to try and live under the same roof. It's just one of those matters that ought to be nipped in the bud. If it isn't put a stop to now, there'll be an end of bother about it afterward, and you're the one that can nip it."

"I quite agree with you, General," I said. "I told my uncle the other day that I was sure it wouldn't do."

"Ah, well, you can't know much about it, you never saw my mother in your life, did you? Mind you, I'm not saying one word against her. The dearest old lady that ever lived, and the best of mothers to us in days gone by—and all that. But—well, I can't go into details, and I'll could you wouldn't understand. You must take my word for it that she is a precious difficult person to live with. There are people who are as good as gold, and who yet would make a thin-skinned fellow like Bernard wish he was dead a dozen times a day. Don't you understand what I mean?"

I did not quite follow the General's drift, but it was entirely superfluous for him to give me reasons for keeping Mrs. Farquhar out of Thirlby, and so I told him. I added, however, that remonstrances would probably come with greater weight from him than from me.

"Not a bit of it!" the General returned. "Certainly I can show Bernard plainly enough that he is contemplating a piece of folly which he'll regret to the end of his life, and so forth; but, bless your soul! he knows all that as well as I do. Bernard is such a confoundedly unselfish old beggar that it wouldn't be of the slightest use to bring forward arguments of that kind. He would simply tell me in polite language that it made no odds to me, and that if he chose to be uncomfortable that was his lookout. But if you were to suppose him on personal grounds—making it appear, don't you know, as if it would be a horrid bore to you to be an old lady in the house—I believe that might have some effect upon him."

"I've tried that already," I replied, remembering, with a twinge of conscience, that my efforts had not been altogether of the disinterested nature suggested by my companion. "I put it to him in that way the other day, but his answer was that it wouldn't be of so much consequence to me now, as I shall be very little at home in the future. He thinks I ought to be going in for a career of some kind."

This conversation took place as we were walking back from the Rhonds, whither we had [illegible] to inspect the decays [illegible] upon the prospects of the [illegible] which end now [illegible] My [illegible] not [illegible] by what the [illegible] it was beginning to be mingled with a [illegible] able spice of curiosity; and [illegible] dressing for dinner I buried [illegible] my conjectures as to the character of this singular lady,

Digitized by Google

"I CAN SEE HIM SITTING THERE NOW, ONE HAND CLASPING THE STEM OF HIS GLASS, THE OTHER THRUST INTO HIS WAISTCOAT POCKET."

whose sons appeared to regard her with something of the feeling ascribed by the poet to the neighbors of Peter Bell. What made the matter the more inexplicable was that these two sons were as kind-hearted a couple of men as could have been found throughout the length and breadth of England; and I was not altogether sorry that Mrs Farquhar was about to pay us a visit, though I had no wish that the visit should be a protracted one.

At dinner the General, who had been lolgets and unlike himself during the day, displayed his usual good spirits, and favored us with many jokes and anecdotes. Across the mists of years I can see him sitting there now, one hand clasping the stem of his glass, the other thrust into his waistcoat pocket, and his jolly face one great beaming smile. "Did I ever tell you about my meeting the old Bishop of Gloucester when I was in command of the 117th? Eh?" I shall never forget it. 'Colonel,' he said, 'what do you call horses for?' 'What for?' says I, 'oh, because they're un-sound, gone in the wind, or otherwise unfit for their work.' 'Well,' says the old chap, 'I can't make it out. My coachman bought one of your cast horses for me the other day, and neither he nor I can discover anything wrong with him. A fine black horse, with one white stocking—' 'Oh dear, oh dear!' I said; 'for Heaven's sake, my lord, keep it dark! Why, that's the troop sergeant major's horse, and—ha! ha! ha!" etc., etc.

I wonder how many times we had laughed at that time-honored yarn. I am not sure that I ever saw the point of it, or made out how it was that the sergeant major's horse had been sold; but I would defy any one to have looked at the General's face as he told it and not laughed.

My uncle, it struck me, laughed rather more heartily than usual; and from this and other symptoms, such as the production of a certain green-sealed Burgundy after dinner, I was led to suspect this of a design to keep the General in good humor. But if he flattered himself that he was going to escape his lecture, that bottle of Burgundy had been brought up from the cellar in vain. No sooner was the cloth removed—I am writing of the era when people used to sit an hour after dinner, and see their opposite neighbors reflected upside down in mahogany tables—no sooner, I say, had Cooper and the cloth vanished than the General opened fire. "What's this I hear, Bernard, about my mother taking up her abode with you?"

"I can't tell you what you may have heard," answered my uncle, placidly.

"But is it a fact? That's what I want to know."

"Now, Tom," said my uncle, "I won't be bullied."

"Won't you, though? By George! that's just what you will do if you allow her to establish herself in your house."

The full brilliancy of this repartee did not appear to strike the General until he had thought it over, for there was a lapse of some seconds before he went off into a series of suppressed chuckles. "It won't do, you know," he resumed at last, recovering his gravity; "it really will not do."

"So Charley has been telling me," observed my uncle.

"And quite right, too. Charley never spoke a truer word in his life. And I must say, Bernard," continued the General, with a shade of reproach in me, "that I think that is a matter upon which Charley is entitled to be heard. You ought to consider how it will affect him before you decide upon making such a change."

"Well," said my uncle, "I haven't decided yet."

"Ah, but you're wavering, my dear fellow; and you mustn't waver. I know what you are, Bernard; you like to turn a question over and over, and hear what everybody has to say about it, and look at it from all the points of the compass, before you make up your mind. That may be a very good system to go upon for ordinary every-day work, but it won't meet all cases. And this is just an instance of a case that had much better not be discussed."

"Except with you and Charley, I suppose."

"Bless your heart! I don't want to discuss it, nor does Charley, I'll be bound. We're dead against the plan, both of us. All we want you to do is to make up your mind. Don't you see what will happen if you leave the thing open? Why, some fine morning she'll suggest it herself, and when once she does that, it 'll be all up with you."

My uncle, whose eyes had hitherto been fixed upon his dessert knife, which he was balancing upon his forefinger, glanced quickly up at the General now, with a half-amused, half-deprecating smile. "The fact of the matter is that she has suggested it," he said.

The General gave a long whistle. "This is bad; this is worse than I expected—by long chalks. What answer did you make?"

"I said I thought we had better take a little more time to consider of it."

"Ah, dear me!" sighed the General, shaking his head mournfully. "You oughtn't to have said that. That wasn't the way to take it at all. You should have rapped out a good round 'No!'"

My uncle laughed outright. "I must confess," he said, "that I was not prepared to be quite so peremptory as that. Doesn't it strike you, Tom, that we are entertaining Charley with a rather shocking display of artificial feeling?"

"No, it doesn't," returned the General, somewhat tartly. "The boy isn't a fool; he understands well enough. It is not as though my mother would like living here. She would be a thousand times happier in Scotland, where she would have all her relations and friends within half of her."

"So she says."

"Then, my dear, good fellow, why the deuce don't you urge her to stay there?"

"Her view is that it would be the right thing for her to come here."

"Right thing be hanged! It isn't the right thing; it's the wrong thing!" exclaimed the General, angrily. "Do you think I don't know? I wouldn't have this happen for a thousand pounds. I did hope you were to have peace and quietness for the rest of your days, if you were to have nothing else; and now—now—" If it had not been so absurdly improbable, I could almost have fancied that there were tears in the General's eyes and voice at this point.

"I thought it was upon Charley's account that you objected, Tom," said my uncle, gently.

"Well, well; don't interrupt a man in the middle of his sentence. What I was going to say was that it is your duty to be firm. Just show a little firmness, and depend upon it there'll be no more bother. Why, what should I say if she were to propose to come and live with me?—though Heaven knows she would never worry me a tenth part as much as she will you!—My dear mother, I should say, 'it's out of the question. Come and stay whenever you like, and I'll go and see you as often as you want me, but as for our setting up house together, we should be a pair of fools to think of such a thing. You've got decided ideas; so have I—and they are different from yours in ninety nine cases out of a hundred. You like your own way; so do I. Now I put it to you as a man and superior woman, could we live together without making one another wretched? But, whether you agree with me or not, I tell you plainly that I've made up my mind, and that I shall never consent to such an arrangement.' That's what I should say," concluded the General, not without some complacency.

"I am sure I should never be able to put things in that convincing way," observed my uncle. "I'll tell you what, Tom—you shall undertake this task for me when she comes. Say all that to her, only substitute my name for yours."

"Eh?" said the General, his face growing perceptibly longer. "Well—I could do that, no doubt; but don't you think it ought to come from you? Thirsby isn't my house, you see."

"Tom, Tom," said my uncle, gravely, "I believe you are afraid of our mother."

"You're another!" returned the General, laughing, but at the same time looking somewhat crest-fallen. He paused, he added, in a much more subdued tone than he had hitherto employed: "If you are really in earnest, you know, Bernard, and if you think I could do any good by tackling her, I'll do it like a shot. She can't eat me, when all's said and done."

"No, no," answered my uncle; "I won't put your courage to so severe a test. You are an admirable reasoner, Tom, but some people, as you know, are not amenable to reason. No, I think, in spite of your warning, we will leave the question open for the present. And now pray let us talk about something else. Charley, I hope we are to have some duck this year. Bunce tells me they are getting more and more scarce."

"Bunce says that every summer," I remarked. "He is so afraid of strangers being disappointed that he always likes to prepare them for the worst. I saw plenty of duck this afternoon."

Our little party was less cheerful than usual that night. We were all three conscious of the restraint which is the inevitable consequence of an unfinished discussion, and we went early to bed. That is to say that the General and I went upstairs, while my uncle betook himself to his study, where it was his habit to sit up all the small hours, either reading or writing, for he was something of a book-worm, and would occasionally contribute articles on literary subjects to one of the few reviews that were then in existence.

I met the landing I met Mrs Peters, the housekeeper, returning from the round of inspection which she made every night to see whether the house was on fire, or whether there were burglars concealed under any of the beds; and it occurred to me that I might get some information about Mrs Farquhar out of her. But Mrs Peters, who had taught me my Catechism in my childhood, and had looked after my wardrobe ever since, had an air of respect for me.

"Now you go off to bed, Mr Charles, and don't worrit me with questions," she said. "The lady will be here soon, and you can judge of her for yourself. I'm not one to chatter about my betters."

"Was there ever anything in the nature of a row between her and my uncle, Peters?" I asked, ignoring this disclaimer.

"Row? What, a quarrel, do you mean? Never was nothink of the sort. Why, you ought to know the Squire better, Mr Charles, than to think he'd quarrel with one of the family—least-ways with his mother."

"Well, I suppose she is one of the family, isn't she? I know there was some trouble, because Bunce told me so."

"I'll speak to that old Bunce for his good next time I see him," cried Mrs Peters, wrathfully. "He's the foolishest man ever I knew, is Bunce, and that opinionated you'd think he had the wisdom of Solomon to hear him talk. By gonest is by-gone, and they don't concern me nor Bunce, nor you neither, Mr Charles. You haven't said a word to the Squire, have you?"

"Of course not."

"Don't you do it, there's a good boy. There was a trouble; but it's all over years and years ago, and we shan't hear no more of it, please God. It never have been spoke about, nor never will be by me, Mr Charles."

This was rather tantalising; but I could not very well press Peters to say more. I only ventured to inquire whether Mrs Farquhar had been concerned in the trouble alluded to.

"Oh, she!" answered Peters, rather contemptuously. "No, she hadn't nothing to do with it, beyond making the worst of a bad job. There's some folks as is like that, and she were always a weak creetur' to my mind, for all her talking and lecturing."

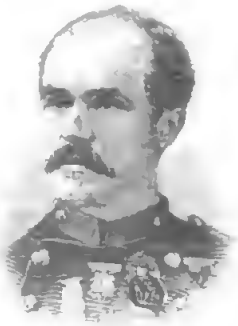
It seemed evident that Mrs Farquhar's character gave scope for a variety of interpretations.

(To be continued.)

COL. GEORGE E. P. HOWARD, Captain.

S. J. SCOTT.

H. W. BULL.



CHARLES H. HINMAN.

GEORGE JOINER.

THOMAS J. DOLAN.

FRANCIS STUART.

JOHN L. PAULDING.

A. B. VAN HEUSEN.

WALTER SCOTT.

W. L. CASH.

J. M. POLLARD.

JOHN H. BROWN.

F. J. HASSETH.

E. C. SHAKESPEARE.

JOHN SMITH.

THE INTERNATIONAL RIFLE MATCH—THE AMERICAN TEAM.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY PAGE.—[SEE PAGE 396.]

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Several years ago a preacher in Cass County, Missouri, wrote to Washington in behalf of the residents of a growing hamlet, asking that a post-office be established there. The request was favorably received, and he was asked by the Post-office Department to suggest a name that would be acceptable to his neighbors. He replied that they were not hard to please, so long as the name was peculiar. The Department took him at his word, and Peculiar is the name of the post-office to this day.

A few days ago "Poe Cottage," on Fordham Hill, was sold under an auctioneer's hammer. It is a low and old-fashioned farm house, surrounded by fruit trees. In an upper room, beneath the slanting roof, Poe wrote "The Raven." A cherry-tree near the house bears the poet's name cut into the bark, but the growth of the tree has distorted the letters. The property brought five thousand seven hundred dollars.

According to London Truth, a recent ball given at the United States Legation in Paris by Mrs. Levi P. Morton was the finest given there in fifteen years, and was noteworthy for the bringing together of elements politically antagonistic.

It was a queer condition of captivity in which the newspaper reporters who had been sent from foreign lands to describe the coronation of the Russian Czar found themselves. They were hospitably received, and each man was presented with a rather costly gold badge and a small sum of the public money, the latter ostensibly for carriage hire. But when they were ready to send their dispatches they found themselves entirely in the power of their hosts. Nothing was permitted to be sent out of Moscow that did not tell the story the censors wished to have told—a story of the splendors of the occasion and the joy of the people. It is asserted that one of the reporters endeavored to send a letter to his paper in London by mailing parts of it in separate envelopes to the addressee of friends, but only two sheets of it reached their destination. The period of their captivity being over, the reporters were entertained at a costly banquet.

The new English cutter, the Marjorie, has made a good beginning by winning the Queen's Cup in the recent regatta at Harwich. The Miranda, Samoena, Speedthrift, and other equally well-known boats were among the competitors.

The latest story of police efficiency comes from New Jersey. A small boy happened to be crossing a canal bridge in Newark just as another small boy fell into the water. A policeman asked the boy on the bridge whether he could swim. The boy said he could, and with great presence of mind the policeman thereupon dropped him over the railing into the canal. After a hard struggle the boy who was dropped in succeeded in rescuing the one who fell in. The policeman has not yet been promoted for his bravery.

Shia Chin Sun, the learned Chinaman who arrived in this country a few days ago from South America with the Vicar Apostolic of Ho-Nan, whose private secretary he is, was not permitted to come ashore, for fear, perhaps, that he might turn out to be an industrious and frugal laundryman in disguise. So he remained on ship-board, with very little to eat, till the authorities were convinced that he was not bent on augmenting the evil of Chinese cheap labor. Being a philosopher, he made the best of the situation, and his subsequent enjoyment of exercise, air, and food was not lessened by the thought that he had said anything which was unbecoming.

President Arthur has quitted the White House for the season, and is staying at that convenient resort for Presidents, the Soldiers' Home. Nearly all of the many rumors as to where he will spend the heated term agree that he will do more or less fishing. An interesting line of inquiry would be whether the President's special fondness for casting a fly has resulted in making that spor. more sought after than it used to be. Under a monarchical government, if it should become known that the sovereign found pleasure in recreation so cheaply obtained as fishing, there would straightway come a "boom" in anglers' utensils.

It is suggested that two difficult problems be solved at once by setting up the Bartholdi statue of Liberty on the top of the Washington Monument.

This announcement is made in a morning paper of this city: "A lady wishes to find a situation for her excellent infant's nurse." As all infants are excellent in the eyes of their mothers, the nurse will probably find an opening if she can bring satisfactory reference from her last employer.

The Sun says that the "sudden burst of summer has driven all the world away." There seem to be reasons for believing, however, that an industrious man could find a couple of millions or so of unconsidered persons in the cluster of cities who have not fled to the watering-places. Whether they are to be regarded as any part of the world depends, perhaps, on the point from which they are viewed. The few who are so fortunately situated that they can drop their work—if they happen to have any—and seek the cooler places of the earth upon the approach of warm weather are to be congratulated, and having so much themselves, surely they will not deny the multitude the privilege of being counted as at least some small part of the world of men and women.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.
BEWARE OF IRITATIONS.
Imitations and counterfeits have again appeared. Be sure that the word "Horsford's" is on the wrapper. None genuine without it.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE
Has received universal endorsement. No other preparation possesses such remarkable properties for embellishing and strengthening the hair and rendering it dark and glossy. It cures baldness and eradicates dandruff. BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are the best.—[Adv.]

BRISTOW'S Pepsi, an advertisement of which appears in our paper to-day, is a preparation which, by its exceeding intrinsic value, has won the front rank as one of substitutes for mother's milk in nourishing infants, and is equally adapted as a food for invalids. It keeps in any climate, is easily prepared, and is highly commended by all physicians.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for Family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, a delicious article to confectionery in a delicious article highly recommended by lecturers.—Baker's Cocoa, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.
TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculte de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.
Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."
Testimonial of a Boston lady.
DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.
CUTICURA, Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.
CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.
CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Sore Nipples, Scalders, and Chafed Skin.
CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.
Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.
POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

PHOTO. COPYING AGENTS!
Splendid portraits of any size or kind finished in the most artistic manner, from any kind of small pictures. Reliable agents wanted in every country in the U. S. Premium Lenses. Address The American Copying Co., 59 Centre St., Auburn, N. Y.

REASONS
WHY
MRS. THOMPSON'S
PATENT WAVES ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.

1—The PATENT SPRING confines Curls to shape to EVERY head.
2—They CAN NOT GAPE A PALER, using less, and look more natural.
3—They CANNOT WITHDRAW or SHRINK with dampness, but last twice as long for years.
4—They turn all over at back apart, but entwine TWICE as many as new made.
5—They are only dressed with a WET COMB when they get SOILED, and are a permanent comfort for a year without redressing.
6—They are ADAPTED EVERY HAIR to be CURLY CURL, or extend Parisian Curl.
7—NOT IMPORTANT. Every lady can look young and attractive with a PERMANENT WAVE, as in accordance with fashion when the hair is parted.
8—As I have 14 different styles of THOMPSON WAVES, every lady can be suited.
PRICES from $6 to $12 Blond and Gray extra. Also the most ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of SWITCHES from $2 to $30. GRAY HAIR A SPECIALTY.
Be careful to avoid Counterfeits or Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.
MRS. C. THOMPSON,
No. 39 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "In a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the facsimile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (Wholesale only): C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.
Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & SANDERBECK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, M. GRAHAM & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH
[HEARSON'S PATENT, H.B.A., JAN. 16, 1882.]
A self-feeding marker pen, writes continuously with any ink and by means of a pen with ordinary nibs.

PENS TO REFILL
(Fine, Medium, or Broad Points), 6d. PER BOX.
MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET WITHOUT SOILING HANDS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE
$1.00
REGISTERED ADJUSTMENT
THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HANDWRITING ARE ENTIRELY PRESERVED
$1.50
EXTRA FOR PER REMOVABLE STYLEPLATE
FITTED WITH A NON-CORRODIBLE PEN.
$2.50 PALLADIUM PEN $3.00
Flexible as Steel. Durable as Gold.
SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.
THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

First Prize Medal, Vienna, 1873.
C. WEIS & CO.
Manufacturers of Meerschaum Goods, Wholesale and Retail. Send for Circular to 199 Broadway. Factories, Vienna and 69 Walker Street, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S
RHENISH COLOGNE.

HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE
(No. 393)
FOR JULY

CONTAINS:

"The Witch's Daughter,"
Frontispiece. From a Picture by F. H. Cozzens.

A Famous London Suburb,
A description of Hampstead Heath. By WILLIAM H. RIDEING. Illustrated from Drawings by HENRY W. MACKAYE and E. F. BOUVERAT.

Conventional Art,
By A. F. OAKEY. Illustrated.

The Romanoffs—II.,
Russia under Alexander II. By H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS. Illustrated.

The Second Generation of Englishmen in America,
Chapter VIII. of T. W. HIGGINSON'S American History Series. Illustrated.

Chatterton and his Associates,
By JOHN INGRAM. Illustrated.

Cincinnati,
By OLIVE LOGAN. With Twenty Illustrations.

Song,
By ROBERT BUCHANAN. Illustrated.

A Castle in Spain—III.,
A New Novel. Illustrated by AMEY.

The Declaration of Independence in a New Light,
By WILLIAM L. STONE.

The Education of Women,
By GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

Political Honors in China,
By WONG CHIN FOO.

Short Stories:
BORN TO GOOD LUCK, by CHARLES READE;
QUITE PRIVATE, by Mrs. D. E. E. GODDARD;
AUNT MARIA AND THE AUTOPHONE;

Poems
By F. D. MONETH and JESSIE F. DOBLOW;

Editor's Easy Chair,
Centennial Monuments.—General John A. Dix.—The Society of Decorative Art.—James Very.—De Lesseps Memorial Tent;

Editor's Literary Record.

Editor's Historical Record.

Editor's Drawer.
July.—Anecdotes of Jefferson.—A Curious Kothe by Entering the Cabinet.—Keeping the Fast.—Charity Advice.—How to Use the Electric Bell.—A Joke that wouldn't Keep.—Anecdote of Bishop Wiley.—Discouraging.—Anecdote of John Quincy Adams.—Reminiscences of Irving.—Seward's Little Jest (C. K. B.).—A Lost Art.—Revised Anecdotes of T. Lannigan).

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the contrary is otherwise directed.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY is a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to MAGAZINE & BOOKSELLERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of four Cents to Postage Stamps.

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.
Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.
"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D.
82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.
What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.
When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, Not Castoria.
What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, Not Castoria.
Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

Print Your Own
Large sizes for circulars, &c., $3. Small sizes for printing cards, labels, &c., $1 to $25. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy; printed directions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to factory.
KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Broadway and 14th Street.

Ladies' Gossamer Rubber Circulars, with Hood. Sizes 30 to 50 in., $1 00; usual price $1 25.

Ladies' Gossamer Rubber Newports, with Cape, Sizes 30 to 50 in., $1 25; usual price $1 50.

Misses' Gossamer Rubber Circulars, with Hood, all sizes, 90c.; usual price $1 00.

Misses' Gossamer Rubber Newports, with Cape, all sizes, $1 15; usual price $1 50.

Gents' Gossamer Rubber Coats, all sizes, $1 50; usual price $2 00.

Gents' Gossamer Rubber Coats (extra light weight), $2 25; usual price $3 00.

Boys' Gossamer Rubber Coats, all sizes, $1 25; usual price $2 00.

Garments may be sent by mail if prepaid at above prices, adding 25 cents for postage.

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Broadway and 14th Street.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

FURNISHINGS FOR GENTLEMEN.

Linen, Percale, and Muslin Dress Shirts, Collars and Cuffs, Jean and Linen Drawers, Night Shirts, Pajamas in Silk Pongee and Cheviot, Turkish Bath Robes and Sheets, Bathing-Suits, Study Jackets, Steamer Rugs and Gowns, Carriage Lap Robes, and a choice variety of the Latest Novelties in Paris and London Neckwear, &c., &c.

Broadway and 19th St.

MEMOIRS OF GENERAL DIX.

Memoirs of John Adams Dix. Compiled by his Son, MORGAN DIX. With Five Steel-plate Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $5 00.

An exceedingly interesting study as the life of a typical American, while it has a no less decided value for the light thrown upon one of the most important periods in the history of this country. * * * The lessons of his career are many, and no sympathetic reader can trace the story as related in these pages without being inspired to nobler purposes, to broader views of the duties of an American citizen. * * * To the political student these memoirs must necessarily be of much interest, and they are not to be ignored by the historian.—Boston Traveller.

The life of General John A. Dix was full of stirring incident and episode. As soldier and statesman his lot was thrown in with some of the most remarkable men and some of the most startling events in the history of the United States. For this reason the book will be read with pleasure and profit by an immense circle of people to whom the name of General Dix recalls reminiscences of grave crises and recollections of perilous passages in the annals of the past quarter of a century. * * * A most entertaining and instructive book.—N. Y. Herald.

It is but seldom that a relative acquits himself as a biographer as well as Dr. Morgan Dix has done in his memoirs of John Adams Dix, for it is but seldom that a biographer has as well formed and rounded a character to depict, and as clean and honorable a life to contain.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE AMERICAN Double Action Revolver,

32, 36 and 44 Caliber, and sold at retail by the best dealers in the United States and Europe. Made by MARKHAM TON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass., also Manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Hammerless Guns.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY (late 130 to 142 Cherry street, New York), who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any CHROMOS made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

BRUSHES of every description at 918 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN L. BOYD'S, Manufacturer and Importer.

IT PAYS to use our Rubber Printing Stamps. Sent by mail, prepaid, for price from 75 cts. to $1 00. Mitten & Co., Cleveland, O.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

The Great Soap Wonder, "Death on Dirt"

NO BOILING!
NO RUBBING!
NO STEAM!
NO ODORS!
BENEFICIAL TO CLOTHES!
BENEFICIAL TO SKIN!
MAKES CLOTHES WHITER!
MAKES THEM IRON EASIER!
LESS LABOR!
LESS FUEL!
LESS TIME!
LESS TROUBLE!

has been tested by thousands upon thousands of housekeepers and laundresses from Maine to California, from Canada to Mexico, and as not a single instance, where directions have been followed, has it failed to do all that is claimed for it. The Manufacturers,

ALLISON BROS., of Middletown, Conn., have several cart-loads of letters and postal cards from those who have used it, thanking and blessing them for the WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

Of course, "Death on Dirt" is imitated; imitated by those who never knew anything about soap until they saw this great housekeeper's magician and realized what a blessing it is and what a demand there would be for it. Allison Bros. have long been known as making nothing but soap of the finest quality, greatest durability, and general excellence of its washing qualities.

They have often talked about the old sloppy way of washing, and wondered what could be used in the manufacture of soap that would banish from the house the steam, suds, and slops always present on washing days. After long and expensive experiments they discovered "Death on Dirt," and all they ask is a trial and comparison of it with any other soap or compound making similar claims, wherever it has once been used there is nothing that will take its place, and every thoughtful, economical housekeeper who tries it, wonders how she ever got along without it.

THE WASH-BOILER NOT TO BE USED AT ALL.

A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE. GET IT OF YOUR GROCER; OR,

If you will send 10 cents for a regular 10-cent cake, the manufacturers will forward it by mail, to do that, it will cost them 12 cents to postage—saving nothing of the neat box in pack it in. If it were not really a SOAP WONDER, this would not be any good, but the Proprietors KNOW that, wherever tried, it is hailed as an emancipator from all the ills of wash-day; and that if you once give it a fair test—using it strictly according to directions—you will never after use any other Soap.

ALLISON BROS., Sole Manufacturers, Middletown, Connecticut.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS will soon publish:

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN,

FIFTEENTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

WITH TWO STEEL-PLATE PORTRAITS.

2 Volumes, 8vo, about 640 pages each, Cloth, $6.00.

Harper & Brothers have in press and announce for publication a biography of James Buchanan, by George Ticknor Curtis. That such a biography will be of the highest interest and value it is not necessary to say. The true history of Mr. Buchanan's administration has, up to the present time, been a profound secret; for, while an immense deal has been written about it, no writer has had any documentary authority for his estimate of the motives, intentions, and prevailing counsels of the president and cabinet in the trying times which preceded the war. From the later history of such men as Cass, Dix, Stanton, Holt, and others, it has been generally regarded as settled that Mr. Buchanan was alone responsible for the course of his administration. But the history of that administration hitherto published has been in large part conjectural and imaginary. It is of the highest importance that that history should be known. The time has long passed when from political feeling any one could desire to suppress the truth, and now all men will be glad to take a dispassionate view of the men and the events of twenty-three years ago at Washington. Mr. Buchanan was in the habit of making brief and clear memoranda of daily conversations, interviews, and occurrences. He preserved all important correspondence. The material for his biography is thus ample, and the character of the book cannot but be of the most absorbing interest. Its revelations will undoubtedly surprise all who have accepted as true the supposed histories which have been written in the excitement of strong partisan feeling; and perhaps not the least startling portions will be in the letters of eminent men who have been credited with dissent from the policy of an administration, which policy they in fact guided and approved. In any event, the biography of James Buchanan covers the most important period of our history since the revolution; and knowing as we do, the material which he left to be used at the proper time, we have no doubt that Mr. Curtis has made such use of it that the publication will throw clearer light on history than any or all of the books which have attempted to show how the United States was led into the war of 1861.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

George Ticknor Curtis announces that his long-promised life of the late President Buchanan is finished, and will soon be issued. * * * In it he promises to make plain many things concerning the early days of the war, and to correct much badly-written history. The revelations made by Judge Black from time to time since the close of the war have done much to correct false impressions, and the sentiment toward the ex-president who occupied a position so difficult has been much modified. Entirely apart, however, from the interest surrounding the closing days of his administration, there was much in the life of James Buchanan demanding strong historical and biographic treatment; and Mr. Curtis's book will be awaited with interest.—The Philadelphia Times.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Sheet Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c. Sold by Agents throughout the United States and Canada. Send for Circulars, Price Lists, &c. H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

The NEW DEPARTURE

Makes Education free and Self-Instruction easy. Learn to write, spell, and punctuate; also, English Grammar at the same time by a new and natural system. Mere learned in a day than in a month by the old method. Sent by mail on receipt of $1. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Refer at sight. E. R. FELTON & CO. 25 BOND ST., NEW YORK.

TEACHERS supplied with positions to all grades of Educational work. Send stamp for circular. Brewster Teachers' Agency, Times Bldg., Chicago.

MELLIN'S FOOD

For Infants and Invalids.

THE ONLY PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR MOTHERS' MILK. The most nourishing diet for invalids and nursing mothers. Commended by all physicians. Sold by all druggists. Keeps in all climates. Pamphlet free. Send for the pamphlet. T. METCALF & CO., 42 Central Wharf, Boston, Mass.

WANTED 8 or 10 BOOK AGENTS to solicit subscribers for a valuable and interesting work. AGENTS to hire at 3 dollars per day and expenses, or a liberal commission. NEW WORK, of extraordinary merit and great popularity. Prospectus sent with full particulars to BUYERS. Address at once, stating what experience you have had, and what territory you want. MUTUAL BOOK CO., 239 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Me.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. H. CHOU & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1600 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $11; Half Turkey Morocco, $13.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,

113 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

A WHOLESOME CURATIVE.

NEEDED IN

Every Family.

AN ELEGANT AND REFRESHING FRUIT LOZENGE for Constipation, Biliousness, Sour Stomach, Indigestion, &c.

TROPIC FRUIT LAXATIVE

SUPERIOR TO PILLS and all other preparations for regulating the system. THE LOZENGE IS ALL THE RAGE. THE LITTLE DARLINGS. Ladies and children like it.

Price 25 cents. Large boxes, 50 cents.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1863, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. We warrant best and Agents wanted. L. JONES & CO., NASSAU, N. Y.

CARDS New Styles Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards (most exactly like cut), name and address neatly printed on, 10c., or present if with each order. CLINTON BROS. & CO., Clintonville, Conn.

50 Large Chromo, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Yolande. By WILLIAM BLACK. Illustrated. 20 cents. Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, just ready.

Arden. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON. 20 cents.

For the Major. By CHARLOTTE FISKE BOVEE. Cloth, $1 00.

Mr Scarborough's Family. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By FRANK BARRETT. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE. 20 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. NORRIS. 20 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. GASKELL. 20 cents.

Grey Points. Memoirs of Margaret de Bonneval, Viscountess of Bellaise. By CHARLOTTE M. [illegible]. 20 cents.

The Story of Medicus. By PAUL MAYNE. 10 cents.

The Hands of Justice. By F. W. ROBINSON. 20 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Three Cents for postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

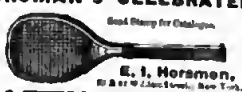
UNCLE SAM TO BRITANNIA.

"This is getting a trifle monotonous, madam. We have had enough of these infants here. Can't you leave some of them next door?"

COMMON-SENSE COMPRESSED.

IT IS DIFFICULT TO GIVE IN A DOZEN LINES THE REASONS WHY TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT SHOULD BE PREFERRED AS A CORRECTIVE AND ALTERATIVE TO EVERY OTHER MEDICINE IN USE. FIRSTLY, IT ALLAYS FEVER; SECONDLY, IT CLEANSES THE BOWELS WITHOUT VIOLENCE OR PAIN; THIRDLY, IT TONES THE STOMACH; FOURTHLY, IT REGULATES THE FLOW OF BILE; FIFTHLY, IT PROMOTES HEALTHY PERSPIRATION; SIXTHLY, IT REJUVENATES THE SYSTEM FROM UNWHOLESOME HUMORS; SEVENTHLY, IT TRANQUILLIZES THE NERVES; EIGHTHLY, IT ACTS UPON THE BLOOD AS A DEPURENT; AND LASTLY, IT FORMS ONE OF THE MOST DELICIOUS COOLING DRAUGHTS THAT EVER PASSED DOWN THE THROAT OF AN INVALID. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED



Send Stamp for Catalogue.

E. I. Horsman,
80 & 82 William Street, New York.

LAWN TENNIS.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT SHORT BAND COLLARS
AND BEAD EDGE CUFFS
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

All Seaside, Lake, and Mountain Retreats.—Just out. A Work illustrations and maps. Describes the resorts and how to reach and boarding houses. Price 50c., postpaid. Address as St mons Resort Directory Bureau & Co., Pulte 5 Murray St., N. Y., or Elevated Railway.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Pint Empty Capsules. All Druggists

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure," says A. M. Noble, St. Louis, Mo., "made my scaly skin soft as a lady's."

LOW, SON, & HAYDEN'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED HANDLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL

PINS BEARING THE

THE PLUME & ATWOOD
WATERBURY, CONN.

THE NEW

SWEET BOUQUET

Delicate, Mild, and Fragrant. A Delight for Connoisseurs.

S. JACOBI & CO., Manufacturers, Richmond, Va.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

Very STRONG, Perfectly SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Long Range or for beautiful, Manipulation more Rapid Shooting more accurate, Model than of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

I STAND AT THE HEAD!

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

738 & 741 BROADWAY.

PAVARA PILLS.

These Pills are the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. No pain, nausea, or purging. New and positive remedy for chills and fever. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents.

C. N. CRITTENTON, General Agent, 115 Fulton Street, New York City.

BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Heat, &c., from any building, no matter how tall or how crowded. Can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Mines, Vessels, Lunatic Asylums, &c. Send for circular or plans. Also, for a full line of reasons for building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet and showing all cleavages. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to

BOWERS & MOORE, 45 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

From Pennsylvania and the Southern States, to

EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 27 North 6th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, malaria, and all impurities of the blood. Avoid crude, harsh waters, native and foreign. Such waters are positive irritants and impair the digestive organs and kidneys. None genuine or draught

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID.

Made of the finest Chemicals known. Combines three important qualities: Fluidity, Color, and Durability. HINDS, BLACKMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 753 Broadway, New York.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A GOLD PEN and HOLDER, writing ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.

WARNE, TODD, & BYRD.

Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.

Send for Price-List.

OUR GOODS ARE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

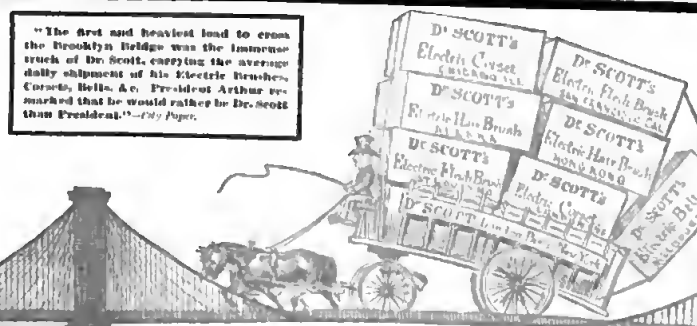
JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills are infallible for every nervous complaint, also neuralgia.

"The first and heaviest load to cross the Brooklyn Bridge was the immense truck of Dr. Scott, carrying the average daily shipment of his Electric Brushes, Corsets, Belts, &c. President Arthur remarked that he would rather be Dr. Scott than President."—City Paper.



PURE BRISTLES,

NOT WIRE.

HEADWEAR FOR

THE BRIDGE

is made of Wire [illegible] people in America are laboring under the delusion that Dr. Scott's Electric Brushes are made of Wire. They are not so. Never have been. but always of Pure Bristles. Any Brushes have been sold through Dr. Scott's Agents as Wire Brushes have been, and still continue to be, sold by persons in all parts of the world with them during the past three years. [illegible] that they were using Dr. Scott's only Electric [illegible] Society are unable to [illegible] All should understand that Dr. Scott's Brushes, and that the use of Wire Brushes [illegible] and hair.

Each [illegible] Brush has the same elegant design peculiar to our well-known [illegible] and contains the same electro-magnetic power—the difference being only in the size. Each [illegible] over-patent designs, by which its power can always be [illegible]

THEY WILL POSITIVELY

CURE Nervous Headache in 1 minute!! Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!! Neuralgia in 5 minutes!! Falling Hair and Baldness!! Dandruff and Diseases of the Scalp!!

Promptly Arrest Premature Grayness!! Make the Hair Grow Long and Glossy!! Rarely fail to produce a rapid growth of hair on bald heads, where the glands and follicles are not totally destroyed.

NEW PRICES!

$1, $1.50, $2, $2.50, $3

Owing to the unprecedented success attending the introduction of our renowned

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC BRUSHES

at $1, and a response to every person to every [illegible] possessing the same therapeutic quality as above pictured, a full line of these beautiful and invaluable remedies, at the following prices, viz.: $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, $2 50, and $3 00.

EITHER KIND SENT, POSTPAID, ON TRIAL.

[illegible] Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets [illegible] Dr. Scott's Flesh Brush, $3 00; Electric Corsets [illegible] Dr. Scott's Incorruptible Adjustable Belt, [illegible] $5 00.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1384.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY
$4 00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

A SWELTERING NIGHT IN NEW YORK—TENEMENT-HOUSE SUFFERERS.—Drawn by W. A. Rogers.—[See Page 410.]

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1883

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBLET'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "*ART COMPETITION, HARPER'S MAGAZINE, Franklin Square, New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as our page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883, and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBLET have been published. That published in 1857 is the one to the illustrations of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

A HURRAH CAMPAIGN

IT is more and more evident that the Democrats will not venture to raise the cry of free trade next year, and that the more sagacious Democratic leaders are resolved to try a hurrah HARRISON campaign, and to rely upon a cry of "corruption" and "turn 'em out." They will lack, however, the immense advantage which the hurrah campaign of 1840 derived from the business panic and prostration of 1837. The situation in 1840 was precisely that in which change for the sake of change is most attractive. But in 1884 if the country is busy and prosperous, change for its own sake will be a less seductive cry. But, on the other hand, whenever parties cease to represent great policies, and rely upon tradition and association, party ties are relaxed, and the voting becomes more uncertain. To vote against the party is not then left to involve such serious consequences. In 1864 and 1868, and even in 1872, a Democratic restoration portended a return of old and familiar dangers. But in 1884 the distrust will be more general, and it will be less effective just in the degree that Democratic success does not mean a pronounced policy, and that Republican shortcomings are more vigorously emphasized. Republicans, therefore, can not rely safely upon this distrust. It is very probable that the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives next winter will forget the wise advice of the politician which we quoted last week, to say nothing and do nothing, and it will probably say and do altogether too much for its own advantage. But it is not good generalship to risk the campaign upon the possible or even probable blunders of the enemy.

There is but one way in which the evident plan of the Democratic party can be successfully met, and that way is, not to rely upon distrust of that party, but to cultivate trust in the Republican party. The Democratic plan is substantially to declare that however tainted it may have been with treason and treachery to equal rights in the past, however honeycombed with corruption, however dependent upon ignorance and the support of the most dangerous classes, however dangerously wrong upon every great issue since the war, however cowardly in shirking all actual present questions, and however plainly a mere desperate conspiracy to obtain control of the government for the sake of plunder the Democratic party may now be, its success involving a complete overthrow of reform, it is still more trustworthy than the Republican party, which is smirched with the Whiskey Ring swindles, and the Star Route swindles, and the BELKNAP swindles, and the salary grab, and the third-term plot, and a myriad other similar jobs and thefts and crimes. The argument will be that no reform is possible until such a party is turned out, and that it can be turned out only by putting in the Democratic party. That such a plan is shrewd and promising is undeniable. It is equally undeniable that it can be successfully countered in one way only, and that is, not by saying that the Republican party saved the Union and emancipated the slaves, but by proving that the Republican party, although, like every party which is long in power, it has developed abuses has punished its own rascals and reformed its own offenses.

This spirit and purpose were plainly shown in the nominations at Cincinnati in 1876, following the Whiskey Ring, salary grab, and BELKNAP revelations, and by the nomination at Chicago in 1880, which suppressed the third-term plot. It was shown by the vigor and resolution with which the Star Route swindles were attacked by the GARFIELD administration, which undoubtedly represented the honest and controlling Republican sentiment of the country, and by the refusal of the same administration to bow to the insolent "boss" supremacy which was fast ruining the party. In deference to the same emphatic Republican opinion the Legislature of New York refused to re-elect Senators who especially represented Republican abuses, and who challenged a party verdict from their own friends and creatures, and were ignominiously banished from public life. The River and Harbor Bill of last summer was carried against the veto of a Republican President and the virtually unanimous condemnation of the Republican press, by a Congress which misrepresented Republican sentiment, as was shown by the general Republican refusal to renominate or re-elect the offenders. Yet the same Congress bowed to the emphatic expression of Republican opinion in the country by the passage of the civil service reform bill, and by the revision of the tariff to reduce the superfluous revenue. The tremendous rebuke of last year's election was a Republican rebuke to those who traded upon the party name, and showed a spirit and resolution of which there is no trace whatever in the Democratic party. These are but illustrations of a regenerating force in the Republican party which has shown itself able and willing to deal with Republican offenses, and to promote the progressive welfare of the country. If this force shall continue to show its power in executive action and in control of the party, the party will retain the confidence of the country. If, on the other hand, the malign influences which have caused the abuses should dominate the party, the party would be defeated. The Democratic cry will be that reform is possible only by a clean sweep of Republican administration. But the crucial practical question for the voter will be whether a party which has shown the disposition and the power to correct itself shall be displaced by a party whose corrupt element is quite as powerful, which has no policy, principle, or purpose, and which has shown neither wish nor ability to reform itself.

THE COPYRIGHT TREATY.

THE formation of a new club to procure the passage of a comprehensive copyright law shows that interest in the subject is not extinct, although little has been recently done in pushing the treaty which has been so long under consideration. We do not know whether the draft of a law has been prepared, nor the reasons which persuade the club that a law is a more practicable and promising method of securing the result declared than a treaty. Both plans must encounter the same objection, the objection which has baffled all previous efforts of the kind, and that objection is the apprehension that an international copyright would enhance the price of books. The moral view of the question, that refusal of copyright to an author is mere robbery, however essentially just, has never been a popular view. Copyright clubs have been composed of authors. The treaties and the laws to secure international copyright have been sustained mainly by authors. The public has taken little interest in the debate; and even the earnest appeals of DICKENS forty years ago fell unheeded and were soon abandoned, although the failure undoubtedly embittered his feeling toward a country which lavished upon him the utmost enthusiasm of personal regard, and yet denied him what he felt to be his rights.

This public indifference is due to two causes—the feeling that absolute and perpetual copyright extending to every copy of a work ever issued would be opposed to the general welfare, and the feeling that an author is adequately paid by protection in his own country. The soundness of these propositions we do not now discuss. But the feeling undoubtedly exists, and the proof is the fact that copyright laws whether limited, as in this country, to authors who are citizens, or extended, as in England, to any author who first publishes in the country, protect the author for a limited term only, and protect him for that term not because of his right, but because of the public advantage. Neither the law of England nor that of this country acknowledges the author's right of property in his work to be the same as his right of property in his hat or his estate. It is solely to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, and not for the protection of a private right of property, that Congress is authorized by the Constitution to secure to authors for limited terms the exclusive right to their works. To rest the endeavor to procure changes in any existing copyright law either by legislation or treaty upon an assertion of the indefeasible right of the author in every copy of his work issued anywhere and at any time is to open a very interesting and important debate, but it is to postpone indefinitely any practical relief.

But if the abstract question of right is to be waived, and a modification of the copyright law is to be sought with careful regard to the actual situation, the first obvious step to be taken is to secure the co-operation of all interests concerned. These are three—the author, the publisher, and the reader. Two of these interests have been hitherto passive, if not hostile to any extension of the copyright. But the proposed treaty contemplates a representation of all the interests, and an arrangement which shall be acceptable to all. The situation is therefore more promising than ever before. The reasons which have produced a change of feeling are not germane to the discussion, so long as the proposed arrangement is just in itself and honestly supported. The great body of English and American authors and of American publishers, without opening the question of property right, and accepting the received basis of the copyright laws, have agreed upon a general scheme by which a common protection will be secured to the authors of both countries upon terms which are certainly most reasonable. This scheme, in the form of a treaty, is still pending, and until it is definitely abandoned, which is not yet the case, it is very much more promising than any plan which has been hitherto proposed. Those who are opposed to insist that it is a compromise and not a proper assertion of the absolute right of the author should remember that it would no more prejudice that right and its assertion than the acceptance of the existing legal copyright by an author prejudices his right. It involves no concession of principle, and may be supported with perfect propriety by those who hold that SHAKESPEARE'S heirs ought now to be receiving a royalty upon every copy of Shakespeare sold, or those who hold that the present limited enjoyment of copyright should apply to foreigners as well as to American citizens.

THE REPUBLICAN REORGANIZATION.

THE plan of Republican reorganization in the city of New York has been adopted by the Central Committee with one important change. The plan as originally published provided for a general enrollment and the disbanding of the "associations" in September, so that the party might be reorganized before the elections to the State Convention of this year, which will select the State Committee to direct the Presidential campaign of next year. Upon the plea, however, that a September enrollment would not be complete, the time was changed to November after the election. But it is provided that every Republican who is entitled to be enrolled may vote at the primaries for the Convention, and additional inspectors, mainly from the anti-machine wing, were selected to act at the elections with the present inspectors.

This scheme leaves the associations unchanged until after the elections of this autumn, and their organized and experienced force is not unlikely to prevail against the scattered energy of the Republicans who have hitherto not been permitted to vote. The disfranchised Republicans will hardly show at once the vigor and power which it is to be hoped that they will ultimately display. If the old machine leaders succeed in controlling the delegations from the city and through them the Convention and the new State Committee, it will be because raw levies and volunteers and minute-men are not a match for the regulars.

The postponement of enrollment is unfortunate, but it can be plausibly defended. The trouble is that if, after the fine scheming for reorganization and the free voting at the Convention primaries, it should turn out that nothing is changed, and that the old machine is still in control, there would be a dangerous chill of Republican enthusiasm. It would have been wiser to carry out the plan as already published, because the old machine is under such a cloud that any modification of the scheme in the apparent interest of the machine arouses profound suspicion.

PROFESSORS AND STUDENTS.

IN these fervid days of the College Commencement season it is startling to hear from some old graduates that the years spent at college are often useless to the student, because, however earnest and diligent he may be, he receives from the faculty no encouragement to study. It is not an accusation brought against any particular college. The mischief is supposed to arise from the perfunctory and formal way in which the college professor discharges his duty. He is generally paid, according to this view, a small salary to teach a class of young persons who have no especial interest in their lessons, and whose real interests are in society and athletic sports. The aim of the teachers is to attend to a mechanical task with the least trouble, and of the pupils to secure just the number of marks which will save them from being dropped.

That there is some truth in the complaint is probable, but the generalization is altogether too sweeping. We know many instances in which it is unfounded—instances of young men with a taste and faculty for special study which have been encouraged to the utmost and wisely guided by the teacher, to the great benefit of the student and the advantage of the public. Wherever the charge is true it is most unfortunate. Yet the corrective of the situation lies with the student, for if a teacher be indifferent or sluggish, nothing so certainly and effectively rouses and quickens him as an apt and eager pupil. If there be many such pupils in any college, and they fail to inspire the teacher, his unfitness for his post will necessarily soon appear. Half a dozen zealous and intelligent pupils in any class, who are determined "to know, you know," will soon demonstrate the ability or the temper of a teacher, and there could be no more refreshing novelty in college experience than the presentation of a professor to the trustees by a body of earnest students as inefficient in teaching and obstructive to study.

No such instance is known to us, and we suspect that the older graduates who enter the complaint, if they could recall accurately the facts of their experience, would find that they had not succeeded in persuading the professor that they were so resolutely bent upon knowledge as to require him to bestir himself. On the other hand, it is unquestionable that a teacher who assumes the interest of his class in their studies, and shows his own interest in them, stimulates many a youth who might otherwise pass hitherto through the prescribed routine. The duty and the pleasure and the advantage are reciprocal. We know a professor of this kind in one of the great universities, who is consequently more beloved and popular than any other. He is singled out at class-day for a special round of cheers, while the rest of the faculty are "lamped," and a friend once said to him, as the hearty hurrah died away, "If I were you I should be prouder of that cheer than of the highest honor of the university." All rights, as Dr. LIEBER, of Columbia, used to say, have their duties. It is the right of the professor to expect attention and docility, and the right of the student to expect intelligent instruction. And it is the duty of both professor and pupil to make that instruction as thorough and effective as possible.

THE OHIO DEMOCRATS.

THE Democratic nomination of Mr. GEORGE HOADLY as Governor of Ohio is very shrewd, and implies the defeat of the reactionary faction, which had selected General WARD. Mr. HOADLY is an old Free-soil Democrat, and a Republican with the peculiar feeling toward his late party that usually follows a change of party association when party principles remain unchanged. He is a man of high character and undoubted ability, whose nomination is in itself a kind of new departure, and whose election by a large majority would make him the Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

The platform begins with a complete disavowal of the historic Democratic position. The Democratic party which was thrust from power in 1860 was an avowed organization for the palliation and extension of human slavery. It was a party radically false to the fundamental American principle of equality and personal liberty. The war was begun by Democratic leaders because a party founded upon that principle had obtained control of the government. The Ohio Democracy in the midst of the contest nominated for Governor VALLANDIGHAM, who really represented its view of the war. The same Democracy now begins its declaration by professing its historical respect for personal liberty! and nominates as old Republican. Its protestations in regard to the tariff are unmanful and deceptive to the last degree. It is a free trade Democracy, but it does not dare to say so, and demands a revenue tariff which shall encourage production interests at home, and afford just compensation to labor. That is a phraseology carefully chosen to satisfy protectionists. It is an illustration of the insincerity which arouses the deep distrust of the country.

Nevertheless the action of the Ohio Democrats strongly emphasizes what we say elsewhere that the path to Republican victory lies in showing that punishment of wrong-doers, honesty and efficiency and reform in the public service, economical administration, wise tariff legislation, and the moulding of the government by the most intelligent and patriotic national sentiment, are more probable under Republican than under Democratic administration. If the election of 1884 is to turn both upon performance and probability, if the parties are to be tried, not as representatives of policies, but by their traditions, their associations, their composition, their measures, and their power of self-correction, the Republicans need not fear the result of the contest. It is from this point of view that the conduct of the Executive becomes of the highest importance to the party.

THE GARBAGE BLOCKADE.

WITHIN six months nine ocean steamers of the largest class have grounded in entering or upon leaving the bay of New York, and every day the passenger crossing the bay may see garbage fleets proceeding to increase the obstructions and to ruin the harbor. It would be very comical, if it were not so serious, that there is not wit or skill enough in New York to dispose of the dirt of the city. In the suburbs the insoluble problem is to get rid of old fruit and vegetable cans and other rubbish; and one village father in the neighborhood complained that if cost his village more than a thousand dollars a year to collect the refuse, for which all the genius of the village could not provide a satisfactory dumping-ground.

But filling up the ocean channels of the chief sea-port upon the American continent is a very serious matter. If any one will look at a chart of the bay and the sea entrance he will see that, easy as it should seem from the simple outline for a vessel to go and come, it is really difficult. The bar between Sandy Hook and Coney Island has but two or three passages, and in the most direct of these a wreck has been lying for some months, and in another the City of Rome lately stuck fast.

It would inspire very much more respect for the commonsense of the authorities of the passenger across the bay should most steamers carrying engineers to clear the channels instead of rubbish scows hastening to obstruct them. Were "G. W. M." still among us, how he would thunder in the Evening Post at the garbage blockade, and the ruin of a noble harbor!

CHARLES T. BROOKS.

THE great multitude that reverently attended the funeral of CHARLES T. BROOKS, at Newport, and the warm and tender words of eulogy from his friend and successor, Mr. WENDTE, the pastor of the Channing Memorial Church, with all the tributes from noted men, showed the universal affection and respect that were felt for one of the purest, gentlest, and most apostolic of men. It is forty-seven years since Dr. CHANNING preached the famous dedication sermon of the church in which Mr. BROOKS so long ministered, and the beautiful spirit of CHANNING abode with the young minister, and remained with him until he was young no longer, and to the end.

With the utmost liberality and generosity of mind, and in the fullest sympathy with all human movements of reform, Mr. BROOKS was conspicuously identified with none of them, but remained always a scholar preaching the Gospel. His fitness for the work was very decided, and his literary accomplishments, especially in German, were very great. His translations of some of the much-to-be-known poets are unsurpassed for fidelity and flowing grace, and his works of this kind are extensive. As a preacher, it was natural to dwell upon the love rather than upon the fear of God that he dwelt, and a sweet benignity of aspect made the utterance of the service an angelic hour.

Some years since a serious affection of the eyes compelled Mr. BROOKS to resign his pastoral charge, and to seek absolute rest. After a visit to Europe he returned to Newport, where he was one of the most familiar figures in the place, his generous mien and simple manners revealing, in the gay wharf of a luxurious and wealthy society, the supreme beauty of the spiritual life. At seventy he was still young of heart, as it will be now long and ever against from the world in the memories of all who loved him.

TWELVE AMERICANS.

THE Harpers have just published in a neat volume, Twelve Americans: Their Lives and Times, by HOWARD PARTON, a series of biographical sketches of distinguished men, some of whom are living. The list ranges in variety of various pursuits, and of all opinions and all sections of the country. It includes HORATIO SEYMOUR and CHARLES DICKENS, JOSEPH JEFFERSON and PETER COOPER, CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, HANNIBAL HAMLIN, ROBERT H. STODDARD, JOHN HAY and WILLIAM ALLEN, JAMES B. WASHBURN and ADLAI E. STEVENSON, all of whom there are portraits.

Mr. PARTON is a vivid, graphic, and entertaining biographer, familiar, and in this gallery of pictures he is at his best. His warm sympathy, his gay humor, and his keenly appreciative nature not only relieve the subject of reserve, and his subjects have freely given him a confidence which he has not betrayed. The group of life-work hardly allows much chance for that "chat" and intimate humor in which he excels, and in which he was made his own victim at the dinner of the Lotos Club, but it is a most interesting and instructive book for "summer reading."

THE NEW WINDSOR CENTENNIAL.

THE closing week of centennial celebrations of Revolutionary events properly takes place upon the Hudson, and one of the most interesting commemorations was that of New Windsor, just above the Highlands of West Point, on the 23d of June. It was at New Windsor that the army was continued for the last time, and on the 23d of June, 1783, the last remnant of the army broke its camp, and was disbanded.

The event, the scene, and the season happily conspired to render a memorable day. There is no more interesting historic spot on the country. On one hand is West Point with all its famous traditions, and on the other Newburgh with the "head-quarters." Opposite are the noble hills, the Fishkill Beacons, and at their foot the village of Fishkill, where the Provincial Legislature sat, while on a bluff upon the bay a little to the north is the modest VERPLANCK cottage, the head-quarters of STEUBEN, in which the Society of the Cincinnati was formed. Every point is a patriotic inspiration.

The people of New Windsor very naturally hold that the birth place of GEORGE CLINTON and the site of the last encampment and final disbandment deserved a distinct commemoration, and they declined to merge their rightful memorial day in that at Newburgh next October. The old "Temple" in which religious services were held is gone. But that story and all the rich tradition of the place were gleamingly told by distinguished orators. New Windsor has never seen such a day, which has an emphasized and illustrated no history that hereafter the smallest village will be pointed out as one of the famous Revolutionary points upon the famous river of the Revolution.

PERSONAL.

THE REV. DR. MCLEAN, whom we announced several months ago as a probable successor to Dr. MCCOSH, in the event of the acceptance of that scholar's resignation of the presidency at Princeton, has been appointed to relieve President MCCOSH of some of his official duties, the trustees of the college declining to allow its present head to retire. Dr. MCLEAN, who for some years has filled the chair of English literature, and was widely known as the pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in New York city, possesses, in addition to sound scholarship, the organizing faculty and the admiration of his pupils. He has, besides, the rare and fine demeanor which college students are always quick to appreciate, and which does much to describe when they say of his possessor that he is a gentleman.

—Captain THOMAS S. CRANE, of the Havana steam-ship Saratoga, celebrates this week the completion of his hundredth voyage in the service of his present employers, Messrs. JAMES E. WARD & CO. The captain is a veteran in steamship navigation. Before entering the service of the Messrs. Ward he had commanded steamships in other lines running to Havana, and in his whole career, although he has gone through many dangers, he has never lost a ship or met with a serious disaster.

—MR. ISAAC J. OTTERSON, who for many years has been a prominent figure in the ranks of New York journalism, has recently taken editorial charge of the True Citizen (New York) Telegram.

—MR. CARL HOLM, the distinguished Norwegian traveller, has received double honors this year, the Geographical Society of Lisbon awarding him their gold medal, and the Emperor of Austria conferring the high distinction of Knight Commander of the Order of Franz-Josef.

—The method of teaching Chinamen in the Protestant Sunday-schools of this city requires a teacher for every pupil. Each pupil, no matter how long he has been an adult he is spoken of as a boy, and the rule is strictly observed as here. After learning the English alphabet and the colors, John is set to reading the New Testament in English—a book which pleases him, and of which he does not tire. With few exceptions the Sunday-school Chinamen in New York are the people's special hobbies. One of the entertainments by the Twenty-first Street Reformed Presbyterian Church in a Chinese opera made quite a hit here many men in the audience. His celebrated a standard—and in

If a girl has a musical voice and wishes to support herself, she must train for the concert stage. She can make money by singing in a church choir, but not enough to enable her to earn by engagements to appear at private concerts. And for this purpose it is necessary that her training should extend for thousand dollars upon training her vocal organs to that. There are masters in New York who will undertake to make her singing in opera and all branches of the profession, and, of course, respectable parents will not permit their daughters among women who earn their living by singing in concert and theatre, but to bring their voices to a certain point of perfection requires a separate house, but also for the individual to possess a desire not expect to make their living by singing in opera.

There will be, Chief Mr. THOMAS W. CRANE'S supreme residence at Bryn Mawr on the Pennsylvania Railroad, about half an hour's ride from Philadelphia, will appreciate the extent of that gentleman's generosity in having a plank walk from the house to the railroad station for the convenience of neighbors who desire to see the place and to speak their selves with the entrance and a small carriage road which it affords. Probably there is not in the United States a more neatly perfect specimen of a Queen Anne villa. It is built of brick, is finished throughout in hard wood, has a tile roof, and is surrounded by a wide piazza on all sides. But the interior is charming, not because of the rare and costly decorations, but because of the unity of color and the general effects. It is needless to tell that the original of such a house is in Europe, Mr. CRANE does not import from it.

—MR. J. PIERPONT MORGAN is known to his personal friends not only as the owner of a rich purse, but also as a connoisseur, a man who has an object of curiosities, an excellent eye for the beautiful in form and color, a taste, and contemplating the expenditure of cash with but a single regret, namely, that the richest man in the United States should have only pennies in comparison with the wealth at his side and willing unstintedly to provide amusement for them. We are in return pleased but not surprised to learn that he has just given to the Fire Department, the Police and the Board Arms of the Republic thirty-five thousand dollars' worth of burial lots in the Bridgeport cemetery.

The moment it is noised abroad that an old master has been hung in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, scores of letters are received by the director from every quarter of the land urging him to turn out the old masters—and better them his old master. The article in that institution of Raphael's celebrated "Madonna of the Candelabras" now the forerunner of at least a hundred long-range epistles, accompanied by photographs and documents, from as many owners of alleged works by that painter. A well known art dealer said the other day that he was gradually going crazy because of the old masters. Everybody who owned one wanted him to get VANDERBILT, BARNUM, or MRS. A. T. STEWART to buy it, and whenever an old master was lost at a fire, he was sure to be called on to testify to its great worth.

—CHARLES BECKER, the "negro minstrel," who lately died of Bright's disease of the kidneys, leaves in the memories of a large company of Americans a gentle and affectionate regret. Not gifted himself with the greatest of mirth-giving gifts, he yet deserved the praise of having exerted faithfully and fully the benign influence of a mouth that no "negro minstrel" could gaze upon without envy. His jokes, though rude, were not coarse, in the coarsest sense of the word, and he has passed into silence with a quicker record that has made thousands of his fellow-creatures happy, and not one of them sad.

—Before the days of his eminent rascality, the late WILLIAM M. TWEED, then foreman of "Big Six" Fire Engine Company, was in danger of being expelled from the Fire Department. While running to a fire his company was about to be passed by Hose Company No. 30, who were drawing their carriage along the sidewalk, but TWEED, in order that "Big Six" might not be left in the rear, threw barrels, boxes, and various missiles in front of the hose-carriage, and so impeded its progress as to gain for his own company the victory in speed. For this offense he was reported to the Common Council, and was about to be expelled. In great dismay he went to the office of a brother foreman, who was also an influential business man, and implored him to interfere. "It will ruin my character," he exclaimed, with intense earnestness, "to be expelled from the Fire Department. I should never survive it." The gentleman appealed to went down and met the committee of the Common Council who had the matter in charge, and succeeded in saving TWEED. It should be said in justice to TWEED that when he came to power he did not fail to remember the kindness of his friend, although the latter disclaimed to avail himself of any benefit that was at the disposal of the great Thief" gratitude.

THE HON. GEORGE HOADLY, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF OHIO.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY LANGE.

JUDGE HOADLY.

GEORGE HOADLY, the Democratic nominee for Governor in Ohio, was born in New Haven, Connecticut, July 31, 1826. He received his elementary education in Cleveland, Ohio, whither the family had removed in 1830. At the age of fourteen he was sent to Western Reserve College, at Hudson, Ohio, and graduated four years later. Having spent a year at the Harvard Law School, he entered the law office of CHASE & BALL in Cincinnati, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. Here he attracted the notice and secured the friendship of SALMON P. CHASE, and was in 1849 admitted as junior partner to the firm (CHASE, BALL, & HOADLY). The retirement of Mr CHASE from professional duty, consequent upon his election to the United States Senate, led to Mr HOADLY's appearing in important cases early in his career, and no doubt contributed to his election by the Legislature in 1851 to the office of Judge of the Superior Court of Cincinnati for the remainder of the term to which that court had been limited by the Constitution.

In 1853 he became City Solicitor of Cincinnati, and in 1859 was elected to the bench of the new Superior Court.

In 1856 he was offered by Governor CHASE, and again by Governor TOD in 1862, a seat upon the Supreme Bench of Ohio, but declined both appointments.

Having been elected without opposition to the Constitutional Convention of 1873-4, he was made chairman of the Committee on Municipal Corporations. During the session he devoted himself principally to devising methods to check the increase of public burdens.

Originally a Democrat, and of a Democratic family, he took issue with his party on the question of slavery, and became attached to the Republican party, remaining a supporter of it until the end of GRANT's first term. But in 1876, with many other Liberal Republicans, who believed that the necessary reforms in the government would be more surely secured by the election of TILDEN and HENDRICKS than their opponents, he joined the Democratic ranks. At the invitation of the Democratic committee he appeared before the Electoral Commission as counsel for the Democratic electors of Florida and Oregon.

In the spring of 1882 he tried, as leading counsel for the assignee and creditors of Archbishop PURCELL, the great case, not yet decided, involving the legal status of Catholic Church property. The preparation for this case, and his argument, which lasted three days, he regards as the most important intellectual effort of his life.

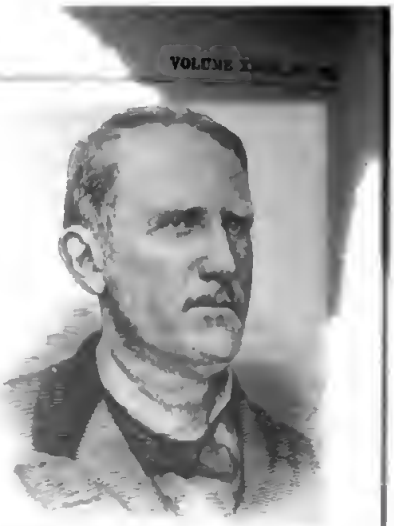
On his father's side Judge HOADLY is descended from a long line of New England farmers, whose sturdy qualities gained for themselves much honor. His grandfather served as a captain in the Revolution, and was afterward elected twenty-six times to the Connecticut Legislature. On his mother's side he belongs to a most distinguished family. He is a nephew of Dr WOOLSEY and grand-nephew of Dr DWIGHT (both ex-presidents of Yale College), a great great grandson of JONATHAN EDWARDS, an own cousin to THEODORE WINTHROP and SARAH C. WOOLSEY, the latter being known in the literary world as SUSAN COOLIDGE.

BISHOP COLENSO.

THE Right Rev. JOHN WILLIAM COLENSO, D.D., Bishop of Natal, who died recently at the scene of his long and active labors, is chiefly known by the controversy which arose on the publication of his work on The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua. But aside from his views regarding the authenticity of these books, which were directly at variance with those held by orthodox Christians, Bishop COLENSO must be acknowledged to have led a very useful life among the natives of his African home. He established schools among them, instructed them in the arts and practices of civilized life, and sought to defend them against the unjust aggressions of the colonists.

He was born at St. Austell in 1814, and graduated with honors in 1836 from St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he afterward became a Fellow. Two years later he was made Mathematical Master at Harrow, holding that post until 1842. During that time he wrote and compiled his books on arithmetic and algebra, which became quite famous. In 1846 he was appointed Rector of Forncett St. Mary, in Norfolk, a living he continued until 1853, when he was made D.D., and appointed to the bishopric of the colony of Natal.

In 1862 Bishop COLENSO, who had been engaged in translating



THOMAS Z. MORROW, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY.—PHOTO. BY BARRETT & SON.

THE LATE BISHOP COLENSO.

the Bible into the Zulu language, published the controversial work already referred to. It was condemned by the Convocation of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Cape Town, as Metropolitan, declared him to be deposed, but the deposition was pronounced void in 1865 on an appeal to the Privy Council.

illustrate the backwardness in educational and material development, and severely criticised the abuse of the pardoning power and the wholesale remission of fines, which have made the law a dead letter. Mr KNOTT in reply conceded the accuracy of Colonel MORROW's financial statements, but contended that Kentucky was no worse off than other States, and was willing she should remain as she is.

JUDGE KINNE.

JUDGE L. G. KINNE, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Iowa, was born in Saratoga, in this State, on the 5th of November, 1826. His education was completed in the High School, and in 1845 he went West, settling in La Salle County, Illinois, going thence to the Law School of the State University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, where he was graduated in 1868, entering upon the practice in his Illinois home, where he married in 1869, and immediately removed to Toledo, Tama County, Iowa, where he has since resided and practiced his profession. In 1872 he allied himself with the followers of HORACE GREELEY, and has since been an active, enthusiastic Democrat. In that year he was nominated for Circuit Judge in his district, and ran ahead of his ticket. In 1874 he was nominated for District Attorney in the face of foreshadowed defeat, though he lost his ticket by several hundred votes. He is a popular speaker, and has taken an active part in every Iowa campaign for several years.

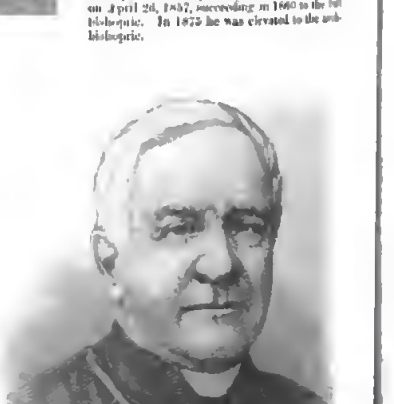
ARCHBISHOP WOOD.

ARCHBISHOP WOOD, who died in Philadelphia on the 20th inst., was a native of that city where he was born on the 27th of April, 1813, of English parentage. He was educated in England, and on his return, after an absence of five years, became a clerk in the United States Bank of Cincinnati, rising soon to the position of cashier. In 1837 he determined to enter the priesthood of the Church of Rome, and repaired to the Eternal City for his ecclesiastical education. He remained there seven years. In 1844 he was ordained a priest, and soon after was appointed assistant rector of the Cathedral in Cincinnati—an office which he held for nearly ten years. He was then appointed to the pastorate of St. Patrick's Church in the same city. He was consecrated Coadjutor Bishop of Philadelphia by Archbishop PURCELL on April 26, 1857, succeeding in 1860 to the full bishopric. In 1875 he was elevated to the archbishopric.

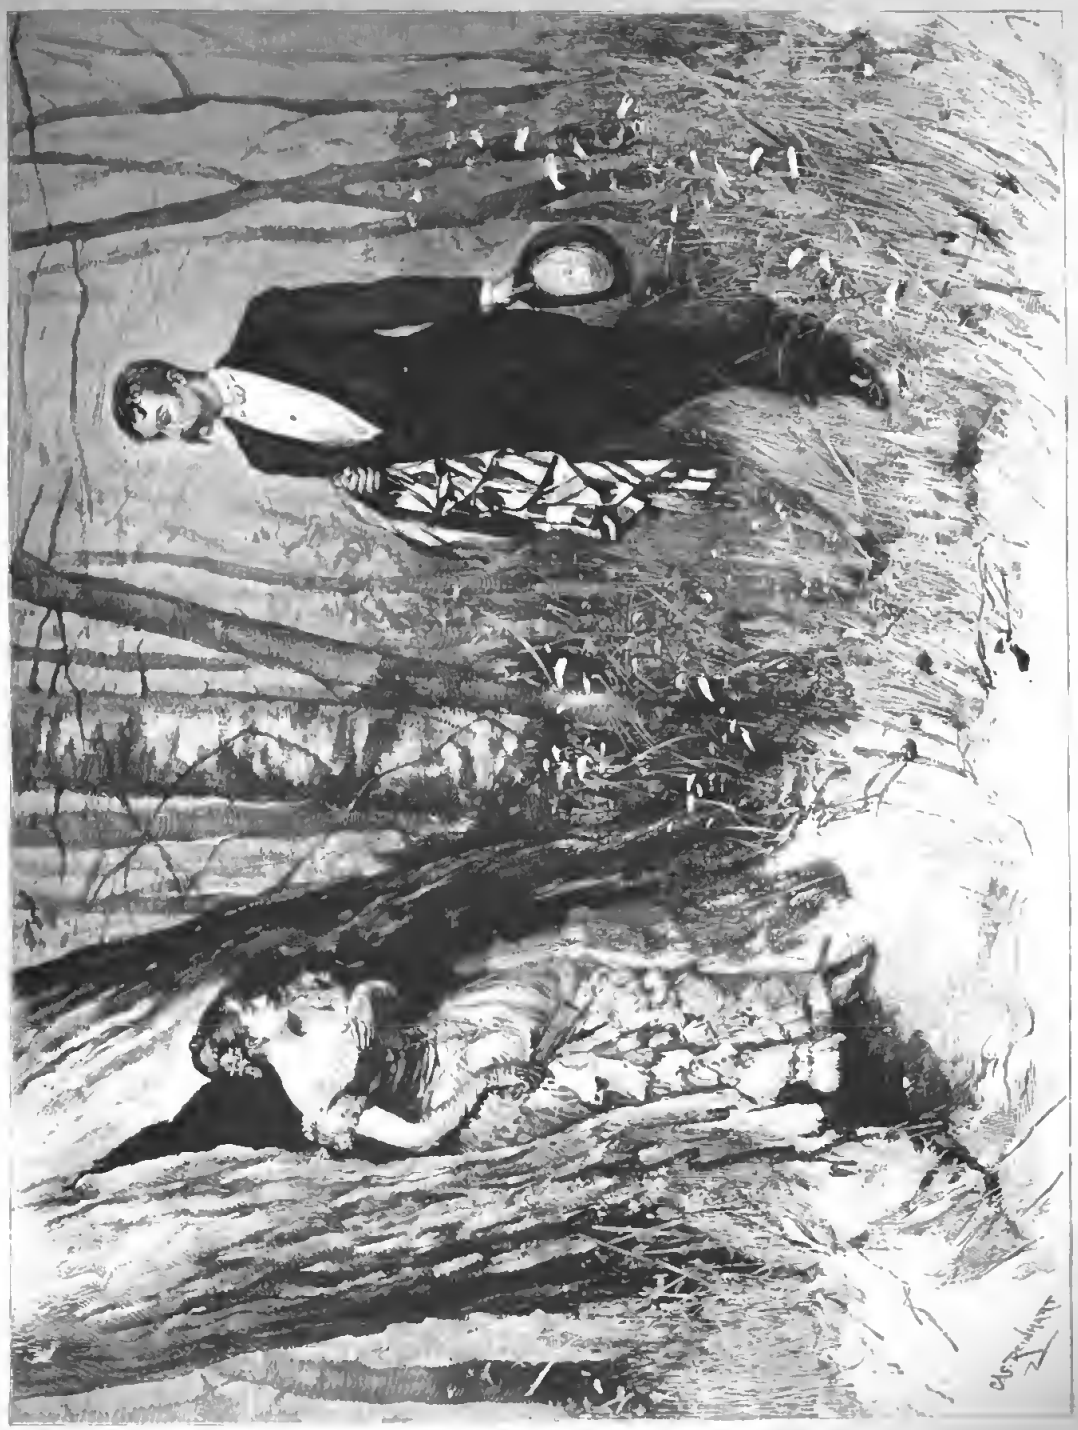
L. G. KINNE, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF IOWA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY MOORE.

COLONEL MORROW.

COLONEL THOMAS Z. MORROW was nominated for Governor of Kentucky by the Republican State Convention held at Lexington, May 26. Six ballots were necessary, and the final one which decided the contest stood 539 to 350. The nomination was subsequently made unanimous. The Colonel is about forty years of age. His home is in Somerset, Pulaski County. He was graduated from Center College, Danville, Kentucky, and is a lawyer of ability. He is a good political speaker, and is Chairman of the Republican Committee of his district. He and his opponent, Mr KNOTT, are stumping the State together, and discussing the questions of the day before the people. In a debate at Mount Vernon Colonel MORROW, according to the Louisville Evening Post, arraigned the Democratic party of Kentucky for defective revenue laws which exempted the lands from the poor and allowed the wealthy to escape; the mismanagement of the finances, by which $9,000,000 which the State had in 1865 have been entirely absorbed in the payment of a debt of only $6,000,000, and still leaving an indebtedness of $400,000 to be met by additional taxation. As an evidence of waste, he said the reports of the Court of Appeals for fourteen years had cost from $9.50 to $10.50 per volume, while in other States similar reports cost only two or three dollars. He asked what there was to show for the $3,000,000 wasted since the Democracy came into power in 1865? He then proceeded to



THE LATE ARCHBISHOP WOOD.
BY PERMISSION FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY GUTEKUNST.



"I CAN'T GET OUT OF THIS DREADFUL TREE!"

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Far from the Madding Crowd," "The Return of the Native," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a-milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER III.—(Continued.)

On the next occasion, which was just when the sun was changing places with the moon as an illuminator of Stickleford Dairy, she found him at the spot before her, and unincumbered by a horse. The certain holy that had so weighed him down at their first interview, and had been perceptible at their second, had quite disappeared. He pressed her right hand between both his own across the stile.

"My dear girl, God bless you!" said he, warmly. "I can not help thinking of that morning. I was too much overwhelmed at first to take in the whole force of it. You don't know all, but your presence was a miraculous intervention. Now to more cheerful matters. I have a great deal to tell—that is, if your wish about the ball be still the same?"

"Oh, yes, sir—if you don't object," said the persistent maiden.

"Never think of my objecting. What I have found out is something which simplifies matters amazingly. In addition to your Yeomanry Ball at Casterbridge, there is also to be one in the next county about the same time. This ball is not to be held at the Town-hall of the county town as usual, but at Lord Blakmanre's, who is colonel of the [illegible] and who, I suppose, wishes to please the yeomen because his brother is going to stand for the county. Now I find I could take you there [illegible] well, and the great advantage of that ball over the Yeomanry Ball in this county is that there you would be absolutely unknown, and I also. But do you prefer your own county?"

"Oh, no, sir. It is a ball I long to see—I don't know what it is like. It does not matter where."

"Then I shall be able to make much more of you there, where there is no possibility of recognition. That being [illegible] the next thing is the dancing. New reels and such things [illegible] For them of this—there is a new dance at Almack's and [illegible] also, over which the world has gone crazy."

"How dreadful!"

"Ah—but that is a mere expression—gone out. It is really an ancient Scythian dance, but such is the power of [illegible] that, having once been adopted by Society, this dance has made the tour of the Continent in one season."

"What is its name, sir?"

"The polka. Young people, who always dance, [illegible] come of your firmness, General? I believe if Maud were to tell you to go to Scotland to-morrow and bring Mrs Farquhar back with you, you'd do it."

"Oh, come, don't you talk," retorted the General. "If she told you to stand on your head on the top of the church steeple, you'd do it. Do you think I don't know that she has got you well under her thumb? Why, you never take your eyes off her! And you're a young fellow, mind you, whereas I'm an old man."

I did not see that this case was much improved by this undeniable fact; but his allusion had the effect of putting me to silence. I had not yet reached that period of life at which a young man in love delights to parade his infatuation, I was very much afraid of being chaffed, and I had no desire that the state of my feelings should be known to any one, except George Warren and Maud herself. I told George subsequently of the General's defection, and its cause, and he said he didn't wonder at it.

"Well," I returned, not quite pleased, "I must say I do rather wonder at it. I shouldn't have thought that an old fellow like the General would have allowed himself to be overpersuaded by a girl who might almost be his granddaughter. And Maud is quite wrong, you know."

"Can she be wrong?" asked George.

"Wh-, yes," I said, "I presume she can, seeing that she is mortal. I'm not sure that I care much for people who never make mistakes. It is quite natural that Maud should have made a mistake in this case, but I'll be hanged if it's natural in a man of the General's age to let his head him by the nose. Between you and me, I don't in the very sorry when the General goes back on his military duties."

The truth was that I was slightly irritated against my good friend the General at this time, for reasons quite unconnected with his deplorable change of front. I did not, of course, object to the sort of fatherly admiration with which he regarded Maud; but I did object a good deal to his coolness in taking it for granted that whenever I arranged to meet her and George anywhere he too was to be of the party. It seemed to show a little want of discrimination. He might have come, and welcome, if, when we were riding, he would sometimes have cantered on ahead, as if, when we were silent, he would have gone away and fished with George (who, to be sure, never caught anything), but he did not hesitate to say plainly that he preferred talking to Miss Maud to attempting to catch pike in bright sunshine, and she, for her part, encouraged him in his laziness, sometimes even scoffing at me with a red and a ridiculous-looking fly to try my luck—which I did with a very bad grace.

All this was not as it should have been, and it was sad to think that the summer was fast slipping away, and that when September came my duty to the partridges would leave me but little leisure for philandering. Nevertheless, those were happy days. People may say what they please about the climate of England, but no amount of statistics and weather tables will ever convince me that it has not changed greatly for the worse, and what proves this is that we all sailed out to the Cockle Light one afternoon toward the end of August in a mercheantly breeze, and enjoyed it. Well me candid person assert that the North Sea under the above conditions is pleasant and big ground towards the end of August, I tried it myself only the other day, and upon my word and honor my teeth chattered to that extent that I could hardly get out an intelligible word. But on that August afternoon two-and-thirty years ago the sky was not gray nor the wind cold; neither had any symptoms of the rheumatism wherewith my bones are eased in the present year of grace as not made themselves felt. Indeed it was as hot as it had been at all during the summer, and the reapers, who had been hard at work since early morning, were complaining of the scorching sun, but at sea we had the perfection of sailing weather, with sunshine tempered by a transparent veil of haze, and a refreshing breeze just strong enough to tip the waves with white here and there, and to send the Sarah Jane swiftly and steadily upon her way.

Our party was small but more numerous than usual, the occasion being one of importance. Bunce's two eldest sons, James and William, who had both taken to a sea-faring life, and, after many voyages and quite an Odyssey of adventures, had chanced to return to the paternal roof within a few days of one another, had agreed, by their father's advice, to go in to partnership upon the strength of their savings, and to enjoy the assets of independence and liberty, the upshot of which decision had been the purchase of the good smack Sarah Jane, together with the rigging, sails, nets, and other tackle appertaining thereto. So at least I was given to understand at the time, but with my present increased knowledge of such matters I incline to doubt whether the capital of the firm of Bunce Brothers could have reached a quarter of the amount required for so costly an investment, and it seems likely that if the accounts of the late Bernard Le Marchant, Esq., could be produced, the price of the Sarah Jane smack would be found accurately stated therein. However that may be, the Bunces, one and all, had expressed a strong wish that the Squire should personally test the sea-going qualities of their new craft, and as the Squire (whose own sea-going qualities were very shaky) had unequivocally declined to do anything of the sort, a proposal had been substituted that we should all take advantage of the first favorable day to give Miss Dennison a few hours' cuil in what Bunce sensor called "smewth watter."

George Warren, as a matter of course, accompanied us, and at the last moment the Rector—whom we met as we way down to the beach, was collared and added to the party, asseverating, as usual, that he one in a desperate hurry, and that he couldn't and wouldn't come, in the midst of which protestations he was unceremoniously lifted off his legs by that young giant William Bunce, who trotted through the water with him, and deposited him in the boat like a baby. Bunce the elder looked on with a grin of approval while this high handed proceeding was being carried out.

"My son Wilson is a well growed 'un, Squire," he remarked. "He ain't got his father's brains, but I'll allow that I never had his strength of limb. Why, he makes on more o' fourteen stun —and Rector's all that, if he's a ounce—nor I should o' liftin' Miss Maud here. I'll carry you myself, miss," he added, re-assuringly. "Don't you be alarmed."

A timid suggestion as my part that I should undertake this share of the labors of embarkation was scouted with contempt, and a few minutes later we were standing out to sea, the little knot of fisher-folk who had assembled on the beach to see us start giving us and the Sarah Jane a parting cheer.

"This is really very jolly," said the General. "Isn't it we odd thing that, during all the years I spent at Thurley as a boy, I should never have thought of going in for sea-fishing? You never did either, did you, Bernard? I wonder you don't keep a boat of your own lying off here—not a regular packet, of course, but something of this kind, that could be hauled up on the beach in bad weather. You might get a lot of fun out of her. Why don't you?"

"Firstly," replied my uncle, "because she would infallibly go ashore in the first gale, and be broken up into little pieces; secondly, because I shouldn't use her more than about three times in the course of the year, and thirdly, because upon those three occasions I should be more or less grievously seasick."

"Not you!" returned the Rector, who had now resigned himself to accomplished facts, and was smiling the mist benevon with much appreciation. "I believe it would do you all the good in the world to fill your lungs with this fine air every now and then; and as for the boat, you could have her pulled up high and dry, as the General says. It would be a resource for you, Le Marchant, and my view is that a man ought to have as many resources as possible. I take all I can get, I know."

"But then you have so many daily duties," observed my uncle, with his quiet smile.

"Yes, yes, just so—that's where it is," went on the Rector, without any suspicion of irony; "time's the difference between us. It would be a great deal worse for you, with all your leisure, to be deprived of resources than it would be for me; and I'm afraid, Le Marchant, that you're beginning to give things up—taking too much to your study and your library. You don't ride as often as you used to do, and you never shoot. It's a mistake, you know, a great mistake—all work and no play—and Chmler going out into the world, as he must do soon, and all the neighbors getting old people, old friends dead and gone, and no new ones, don't you see."

The Rector had thrust his hands into the pockets of his loose coat, and was shaking his head and frowning at his feet, which were stuck out straight before him. His tongue could never quite keep pace with his thoughts, so that his sentences, even in the pulpit, would often die away, as this one did, into unintelligible mutterings. After which he would come to himself with a start, feel about him for the lost thread of his piece, and grasp it—or possibly some other stray thread triumphantly.

"By the-bye, though, you will have Mrs Farquhar with you perhaps," he said.

"Perhaps," answered my uncle.

The Rector, with a prolonged "H—m—m—m" drew his hand several times across his mouth and chin, gazing thoughtfully the while at his old friend.

The significance of that inarticulate murmur was obscure, and Bunce, who had pricked up his ears at the sound of Mrs. Farquhar's name, groaned sardonically. There was a moment of rather awkward silence, but the General precipitately threw himself into the breach with a change of subject.

"I suppose there'll be water enough for us to get alongside of the Cockle Light, won't there, Bunce?" Pity we didn't think of bringing some newspapers for the poor fellows on board."

Mr uncle, however, had thought of this—as, indeed, he was always thinking of other people—and he held up a large bundle of papers and magazines. "I have got some fresh butter and eggs for them too," he said, "which I hope they will not despise. I should have liked to bring them a bottle or two of whisker, but Bunce seemed to think that would exercise a demoralizing influence."

Meanwhile the Sarah Jane had been stealing rapidly along on her southward course before the wind. Thurley was far astern in the blue distance, and on the low Winterton church tower rose, tall and imposing, above the sand-hills and the grayish of silvery coarse grass which crowned them. It is an ugly coast-line, our most people, that long, straight succession of low sand-cliffs and dunes, deeply indented at intervals with gaps occupied out by the not at spring tides; and yet, with its soft grays, its pale yellows, and neutral tints, its weather-worn church towers here and there, its diving cluthorn and flocks of screaming gulls high overhead in the misty air, this lowlying sea-board has a melancholy beauty of its own, which, if one were an artist or a poet, one might possibly contrive to interpret. Being neither the one nor the other, I will content myself with saying that earth, sea, and sky were alike beautiful to me on that especial afternoon, and I imagined, everybody must be aware that there are certain constitutions of age, company, and circumstance which can repulse of causing the desert itself to blossom like the rose.

The wind fell light when we were off Winterton Sands, and, with the tide setting us up, we made but little way. The two owners of the boat had modestly retired to the extreme end of the boom, where they had perched themselves sideways upon the gunwale, with their backs turned toward us, like a gigantic three-head of Castor and Pollux. The General and George Warren had nested up near them, and were smoking silently and gazing out to sea. My uncle was deep in a small brown volume which he had produced from his pocket. Maud and I were seated in the stern beside Bunce, who, with characteristic self-assertion, had taken possession of the tiller; and amidships the Rector, his head sunk upon his breast, was slumbering peacefully. None of us had spoken a word for a long time. Suddenly the Rector startled us all by waking up and saying, in a clear and solemn voice, to my uncle, "He sure your sin will find you out!"

My uncle dropped his book and stared; I began to laugh; and the General, turning his head, called out, "Hallo, Mr. Dennison, you've been having a nap."

"Not at all," returned the Rector, looking a good deal confused and annoyed, "nothing of the sort! I was just thinking over my sermon for Sunday, and I believe I forgot where I was for the moment. Maud, my dear, will you remember to look out No. 20 for me when we get home? I think I will give them 29 in the afternoon. They had it on Septuagesima; but you can't drive a nail home with one blow, and their skulls are very thick, poor things! Besides, if I am to be carried off at sea, without with your leave as by your leave, I must not be napreted to find time for writing two brand new sermons in the week."

"I don't remember to have heard you preach upon that text, though," observed my uncle.

"How should you, when you never come to afternoon church? Not that I mentioned my text; I was amplifying an incidental issue. At least, I may have been doing so, I don't quite remember," said the Rector, feeling, perhaps, that he was plunging into a slough of prevarication from which it might be well to extricate himself. "Bless me! Five o'clock already!" he exclaimed, consulting his watch. "Where is this ridiculous light ship? What? Over there on the horizon, Bunce? You can't be serious! Le Marchant, we really ought to be getting ahead."

"Time enough, sir, time enough," said Bunce. "We shall have the breeze again presently, sin't it so, Jim?"

Castor and Pollux wheeled round simultaneously, scrutinized the sky, and growled out something in a deep tones about "making to the nor'ard," and "plenty of it afore night," which, it must be presumed, was satisfactory, for Bunce rejoined, triumphantly, "Telled 'ee so, sir! 'Tain't often as you'll find me wrong about the weather, though I say it, as shouldn't."

And, sure enough, the wind freshened considerably within the next few minutes, so that it took no handy half an hour to dispose of the five miles of water which still separated us from the light ship. There had been some talk of our going on board of her, but when we he to, on reaching our destination, there was found to be such an uncomfortable swell running that Will Ims was deputed to take off the newspapers and provisions in the dinghy, some of us proposing to accompany him except Maud, who, perhaps, wished to make this opportunity of delivering a brief temperance lecture, but who was ordered peremptorily to sit still to her father.

Presently, Bunce, who had been holding a whispered conference with his sons, bent forward to confide to me that he was uneasy in his mind. "I can work her back, sir; no fear for that," he said, "but the ova is a-gettin' up, do you see, sir, and if you ask me about puttin' of you ashore—why, I don't hardly know what to say."

"Surely we can manage to get ashore somewhere," I said.

"No doubt o' that, Mr Chas'ls. Question is—a bore?"

"Bore," struck in my uncle, "do you honestly think that there is the slightest chance of our being able to land anywhere within five miles of Thurley?"

"Can't just exactly say as I do, sir—not for certain."

"Then, in Heaven's name get about, and run for Yarmouth. Don't let us go on thrashing in this horrible sea a minute longer than is necessary."

"As you please, Squire," replied Bunce, with evident relief. "Ready about, Wilson! Slack out our main-sheet!—There, sir, you feel a deal comfortabler now."

This last encouraging assurance was addressed to the Rector, who was looking rather yellow, but who immediately rejoined that he had been perfectly comfortable before, and that he did hope he was not going to be accused of having been unwell.

"Nobody could look at your face and being forward such a palpably absurd charge," said my uncle. "For my own part, I am convinced that you are as well as I am myself."

At this the General chuckled, and said he would tell us a capital story about the Duke of Wellington and a Dutch skipper. In point of fact, I believe we were none of us sorry to be scudding before the wind again, and I know any members of the party to whom the prospect of a dinner to Yarmouth and a long fifteen mile drive home was an assured delight.

Alas! I was reckoning without my host. We did indeed reach Yarmouth without roisolvenjare of any kind, and the dinner to which we sat down at the Royal Hotel was a very choice repast if it was not particularly famous in point of cooking; but the remainder of the programme was executed in a way which was not my way, and which was the more mortifying for having been quite unanticipated by me. Having settled it in my own mind that I was to drive Maud home in a dog-cart, while the other four were to be accommodated in a two-horse fly, I had thoughtfully ordered those vehicles before sitting down to dinner; and I am sure that the sympathies of all generous-minded readers will be with me when I say that not only did Mrs Dennison refuse point blank to accompany me, alleging that she hated dog-carts (which was not true), but that she and others further objected to any arrangement involving the packing of four persons into a close fly. Nor was this all, for after the rejected dog-cart had been taken back to the stables and a second fly produced, Maud—whether to punish me for my presumption, or out of sheer perversity, I can not say—stepped briskly into the first, followed by the General, and just as I was preparing to do likewise, struck me dumb by saying, "Mr Warren is coming with to. Get in, George."

George, with that stupid habit of his of always doing what he was told to do, promptly obeyed, and away they went, leaving me to seek the society of my uncle and the Rector with as good a grace as I could assume.

To tell the truth, I did not accept the situation with a good grace at all. I was not accustomed to being snubbed, and I didn't like it. Luckily for me, it was now pitch-dark, so that my sulky face was not visible, and, as soon as we had started, I took back into a corner, and pretended to go to sleep, feeling that speech was beyond my powers.

Neither of my companions appeared to notice that there was anything wrong with me, and no doubt time imagined my absence to be genuine. We had driven some distance in the darkness before my uncle remarked, quietly, as though resuming an interrupted conversation

"When you speak of my sin finding me out, you mean, I suppose, to imply that my mother is the instrument of Nemesis. Isn't that a little hard upon her?"

"Now, now, now," expostulated the Rector, "why go back upon things in that way? It is most unfair to hold a man accountable for what he says in his sleep. Why, only the other day I was sitting by the bedside of a poor old woman, and I had read her nicely off to sleep with the first lesson for the day—the twenty-fifth of Jeremiah, I think it was—and I was waiting there till her daughter came back from the baker's, when she woke up all of a sudden and said, 'The devil fly away with them long wanded parsons!' Now do you suppose that I should have the shabbiness to bring up a thing of that kind against her afterward? I declare to goodness—"

"But I thought you denied that you had been asleep," interrupted my uncle.

"Well, well, what if I did? Everybody denies having been asleep in daylight, it's a natural impulse. I've heard you do it yourself scores of times."

"I think not," said my uncle.

"Le Marchant," said the Rector, testily, "you are contradictious and argumentative. That's just where it is, you see. If you and Mrs Farquhar are to be splitting hairs from morning to night, your life won't be worth having."

"Perhaps we shall not behave en clint war," said my uncle. "It seems, however, that it was of no mother that you were thinking when you startled me by hurling that solemn warning at my head. Well, you are not alone in the view that you take of the matter. I confess that I am a little surprised; I did not expect you all to feel so strongly. Still, you may be wrong—something that I am contradictious and argumentative, as you say, I may not be too old to turn over a new leaf."

"My dear old friend," exclaimed the Rector, "you are neither the one nor the other; you know that very well. It is she who—"

"You must be going quite heavy evidence, Dennison. I don't think you have met her more than once or twice in your life, and the last time must have been something like twenty years ago."

"I know what I am talking about, for all that," declared the Rector. And after a pause of a few seconds he continued, in a somewhat changed voice: "See here, Le Marchant, you will allow an old friend to take a liberty just for once—can't you reconsider matters?"

"Can't you let the dead past bury its dead, and start afresh?"

"No," said my uncle, quietly.

"Ah," sighed the Rector, "I am sorry to hear you say so. I don't understand you, Le Marchant. Of all the men I have ever met, you are the least opinionated. You call yourself a Tory, and you make a positive pleasure in reading the Radical papers; you are, I hope, a good Churchman, and you would attend a Dissenting meeting without a moment's hesitation; you never make up your mind to do anything without hearing all that can be urged against it, even by ignorant and incompetent people. And yet—"

"And yet, when once I have made up my mind, I don't easily change it. Does that strike you as inconsistent?"

"I think it is strange," answered the Rector, "I think it is a thousand pities that—that, in short, you can not forget as well as forgive. I do you the justice to feel sure that you forgave long ago, but there is a material as well as a moral kind of forgiveness."

"And there are moral as well as material impossibilities. I would rather say no more about it, Dennison, if you please."

"Ah, well! I fear it is a bad lookout," said the Rector. "Of course Mrs Farquhar must be against you in this, and equally of course she will tell you so—in season and out of season."

My uncle laughed a little. "You know my mother better than I do if you can be so certain as to what she will say or do under any given circumstances."

"I take her to be a human being like other human beings," said the Rector.

"You would tell you that that only shows how little you know about her. I am glad, however, to find that you are less prejudiced against her than I had supposed. I have not yet made up my mind that she shall live at Thurley. As you say, I like to hear all the pros and cons before I

"HE MIGHT HAVE COME, AND WELCOME, IF, WHEN WE WERE RIDING, HE WOULD SOMETIMES HAVE CANTERED ON AHEAD."

...sense to a decision, and I have taken note of the fact that both Tom and Charley are strongly opposed to her going. Nevertheless, I think the end of it will be that she will come, and I want you, if she does to be civil and kind to her."

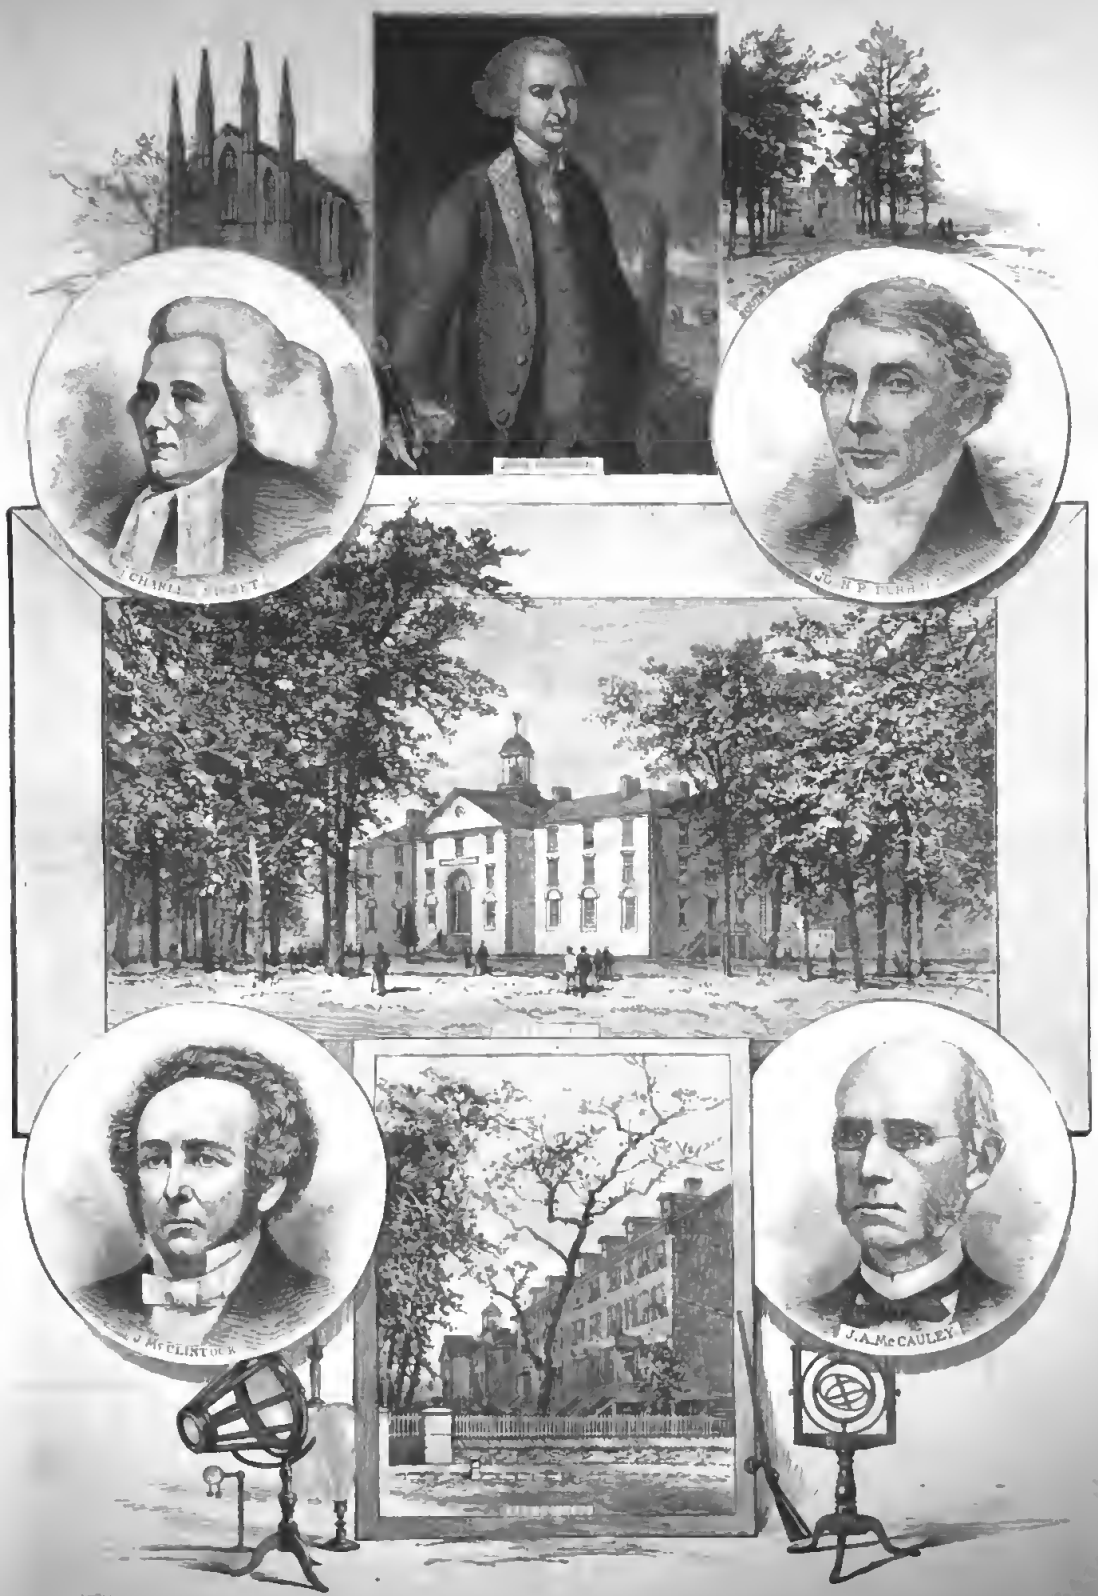
"Am I unwild and unkind as a rule?" the Rector asked.

"I don't say so, but my hope is that you will be specially the reverse in this instance. Do what we will, there must be rules, and I don't think they will be the more easily smoothed over if every body is determined to take my side. Let us at least have a fair start, and perhaps it would be only fair also to remember that if my mother leaves Scotland, she will do so against her personal inclinations."

The Rector was about to make some rejoinder, but at this moment the fly stopped at a turnpike gate, and, the poke man coming out with a lantern to get his money, I took that opportunity of becoming evidently awake. I had already made a compromise with my conscience by shuffling my feet and coughing gently once or twice, but these signals had passed unnoticed, and it was now that the Rector remarked, innocently, "Bless me, Charley! I had forgotten you were here."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

TRAINING ELEPHANTS AT THEBES—AN INCIDENT AT BROCKTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—DRAWN BY T. H. CHURCH.—[SEE PAGE ...]



DICKINSON COLLEGE, CARLISLE, PENNSYLVANIA, FOUNDED IN 1783.—[See Page 410.]

ELEPHANTS AS FIREMEN.

We copy from the Boston Herald the following interesting account of an incident which Mr Current has illustrated in the sketch on page 412. The elephants which performed so well the duty of firemen at a critical moment belonged to the menagerie of Mr ADAM FOREPAUGH.

Shortly after a recent matinee performance at Brockton, Massachusetts, a one-story frame building near the tents caught fire, and in a few moments the entire building was enveloped in flames. Attached to the station-house was a row of horse sheds, and connecting with the latter was the grand stand, in close proximity to which were Mr FOREPAUGH's tents. There being no fire appliances on the grounds, it may well be assumed that the burning building gave serious alarm to the circus people, as well as to the citizens, many of whom had not yet left the grounds.

"At this juncture Mr FOREPAUGH and his general manager, C. W. FULLER, appeared on the scene. It was plainly apparent that unless the horse sheds were torn down the grand stand would burn, and in that event the destruction of the circus tents was inevitable. While all were excited, and making futile attempts to pull down the buildings with their hands, ADAM FOREPAUGH junior came running up, and, taking in the situation at a glance, called his colored assistant and hastened to the elephant quarters, soon after appearing with Bolivar and Basil, the latter being next to the former in point of size. The two huge beasts were hurried over to the fire, and, much to the surprise of the spectators, began pulling down the horse sheds in obedience to the direction of the junior FOREPAUGH. The bystanders removed the débris as fast as it accumulated under the mighty blows of the elephants, the Brutes, who seemingly looked upon the affair as a matter of little moment. In an incredibly short space of time the horse sheds were demolished, the grand stand was saved, and the circus tents loomed up as proudly as ever. It is proposed to make Messrs Bolivar and Basil honorary members of the Brockton Fire Department."

A comical feature of the scene was the appearance of the "fat woman," the "living skeleton," and a wee bit of a dwarf in a group, all of them deeply interested in watching the efforts of the sagacious elephants to demolish the sheds

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

New interest in the speed of gentlemen's teams has been produced by the unmatched performance of Mr VANDERBILT'S Maud S and Aldine on Fleetwood Park a few days since. Last season the record was brought down from the two-minutes to less than two-minutes, and this season's rivalry has opened with Mr VANDERBILT sending his team a mile in 2.15¾ on the first trial. If Mr WORK attempts to equal this performance, and regain the last laurels with his Edward and Dick Swivel ler, the trial will be attended with extraordinary interest. A Western trainer of horses has offered to wager ten thousand dollars that he can drive Mr WORK's team a mile in 2.10 or less.

Now that the bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister seems about to become a law in England, the English people have taken up anew and with unwonted zest the fascinating employment of enumerating the complexities of relationship which may ensue. They have thus far overlooked the fact that under the proposed regulation one person may become double a mother-in-law to another person—a consideration quite as momentous as that a child may have its aunt for a step-mother, its cousin for a step-brother, its father for its uncle by marriage, and itself for its own cousin.

A somewhat alarming story has been printed to the effect that a large dry goods and millinery firm has secured photographs of several handsome ladies who are prominent in New York social circles, and will reproduce them in cheap lithographic form for decorating paper boxes used in the trade. This stroke of enterprise is made practicable by the fact that photographers have exercised the privilege of retaining specimens of their work, and have parted with them now and then to chance customers at rather high figures. The day may not be far distant when the young man who buys an after-luncheon cigar down-town will occasionally find a portrait of his "intended" on the paper band thereof, and thus will be able literally to see her face in the wreaths of smoke that arise during his siesta.

The Irish invincibles are credited with being the first to use the word "remote" in the sense of "murder." This is an error. The word was used in that sense by an American assassin of lented memory some little time before the Invincibles "removed" anybody, and it was probably borrowed by them from his vocabulary.

A noteworthy coaching trip of some two hundred and fifty miles, and occupying ten days, came to an end recently at Burlington, Vermont. The start was from Greenfield, in Massachusetts, and the route lay up the valley of the Connecticut River, through parts of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, across the Green Mountains at Mount Mansfield, and to Lake Champlain. The party included several prominent New-Yorkers.

In Austin, Texas, the United States District Court has decided against the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act in a test case upon the decision of which many similar suits were dependent. A colored woman was excluded from a ladies' car on the Houston and Texas Central Railroad, and suit was brought in her behalf under the Civil Rights Act to enforce the penalty of $500. The Court held that the act is an infringement on the rights of the several States, that only the State tribunals have jurisdiction in the premises, and that the act is therefore unconstitutional.

It is expected that there will be a remarkable gathering of scientific men in Philadelphia next year at the meeting of the American Society for the Advancement of Science. Huxley, Tyndall, Sir William Thompson, Richard A. Proctor, Sir John Lubbock, and Lord Rayleigh are among those who will probably attend.

The New York Herald has information from Newport that a lady of this city, who is now in Europe and will not return till fall, has sent all her servants to her Newport cottage, in order that they may have their summer vacation by the sea. There are ladies who are not so thoughtful with respect to the pleasure of their servants, and there are servants who could hardly be trusted to occupy a villa at Newport by themselves during the gay season. Indeed, the circumstance is noteworthy from two points of view

Jumbo has a rival in a very large elephant which has recently come into the possession of a dealer in animals at Liverpool. The London Times mentions this creature as perhaps the largest captive animal in the world, and says that though not quite so high as Jumbo, the monster is more bulky, weighing nearly five tons. It is claimed, however, that Jumbo has grown considerably since his arrival in America, increasing his height by about eight inches, and his weight by many hundred pounds

"I am now Acting Secretary of War," said General Sherman to a friend recently, while he was sitting in that capacity in the absence of Secretary LINCOLN, "and for the first time since I came to Washington there is perfect harmony between the General of the Army and the Secretary of War"

The Marquis TSENG, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Chinese government at Paris, London, and St. Petersburg, is credited with one of the best witticisms produced in the course of the coronation fêtes at Moscow. Seeing the Czar wipe the perspiration from his face while waiting for the coronation to be concluded, the Chinese diplomatist whispered to the dignitary nearest him, "Why don't they punish the Nihilists by making them go through the ceremony of coronation every day?" It should be remembered, however, that the occasion was not conducive to a copious and general flow of wit.

The Luray Caverns, in Virginia, are lighted with electric lamps. The other day, while a large party was visiting the caves, lighting much one of the wires outside, buried over the entire line beneath the ground, looking like fiery serpents, shivered the glass globes, and made big balls of fire, which exploded with loud reports. A lightning bolt leaped from the wires and electrocuted the conductors in the Bridal Chamber. The destruction of the lamps left the astonished party in total darkness.

The cyclone which descended upon Long Island a few days ago, made havoc on two villages, whisked a minaret from the splendid new cathedral at Garden City, and wrecked houses and outbuildings in considerable numbers—doing all this in a dozen seconds or so—was a pretty fair imitation of the genuine Western article. The next one that comes along may drop down in the centre of Manhattan Island, and then it will be seen whether Eastern critics are justified in imputing the great damage done by the Western cyclones in part to the frailty of the buildings in those regions.

In England it seems to be the popular impression that Mr Irving Bishop, the American thought-reader, has Mr Labouchere somewhat at a disadvantage. The editor of Truth offered no longer five thousand dollars to five hundred that Mr Bishop could not announce the number of a bank note which he had not seen, by reasoning to the thought-reading method. Mr Bishop accepted the challenge, and the charity to which the stake was to be given was named. On the evening when the test was to be made in St. James's Hall Mr Labouchere's representative did not appear, but Mr Bishop went through with the test, apparently to the satisfaction of the large audience, under the conditions imposed. On the strength of his having told the number of the concealed bank-note on the first trial, he refuses to listen to the reserved challenge of Mr Labouchere till the latter shall have paid five thousand dollars as the Victoria Hospital for Children.

The Pall Mall Gazette calls attention to the fact that Lord Chesterfield, in telling what a gentleman might or might not do, wrote down his disapproval of coaching, horse-racing, fox-chasing, and many of the field games in terms that admit of no doubt as to his meaning. A gentleman, he wrote, will not be seen playing foot ball as cricket, or driving a coach, "for he knows that such an imitation of the manners of the mob will indelibly stamp him with vulgarity." Again he says that "driving coaches, rustic sports, such as fox-chases, horse-races, etc., are infinitely below the honest and industrious professions of a tailor and a shoemaker." The Pall Mall Gazette observes that not only do persons who call themselves gentlemen do most of those things nowadays, but those who are not gentlemen consider themselves such in consequence of doing some of them.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.
EXCELLENT RESULTS.
Dr. J. L. WILLIS, Elbert, Mo., says: "Horsford's Acid Phosphate gives most excellent results."—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.
"By it no near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.
"The color of new-mown hay, the perfume of roses, the cool breeze, the grim lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune.
Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Foot of 23d St., East River, and Jewett's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

HOTEL KAATERSKILL,
CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.
Largest mountain house in the world. Open June 20th to October. Accessible by all rail route within half mile of hotel, via the New Kaaterskill Railroad. Address, E. A. GRAHAM, Kaaterskill P. O., N. Y.—[Adv.]

The question of a proper food for infants interests all mothers, especially those unable to nurse their offspring. Mellin's Food for infants possesses all the requisites as a substitute for mother's milk, and is highly commended by the medical faculty of both Europe and America. An druggists have it.—[Adv.]

A FINE HAIR DRESSING.
Cocoaine dresses the hair perfectly, and is also a preparation unequaled for the eradication of dandruff. The superiority of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts consists in their purity and great strength.—[Adv.]

GRAY HAIR
Turned to its natural color, pimples and blotches eradicated, by using Dr. Taddeo's Vermifuge Liniment. Warranted to be genuine and perfectly harmless. It also prevents the hair from falling out. Sold by all the druggists. 25 and 50 cents.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure.
This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, Piles, Hemorrhoids, Sick Headache, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 21, rue Hautefeuille, Paris.
Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

Established 1818.
Copenhagen
Beware of Counterfeits.
Gold Medal 1878
Paris.
Peter F. Heering's
Cherry Cordial
Prize Medals
Purveyor by appointment to the Royal Danish Court and H. H. M. the Prince of Wales
And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.
For sale by Wine Dealers generally
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS, New York.

Print Your Own Cards, Presses $3
Large sizes for circulars, &c., $5 to $30. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory.
KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.
EDENIA AND MARECHAL NEL ROSE.

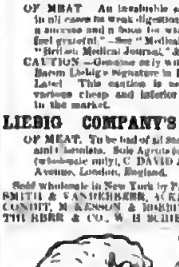
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES
Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of plain chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and eminently adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery, is a delicious article; highly recommended by learned physicians.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet in cases of dyspepsia, nervous debility, etc.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for family use.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT, FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases in which digestion and debility, with a morbid and a desire for which nutrition should find grateful aid."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States for Wholesale only, C. DAVID & CO., 9 Feachurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, M. KESSON & HOBBINS, H. K. & F. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.



"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."
Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and hereditary humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.
CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.
CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly stops Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.
CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Many Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.
CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.
Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents. Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.
POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

TWELVE AMERICANS.
Their Lives and Times. By HOWARD CARROLL. Containing Sketches of Horatio Seymour, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Hannibal Hamlin, John Gilbert, Robert C. Schenck, Frederick Douglass, William Allen, Allen G. Thurman, Joseph Jefferson, Ellen H. Wadsworth, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.
"It has been my aim to deal with portraiture rather than with analysis, to represent my subjects as in life and habit lived, and as persons and colleagues knew them. Good fortune has permitted me to enjoy personal relations of the most friendly character with many of the gentlemen included in the list; and it is particularly worthy of note that the material for these sketches of their lives was, in every case, obtained during long and frequent personal interviews with them. * * * It is confidently claimed that they are truthful and appreciative records of most eventful careers, that they touch many a wholesome lesson, by laying bare the motives which have actuated men endowed in widely different walks of life, that they bring to memory historical events of great interest, that they contain many important facts, characteristic anecdotes, and incidents bearing upon history, which hitherto have remained unpublished, that they throw new light on movements of the first importance, and that they strikingly illustrate the great progress and growth, the astonishing wealth and material development of the Republic."—Extract from Preface.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.
Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

"BOSCHEE'S BITTERS," THE OLD-time Pure and Best German Bitters—prepared and unequalled for their medicinal properties, and especially for their tonic and stimulating effect. To be had in Quarts and Pints. E. BOSCHEE, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 76 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1029.

BRUSHES of every description at 170 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN K. HOPPEL, Manufacturer and Importer.

Lady Agents wanted everywhere to sell our Rubber Undergarments and Shoes. Liberal terms. Address Clay Rubber Co., Cincinnati.

SITUATIONS furnished teachers. Agency Journal, terms and form and copy of our "School Journal," sent free postage. Address National School Supply Bureau, 70 Fifth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

RIDLEYS',

Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N. Y.

PARASOLS.

400 LACE-COVERED AND TWILL COACHING PARASOLS, 49
200 SATIN COACHING PARASOLS, WITH GILT PAGODA FRAMES, AT $1 00
250 FINE SATIN PARASOLS, 10 RIBS, $1 99
250 FINE FANCY PARASOLS, AT $2. HAVE BEEN $10 TO $15.
CHILDREN'S COLORED PARASOLS, 25c. AND 50c.

Ostrich Plumes.

NOVELTIES IN FINE NATURAL BRONZE AND OTHER PLUMAGE, FANCIES FOR SEA-SIDE WEAR, FROM 25c., 50c., $1 TO $2 EACH. GENUINE DUPLEX CRESTED TIPS, IN GOOD BLACK, AT 49c. THE DOZEN.
THREE-QUARTER COLORED OSTRICH PLUMES, FROM $1 75, $2, $2 50, $3 50, $4 50 EACH.
DAISY WREATHS AND SPRAYS, 10c. EACH.
HANDSOME SPRAYS AND WREATHS, 25c. EACH.
ELEGANT DAISY WREATHS, SPRAYS, AND MONTURES, 39c.

Samples of Piece Goods Sent on Application.

ORDERS BY MAIL

FAITHFULLY ATTENDED TO

Our Summer Magazine Now Out. 15c. per Copy.

E. RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand St.,
60, 62, 64, 66, 68, AND 70 ALLEN ST.,
99, 61, AND 63 ORCHARD ST., N. Y.

CENTRAL PARK SWINGS

FOR HOUSE, PIAZZA, OR PARKS.

Price $5 00.

A safe Exercise for children and adults. Notepaper Children's swing or sleep will be sent gratuitous by merely procuring on the hand-board. Send for Circular to L. E. THOMAS, 820 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE AND HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the NUMBER of each Periodical at current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, a weekly publication, containing Works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full List of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four hundred volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

LADIES!

Genuine Pebbled, only hair at cost 4 cents. Formula (only 4 cents), a copper label book 1 and one dozen 3-ft. lengths assorted fancy shoestrings, all for 25 cents. Catalogue to post holders. The UNIVERSITY CHEMICAL PREPARATION CO., formerly Warner Chemical Company & Co., 301 Spruce St., Phila., Pa.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, No. 130 to 136 Liberty Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any certificate made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Broadway and 14th Street.

Ladies' Gossamer Rubber Circulars, with Hood, Sizes 50 to 60 in., $1 00; usual price $1 95.
Ladies' Gossamer Rubber Newports, with Cape, Sizes 50 to 60 in., $1 75; usual price $2 00.
Misses' Gossamer Rubber Circulars, with Hood, all sizes, 36c.; usual price $1 50.
Misses' Gossamer Rubber Newports, with Cape, all sizes, $1 75; usual price $1 95.
Gents' Gossamer Rubber Coats, all sizes, $1 50; usual price $2 50.
Gents' Gossamer Rubber Coats (extra light weight), $2 25; usual price $3 00.
Buyers may be sent by mail if prepaid as above terms, adding 25 cents for postage

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Broadway and 14th Street.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Furnishing Goods for Gentlemen.

Parisian and London styles in Neck Dressings, Hosiery, Percale, and Linen Dress Shirts, Collars, and Cuffs, Jean and Linen Drawers, Pajamas in Cheviot and Silk Pongee, Turkish Bath Robes and Sheets, Flannel and Net Bathing Suits.

Pongee and Flannel Jackets, Steamer Rugs and Robes, Linen, Cloth, and Pongee Carriage Robes, &c.

Broadway and 19th St.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

A History of the Brooklyn Bridge. By W. C. CONANT. (Reprinted from HARPER'S MAGAZINE for May, 1883.) The Bridge as a Monument. By MONTGOMERY SCHUYLER. (Reprinted from HARPER'S WEEKLY, May 27, 1883.) Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Two Portraits and Twenty-eight Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding. Most durable. Lightest draft. Can be made to fit any road. The wearing parts are made of the best steel, and are fully protected from dust. Send for illustrated catalogue, containing further information regarding the merits of these celebrated vehicles. Mailed free. Agents wanted.

HENRY TIMKEN,
Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.
Trade supplied by H. H. ABBOTT BUGGY CO.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion.

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges, Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
113 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

WANTED 8 OR 10 BOOK AGENTS

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c. Send for Descriptive Pamphlet.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

ASTHMA & HAY FEVER
THEIR CAUSE & CURE.
KNIGHT'S NEW TREATISE sent free.
Address L. A. KNIGHT, 15 E. Third St., CINCINNATI, O.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

Are the best material known for the cure of PILES. Have been in use for 15 years, and are endorsed by the leading physicians. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Sold by druggists generally, and by the manufacturer, with full directions for use. Sold with a guarantee to give satisfaction or money refunded. Seeley's Drug Establishments, 1441 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 76 Fleet Street, London, England.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? The Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills the worms, Rid Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, Rid Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, Morgan Dix. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $5 00.

II.

TWELVE AMERICANS: Their Lives and Times. By Hezekiah Conover. Containing Sketches of Benjamin Franklin, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Horatio Hackett, John Gilbert, Robert L. Schuyler, Frederick Douglass, Wilkins Allen, Alice G. Freeman, Joseph Jefferson, Rufus B. Weaver, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

III.

SPANISH VISTAS. By Clarence Paterson Lathrop. Illustrated by Charles S. Reinhart. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $1 00.

IV.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record, with Illustrative Poetic and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By Mahlon Williams and Rowena Pinkerney Williams. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

V.

COMPARATIVE ZOOLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By Alpheus Hyatt, A. M., Ph. D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Second Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

VI.

GAMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Compared by William Wells Newell. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $1 50.

VII.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by Thomas Carlyle. Edited by James Anthony Froude. 8vo, Paper, 20 cents. Also, Library Edition. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VIII.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. Edited, with Notes, by Wm. J. Rolfe, A. M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 35 cents; Paper, 20 cents.

IX.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS. Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, and other Poems. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A. M. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 35 cents. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

X.

NAN. By Lucy C. Lillie, Author of "Mildred's Bet" and "Mildred's Engagement," "Pembroke," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XI.

FREDERICK II. AND MARIA THERESA. From Hillebrand's Lectures on Germania. 12mo, Cloth. By Theodore Bacon. From the French, by Mrs. Charles Bray and Mrs. Jonathan Lucas. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XII.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE. A History of the Brooklyn Bridge. By W. C. Conant. (Reprinted from Harper's Magazine for May, 1883.) The Bridge as a Monument. By Montgomery Schuyler. (Reprinted from Harper's Weekly, May 27, 1883.) Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Two Portraits and Twenty-eight Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XIII.

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D. D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D. D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. Francis Gardner, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $10 00.

XIV.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. For universal Reference, including the History of the World to the Autumn of 1881. By Benjamin Vincent. Revised for American Readers. Large 8vo, 800 pages, Cloth, $5 00.

XV.

THE REAL LORD BYRON. New Views of the Poet's Life. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Yolande. By William Black. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 25; Paper, 50 cents.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Arden. By A. Mary F. Robinson. 25 cents.

Mr. Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 50 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 50 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Elliott Trollope. 50 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 25 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Sister Dora. Memoirs of Margaret de Ribaumont, Viscountess of Bellaise. By Charlotte M. Yonge. 25 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

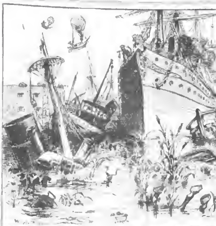
☞ Harper's Catalogue mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Wetmore & Co., Agents wanted. J. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.



THE NEW YORK HARBOR EVERGLADES.

[SEE "THE GARBAGE BLOCKADE," PAGE 403.]

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

GENTLEMEN'S

BOSTON GARTER.

An exceedingly neat invention without which every gentleman's dress is incomplete, especially during the Summer months ... the Boston Garter ...

For Sale by all the leading Gents' Furnishing Houses, or Sample will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Cotton, 25 cents per pair; Silk, 75 cents per pair.

Mention this paper. Address

GEORGE FROST & CO.,

All Seaside, Lake, and Mountain Retreats ... Railway.

RoundWriting

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS.

Mailed for $1.50 by stationers, or KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

"Headache for years. 2 boxes of Dr. ... cured it."—Wm. A. Moore, Coulterville, Cal.

LANGUOR AND LASSITUDE,

SO COMMON IN SUMMER, INDICATE A TORPID CONDITION OF THE LIVER AND A SLUGGISH CIRCULATION OF THE LIFE-GIVING FLUIDS. A TEASPOONFUL OF TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT IN A GLASS OF WATER HALF AN HOUR BEFORE BREAKFAST WILL GENTLY RELIEVE AND REGULATE THE LIVER, QUICKEN AND PURIFY THE CIRCULATION, AND IMPART NEW LIFE AND VIGOR TO EVERY FUNCTION OF THE BODY. ALL DRUGGISTS HAVE IT.

PHOTOGRAPHIC OUTFITS ... H. A. & J. HICKS ... Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

Russell & Morgan Printing Co.'s New Factory, Lock Street, Eggleston Avenue and Sixth Street, Cincinnati, O.

THE RUSSELL & MORGAN CO.'S

U. S. PLAYING CARDS.

ALL INDEXED, ALL ROUND CORNERS, AND EVERY PACK IN A NEAT BOX.

VICTOR E. MAUGER, General Agent, Cincinnati, O.

New York Office, corner of Reade St. and West Broadway.

PAVARA PILLS.

These Pills are the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. No pain, nausea, or purging. ...

C. N. CRITTENTON, General Agent, 115 Fulton Street, New York City.

BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make ... Theatres, Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send size of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address ... EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey and the New England States, to ... 15 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS. In 26 Numbers, ... of writing. ... for trial, by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 25c. in stamps. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS

TRADE P&A MARK.

ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER

SAYS OF

DR. TOWNSEND'S REMEDY FOR

Hay-Fever, Asthma, and Catarrh:

"I believe it will be sure in ninety cases in a hundred."

"I am happy to say that your remedy has served me ... fully as well as the last year."

Pamphlets, with Mr. Beecher's full letter and other testimonials, furnished on application.

DR. M. M. TOWNSEND, Frostburg, Md.

... and by all Druggists.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT "SHORE-BAND" COLLARS
AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

Hair and Scalp diseases thoroughly cured by Dr. C. W. Benson's ... $1, druggists.

A Voice from the People.

THE GREATEST CURATIVE SUCCESS of THE AGE.

No medicine introduced to the public has ever met with the success accorded to Hop Bitters. ... It is the best known curative article in the world. ... It is the purest, speediest, and effective agent known for the building up of debilitated systems, and as a general family medicine.

... Very respectfully, REV. H. FEREBEE.

... ONE LADIES ... IN THE HOME OF OUR PASTOR.

... I have taken ... Bitters. ...

... I have been taking Hop Bitters for inflammation of the kidneys and bladder. ...

If you have a sick friend, whose life is a burden, one bottle of Hop Bitters will restore that friend to perfect health and happiness.

It has cured me of several diseases ... I have not seen a sick day since I took Hop Bitters. MRS. FANNIE GREEN.

... I recommend my patients to use them. DR. A. PRATT, Treater of Chronic Diseases.

... LEANDER WHITNEY.

What it Did for an Old Lady

... W. B. HATHAWAY, Agt. U. S. Ex. Co.

Honest Old Tim

... TIM BURCH.

Anna Maria Krider, Wife of Tobias K.

... A MEMBER OF CANADIAN ...

A Rich Lady's Experience.

...

My mother says Hop Bitters is the only thing that will keep her from her old and severe attacks of paralysis and headache.—Ex. ... Feb. 2, ...

I have sold Hop Bitters for ... and there is no medicine that surpasses them for ... kidney complaints, and many ... malarial climate. H. T. ...

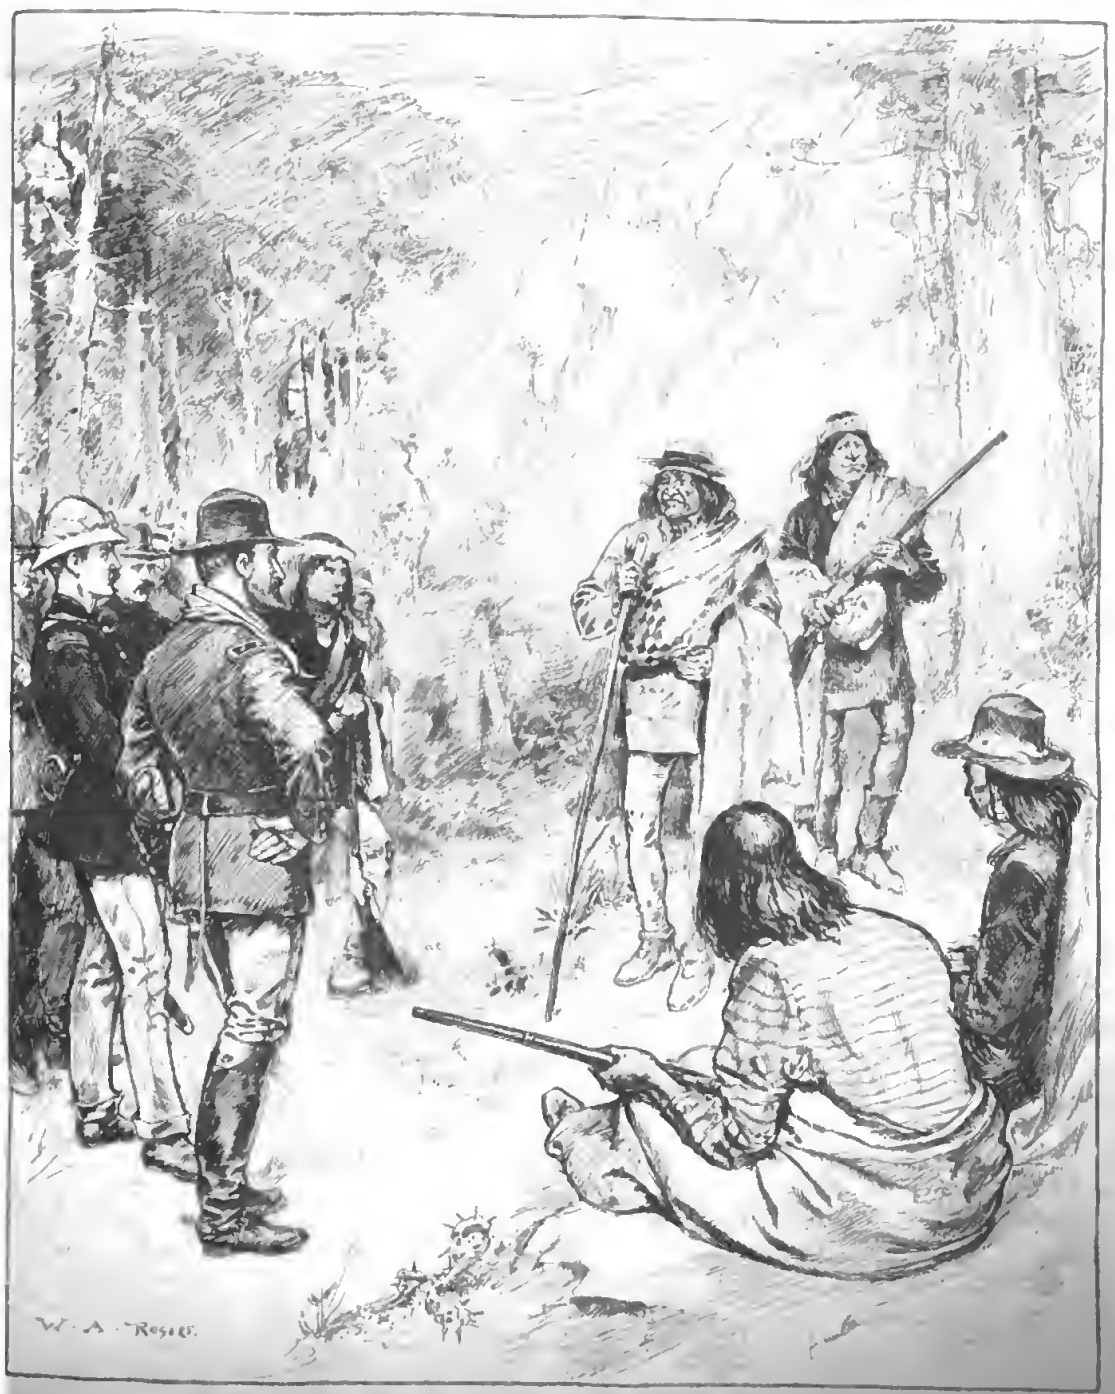
ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1385. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



THE APACHE SURRENDER—CHIEF NANÉ ENTERING GENERAL CROOK'S CAMP TO SUE FOR PEACE.
DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS FROM A SKETCH BY A. F. HARMER.—[SEE PAGE 429.]

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOWETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the improvement of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges in the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883, and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $300; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is available, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOWETT have been published. That published in 1875 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE FOURTH OF JULY

THE one-hundred-and-seventh anniversary of "Independence day" dawns upon a country so prosperous and peaceful and progressive that it is impossible not to believe that the happiness of the children is shared by the fathers. Their simple rural republic, indeed, is lost in the continental Union, and in the vast industrial and commercial developments and inventions of the century. A little one has become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation. But could the first builders of the state behold it now, they would own that its life and vigor and marvellous extension had sprung from their own spirit and principles, and that the faith with which they wrought is even more profound than it was in their own minds. Indeed, there is nothing more striking than the fact that notwithstanding the appearance of new difficulties and perils not foreseen by the fathers, the confidence of the most intelligent Americans in what may be called the American idea is very much more general and strong than it was a hundred years ago. The reason is to be found both in our own national experience and in our observation of the experience of other nations. While the political influence of the United States upon all other countries during the century has been profound, other countries have not politically influenced the United States in any degree. The institutions of European nations have been steadily Americanized, but those of the United States have not been in the least Europeanized.

The most sagacious and patriotic men of the Revolution accepted a republic as inevitable, but many, if not most of them, considered it to be an experiment which might end in disaster, and when JEFFERSON was elected they thought the day of doom was at hand. But the men of to-day regard republican government not only as the most just and reasonable, but, because it is so as the strongest and most permanent. This is not because it has not revealed dangers of its own, but because it has also shown their correctives. The old doctrine that, as the mass of men must be always more or less ignorant, a government of the people must be necessarily a government of ignorance, is met by the perception that the brute force of numbers yields naturally to mental and moral superiority, and that while the results of this law are not visible at every point and in every incident, the law is vindicated by a broad and continued observation. It is found, against all anticipation and theory, that the people correct their own errors, and that if special measures of reform are more promptly undertaken upon the official order of a council, yet that reform is sure and effective only when it is justified and demanded by public opinion. The natural beginning of political progress with us, therefore, is not with the legislature or the government, but with the public sentiment which makes both. The republic itself began in the town meeting, and all permanent progress springs from the same source—from public opinion.

The three gravest political perils that we have passed were the election of 1800, the civil war, and the election of 1876. In the war the moral conviction and the intelligence of a free people alone saved the country. In the two elections it was the force of public opinion that settled the immediate dispute, and the trained Republican habit, which preceded the Constitution, of respecting forms of law, which without hesitation made the settlement final. The past is not only secure, but it is inspiring, and on the happy day that recalls the heroism and the suffering and the glorious triumph of our fathers who are gone, those who are now the living fathers may well say to the children, in Mr. BANCROFT'S glowing words at the centenary of the Exeter Academy, "We, your elder brothers, cheer you on to action, happiness, and glory. Yet do not in reply say to the aged that we are passing away. To a good world belong age and youth, and to us who are to go before you let your words be, 'Ever and forever move joyfully and hopefully on.'"

PLATFORMS

THE platitudes of party platforms are a familiar text. But it is curious to see that while they are perfectly well understood to be manifestoes which are intended to "straddle" all doubtful questions, and which are known to bind nobody, they are often treated with gravity as serious declarations of principle. Nobody probably was ever known to vote for party candidates because of the statements of a party platform. A party is judged by its conduct and by its representatives when it has power, and not by what it says when it wishes to obtain power. When it is defeated it is because of its own offenses, and not because of the promises of its rival. If both the Ohio Conventions had adjourned without making a platform, the result of the election would doubtless be precisely the same. The cardinal principle of a platform is to state what is supposed to be the current opinion of the party, but to state it in a vague and general way, so as not to alienate the most backward party Bourbon, and so as to conciliate the independent voter and even the party opponent. But nothing is droller than to exhort a voter in New York, for instance, to support the Democratic party in the State as a party of superior economy, honesty, and intelligence in administration for the reason that it praises virtue in its annual platform. The exhortation is droll, because the Democratic party constantly shows what it is and what is to be expected from it, and it is judged by what it does and not by what it says. Its prodigious majority in New York last year sprang not from confidence in it, but from disgust with the Republican party. The voters neither knew nor cared what the Democratic party had said in its platform.

In Ohio the value of platform declarations can be tested by one plank of both the recent party platforms. The Republicans said,

"We reiterate the declaration of previous Republican Conventions in favor of civil service reform, and we renew every needful effort to make that measure practical, and we especially approve the provisions made for a Republican Congress for giving the patriotic soldiers of the late war, with proper qualifications, the preference to all places under the government."

This is simple buncombe. It means nothing whatever, and was meant to mean nothing. The Democrats say:

"We reaffirm the resolutions of the State Conventions of Ohio in 1880, 1881 and 1882, and of the Democratic National Conventions of 1872, 1876, and 1880, demanding thorough reform and purification of the civil service, and charge that the Republican party has violated every pledge it has heretofore given for the reform thereof, and has failed during its long administration of the government to correct even the most crying abuses, and we demand, therefore, a change in the executive administration of the government itself as the reform first of all necessary, as made more manifest by the recent Star Route trials, thereby meeting corrupt ring confederated to protect crime and prevent the punishment of criminals, and by so doing to make it possible to again punish fraud and theft in the public service."

This is equally buncombe, and buncombe intended not to secure reform, but to give a cry for next year's campaign. Its value as a sincere expression of a reform purpose is shown by the conduct of the Ohio Democrats in the Legislature during the last winter, who ridiculed and resisted reform. Upon this subject, as upon all others, the parties will not be tried by the phrases of a platform, but by practical performance. Neither the Republican nor the Democratic machine honestly desires a genuine reform in the civil service, and very naturally, for they are the product of the abuses which reform would correct.

But, despite the machines, each party has "made a record" upon the subject by which it will be tried. The reform in itself is, of course, wholly non-partisan. It concerns the principles and methods of administration, not the policy of the government. But it will not be denied that the Republican attitude and achievement have been more promising than the Democratic. Nor can it reasonably be doubted that "reform" in the sense of the Ohio Democratic platform and of the proposed Democratic cry for next year means only that "clean sweep" of all the subordinate places which is one of the most wanton pieces of extravagance of which a sensible country can be guilty, and which is one of the great dangers that a real reform would avert. There is probably no intelligent person in the Union so wild as to assert that a Democratic administration would honestly respect the beginnings of reforms that have been already made, and carry them forward. Whatever some Democrats might desire, the party action would conform to the general demand of the party. Even the Democrats who are loudest in insisting that the campaign cry shall be "reform" are very careful to say that by reform they mean a general turning out and appointing of the civil service. They sneer at the reform bill, and the system which it provides for introducing a genuine reform, as trivial and contemptible. Their purpose is to overthrow it, and to restore the infamous spoils system complete and unchecked. The general conviction of this purpose, founded not upon the declarations of Democratic Conventions, but upon experience of Democratic conduct, no platform will be able to shake, and the just apprehension of the consequences of such a causeless disturbance no sneering at civil service reform will allay. Of the Democratic party, with which this country is perfectly well acquainted, change may be certainly expected, but not reform.

MR. RANDALL IN 1877.

THE Democratic opponents of Mr. RANDALL foolishly revile him for the most patriotic and courageous act of his public life—his refusal as Speaker to carry out the views of the Democratic obstructionists in 1877 and plunge the country into civil war. The result of the election was in doubt. Democratic intimidation and violence and cheating at the polls, and Republican conduct in counting the vote, had covered the election with suspicion. The Senate was Republican, and the House of Representatives Democratic, and so fierce was party feeling that an irregular exhibit contest and no valid declaration of the result of the election were imminent.

In this extreme emergency patriotic men of both parties in Congress united in devising a scheme of settlement. The Electoral Commission was appointed by the consent of both parties, and in accordance with the terms of the law creating it. According to those terms also its decision was rendered. By every consideration of honor and patriotism Congress was bound to accept the decision. But a certain number of Democrats resolved if possible by parliamentary obstruction to prevent acceptance—a course which would certainly have ended in civil war. Had the Speaker not been brave and honest enough to decline to become their tool, the most disastrous consequences would have followed, and the American republic would have fallen, as other republics have fallen, before the fury of party spirit.

That the calamity was averted was due to the Speaker more than to any other individual. He steadily held to the agreement. The result was constitutionally declared. The President was peacefully inaugurated. The whole transaction was one of the most striking events in the history of constitutional liberty, for it showed the ability of two great parties to settle a perilous contest by a common understanding, honorably respected, instead of resorting to force and anarchy. Mr. RANDALL'S service in the desperate juncture was that of a sagacious and firm American patriot, and if his party should resent his conduct it would only deepen the just and profound distrust with which, as Senator BECK truly remarks, his party is still regarded.

JUDGE HOADLY'S JOKE.

JUDGE HOADLY has begun his campaign in Ohio joyously. He denies energetically a rumor that he is already disgusted with his party friends and intends to withdraw, and with capital humor he declares the Democratic party to be a party of progress. "I believe with all my heart and strength," he says, "in a new and living Democracy, not in a fossilized and Bourbonized Republicanism. In this creed my own party and thousands of hopeful Republicans are with me." That is to say that the Democratic party as a party holds the position and the views which are held by the most intelligent and independent Republicans. Judge HOADLY has a keen sense of humor, and his joke is excellent. He knows, of course, as well as every body else, that not one of the purposes which are especially favored by such Republicans as he describes as an object of the Democratic party as such, and his remark, had it not been a joke would have been exactly reversed. He would have said that his desire of honest, simple, economical, and efficient government was shared by a few hopeful Democrats and by independent Republicans.

There was nothing whatever in the action of the last Democratic Congress or in that of any Democratic Legislature which shows that the great interests of the country, or any progressive reform policy, would be safer and surer in Democratic than in Republican hands. The party, as such, has no tariff principle or policy. It holds, as a party, no ground upon administrative reform. The dangerous financial schemes and heresies have all relied upon Democratic sympathy and support. If an enlightened economy has anywhere distinguished Democratic control of the public treasury, it has escaped public attention. The Democratic party, as such, is not identified in the public mind with a single great patriotic and beneficial measure or policy since the day in 1861 when it was driven from national power, and left the government struggling for life with Democratic hands at its throat.

Moreover—and this is a point which gives especial pungency to the judge's joke—the great body of the Republicans who, like Judge HOADLY, united with the Democrats ten years ago to elect a Republican and a Democratic President—in other words, to bring the Democratic party into national power—have long since resumed their relations with the Republican party, satisfied that as a party the Democrats are not to be trusted. Still further, the judge humorously affects to be unmindful of the significant fact that the action of "thousands of hopeful Republicans" whom he mentions, the independent Republicans who scratched in 1879 in New York, who baffled the third term plot in 1880, and who tacitly permitted the election of Governor CLEVELAND in New York in 1882, took all three steps not to promote but to prevent Democratic national success. It was the danger of a "fossilized and Bourbon" rule, which they believed to be identical with Democratic triumph, which led those Republicans to call a halt to the reckless leadership of their own party, and the call was heard and heeded. The judge's joke must not lead any incautious person to misapprehend the views of the "hopeful Republicans" of whom he speaks. Their hope is not in or of the Democratic party. Their rebuke instead of their desertion of their own party shows that their hope in it still remains. If they had lost hope of it they would have joined the Democrats long ago. As a joke, therefore, the remark of Judge HOADLY that the "hopeful Republicans" agree with the Democratic party as a party is unequalled. But as a serious remark it would be a still greater joke.

MR. BEECHER'S BIRTHDAY.

The celebration of Mr. BEECHER'S seventieth birthday was the occasion of a striking popular demonstration of regard and admiration. There can be no more trying ordeal than that to which a man is subjected upon such an occasion. The unbounded praise the hero of the hour naturally put aside as the extravagance of friendly partiality. Mr. BEECHER'S gifts and services, however, are not the less striking and signal because admiration may express itself in an unmeasured attitude. No good cause has ever wanted a friend when it appealed to him, and few friends can bring to any cause such powerful aid as he.

He is one of the few great preachers of his time, and as a popular orator he has had few superiors even in our history, which teems with eloquent speakers. His religious independence is unequalled among clergymen who belong to the recognized evangelical denominations, and not belong to the recognized evangelical denominations, and not belong to churches more significantly the change in the relations of Christian denominations than the difference in the attitude of LYMAN BEECHER to CHANNING, Unitarianism and that of his son to the modern form of the same spirit. Indeed, the secret of the difference is that the son sees that it is a spirit of life, and not a creed.

Mr. BEECHER has been a hard worker; but a strong constitution, cooperate living, and a buoyant temperament have brought him in full vigor and freshness to threescore and ten. He bates no jot of heart or hope, and, so far as appears, his hold upon the love and confidence of his enormous audience is unrelaxed, and the good work that he has so long been doing he will long continue to do.

THE CRUSADES.

We mentioned last year the illustrated lectures upon American history by the Rev. Dr. EGGLESTON, of Clifton, Staten Island, which were so successful that he has prepared a series of four lectures upon the Crusades, to be illustrated with stereopticon illustrations from DORÉ'S famous pictures. Dr. EGGLESTON'S admirable arrangement of his subject and simple narrative style make his lectures exceedingly interesting as well as instructive. The new series will be first delivered before the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, and then at Chickering Hall in New York, and the lectures will be undoubtedly among the most attractive of the winter.

HAWTHORNE.

The "Riverside Edition" of HAWTHORNE, published by HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN, & Co., is now complete, and a very attractive edition it is. It is edited by Mr. GEORGE P. LATHROP, the son-in-law of the famous author, and himself a well-known writer. He has wisely included every thing of HAWTHORNE'S—Fanshawe, the Life of Franklin Pierce, and the magazine papers, with the fine article upon Dr. JOHNSON, and he has written a biographical sketch which is admirably done, and in the most complete and satisfactory manner of HAWTHORNE yet published.

Of the works themselves the general verdict has been as plainly declared as upon those of any author who is called a classic. HAWTHORNE is by far the greatest creative genius that America has yet produced. His intellectuality and power are as pronounced as those of any story-teller—SCOTT, or DICKENS, or THACKERAY, or BALZAC, or George Sand. The entrancing spell of his romance is unsurpassed, and the snowy simplicity, the racy purity of his style is, and its total freedom from effort, or ostentation, or rhetoric, place him among the very first of writers.

The qualities of his romances are all evident in his smaller stories; but three or four volumes of these had been published without perception upon the part of the public that among the pleasant but unimportant writers of the day a great author had appeared. Readers who will turn back to the Democratic Review of forty years ago will find many of his most charming tales, which produced no observable general impression at the time. LONGFELLOW had greeted HAWTHORNE in the North American, but they had been colleagues together at Bowdoin, and the North American was then read only by a few. Now, the fame of the author is of the highest kind. The strange insight of a genius essentially solitary, the vivid play of a weird imagination, the subtle sympathy with what we call the supernatural environment of human life, are but names of parts of the power of this extraordinary and most interesting writer.

THE ART COMPETITION

The attention of all who desire to enter the list of competitors for the prizes which have been for several months announced at the head of our editorial columns is called to the fact that in less than a month from this date the time for sending in designs will close. We would caution those who hereafter send for the Christmas Hymn to address their letters simply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York city, as letters addressed "Art Competition" will not be opened until the committee meets to determine upon the merits of the designs.

THE CORNELL ALUMNI.

We alluded at the time to the severe criticisms upon Cornell University and its management that were made during the spring, and to President WHITE'S detailed and cogent reply. The controversy culminated in the election of a trustee, and the interest of the alumni was fully aroused. The personal attendance and the proxies secured a much larger vote than has been known hitherto, and the contest was decided by a very large majority in favor of the President. A resolution of implicit confidence in him and his conduct of affairs was passed, and the result was a perfectly free and emphatic verdict of those most immediately interested.

President WHITE is a man at once so generous and so enlightened, so thoroughly in sympathy with the modern spirit in education, so familiar with the condition of education everywhere, and so justly proud of the great institution which he has so largely modelled, that there is no doubt that the verdict is generally welcome. Even those who have believed that there was a solid ground of complaint must feel that there is good reason to reconsider the methods of redress, if not the propriety of the censure.

The event in any case will be beneficial to the University, for while the satisfaction of the alumni and the general excellence of the management have been positively affirmed, the authorities will be justly stimulated by the consciousness that they are steadily and closely scrutinized by all in whom the good name of Cornell is precious.

FLANAGANISM.

Mr. EVANS, the new Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is evidently one of the politicians who have no idea that anybody takes civil service reform in earnest. "But Mr. EVANS has been widely understood. He has attracted excellent and efficient officers to give their places to friends of his own, upon the good old theory that the offices of which he controls the appointment are his personal perquisites and not public trusts, and the good man is amazed to find a prodigious uproar going on, and he is actually told that it is substantially a betrayal of his own trust to postpone his official authority to the gratification of his personal partialities.

There has been no more significant sign of the remarkable change of public sentiment upon this subject than the sharp censure of Mr. EVANS. Like the worthy FLANAGAN, of Flanagan's Mills, who demanded of the Chicago Convention, "What are we here for, except the offices?" the notion that Mr. EVANS can be almost heard asking, "What am I Commissioner of Internal Revenue for, if not to provide for my friends?" The excellent man is doubtless lost in consternation that the scatter-brained sentimentalists should be able to raise such a row over the steady gang and custom.

We wonder that some esteemed contemporary of the daily press has not sent a "commissioner" to Texas to learn from FLANAGAN'S own lips what he thinks of the reform fall, and of the condemnation of Mr. EVANS merely for turning out honest and experienced and efficient officers to give their places to his own friends. We can hear the Texas statesman shouting lustily, "Why, what on earth is he there for?"

PERSONAL.

Is genius inherited through fathers or through mothers? Some thinkers, like Mr. FRANCIS GALTON, affirm that it can be transmitted only by the father, others, like M. DE LEMAINE, in his treatise entitled Hereditous Mothers, maintain that the descent is exclusively through the feminine branch of the house. Mr. HENRY WARD BEECHER seems to side with the latter class of disputants, for in his seventy-septuagenarian address he said, "From my father I received a sound stomach, from my mother a serene spirit."

—The family physician in the suburbs of New York city earns more money than he collects. A case has come to our knowledge in which after practicing faithfully and acceptably for thirty or forty years he is about to retire into bankruptcy, with thirty or forty thousand dollars of unpaid entries in his account-book. The amount of gratuitous medical service now rendered by the poor is proportionately much larger than ever before, and it is obtained not only at the hospital and the dispensary, but in the doctor's private office and the patient's own house. Nor do experienced physicians expect much gratitude from their pauper patients.

—At the annual Commencement of a Catholic seminary in New York city a principal attraction of the programme was the singing of an Angelo Netenade by an invisible chorus of young ladies.

—A New Yorker who visited some of the finest residences in Boston, especially those in the Back Bay region, was struck by the greater size of the rooms and the increased sense of airiness, as compared with New York houses of the same grade. "In the Boston halls and drawing rooms," he said, "you can take a long breath without feeling that you have interfered with anybody's rights."

—Dr. KEISELMANN, who died recently in Paris, was the man who demonstrated that tuberculosis, or consumption, could be transmitted by inoculation. He inoculated fourteen monkeys, and twelve of them died in from 34 to 210 days. He proved also that consumption is contagious, or rather infectious. A small healthy monkey was put into a cage with several monkeys who had been inoculated. One of the latter became much attached to him, and almost constantly held him in his arms. Nine days after his death the small monkey died too, and on autopsy showed that his disease was consumption. The cage was then emptied and disinfected and twelve seven fresh monkeys put into it. None of them took the disease.

—A French scientist has submitted to a learned society the results of his study of the effect of tobacco on boys. Out of thirty-seven boys, between the ages of nine and fifteen, who used the weed, twenty-two showed symptoms of a distinct disturbance of the circulation, impaired digestion, palpitation of the heart, bruit at the carotids, sluggishness of intellect, and a craving for alcoholic drink. Eleven of the lads had smoked for six months, eight for one year, and sixteen for more than two years.

—Mr. Judge to MOLÈRE, the Gallicism poet (says the Pall Mall Gazette), has just made known to the world the tragedy of his home. In the New World, as in the Old, the poet soon needs take all manhood into his confidence and Judge to Mr. Judge follows the example of Lord Byron in letting the whole world know the miseries of his love. "I suppose the world needs a few grimmest from into it now and then," once said the unhappy wife of one of the best known of English novelists, "but I am very sorry for those who have to live with them."

—Lord Rosebery thinks that "the most precious reward a man can hope for in public life is the friendly recognition of his fellow-countrymen."

—Mr. ALDERMAN THOMAS SUTTON has written: "To the England of our own time (it has often enough been remarked) the novel is what the drama was to the England of SHAKESPEARE'S. In the modern world of English letters the novel is everywhere and the drama is nowhere. But we may remark one point of radical difference between the taste of play-goers in the age of SHAKESPEARE, and the taste of novel-readers in our own. Tragedy was then at least as popular as either romance or realistic comedy, whereas nothing would seem to be more unpopular with the run of modern readers than the threatening shadow of tragedy projected across the whole length of a story."

—The influence of the late Cincinnati Domestic Festival is yet potent in the Queen City of the West. One esteemed contemporary the Commercial Gazette continues its criticism of SHAKSPEARE'S plays, the latest of its remarks being concerned with "The Character of Hamlet's Father's Ghost." The ghost, observes that journal, "is an unwholesome disturbance, and has nothing to do with it." It may be remembered that he has been the chief agent in moving the plot of the play, and not content with simply "having nothing to do with it," he insists upon going on, and he is actually told that it is substantially a betrayal of his own trust to postpone his official authority to the gratification of his personal partialities.

There has been no more significant sign of the remarkable change of public sentiment upon this subject than the sharp censure of Mr. EVANS. Like the worthy FLANAGAN, of Flanagan's Mills, who demanded of the Chicago Convention, "What are we here for, except the offices?" he notified Mr. EVANS on his almost heard asking, "What am I Commissioner of Internal Revenue for, if not to provide for my friends?" The excellent man is doubtless lost in consternation that the scatter-brained sentimentalists should be able to raise such a row over the steady gang and custom.

We wonder that some esteemed contemporary of the daily press has not sent a "commissioner" to Texas to learn from FLANAGAN'S own lips what he thinks of the reform fall, and of the condemnation of Mr. EVANS merely for turning out honest and experienced and efficient officers to give their places to his own friends. We can hear the Texas statesman shouting lustily, "Why, what on earth is he there for?"

—Mr. WHISTLER took his medal at the Salon ostensibly by reason of the merits of his very artistic portrait of his mother, recently exhibited publicly in this city; but there were half a dozen other pictures of his at another exhibition in Paris at the same time. He is well known to French artists, and is a master of their language. That he deserves this late official recognition of his undoubted genius no artist in any country would be likely to deny.

—We take pleasure in copying this announcement from the Chicago Tribune: "The Germantown (Pa.) Telegraph, one of the oldest and most profitable weeklies in the country, published at Germantown, Pennsylvania, has been purchased from its present owner and founder, Major PHILIP R. FRAAS, by HENRY W. RAYMOND, son of the late HENRY J. RAYMOND, who has been for nearly four years the literary editor of the Tribune, and for nearly two years its musical critic. The purchase is made through the disinterested kindness and generosity of GEORGE W. CHILDS, who, out of pure friendship, has assumed all the notes and guaranteed the sale, thus enabling Mr. RAYMOND to own a prosperous paper of his own, and to pay for it out of its profits. The Telegraph was established in 1820, has a wide circulation and a large advertising patronage. The transfer does not take place until August 1, and Mr. RAYMOND does not assume the entire management until October 1." Mr. RAYMOND is a graduate of Yale. He possesses fine culture, high literary ability, and a large measure of editorial newspaper talent. We wish him all success in his new enterprise.

THE SEVENTH IN CAMP.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup.—[See Page 422.]

"She put her hands on his shoulders and bent down over him, examining the cards which he had thrown upon the table"

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MATRIMONY," "MDLLE. DE MERSAC," "NO NEW THING," "HEADS OF MONEY," ETC

CHAPTER V.

MRS. FARQUHAR PLAYS ACCORDION TO RULE.

It was on a dull afternoon in September that the dreaded disturber of our peace descended upon us. My uncle drove off to the station to meet her, while the General and I went out shooting, and remained out until the light became so bad that it was impossible to delay our return any longer. We had given up talking about Mrs. Farquhar for some time past, and we did not depart from our rule upon the present occasion, but there was a tacit understanding between us that it would be well to shirk as much as we conveniently could all that an inward interval which separates the arrival of a guest from the dinner hour. The General was silent and out of spirits, and had shot badly all the afternoon. Possibly his remembrance may have been reproaching him with his desertion to the enemy, or it may be that he was looking forward with some apprehension to the meeting which must shortly take place. I myself was depressed, feeling as if the last of all the good old days was coming to its close, and I also was a little afraid of that meeting. I don't know why I was afraid, nor exactly what my anticipations were, but I well remember that the meeting, when it came, was something altogether unlike what I had expected.

We crossed the dark hall and entered the library, where a cheerful fire was blazing, and where the sudden flood of light set us winking and blinking. The General was the first to cross the threshold, and hardly had he done so when I, peering over his shoulder, saw a little black figure rise up from the fireside and hurry forward with some outcry.

A rather shrill but not ungentle voice exclaimed, with a slight Scotch accent, "Eh, Tom, is it you?" and immediately the General was being kissed and embraced. He had to bend himself almost double in order to render this operation possible, and while it was going on all that I saw of Mrs. Farquhar was a small portion of an arm and a diminutive white head covered with flashing jewels, which beat a gentle accompaniment on the General's shoulder to certain indistinct but affectionate words.

"Well, mother, so you've got over the journey all right," was all that the General said, as he disengaged himself.

It was now my turn. "Can this be Charley?" Mrs. Farquhar exclaimed, looking up into my face, while she took possession of my hand. And I was very nearly retorting, "Can this be Mrs. Farquhar?" for in truth she was an extremely pretty and agreeable-looking old lady, and it was difficult at first sight to trace any connection between the outward aspect of her and that cantankerous disposition with which I had been led to infer that she was afflicted.

My eyes having by this time become accustomed to the light, I was able to take notice of hers, which were brown in color, and as bright as a squirrel's. Her abundant gray hair formed a frame for a sharp little face, which might probably have had but small claims to beauty in its youth, but which, in the different order of grandeur applicable to old age, presented no defect, unless it were the somewhat exaggerated length of the upper lip. She was, of course, dressed in widow's weeds—a garb far more uncompromisingly ugly in those days than it is now—but the sweeping black robes suited her small, spare figure well enough, and even the close-fitting white cap with its broad strings, which no widow of the year 1851 would have dared to modify, was not unbecoming to her, as it would have been to a younger woman.

Attractive though she was, however, I was not desirous of being embraced by her; for I was at that time of life when a young man dislikes nothing so much as being kissed by his female relatives. Therefore I did not bend down like my predecessor, but held myself up to my natural height of six feet two above the level of the carpet, an altitude which rendered all surprises on the part of a lady of Mrs. Farquhar's inches impracticable. She was so considerate as to make an attempt of the kind that I feared, and contented herself with holding my head in one of hers while she patted it gently with the other, murmuring, "A fine young fellow indeed! Dear, dear, how time goes on! The last time I saw you you were a baby—just a baby, and now you are a great tall man, and you've been captain of the Eton eight, as I read in the newspapers. That is something to be proud of, Bernard"—turning quickly round upon my uncle—"I am sure you must be proud of this young gentleman."

"I am," said my uncle laughing, "I take good care not to tell him so."

"Oh, ave, you are a pessimist, returned Mrs. Farquhar, gayly, "but I am all for giving credit where credit is due."

Now my uncle was not a pessimist, nor had he ever been known to grudge any man his due; but the general tone of Mrs. Farquhar's remarks appeared to me to be so pleasant and sensible that I was not disposed for nothing. I should have imagined that a tolerably well-spread table was more to Scotland upon the subject of the Eton eight and the glory of rowing stroke thereon, and I was naturally glad to find that this was not so. I modestly gave Mrs. Farquhar to understand that the high honors to which I had attained were due not so much to inherent genius as to unremitting labor. Lots of other fellows, I said, might have turned out far better oars than I could ever hope to be; but they wouldn't give their whole minds to it, and of course, if a fellow wouldn't give his whole mind to a thing—

At this my uncle and the General burst out laughing, and Mrs. Farquhar, after a moment, joined in their laughter. "Oh, I know what you're meaning, both of you," said she, "you think he should be giving his mind to his books. But, dear me! he has his whole life before him for study, and he has only just these few years to be young in. I say he is right to make the most of youth while it lasts."

How true! I began to feel that Mrs. Farquhar was almost a kindred spirit; and in another five minutes we were all seated round the fire, chatting in as friendly a fashion as if we had really been what we appeared to be—a cheerful family party. And in this condition of unity, peace, and [illegible] we continued throughout the evening. There were one or two slight awkwardnesses, but they were so slight that I should hardly have noticed them if I had not been on the look-out for something of the kind. Several times during dinner Mrs. Farquhar flatly contradicted my uncle, and in the drawing-room afterward she contradicted us all round upon I forget what political question, although our several views with regard to it did not happen to resemble one another.

"Oh, but that is nonsense—just nonsense!" she said, when my uncle endeavored to explain his reasons for holding certain opinions. It sounded a little rude; but, in that, as in previous instances, she spoke so placidly and good-humoredly that no one could suppose any offense to be meant. I said to myself that perhaps people in Scotland were in the habit of contradicting each other by way of making conversation—and indeed I have formed more erroneous surmises than that on my life.

I was left for a few minutes alone with my uncle before I bade him good night, and he said, "You see, Charley, my mother is not an ogress, after all."

"I think she is very nice," I admitted, rather reluctantly.

"Yes, you may remember that I told you you would think so. And she has confided to me that she thinks you very nice too. So all is for the best."

And really it did seem as though all were going to be for the best. Very likely I might not have taken so kindly to Mrs. Farquhar had she not taken kindly to me, and shown in the plainest possible manner that she had done so. During the next three days she lost no opportunity of patting me on the back and flattering my youthful vanity, and that, perhaps, caused me to overlook some acts of interference which I should otherwise have indignantly resented.

"Bernard, do you never have family prayers?" she asked, the very first morning, at breakfast.

My uncle confessed that such had not been his custom.

"Oh, but I think you should," she said.

"A man must please himself about such matters," struck in the General, boldly.

"Now, Tom, that is as like you! A thing is right, or it is wrong, and if we profess and call ourselves Christians, we ought certainly to set an example of religion to our servants."

"I dare say you are right," my uncle said. And thenceforth family prayers became an institution at Thirlby.

Many people may be disposed to think that Mrs. Farquhar was justified in upholding her sentiment with regard to this particular innovation; but it will be allowed that, when she went on to alter the hours of breakfast and dinner, she was making herself a little too much at home. Nevertheless, this change also was accomplished without opposition or audible murmur.

For the rest, Mrs. Farquhar (who, to be sure, had had everything her own way so far) made herself very agreeable on all about, high and low, and since nobody had yet been instructed to regard her as a permanent inmate, her mild tyranny was accepted submissively enough. I may confess that, for my own part, I was alive to the advantage of having a lady in the house for the next few weeks, for I foresaw that she and Maud would become fast allies, and that, as a consequence, the [illegible] to visit the Hall a great deal more frequently than [illegible] had been.

But here my prescience was at fault, for it [illegible] of those mysterious facts which only a [illegible] student of feminine nature can explain that Mrs. Farquhar did not take to Maud at all. The Rector and his daughter came to dinner on the fourth day, and I don't think they had been ten minutes in the drawing-room before the two ladies had a trifling difference. It was about some parish matter—I don't remember what, but I do remember perfectly the tone of kindly reproof in which Mrs. Farquhar said, "My dear, when you are a little older you will know better." Maud smiled, and made no reply, but I knew very well (in spite of subsequent assertions of hers to the contrary) that from that moment she

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1361.

Digitized by Google

cordially detested the little old lady whose presence among us she had declared to be so desirable.

I could not resist taking the first opportunity that offered of asking her whether Mrs Farquhar came up to her expectations. That was after dinner, in the drawing-room, to which vast and rather melancholy apartment we had adjourned, as it was a company night, instead of to the more cheerful library. The four elders had just sat down to a hand at an old-fashioned spindle-legged table, and I placed myself inside Maud on a sofa some little distance from them.

"Quite. In fact, she surpasses them," said Maud, in answer to my question.

"I dare say; but in what sense?—for the better, or for the worse?"

"Oh, for the better, I suppose. That is, she seems to me in be better suited for her station than I thought she would be. Evidently she knows how to assert herself, and is capable of snubbing people too, when necessary. And that, you know, is a valuable gift, under certain circumstances."

"So it is," I agreed, "and what makes it the more valuable in Mrs Farquhar's case is that she uses it with so much discrimination. She likes me, she hasn't ceased to say sweet things of and to me since she entered the house. Other people, as you know, have not been so fortunate, and I shouldn't wonder if other people were feeling a little bit sore in consequence." The truth was that I had not yet quite forgiven my companion for having driven off and left me in the lurch at Yarmouth in that cruel way.

"My dear Charley," she answered, "do you really suppose that I care two straws whether Mrs. Farquhar likes me or not? I hoped that she would come and live here, and I hope so still, but I never contemplated her in the light of an addition to my personal happiness. I am perfectly disinterested in the matter."

"You are not half pleased with her, all the same," I persisted.

"She was rude to me, and of course one is never exactly pleased with rude people; but I shouldn't have minded that if she had not been entirely in the wrong. There is nothing more loving to the patience when to be seriously told that black is white by a person who is too old to be contradicted."

"And is it that wrong-headed old person whom you wish to inflict upon my poor uncle and me as a permanent penance? What have we done that you should be so hard upon us?"

Maud made no reply. She was resting her chin upon the top of her closed fan, and gazing meditatively toward the card table where Mrs. Farquhar was smiling the smile of consummate rectitude undismayed by ill fortune. My uncle and the General, who were partners, were smiling too, but theirs was the smile of victory. As for the Rector, his back was turned to us, but every now and again there was wafted toward us from the direction of his chair a low, wailing murmur which told its own tale.

"I can understand," said Maud, suddenly, "that a woman like that might be a great power. A little brain, which would be quite filled up by one idea at a time, a great deal of conceit, and, I should think, illimitable obstinacy. You may say that all she can do is to raise a storm in a tea-cup; but then you happen to live in the tea-cup. I am glad she likes you, Charley. You must keep friends with her, or she may do you an ill turn one of these days."

"What in the world makes you say that?" I asked, in some astonishment.

"I can't tell you. There is something wrong—some mystery or other, and my father seems to think that trouble may come out of it, though I can't get him to explain himself."

"I know there's a mystery," I said.

"Do you? And can you guess what it is?" asked Maud, eagerly.

"Not in the least. Can you?"

"No—at least I don't think so. But it concerns you in some way; and I want you to keep yourself in Mrs Farquhar's good graces, Charley, because she means to stay here, and because it is certain that she will rule Mr Le Marchant absolutely in the course of a few months."

"How do you know that she means to stay here?" I asked.

But her reply, if she made one, was drowned in a cry of agony which arose at that moment from the card-table.

"My dear madam!—oh, my dear madam, how could you! We had the game on mathematical certainty—and then to throw it away by trumping second in hand in that—I must say that in some manner! Oh dear! oh dear! oh dear!"

The General threw himself back in his chair, and made the room ring with peal after peal of merriment. "Ho, ho, ho! I beg your pardon, mother, I'm sure; but your partner's face—ha, ha, ha!"

"I did the right thing," said Mrs Farquhar, not at all perturbed by all this commotion; "I played according to rule, which is the only real way to play."

"A rule to trump second in hand!" ejaculated the Rector, aghast.

"I don't exactly remember how the cards went, but I played according to rule, I know, because I always do. You must just make up your mind to lose a game sometimes, Mr. Dennison, like everybody else."

The Rector only groaned as he took up his cards. Presently the game was resumed, and I returned to my interrupted conversation with Maud.

"How do you know," I asked again, "that Mrs. Farquhar intends to stay here?" And why are you so anxious that I should keep upon good terms with her?"

But Maud had recovered her wonted serenity now, and no longer chose to deal in prophecies. "I don't know that Mrs. Farquhar will stay," she answered; "but if seems natural and probable that she should. And it is always best to be upon good terms with your neighbors."

"I tell you what," I said, "I suspect that I am a great deal more likely to remain upon good terms with this old woman than you are. You haven't made a particularly promising start, but I hope you won't be discouraged by that, but will come and see her very often, and show us a bright example of kindly behavior toward the aged."

"I should be delighted," answered Maud, "but unfortunately I am going away in a few days, so you will have to try and behave yourselves properly without me."

"Going away!" I exclaimed, in horror and amazement; "how can you say such dreadful things in that calm tone of voice! Where are you going?—and for how long?"

"I am going to stay with my aunt, Mrs. Saville," she answered. "I don't quite know how long I may be away, it will depend upon papa, who has been persuaded to take a holiday for a person's three weeks and come with me. The Savilles want me to stay with them until after some dances which are to come off in the beginning of November, but most likely I shall come back a few days before. I conceive that parochial and dame-de dances will hardly be mine from the giddy throng."

"It makes no difference to me," I said, resolutely, "because, in any case, I shall here going to Oxford before you come back. This is an awful blow!" But in my heart I was selfish enough to find a grain of comfort in the thought of Maud's probable inability to dance with the gay bachelors of Sussex.

"You must summon up all your strength, and endeavor to bear it," she answered, with an unfeeling laugh. "You are going to lose me for a time, but Mrs. Farquhar will remain to you by way of compensation."

"I wish Mrs Farquhar was dead and buried—" I was beginning, but before I could finish my sentence another exclamation of dismay caused us both to turn our eyes once more toward the card table.

"She's done it again!" cried the Rector, wheeling round in his chair, and spreading piteously in space. "So help me—them!—in such and a hor, she's done it again! Now, did you ever in all your born days! Ah, yes, of course!—there it is, you see—they got the odd trick. Well, I really could not have believed that any responsible human being—"

Maud rose and crossed the room hastily. The Rector, when he was at all excited, had an unfortunate habit of thinking aloud, and there was no saying to what lengths he might not be about to go. She put her hands on his shoulders and bent down over him, examining the cards which he had thrown upon the table, while the General, in a voice trembling with suppressed laughter, called out, "Single, treble, and the rub!"

"The cards have been against us the whole evening, and that is always a trying thing to the patience, but we should not lose our temper over a mere game," said Mrs Farquhar, kindly, but a trifle severely. "As for me, I just play according to rule."

After this everybody rose from the card-table, and Maud pointing out that it was past eleven o'clock, prepared to march her father off home. The Rector, however, was not to be restrained from the utterance of a few last words.

"Good night, Mrs Farquhar, good night," he said. "I have no doubt they play that game in Scotland, and it may be a very amusing game when one understand it. But it is not whist." And a nib that he decamped precipitately, allowing his late partner no time to make a rejoinder.

She, for her part, did not appear to be offended; and indeed I found out afterward that Mrs. Farquhar was not one to take offense readily. All that she said, after the Rector had left us, was: "He's a worthy kind of man, that Mr Dennison. Not very wise, I dare say, but one does not look for wisdom on those parts. I've no great opinion of the daughter—a consequential young miss, full of airs and graces."

"Perhaps she may improve as she grows old-er," said my uncle, quietly, while I gulped down the indignant retort that rose to my lips, and the General, who was putting the cards away, called out "You're all wrong, mother. Miss Maud is no more consequential than I am, and if ever there was a girl who had not a trace of a hat you call 'airs and graces' about her, it is she."

"So you think," returned Mrs Farquhar, smiling complacentably; "You never look before the mirror, Tom; if a woman is pretty, that is all you ask of her. Not that I would call Miss Dennison pretty myself, but she has fine eyes, and that is quite enough for you. Maybe, as Bernard says, she'll improve as she grows older; lest if she had green eyes, or if she squinted, you would see plainly enough that she is nothing but a silly and forward girl now."

Contrary to his own anticipations, it proved to be the General, not my uncle, who found it impossible to get on with the old lady. "I'll tell you what it is, Charley my boy," he said to me, after a few days, "I must be off. I should have liked to stay another week or so with you, and to do a little justice to old Rouse's pheasants, but the fact of the matter is that at my time of life a man's temper is apt to become a little uncertain, and I find that I can't stand being called an infernal ass half a dozen times in the course of the day."

Now I need hardly say that Mrs. Farquhar had never made use of the above unseemly expression in addressing her son, but she had certainly been extremely aggravating, and had more than once contrived to put the General, who was one of the best-tempered men in the world, into a downright rage. And this always appeared to astonish her beyond everything. "Poor Tom seems very irritable," she would say. "Is it gout, do you think?"

She herself was out in the least irritable, and never lost her temper. She was tolerably pleasant to my uncle and quite affectionate to me, and I should be sorry to swear that she intended to be disagreeable even to the General. But she was disagreeable—as persistently, quietly, and tearingly disagreeable that at last the poor man could bear it no longer, and took to his heels.

Almost immediately afterward the Rector and Maud departed for Surrey, and there away, as it seemed to me, the last of the summer and autumn with them. Chill October fell upon us with alternate fogs and gales, the gloomiest half day time was over and gone, and the pheasants brought little comfort to my bereaved heart. George Warren was no sort of comfort either. I used to pour me rule of wine into the patient ear as we trudged home after shooting in the misty evenings, and he answered me excessively by pooh-poohing that I should soon forget it all among the manifold excitements and recreations of Christ-church. He himself was at Oriel—a quiet weather of a quiet reading set—"and of course," he would say, in his calm, matter-of-fact way, "you and I shall not see very much of one another, Charley. You'll find yourself among a foolish lot of men, most of whom will have a great deal more money to spend than you have, and as many of them are old Eton fellows, who know you already and like you, you will become popular, and I shouldn't wonder if some head were to be a little turned at first. But I shall look in the river to keep you out of serious mischief."

It had now been practically though not entirely arranged that Mrs Farquhar was to leave Thirlby no more. My uncle gave me to understand as much the same evening adding, with a slight smile, that he hoped I had changed my opinion upon the subject.

I answered frankly that to a certain extent I had. I still thought that third persons were a mistake, but at the same time I was bound to say that personally I had found Mrs Farquhar kind and agreeable. "What do you think yourself, Uncle Bernard?" I asked. "Will she be a great bore to you?"

He considered for a few moments, and then answered, quietly. "Yes. I don't mind confessing to you, Charles, that she will. But that is my fault, not hers; and I don't think we shall quarrel."

"I am quite sure that it will be her fault, not yours, if you do," said I. And then was all that came of my first opposition.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE SEVENTH IN CAMP.

Last week was an eventful one to the members of the Seventh Regiment N. G. S. N. Y., and one so full of pleasure and solid enjoyment as it was of hard work the Saturday, the 23d ult., they took possession of the State Camp Ground at Peekskill, and last Saturday they returned to New York, dusty, sunburned, and richer by a week's experience of military camp life and the duties incident thereto. To the majority of the members this experience was novel and interesting, as it was the first time in nine years, or since it visited the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, that the regiment had gone into camp, and while they looked forward for months with eager anticipations to this brief campaign, they now recall its various incidents with a corresponding degree of pleasure.

During their occupation of the camp, which has a pitched on a level plateau of ninety acres lying at the foot of Manitou Mountain, the first of the Hudson Highlands on the east, and overlooking the confluence of the great river with Jan Peek's Kill, the men of the Seventh experienced much of the sunshine and some of the shadow of a soldier's life. The weather was by turns sweltering and breathless, clear and breezy, cold and rainy, and moon by nights or nights as dark as pockets observed or been delivered the blue coated pockets on their solitary parade during the weary intervals between reliefs. Mornings of marching and countermarching, serene drill and arduous duty, were followed by afternoons of delightful leisure, and evenings of that hilarious fun which forms so prominent a social feature of the Seventh.

The week's work was finished last Friday afternoon, and that evening the fun culminated in a saturnalia, which, taking the form of a military travesty, was heralded as the parade of the "Darling Dudes." The "Dude Battalion" was composed of 270 men drawn in equal numbers from the ten companies of the regiment. Each company was uniformed in costumes the absurdity of which was only equalled by the dark secrecy maintained concerning them up to the very hour of exhibition. That the parade was an overwhelming success as a mirth provoking spectacle was attested by the convulsions of laughter into which it threw the thousands of spectators who witnessed it. It cost the participants four thousand dollars, and when it was dismissed they expressed the conscientious of having thus perpetrated a folly which only the Seventh could afford. The parade was followed later in the evening by a concert, fire works, and a general illumination.

A notable feature of this camp of 850 men was the number of generals whose presence was deemed necessary to maintain its military dignity and prestige. Of these officers no less than seven occupied the row of large, elegantly furnished double tents that lined the edge of the bluff overlooking the river. They were Major General Fassenmeyer, the Adjutant-General; Major General Rosecrans, the Inspector-General of Rifle Practice; Brigadier-General Wetmore, Commissary-General; Brigadier General Burnes, Inspector General; Paymaster-General Rich, Surgeon-General Bryant, and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General Pinkerton, the Post-Adjutant.

Although on the whole the Seventh upheld itself, and its members fully realized their expectations, most of them are satisfied that for the present the regiment has had enough of the country and enough of glory. The camp is now occupied by the Thirteenth Regiment.

"DISARMED."

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Hoodwinked in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Seven Sisters; or, The Octopus," Etc.

CHAPTER XXX.—(Continued.)

Stephana paused, and peevishly, although with angelic mildness, gazed on her companion. For was not this poor thing a very demoniac, downhearted, struggling against the light of divine truth and goodness?

After a brief silence, during which Mrs Hermitage moved restlessly in her chair, Stephana asked, in a sad, gentle voice: "If, then, no sin, why any shame? You say there was a marriage?"

Again Mrs Hermitage turned away from the beautiful winter sunlight and the sight of the silvery sea, and leaned her head uneasily on the cushions. "Valerian knows. Valerian guesses. It is his affair. I want you to talk to me of other things," she murmured, querulously, half crying. Stephana looked and listened in a painful state of doubt. She did not feel sure that Christina was telling the truth.

"It is very unkind of you to dislodge me," she said, in the same petish tone. "I have had a great shock. It will very likely kill me. I do want to know what you think doing—doing—doing. We talk of it every day, but who knows anything at all?"

"I could give you peace would you but give me something in exchange," Stephana made answer. "You can not have meeting thoughts and fervent dreams and celestial visitations while we torture an uneasy conscience."

"I am afraid of you, Stephana. Yet what harm can you do me? Why do you game me to read me through and through? What do you want?"

"Only the truth," answered Stephana, almost solemnly. "That shrinking from Valerian, this unnatural dislike, that secrecy of so many years, if, indeed, it is as you say—"

"I am a common woman, but I aimed not the common sin," Christina said at last. "Valerian was born to wedlock." She now sat up in her arm-chair, and spoke rapidly and desperately as if keenly anxious to unburden herself, as before she had been resolute to keep silence. "You can not judge me. Your young life was happier and better than mine. I had never an liberty, no love. I was ere snatching the forbidden fruit. But Colette knows. Colette shall tell you every thing."

"Much is forgiven where love has tempted one wrong-doing," said Stephana—"if mu lord indeed."

"What is love?" asked Mrs Hermitage impatiently. "There is no love born of parents that is love like hate. You are young, you say all know a better kind. I never shall."

"The love of men and women for each other should be lasting and sweet, but rare has to the bitterness of gall. There is other love in the world, and good and comforting it is. That should be yours now."

"You have Valerian in your mind. I forget that you two are going to marry. That is why you want me to be kind to him, I suppose."

"Just to him rather, justice is the best kindness, the only kindness I am thinking of."

"Valerian will never forgive me, whatever I do for him now—never, never."

"He will, he must forgive," Stephana replied. "But tell me one thing—why this concealment of so many years if Valerian is entitled to his father's name?"

"The name would have shamed me and him. Time is true marriage. That is why is not justly the devil's offspring. Such pride was my father's and mine."

"Yours was not all the blame, then! You were constrained to this deceit?" Stephana asked, with pitying concern.

Mrs Hermitage answered, averting her face. "All a woman's are not idolatry of their children I suppose, if I had cared much about Valerian, I should never have consented to the past."

Stephana listened in silence, saddening as she heard.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"One ghost story more, said Mr Constantine, when Arthura entered his room precisely at twelve of the clock, on the third day of the new year. "I have something to tell you, my Prospero. The world is turned topsy-turvy. We are all walking on our heads. You and I are dreaming like one betters."

Arthura opened her eyes, although not more astonished than usual. Mr Constantine would be astonishing so long as breath was left in his body.

What! No impatient why and wherefore! No Lord's mercy, and all good angels save us!"

"The world has always seemed to me topsy-turvy, sir, and if people did not walk on their heads would they make so many blunders?" asked Arthura.

"On my word, a pat answer ever on the tip of her tongue! Walking on the head has not muddled your thoughts, anyhow. But the news—the wonderful news! I really have no breath for it.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1[illegible].

all. Well, all kinds of marvels happened on New-Year's Day. The household by the sea is broken up. Valerian and his rich patroness have parted company. He is coming to make his way in London."

Arthura listened mute, all expectation. Her fresh girlish trust in Valerian was not clouded. He ought be going to master Stephana in the eyes of the world, but he was her own Valerian for all that. Love makes two people belong to each other forever, thought Arthura, and no shank must lovers and maidens at twenty four.

"I have not told you half the news yet," Mr Constantine added. "The most important part of it was confided to me in strictest secrecy. Can you keep a secret, my dear?"

"No, indeed, sir; the greatest of a secret ten in the telling."

"Tis a dead secret, then; but, on my life, I can't help telling you. I am tired, however; I will wait till the morrow. By the way, where do you get your ghost stories?"

"Ghosts run in my family sir, and my step-mother has taught me several. She has an especial affection for this."

"Admirable woman! Would I had such a step-mother! Well, for your story. Be your ghost freakish, prankly, benign, half-twisting, heavel, he is welcome. Come in, good ghost. I bid you good morrow, kind ghost. We wait for you."

If Arthura excelled in the art of telling ghost stories, it was on Mr Constantine's pupil. He had fashioned her to the luxurious, first by showing her how tales of murder should be read, and next by educating her how they should be narrated. Arthura was guileless of book learning, but her apt, eager, midchoice young mind must have some aliment, and she found it here. The supernatural, the marvellous, the unknown, were to her what ordinary love stories, boarding school music, and clerical slipper making are to those young ladies as yet outside the intellectual regions of exemplarships or the classical tapes. So she had thrown heart and soul into her new vocation, amused herself no less than her instructor by the new powers thus developed.

"A most engratiating ghost! a most sociable, unceremonious ghost! We'll ask for his company another day. Now take up those wondrous little forest stories from Germany. Read about the ancient bride who on her marriage morn was carried away by a wizard of beautiful appearance and when he let her go from his enchanted garden she found every one staring at her with amazement, as well they might. She had been away a hundred years! Open the book where you like. The all fascination, mystery, and wonder."

Arthura did as she was bidden; but ere she had read a page, the old man said:

"You may leave off, my Prospera. I am not lucid to-night. I feel already in the land of shadows you have so bountifully brought before me. And soon I shall be one of them—but not too soon! Why do we live so long?" he continued, after a pause. "He wanted, my Prospera the young, the in the full flavor of your friends and the world, or inherit the thousand a year. Old age is a luxury for the rich to indulge in only. Remember the worst time ever passed by a great poet,

'Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.'

We must turn on all when we begin to tumble to pieces—eyesight, feet to walk on, esprit, and if we can't buy a digestion, like the man in the story, meats are to be had requiring none. But age and penury, decrepitude and forlornness—'tis a picture to melt the gods to compassion." He raised his head and looked at Arthura with an odd smile. "People for the most part take too much trouble about keeping the breath of life in them. As if life for the mere sake of life were worth a pinch of salt! But the manner of life whilst we are in our prime, has many times their concern." When the tools fall from our hands, let us make way for our betters, I say. You are young, and shall greet many a contriving, but 'tis time for me to wrap myself in my cloak and turn my face to the wall. Good bless me! And now good-night, my dear; I can sleep, I think. Rest you well."

Arthura stole quietly out of the chamber, although little disposed to close her own eyes. What, indeed, had she to do with sleep after such news? Valerian no longer his kinswoman's dependent, Valerian manfully making his own way in the world, seemed twice, threefold, her own. She realized in a moment, as the thought, the effect of these unforeseen disasters not only on her lover's worldly prospects, but on his love for herself. The necessity for self reliance and his very isolation must draw them nearer together, reminded the generous girl, ever judging of the springs of action in others by her own. Could this change mean anything else but the fulfillment of happy summer dreams, a sweet home, and toil mutually shared, daily fare made romantic and beautiful because it belonged to two?

When at last she did sleep it was to dream sweetly, and next day when she set off as usual to help Steppie with the housekeeping and the children's lessons, it was with a beaming face. To her great astonishment, Steppie, who met her at the railway station, wore a beaming face also. She not only smiled, she actually indulged in a near approach to a laugh. "Dear little mamma, has Aunt Fanny sent each of the children a Sunday suit?" asked Arthura.

"Ah, Arthura, why am I so much more wicked than other people? I ought to be weeping and sighing in a darkened room." Here she did indeed break down and give a genuine sob. "Aunt Fanny will never send the children any more new frocks." Another sob. "Aunt Fanny's gone to heaven." Then the tears ceased to flow, and the pale, pretty, sore-worn face brightened again. "Aunt Fanny has left me a thousand pounds."

"Kind Aunt Fanny! You will be so much happier now," Arthura said.

"No; I shall be more comfortable but not happier, instead, more miserable. Think how heartless of me to be able to rejoice at such a moment!"

"But you are rejoicing over the thousand pounds, not over your aunt Fanny's death. I am sure you are as sorry as can be."

"Yes I am," said poor Steppie, wiping her eyes. "And, oh, Arthura, I shall never forgive myself for not having finished those mats I was knitting as a Christmas gift. There was a dense fog on the day I wanted to buy more silk, and I decided going out in it, and now poor Aunt Fanny"—here she began sobbing again—"will never have her black silk mits—never! never!"

"You must comfort yourself with the thought that she does not want them," Arthura made reply. She had never seen Aunt Fanny in her life.

"Nor does she want the thousand pounds. That ought to be a comfortable thought too," poor Steppie said. "But how I wish she had left me the legacy and gone on living all the same! There is always something to spoil our enjoyment in the world."

"We must not be on the watch for it, then," Arthura replied, cheerfully. "We should have had crosses in the back of our heads had Providence intended us to see everything at once. You can not bring Aunt Fanny back again, but you can use her money as to make us all happier by erecting one so."

"Oh, Arthura, I am never more miserable in my life."

"But people can be happy and miserable at the same moment, and just think what a comfort this money will be! Mr. Constantine shall advise us as to the investments. You will be quite rich."

"Am I the most selfish being in the world?" cried Steppie, indignantly. "Every penny can have spent on me and the poor children shall soon be expend you. Then your poor papa's debts—they are mine as well as yours."

"We will settle everything by-and-by," Arthura said. "You shall do exactly as I like, and I will do exactly as you like. That is the way to settle quarrels."

Then the reached the house. What an abode of content and contention was that Arthura was a dolly restant! No more glasses, monsieurs, plaints, all wrath, freshness, grace. Then will a bright spirit transform a dark place.

"Kisses first and lessons afterward," cried the boy Wilber, throwing his arms round his step-mother's neck, and showing her again and again.

"Buns first and lessons afterward," cried Benjamine as her turn, laying a nefarious hand on Arthura's much pocket. Sorrowful, most docile creatures imaginable, she as yet was inked those little animals so low in the scale of development as to consist of a mere sac and an ombre—skin and stomach only.

"Arthura," said Walter, "when you have taught me all you know, will you let me go to sea?"

"Why can not you be content to stay with mother and Arthura and little sisters?" asked Steppie, reproachfully.

"Because you will love me twice as much when I am a sea captain," cried the boy. "And I want to come home with a red face and a powerful of money, and see all the people throwing up their windows to look at me as I stood up the street."

Benjamine laughed immoderately. Steppie called to order, and quilling and exams were begun.

[To be continued.]

FOURTH OF JULY.

Time gives us many days and hours to livery,
Some for enjoyment, and some for tears;
But, O bright July day, 'tis thine to reap
The splendid harvest of the long lasting years.

Sunshine in sunshine, clothed in heat and light,
Crowned with the song and rose of summer's prime,
Of liberty's birth, thine is the right
To wear the State of Freedom for all time.

Through all the jovial hours our flag shall fly,
In three-colored pride—red, blue, and white—
And the sweet music of humanity
From grateful hearts salute thy loftier light.

As men salute a mother from whose hands
They've taken perverse gifts, on days like hers
The sighing of the sad then a sudden hands
But lift their heads, and know not how to fret,
Because the splendor grows from pain to pain.

THE MISSISSIPPI FLOODS.

Every month of the present year has been prolific in storms, cyclones, floods, and various forms of devastation along the valleys of the great Western waterways, but none has been more disastrous and caused greater distress than the terrible flood which last week swept out of the Missouri and down the Mississippi River. Above their confluence the Missouri is a larger stream than the Mississippi, and rising in the Rocky Mountains, as do its principal tributaries, the Yellowstone and Platte, it is much more subject to sudden and overwhelming rises than is the Mississippi along the upper portion of its course. It is therefore below their junction, and after the Missouri has hurled his mighty volume into the already swollen current of the Mississippi, that the greatest danger is to be apprehended.

It is this same rush of Missouri waters sinking the annual freshets of past centuries that has formed the vast alluvial deposits along the eastern bank of the Mississippi for two hundred miles, from Alton to Cairo, or from a short distance below the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Ohio River. These deposits vary from one to ten miles in width, and are known as the "American Bottoms." Containing hundreds of thousands of the richest farming lands in Illinois, of inexhaustible fertility and easily worked, these lands offer such irresistible attractions to the agriculturist that, in spite of the danger to which they are annually exposed from high waters, they are thickly settled. The settlers attempt to protect their lands by building dikes or levees along the river banks, and those of the bottoms nothing to fear it, but as these are erected at a time of low water, they are rarely of sufficient strength to withstand the terrible force hurled against them whenever the river chooses to assert his ancient dominion. At such times strenuous efforts are made to strengthen the dikes. The entire available force of the country is concentrated at the weak points, earth or bags, the contents of warehouses, of freight-cars, of box sticks—everything procurable and movable is flung into the breach. For a time it looks as though these efforts would be crowned with success, and hope inspires the workers with renewed strength. Suddenly the river seems to gather itself together as though for a spring, a wall of water advances toward the barrier, and in a moment it is swept away, and disappears as completely as though it had never been. With an exulting roar, the turbid waters roll through the breach, and civil like hungry demons over the level country, devouring everything in their path, and replacing with death and ruin the teeming life and smiling plenty of a moment before.

Besides the fierce onslaught, the wily river employs strategy, and often its malicious underminings have so weakened a dike that almost before danger is announced a section of it sinks away like a snow bank before the breath of summer, and the mocking waters sweep on, unopposed, to their work of destruction.

Although the Missouri, and consequently the Mississippi, is subject to periodical freshets known as "June rises," caused by the melting of Rocky Mountain snows, the floods of last week were the effect of heavy and protracted rains in the Missouri Valley. At St. Louis the flood began on June 20, and on the 25th the Madison Levee, above the city on the opposite side of the river, broke, and the flood was let upon with terrible rapidity over the rich bottom lands that it should have protected. Villages, farm-houses, railway embankments, cattle, and crops were swept away in an hour, wealth and prosperity were replaced by utter destitution, and the wreck of ruin over a vast extent of country was complete. For two days more the waters rose, and with each hour fresh barriers to its progress were overwhelmed, until the whole of the wide spread bottom lands, on which the crops, almost ready for harvesting, were the heaviest known for years, was covered with a turbid sea.

Across the bottom lands thus flooded a dozen railway lines found their way over high embankments to the bridge connecting East St. Louis with St. Louis across the river. One after another several of these road beds were swept or melted away, until the Chicago and Alton, the Rockford, Rock Island, and St. Louis, the Indianapolis and St. Louis, the Chicago, Bloomington, and Quincy, and the Wabash railroads were cut off from communication with the city, save by a roundabout route over the Vandalia road, which, with the Ohio and Mississippi, retained its embankment intact.

While the loss of property by this wide-spread calamity, which is felt from Kansas City on the Missouri to Cairo on the Mississippi, is almost unreckonable, the loss of human life, owing to the timely warnings of the telegraph, is slight. The destruction of ten thousands of houses—people who escaped to the bluffs or the higher railway embankments, and who still remain there awaiting the subsidence of the regular June flood, which followed close behind the rain fall produced, is absolute and painful, and calls for immediate and generous contributions for their relief.

On page 426 our artist has illustrated a night scene of work on the levees during the heroic hot, as was seen proved, fruitless efforts to save them. Such scenes are only to be witnessed along the Mississippi, and will continue to be so as long as the safety of its bottom lands is entrusted to slight and unscientifically constructed barriers of earth.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

Wily Fish-Dealers.—Vivisection in Paris.—Reprisals.—The late William Chambers.—"I am Jack."—The Lyon Tournament.—The new "Cornhill."—Street Noises.

Amid the cheers of exultation over the Fisheries Exhibition, I ventured to hint, in the gentlest of whispers, that when the noise of the trumpets had died away, I was rather doubtful whether much (or, at all events, cheap) fish would come of it. It now appears, that that the mail hankers on the exhibition all keep fish-mongers' shops in the main. As a general move sensible than polite has style put it, "What tradesman would be such an idiot as to sell cheap in the one market for the sake of showing what lucrative large profits his shop makes?" Fish will never be sold at a reasonable price "till some well-managed company is started to open fishing vessels and sell the fish themselves."

The French entente are very indignant at what the call a "public outrage," which has been committed upon Dr Brown-Séquard. This gentleman is one of those physiologists who confess as regards vivisection that whether animals suffer or not is a question that "has never entered their minds." He seems to employ anæsthetics as being a thing in so popular a manner, and when there is clamor from his tortured victims, silences them by "severing the vocal chords." The other day he was about to vivisect a monkey in public for the edification of a large audience. The poor creature began to shriek with pain and terror, and a young lady in the company, moved by a natural compassion, sprang on to the platform and struck him in the face with her parasol. She ought not to have done it, of course, for she ought not to have been present; but I confess I feel a much greater sympathy for her than the professor had for the monkey. It was a generous impulse, and considering the strong likeness that she could not have failed to see in the animal to her grinning fellow countrymen, I do not wonder at her indulging in it.

I suppose it is the preaching of the new religion of dynamite that has caused of late enormous crimes to be attempted upon the slightest provocation. Nothing is too much excuse than for a madman who has been dismissed from the employment of a railway company to make that Mr Whistler calls "an arrangement" with sheep ers, or other material, for the destruction of an express train. The killing and wounding of a score or two of his fellow countrymen who have never injured him seems to him a fair equivalent for the loss of a pound a week. It is no wonder that, on reading particular is done to these gentry when convicted, this desire for a penalty on an exaggerated scale should grow. The gentleman, however—Irish, it need hardly be said—has lately met-throated threat to his line of business. Having been refused entrance to a circus on account of his being in an advanced stage of intoxication, he purchased petroleum, saturated the tent with it, and during the next performance, when it was filled with spectators, set it on fire."

I can not help thinking that, into the trading the advantage of new liberal—which is as highly thought of in some quarters as old blood is in others—it would be better for journalism if such very young heads were not so generally employed in writing obituaries. It is quite right that obituaries should be "genial," but they should be written by men who have some experience of the persons described. When an old gentleman happens to decease is it quite well to make how little the scribe who "notices" the circumstance seems to know about him. Mr William Chambers, for example, or, as some call him, Sir William Chambers, has been spoken of as "childless," as "having unfortunately had less children in infancy," as "the author of Traditions of Edinburgh," as "the writer of one of the most charming biographies of modern times," and as having "contributed countless articles to the Journal with which his name is inseparably connected." Some of these things are true, but they are not true of William Chambers. He never had any children, he did not write the famous Traditions, he rarely contributed to the Journal, except for the last half-dozen years, and the so-called autobiography was written chiefly by his brother Robert. The latter died of a very stormy period, when the newspapers had something else to talk about, and the circumstances were hardly noted, but he was by no means the more remarkable of the two brothers. William, indeed, started the Journal, but Robert made it what it was, and supplied for many years its literary attractions.

It is not always pleasant for one brother to be taken for another. Last week I saw two old gentlemen, A and B, meet at the club, after a separation of twenty years. They recognized each other at once, and seemed very cordial. After much talk of old times, A observed, in a hushed voice, "And how is that poor ne'er-do-well younger brother of yours—Jack—getting on?"

"No," said B, "I am Jack."

After those many years it was no such wonder that A should have taken the younger brother for the elder, but it was very unfortunate.

I went the other day to see the Lyon Tournament. It was a most amusing spectacle. Two hundred people or so, saying nothing, and looking on in hushed excitement at half a dozen pairs of people doing nothing. These latter were posed in exactly like wax figures to a show, only not looking so life-like. They had chess boards before them, over which they leaned on their elbows, and every now and then they moved a hand, them, and not before the movement, as is usual, there was a sound of clock work, and an unknown registered the circumstance. They were all smoking, but without at all injuring it; they had a fixed mechanical stare, very painful to witness, and an appearance of mental and physical weariness such as I never saw in a certain member of the genus Ratrachus (Bufo vulgaris), which had just been extricated from a mine in which he must have been shut up for at least 500 years. Of course I knew that chess-players were not a lively lot. I didn't expect to see them hopping about like frogs, but their stability appalled me.

The announcements concerning the new Cornhill have been very funny. The Athenæum spoke of its being about to have fourteen full page illustrations, instead of two as at present. The Athenæum is not an illustrated paper, it is true, but I should have thought some one connected with it could have known something about what full-page illustrations cost. As a matter of fact, however, there will be a great number of pictures in the new magazine, more and better than can be conceived of as being bought for sixpence, but the chief feature of it will be its short stories and the freedom from "padding." I have not a doubt myself that if enough (said good enough) short stories can be got, the venture will be a success; but the question is, can they? They are undoubtedly the rarest of all literary wares. If on author has a good plot he will not "throw it away," as he calls it, upon a short story, and up to this time it has been a most uncommon sight to see two good ones in any one number of an English magazine.

I am glad to see that the Lancet is taking up the subject of street noises, and showing the serious effects which the preventable ones, especially the street organs, have upon human health. There can be no question of their giving pleasure to any ear, for their sounds are unmusical, while the torture they inflict upon invalids, especially on those suffering from nervous disorders, can hardly be exaggerated. What is at the root of the nuisance is, as the Lancet points out, that "if a man is not himself sensitive about noises, he cares nothing for his neighbors."

R. KEMBLE, of London.

THE WEDDING TRIP.—DRAWN BY WILL H. LOW.

THE FLOODS AT ST. LOUIS—WORKING ON THE LEVEE AT NIGHT.—DRAWN BY CHARLES GRAHAM.—[SEE PAGE 433.]

HERE'S A SONG, COMRADES ALL.

Here's a song, comrades all, for the flag of our nation,
That, enthroned by old Time, still resplendantly shows
The colors that met at its grand consecration,
The gifts of the blushed, the Lily, and Rose;
And whose stars have grown greater in number and lustre
Since first they were lighted by Liberty's hand,
And now, clinging closely in beautiful cluster,
Stand their light for and wide over ocean and land

Here's a song, comrades all, for the flag ever ready
To shelter the weak or who shelter no more
Can find in the Old World—the flag always ready
In welcome to those who are seeking our shore;
The flag that repulses when Peace lingers near us,
But never to war shrinks from mightiest foe;
The flag that is waiting to bless and to cheer us
With thoughts of our dear home wherever we may go.

Here's a song, comrades all, for the flag that floats o'er us,
The sign of a country prosperity blest:
Come join with a will in a free rousing chorus,
From the North and the South, from the East and the West.
Hurrah! for the stuff that so firmly upholds it
Through fiercest of tempests with strength ever new;
Hurrah! once again for the breeze that unfolds it,
And hip! hip! hurrah! for the red, white, and blue.

MORGANEY HAYNES.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Two Retrieve of the Native," "Far from the Madding Crowd," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a-milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER V.—(Continued.)

Margery did not wake till they stopped to change horses, when she was aroused by the Baron rising as erect as ever. "He watches like the sages Gabriel, when all the world is asleep!" she thought.

With the resumption of motion she slept again, and knew no more till he touched her hand and said, "Our journey is done—we are in Chillington Wood."

It was almost daylight. Margery scarcely knew herself to be awake till she was out of the carriage and standing beside the Baron, who, having paid the coachman to drive on to a certain point indicated, turned to her.

"Now," he said, smiling, "you access to the hollow tree, you know where it is. I'll wait as before, while you perform the reverse operation that you did last night." She took no heed of the path now, nor regarded whether her pretty slippers became scratched by the brambles or no. A walk of a few steps brought her to the particular tree which she had left about nine hours earlier. It was still gloomy in that spot, the morning not being clear.

She entered the trunk, dislodged the box containing her old clothing, pulled off the satin shoes and gloves and dress, and in ten minutes emerged in the cotton gown and shawl of shepherd's plaid.

The Baron was not far off. "Now you look the milkmaid again," he said, coming toward her. "Where is the finery?"

"Packed in the box, sir, as I found it." She spoke with more facility now. The difference between them was greater than it had been at the ball.

"Good," he said. "I must just dispose of it, and then away we go."

He went back to the tree, Margery following at a little distance. Bringing forth the box, he pulled out the dress as carelessly as if it had been rags. But this was not all. He gathered a few dry sticks, crushed the lovely garment into a loose billowy heap, threw the gloves, low, and shoes on the top, then struck a light and coolly set fire to the whole.

Margery was aghast. She ran forward, she implored and entreated. "Please, sir—do spare it—do! My lovely dress—my dear, dear slippers—my fan—it is cruel! Don't burn them, please!"

"Nonsense! We shall have no further use for them if we live a hundred years."

"But spare a bit of it—one little piece, sir—a scrap of the lace—one bow of the ribbons—the lovely fan—just something!"

But he was as immovable as Rhadamanthus. "No," he said, with a stern gaze of his aristocratic eye. "It is of no use for you to speak like that. The things are my property. I undertook to gratify you in what you might desire because you had saved my life. To go in a ball, you said. You might much more wisely have said anything else; but no, you said to go to a ball. I have taken you to a ball. I have brought you back. The clothes were only the means, and I dispose of them my own way. Have I not a right to?"

"Yes, sir," she said, meekly.

He gave the tree a stir, and lace and ribbons, and the twelve flounces, and the embroidery, and all the rest, crackled and disappeared. He then put in her hands the butter basket she had brought to take on to her grandmother's, and accompanied her to the edge of the wood, where it emerged in the undulating open country in which her grandchild dwelt.

"Now, Margery," he said, "here we part. I have performed my contract—at some awkward cost, if I was recognized. But never mind that. How do you feel—sleepy?"

"Not at all, sir," she said.

"That long nap refreshed you, eh? Now you must make me a promise. That if I require your presence at any time, you will come to me. I am a man of more than one mood," he went on, with sudden solemnity, "and I may have desperate need of you again to deliver me from that darkness as of Death which sometimes encompasses me. Promise it, Margery—promise it, that, no matter what stands in the way, you will come to me if I require you."

"I would have if you had not horned my things," she pouted.

"Ah—ungrateful!"

"Indeed, then, I will promise, sir," she said from her heart. "Wherever I am, if I have bodily strength, I will come to you."

He pressed her hand. "It is a solemn promise," he replied. "Now I must go, for you know under way."

"I shall hardly believe that it has not been all a dream," she said, with a childish instinct to try at his withdrawal. "There will be nothing left of last night—nothing of my dress, nothing of my pleasure—nothing of the place."

"You shall remember it in this way," said he. "We'll cut our initials on this tree as a memorial, so that whenever you walk this path you will see them."

Then with a knife he inscribed on the smooth bark of a beech-tree the letters M. T., and underneath a large A.

"What, have you no Christian name, sir?" she said.

"Yes, but I don't use it. Now, good-by, my little friend. What will you do with yourself today when you are gone from me?" he lingered to ask.

"Oh, I shall go to my grannie's," she replied with some gloom, "and have breakfast and dinner and tea with her, I suppose, and in the evening I shall go home to Southleford Hales, and perhaps Jim will come to meet me, and all will be the same as usual."

"Who is Jim?"

"Oh, he's nobody—only the young man I've got to marry some day."

"What! you engaged to be married! Why didn't you tell me this before?"

"I—I don't know, sir."

"What is the young man's name?"

"James Raywood, sir."

"What is he?"

"A master lime-burner."

"Engaged to a master lime-burner and not a word of this to me! Margery Margery! where shall a straightforward one of your sex be found! Publish even to your own disadvantage! What mischief have you caused me to do, through not telling me this? I wouldn't have so endangered my uncle's happiness for a thousand pounds. Wicked girl that you were, why didn't you tell me?"

"I thought I'd better not, sir," said Margery, beginning to be frightened.

"But don't you see and understand that if you are discovered the property of a young man, and he were to find on the night's excursion, he may be angry with you and part from you forever? With him already in the field I had no right to take you at all; he undoubtedly ought to have taken you, which really might have been managed if you had not deceived me by saying you had no body."

Margery's face wore that aspect of one which comes from the repentant consciousness of having been guilty of an enormity. "But is man's good enough to take me, sir?" she said, almost crying, "and he isn't absolutely my master until I have married him, is he?"

"That is a subject I can not go into. However, we must alter our course. Instead of advising you, as I did at first, to tell of the experience to your friends, I must now impress on you that it will be best to keep a silent tongue in the matter—perhaps for ever and ever. It may come right some day, and you may be able to say 'All's well that ends well.' Now, good-morning, my friend. Thank of Jim, and forget me."

"Ah, perhaps I can't do that," she said, with a tear in her eye, and a full throat.

"Well, do your best. I can say no more."

He turned and retreated into the wood, and Margery, sighing, went on her way.

CHAPTER VI.

Between six and seven o'clock in the evening of the same day a young man might have been seen descending the hills into the valley of the Swean at a point about midway between Stickleford and the residence of Margery's grandmother, four miles to the west.

He was a thorough-bred son of the country, as far removed from what is known as the provincial as the latter is from the cut-and-out gentleman of culture. He crossed and wandered more of custom, almost white, but he wore a jacket of old fashioned blue West of England cloth, so well preserved that evidently the article was reserved to a suit whenever its owner engaged in such active occupations as he usually pursued. His complexion was fair, almost florid, and he had scarcely any beard.

A novel attraction about this young man, which a gloaming stranger would know nothing of, was a rare and curious fruitiness of atmosphere that appertained to him, to his clothes, to all his belongings, even to the room in which he had been sitting. It might almost have been said that by adding him and his implements to an overcrowded apartment you made it healthful. This resulted from his trade. He was a lime-burner, he handled lime daily, and in return the lime rendered him an incarnation of salubrity. His hair was dry, fair, and frizzled, the latter possibly by the operation of the same caustic agent. He carried as a walking-stick a green sapling, whose growth had been contorted to a corkscrew pattern by a twining honeysuckle.

As he descended to the level ground of the water meadows he cast his glance westward with a frequency that revealed him to be on search of some object in the distance. It was rather difficult to do this, the low sunlight dazzling his eyes by gleaming from the river away there, and from the "carriers" (as they were called) in the path—narrow artificial brooks for conducting the water over the grass. His course was something of a zigzag, from the necessity of finding pounds in these carriers convenient for jumping. Thus peering and leaping and winding, he drew near the Swean, the central river of the miles-long mead.

A moving spot became visible to him in the direction of his scrutiny, mixed up with the rays of the same river. The spot got nearer, and revealed itself to be a slight thing of pink cotton and shepherd's plaid, which pursued a path on the brink of the stream. The young man so shaped his trackless course as to engage on the path a little ahead of this colored form, and when he drew near he smiled and reddened. The girl smiled back to him; but her smile had not the life in it that the young man's had shown.

"My dear Margery, here I am!" he said, gladly, in an exalted tone, as with a last leap he crossed the last intervening carrier and stood at her side.

"You've come all the way from the hills, on purpose to meet me, and you shouldn't have done it," she reproachfully returned.

"We finished there at noon, so it was no trouble; and it had been, why, I should be come."

A small sigh was the response.

"What, you was not even so glad to see me as you would be to see your dog or cat?" he continued. "Come Miss Margery, this is rather hard. But, by George, how tired you do look! Why, if you'd been up all night your own double it be none like tea-saucers. You've walked too far, that's what it is. The weather is getting warm now, and the air of these low lying meads is not strengthening in summer. I wish you lived up on higher ground with me, beside the hills. You'd get no strong as a hoss. Well, there; all that will come in time."

Instead of saying yes, the fair maid repressed another sigh.

"What, won't it, then?" he said.

"I suppose so," she answered. "If it is so to be, it is."

"Well said—very well said, my dear."

"And if it isn't to be, it isn't."

"What? Who's been putting that into your head? Your grumpy granny, I suppose. However, have no fear. Margery, I have been thinking to-day—in fact, I was thinking it yesterday and all the week—that really we might settle our little business this summer."

"This summer!" she repeated with some dismay. "But the parson's ships! Remember, it was not to be put after that was completed."

"There I have you," said he, taking the liberty to put her shoulder, and the further liberty of advancing his head behind it to the other. "The parson's ship is settled. To View A Howard, lime-burner, now, and Richard Cline no longer. Yes, Cousin Richard has settled it so, for a time at least, and 'tis to be painted on the carts this week—blue letters—yellow ground. I'll have one all em, and drive em round to your door as soon as the paint is dry, to show ye how it looks."

"Oh, I am sure you needn't take that trouble, Jim; I can see it quite well enough in my mind," replied the young girl—not without a flitting appearance of supercilium.

"Hallo!" said Jim, taking her by the shoulders and looking at her hard. "What do that bit of incivility mean? Now, Margery, let's sit down here, and have this cleared." He cupped a nib his elm upon the rail of a little bridge they were crossing, and seated himself firmly, leaving a place for her.

"But I want to get home along, dear Jim," she coaxed.

"Fidgets! Sit down, there's a dear. I want a straightforward answer, if you please. In what month, and on what day of the month, will you marry me?"

"Oh, Jim!" she said, sitting gingerly on the edge, "that is too plain spoken to not yet. Before I look at it in that business light I should have to—to—"

"But your father has settled it long ago, and you said it should be as soon as I become a partner. So, dear, you must not mind a plain man wanting a plain answer. Come, name your time."

She did not reply at once. What thoughts were passing through her brain during the interval? Not images raised by his words, but whirling figures of men and women in red and white and blue, reflected from a glazed Bone, in movements toned by the thrilling beauty of the Dorn Polka. At last she said, slowly, "Jim, you don't know the world, and what a woman's wants can be."

"But I can make you comfortable. I am in business as yet, but I can have a home for the asking, and as to furniture, you shall choose of the best for yourself—the very best."

"The best! Far are you from knowing what that is!" said the little woman. "There be ornaments such as you never dream of, work tables that would set you in amaze, silver candlesticks, tea and coffee pots that would dazzle your eyes; tea cups and saucers gilded all over with guinea gold, brave velvet curtains, gold clocks, pictures, and looking-glasses beyond your very dreams. So don't say I shall have the best."

"Why?" said Jim, gloomily, and fell into reverie. "Where did you get those high notions from, Margery?" he presently inquired. "I'll swear you hadn't got em a week ago." She did not answer, and he added, "You don't expect to have such things, I hope, deserve them as you may?"

"I was not exactly speaking of what I wanted," she said, severely. "I said, things a woman could want."

"You are a pink and white comedian, Margery," he said, "and I give you up for insight. Anybody would think the d——l had showed you the kingdoms of the earth since I saw you last."

She reddened; then, aware, he following her, and they soon reached Margery's house. Approaching it from the lower or back side—the opposite to that of the garden gate where she had met the Baron.

"You'll come in, won't you, Jim?" she said with more ceremony than heretofore.

"No, I think not to-night," he declared. "I'll consider what you've said."

"You are very good, Jim," she returned, tearfully.

"Good-by."

CHAPTER VII.

Jim thoughtfully retraced his steps. He was a village character, and he had a villager's simplicity—that is, the simplicity which comes from the lack of a complicated experience. But simple by nature he certainly was not. Among the rank and file of rustics he may quite a Dalecraud, or, rather, had been one, till he had a good deal of his self-command by falling in love.

Now, however, that the charming object of his distraction was out of sight he could deliberate, and measure, and weigh things with some approach to keenness. The substance of his previous was what change had come over Margery—whence those new notions?

Ponder as he would, he could evolve no answer save one, which, eminently unsatisfactory as it was, he felt it would be unreasonable not to accept: that she was simply shrinkish and ambitious by nature, and would not to hunted into matrimony till he had provided a well adorned home.

Jim returned to the hill, and looked to the fires. The kiln stood in a peculiar, interesting, even impressive spot. It was at the end of a short ravine in the lower chalk formation, and all around was an open hilly down or coomb. The nearest house was that of Jim's cousin and partner, which stood on the outskirts of the down beside the turnpike-road. From this house a little lane wound between the steep escarpment of the ravine till it reached the hills, which rose above the miniature valley, commanding it as a fort might command a delle.

The idea of a fort in this association need little to imagination. For on the rubbish grass steep about the kiln stood a bygone, massive specimen of such an erection, huge impressive, and difficult to scale even now in the dawn. It was a British castle or entrenchment, with triple rings of defence, moss well behind roll, then ostlines cutting sharply against the sky, and Jim's kiln nearly undermining their base. When the lime-kiln flared up on the night, which it often did, its fires lit up the front of these ramparts in a great measure. There were old friends of his, and a kiln keeping up the best through the long darkness, as it was sometimes his duty to do, he would imagine the dancing lights and shades about the stupendous earth-work to be the forms of those giants who the supposed had heaped it up. Often he clambered upon it, and rolled about the turnsalt, thinking one the problems connected with his business, his partner, his future, his Margery.

It was what he did this evening, continuing the meditation on the young girl's manner that he had begun upon the road, and still, on then, had long on then to the change.

While thus engaged he observed a man running up the ravine to the kiln. Burnes messages were almost invariable left at the lime-house, and Jim watched the man with the interest excited by a belief that he had come on a personal matter. On nearer approach Jim recognized him as the gardener at Room Lodge (I this means business, the Baron (of whose arrival Jim had vaguely heard) was a new and unexpected customer.

It meant nothing else, apparently. The man's errand was simply to inform Jim that the Baron required a load of lime for the garden.

"You might have saved yourself trouble by leaving word at Mr Vine's," said Jim.

"I was to see you personally," said the gardener, "and to say that the Baron would like to inquire of you about the different qualities of lime proper for such purposes."

"Couldn't you tell him yourself?" said Jim.

"He said I was to tell you that," replied the gardener, "and it wasn't for me to interfere."

No motive other than the ostensible one could possibly be conjectured by Jim Hayward at this time, and the next morning he started with great pleasure, in his best business suit of clothes. By eleven o'clock he met his horse and cart had received on the Baron's premises, and the lime was deposited where directed—an exceptional spot just within view of the windows of the south front.

Baron Xanten, pale and melancholy, was sauntering in the sun on the slope between the house and the all-the-year round. He looked across to where Jim and the gardener were standing, and the identity of Hayward being established before he brought, the Baron came down, and the gardener withdrew.

The Baron's first inquiries were as Jim had been led to suppose they would be, on the extermination effects of lime upon slugs and snails when different conditions of slaked and unslaked, ground and to the lump. He appeared to be much interested by Jim's explanations, and said the young man closely whenever he had an opportunity.

"And I hope trade is prosperous with you this year?" said the Baron.

"Very, my noble lord," replied Jim, who, in his uncertainty on the proper method of address, wisely concluded that it was better to err by giving too much honor than by giving too little. "In short, trade is looking so well that I've become a partner in the firm."

"Indeed; I am glad to hear it. So now you are settled in life."

"Well, my lord, I am hardly settled, even now. Not I've got to finish it—I mean, to get married."

"That's an easy matter, compared with the partnership."

"Now a man might think so, my lord," said Jim, getting more confidential. "But the real truth is, 'tis the hardest part of all for me."

"Your suit prospers, I hope?"

"It don't," said Jim. "It don't at all, just at present. In short, I can't for the life of me think what's come over the young woman lately." And he fell into deep reflection.

Though Jim did not observe it, the Baron's brow became shadowed with self-reproach on he heard those simple words, and his eyes had a look of pity. "Indeed—since when?" he asked.

"Since yesterday, my noble lord." Jim spoke meditatively. He was resolving upon a bold stroke. Who ant make a confidant of this kind gentleman, instead of the parson, as he had intended? The thought was no sooner conceived than acted on. "My lord," he resumed, "I have heard that you are a nobleman of great scope and talent, who has seen more strange countries and characters than I have even heard of, and knows the insides of men well. Therefore I would fain put a question to your noble lordship, if I may so trouble you, and having nobody else in the world a be could inform me on truly."

"Any advice I can give is at your service, Hayward. What do you wish to know?"

"It is this, my lord. What can I do to bring down a young woman's ambition that's got so such a towering height there's no reaching it or compassing it; how get her to be pleased with me and my station as she used to be when I first knew her?"

"Truly that's a hard question, my man. What does she aspire to?"

"She's got a crane for fine furniture."

"How long has she had it?"

"Only just now."

The Baron seemed still more to experience regret. "What furniture does the specially covet?" he asked.

"Silver candlesticks, work-tables, looking glasses, gold tea things, silver tea pots, gold clocks, curtains, pictures, and I don't know what all—things I shall never get if I live to be a hundred—not so much that I couldn't raise the money to buy 'em, as that I ought to put it to other uses, or save it for a rainy day."

"Ton think the possession of those articles would make her happy?"

"I really think they might, my lord."

"Good. Open your pocket-book and write as I tell you."

Jim in some astonishment did as commanded, and elevating his pocket-book against the garden wall, thoroughly moistened his pencil, and wrote at the Baron's direction:

"Pair of silver candlesticks, inlaid work table and work box; one large mirror, two small ditto, one gilt china tea and coffee service, one silver tea-pot, coffee-pot, sugar basin, jug, and dozen spoons; French clock; pair of curtains, six large pictures."

"Now," said the Baron, "tear out that leaf and give it to me. Keep a close tongue about this, go home, and don't be surprised in anything that may come to your door."

"But, my noble lord, you don't mean that your lordship is going to give—"

"Never mind what I am going to do. Only keep your own counsel. I perceive that, though a plain countryman, you are by no means deficient in tact and understanding. If sending these things to you gives me pleasure, who should you object? The fact is, Hayward, I occasionally take an interest in people, and like to do a little for them. I take no interest in you. Now go home, and a week hence let its Mary—the young woman and her father, to tea with you. The rest is in your own hands."

A question often put to Jim in after-times was why it had not occurred to him at once that the Baron's liberal conduct must have been dictated by something more personal than sudden spontaneous generosity to him, a stranger. To which Jim always answered that, admitting the existence of such generosity, there had appeared nothing remarkable in the Baron selecting himself as his object. The Baron had told him that he took an interest in him, and self-esteem, even with the most modest, is usually sufficient to overrule any little difficulty that might occur as an obstacle in accounting for a preference. He moreover considered that foreign noblemen, rich and eccentric, might have habits of acting which were quite at variance with those of their English compeers.

So he drove off homeward with a lighter heart than he had known for several days. To have a foreign gentleman take a fancy to him—what a triumph to a plain sort of fellow, who had scarcely expected the Baron to look in his face! It would be a fine story to tell Margery when the Baron gave him liberty to speak out.

Jim lodged at the house of his cousin and partner, Richard Vine, a widower of fifty odd years. Having failed in the development of a household of direct descendants, this tradesman had been glad to let his chambers to his much younger relative, when the latter entered on the business of lime-manufacture; and their intimacy had led to a partnership. Jim lived upstairs, his partner lived down; and the furniture of all the rooms was so plain and old-fashioned as to excite the special dislike of Miss Margery Tucker, and even to prejudice her against Jim for tolerating it. Not only were the chairs and tables quaint, but, with due regard to the principle that a man's surroundings should bear the impress of that man's life and occupation, the chief ornaments of the dwelling were a curious collection of carbonates, that had been discovered from time to time in the limekiln—mesolimpet ingots of strange substance, some of them like Pompeiian remains.

The head of the firm was a quiet-living, nay now retired, though friendly, man of fifty, and he took a serious interest in Jim's love suit, for genuine inquiring him a progressed, and assuring Jim that if he chose to marry he might have all the upper floor at a low rent he, Mr Vine, contenting himself entirely with the ground-level. It had been on convenient for discussing business matters to have Jim in the same house that he did not think any change to be made in consequence of a change in Jim's state. Margery knew of this wish, and of Jim's concurrent feeling, and did not like the idea at all.

(To be continued.)

COTTON.

FROM THE PLOUGH TO THE LOOM.

By W. M. BURWELL.

II.

The Cotton Harvest.—While the harvest home of most other crops is conducted with more or less hilarity, with joyous troops of boys and girls rising on the wagon with the last sheaves of wheat, or where "laden with grapes, red wagons chuch the way," the cotton harvest is an occasion of patient toil that continues for from two to three months. Imagine the cotton field so long ere verdant and blooming, but now, for the frost and white as snow with the open and dejected fleece. It is, in fact, a silent and rather sombre scene. The cold winter sun shines dreadly through the forest; the woodpecker knocks at the door of some hollow insect concealing himself from this importunate creditor; flocks of the blue jay and parquet scream as they fly over the field in flocks. The cotton field lies like snow before our eyes, and the smoke rises from the fires built to "niggers" a fallen tree to warm the fingers or light the pipes of the coopers; there has been a light frost, which in the mornings still lies on the shady side of the fence rails. At this season the rains have often so soaked the soil that the harvesters have to stand in the cold mud, with the sun, and sometimes the rain, again their heads. Then the leaves, which mature about the same time with the cotton, cling to the clothes, and the whole party are in a draggled condition. With these discomforts the pickers advance slowly, silently, carefully but rapidly picking the cotton from the bolls, and putting it into the bags suspended around their necks, to be emptied into the large central baskets at the end of the row, where it is collected and carried to the gin-house every evening. The harvesters comprise men, women, and children. In the hill country cotton is cultivated by the white planters, who with their families and an occasional hireling, white, black, or Indian, conduct every operation, and with the service of every member of the family send the cotton to be ginned on toll by some richer neighbor. On the low and fertile lands of the Red, the Yazoo, the Arkansas, or Mississippi, where the plantations are very extensive, the latter employed is almost exclusively colored. Here the hands are strung out along the rows at such intervals as the comparative speed of the pickers may make. Women and girls usually lead, as their more pliant fingers will gather as high as three hundred pounds of cotton a day, while the older and less active follow far in the rear. In fine silent and orderless zeal, however, it must not be supposed that the colored laborers present the appearance of the tropical negro depicted in the geographical pictures prepared for the schools. It is by no means the gang of bare-headed, bare-footed, and almost bare-backed barbarians who appalled in their pictorial nakedness to the sympathetic readers whom they were toiling to clothe. The men, woman, and children are clad and shod comfortably. Nor is the same hesitation developed to the strained tones of a Hermes raising a basket of cotton to his head, as in the same philanthropic cartoons. The progress of the pickers is marked by a line. The field where the corn passed is a dark brown, in front it is white as a snow bank. The cotton picked during the day is carried at night to be weighed at the gin house, as some of the hands pick "by the hundred," and the work of each is ascertained. There is much emulation among the quicker pickers, who have their partisans, like other leaders. The fastest pickers are usually girls in their teens.

The Gin House.—While Whitney devised the principle of the circular saw gin, he could have had little idea of the perfection to which the machine has been brought at present, with the "revolving head" and other improvements. The gin and corn mill are put in motion by a two-horse-power, on the ground, above which is the gin, corn mill, and cotton-room. Many planters use engine steam-power. The cotton is dried on a platform or otherwise to put it in proper condition. It is fed through a hopper furnished with steel ribs, between each pair of which revolve saws, which rapidly strip the lint from the seed, which then drops from the gin. A cylindrical brush revolves in a direction opposite to that of the saws, and takes the lint from the saws, and a current of air from the blower carries the clean cotton into the cotton-room, from which it is carried to the cotton press.

The original preparation of cotton for the market was very simple, probably adopted from the "wool-sacks" of England. There was an opening in the floor of the gin-room, beneath which a long bag of coarse and strong hempen cloth was suspended. Into this the cotton was stamped and packed. The wooden cotton press was made by planting strong posts with transverse beams. A firm platform was framed in the ground, upon which was placed the frame, within which the cotton was to be baled, with the bagging and rope of the period.

The Cotton Bale.—From the variable weights of cotton, according to the section or season in which it is grown, there can be no fixed weight for the package in which it is carried to market. The average plantation bale weighs from 450 to 600 pounds. It is packed within a compass of about four feet wide and deep and five feet long, but may be compressed for exportation into double the weight in about the same cubic space.

When ready "upon shares," the plantation bale is often owned by two or more hands, and the code inscription, "Sal and Jos," or "Maria and Dora," sometimes accompanies the package to Lowell or Liverpool.

Frauds in packing have been occasionally committed, but while—as will be shown—the city pickings and stealings are unaccounted for, the right and the fairness and the integrity of the Exchange are such that the sand or pebbles surreptitiously packed into the bale may be traced back from Birmingham to the very plantation upon which the fraud has been committed.

As fast as the cotton can be ginned and baled the bales are conveyed by the mule or ox teams of the plantation to the river "landing" or railroad station. It may be mentioned at this point that this delivery of the cotton usually terminates the connection of the freedman with the crop, and he undergoes for a time a change of pursuits almost analogous to that of the 23rd and Israel, which which he has been lately contending. As he is free to choose his place of work for the next season, having no planter of his own, and is without work or wages in the interval between moving one crop and "picking" another, he disposes of his cotton to the Mr Guggenheim of the nearest landing, who settles his sum account, and pays for any balance at the most liberal market rates; the plantation laborer next reports to the mate of the most popular steamboat as a deck hand.

The mule, like the mule, has survived the later revolution of the South. He is still a rapid and resolute ruler of the gangway and hold, soaring, however, a thick stick instead of a cow-skin. The darky, like the mule, takes no account of the cubic and about of the mule, but goes ranging at gravitating about his work at all hours and places, rolling cotton at shippers backings in many inlinguable, or landing mules in mill merchants by glaring lights of camphine in open cane and cut on bells. In all this he submits to the vociferous indignities of the mate as if alone was a continuance of rudeness to which he had been too long accustomed to abandon.

The roustabout having joined the gang on the "lowest deck," and after a test of the comparative thickness of his skull in contact, or of strength in straining at some heavy package, is adopted by his associates on their terms and laws. Unless the roustabout shall join the colored quartet or lower laborers on their retreat at New Orleans, he "runs the river" during the winter months, and if not shot, stabbed, lost overboard, sent to the penitentiary for some act of drunken recklessness, or a victim of small pox or pneumonia, returns to the plantation in the spring, to go through the same nomadic and restless route of life and labor, until too old or infirm to pursue it. The roustabout on the boat wears coarse strong cloth pantaloons "reinforced" with striped ticking. He also carries no over abundant boots. At his girdle is worn a knife and a somewhat less dangerous weapon, the cotton hook. This may be used in a combat somewhat as a knife until both, disarming the foe up with the oar and cutting him with the other. When on shore, boat-er, as the boys I honors begins, or gambling to hone which await the paying off of the vessels mate, he appears resplendent in a side-brimmed planter's hat of felt or imitation Panama. In the lowest pocket of a red check shirt elaborately embroidered in stars on scrolls watch and chain fly waves black cloth pantaloons, with shy-blue suspenders and waked-plated slides, terminating this wardrobe with a pair of fine gaiter boots about three sizes too small for his feet. Really the roustabout is too magnificent a combination of lame and wreck, too docile and too woeful, to be wasted in a manner so prodigate. Could he not be economized somewhat?

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Whalers coming down from the Northern regions express the opinion that Professor Nordenskjold will meet with favorable conditions in his endeavor to penetrate into the heart of Northern Greenland. The chief object of his expedition is to test the theory that the ice barrier is only a belt surrounding a region in the interior which is free from ice and other obstacles to progress northward. In 1870, when he made a previous visit to that country, he is said to have come to the conclusion that if he could pass the belt of ice he would find in summer time a region in the interior which would give to Greenland some excuse for its apparently absurd name. This theory is a pleasant one to contemplate. Indeed, the greater part of whatever has been done in the way of arctic exploration has been the result of allowing theories about warm open seas and hospitable shores beyond the barriers of ice.

The embassy from the Queen of Madagascar, which recently visited the United States, is said to have abandoned the attempt to effect a settlement of the dispute with France, and to have set out from Paris for their island home.

An outcry which may prove to be the beginning of a popular war on "occasional" correspondents comes up from a Georgia town. The editor of the Waynesborough Citizen announces that he is authorized to offer a liberal reward for the "miscreant who writes the scurrilous articles to the New York papers about the people at Waynesborough." The long-suffering people of New York would be willing probably to make generous contributions to the fund, if the movement could be extended so that it would give promises of resulting in the capture of the swarm of "mis. reants" who write so blithely about New York people in papers printed at a distance from the metropolis.

A convict who has been confined for over three years in the Muncy prison (Pennsylvania) prison, most of the time under sentence to be hanged for wife murder, has read more than seven hundred books, written many verses in English, German, and Latin, composed thirty pieces of music, and compiled a medical work. The Supreme Court recently granted him a new trial.

Speaking of the displacement of coal tenants by lawn tennis, a writer in the London Standard says: "We should not be surprised if the more religious devotees of tennis in this country—for though few'—were to regard the recent defeat of the English by the American players as a visitation and just punishment upon us as a nation for the creation and adoption of lawn tennis."

The telegraph seems to be the most potent agent in the South for the suppression of duelling. When one editor has sent a challenge to another editor he straightway has himself to some interesting dwelling region, while the challenged major or colonel, as the case may be, sets out for the same place by a roundabout route. Their movements are telegraphed to the newspapers with sufficient accuracy to deprive the authorities of every excuse for failing to arrest one, at least, of them before they can come together. Thus, without either fighting or running away, each lives to "talk fight" another day.

The witticisms of the opposing counsel in the Star Route trials having been cut off by the verdict of acquittal, the lawyers engaged in the Hill investigation are throwing in a little too and then in the way of comedy. A witness was asked the other day whether he had ever been a member of Congress, and a sat bold in the same breath, "Remember, you are not obliged to answer if it will criminate yourself." The witness, says the report, "admitted" that he had been a member of Congress.

An amusing error into which one of the London dailies fell in its report of the Czar's coronation is pointed out by Truth. The report said that after the sacrament the Archbishop tendered his Majesty "the customary antidote." It is explained that what was tendered to the Czar was the customary antidorum, or holy loaf.

Philadelphians have long believed that a mule log cabin on the Schuylkill was once the residence of Tom Moore, the Irish poet. Mr Edward Wain has written a letter to the Commissioners of Fairmount Park in which he seems to prove that Moore never lived there.

Our fellow-citizens in the extreme Southeast seem to be finding the steam railways much greater conveniences than their bad antiquated Bardlit a week passes in which news does not come of a railroad bridge being mixed on a gallows by self-appointed executioners.

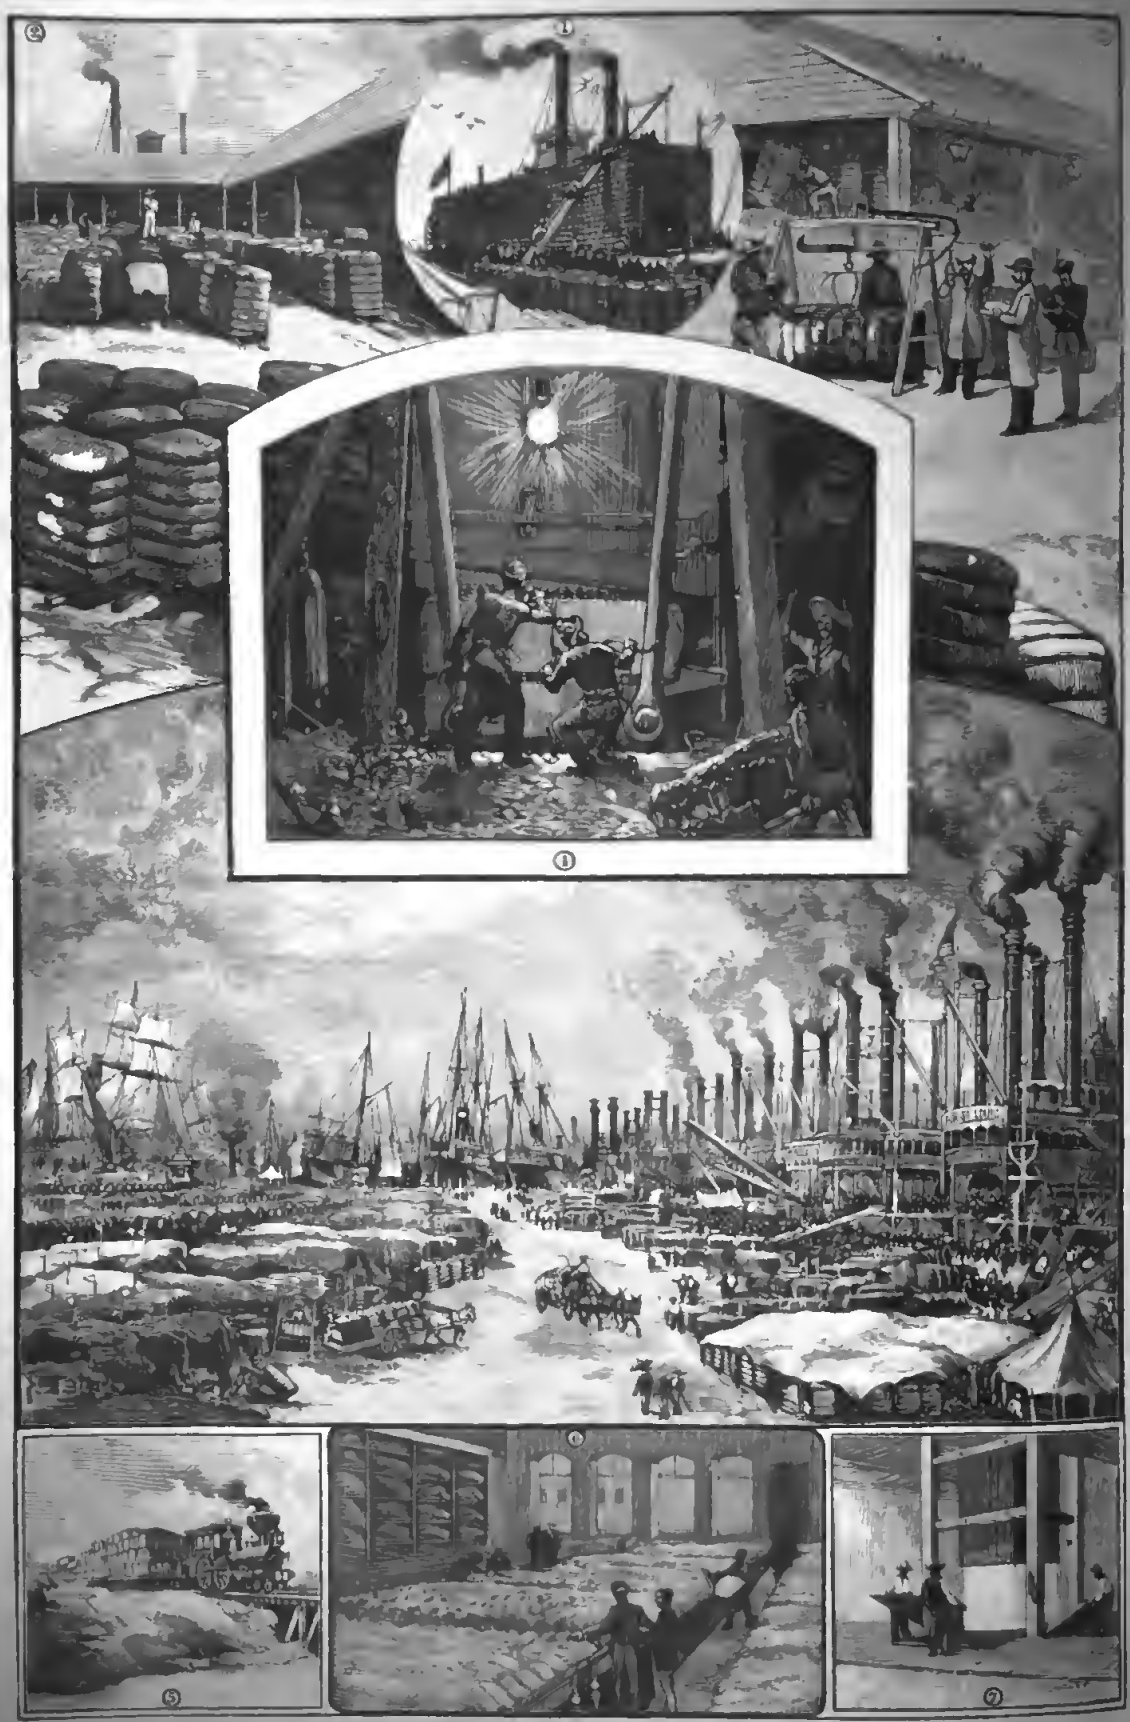
From the fact that parrots take hold of their food with the claw of their right leg, it is inferred that they are not ambidextrous. Scientific observations, however, is not likely to dispel the popular belief that they are sometimes ambiguous. It is claimed that "right handedness" extends also to wasps, beetles, spiders, and many other insects, and is manifested in their using the right anterior limb more frequently than any other. Some heroic naturalist should begin observations on the mole.

A Mr Willing has made claim to land in the far West valued at about ten million dollars. There is a sort of appropriateness in his name.

In Western New York a parrot has been talking through a telephone. Vox et prærerea nihil.

The indications are quite as strong this season as they were last summer that different methods must prevail at the sea side resorts near New York before anything like the numbers of visitors who flocked to those places a few years ago will be seen there again. In order to succeed in the grand scale on which they were projected, these resorts must have the patronage of a large number of New York and Brooklyn people, who will not make frequent visits there until they feel assured that they will get the worth of the money they must spend. As in the early days of Coney Island and Rockaway, a large proportion of the persons who come to New York from a distance in the summer go down to the sea before returning. They think that "once in a lifetime" they can submit to whatever extortion they are likely to fall in with. But their numbers are not large enough to support the resorts. Nothing less than the liberal patronage of those in the cities near by who can afford to spend a day or two in the week at the sea will be sufficient, and that patronage can not be secured until accommodations there are furnished as reasonably as transportation to and fro is furnished. If satisfactory returns upon investments can not be secured on that basis, then somebody must suffer loss till the reputation sealing days has been accomplished. This is inevitable, for visitors can not be drawn to those places except on terms which are acceptable to them. The time will probably come when the sands of Coney Island will swarm with visitors as on the prosperous days of a few seasons ago, but not until recreation can be obtained there for just about what it is worth.

Digitized by Google



1. Cotton Steamer unloading. 2. Cotton Yard and Sheds. 3. Weighing and Sampling. 4. Steam Press. 5. Cotton Train. 6. Sampling Room. 7. Bales in a Factory.
Centre. On the Cotton Levee, New Orleans.

COTTON CULTURE IN THE SOUTH, NO. 2.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 427.]

THE STATUE OF GENERAL LEE.

Mr. Valentine's recumbent statue of General Robert E. Lee was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies on the 29th of June in the University Chapel at Lexington, Virginia. The body of General Lee rests in a mausoleum attached to the chapel. The floor of the mortuary chamber is translated in white veined marble and mosaic tiles, and the effect of the design is very impressive. The recumbent figure is softly lighted through a ceiling of semi-transparent glass, and the whole setting is well adapted to display to the best advantage the merits of the sculptor's admirable work.

THE APACHE SURRENDER.

On our front page we give a picture, from a sketch taken on the spot by Mr A. F. Harris, of Nana, the Apache chief, entering General Crook's camp, in the heart of the hostile stronghold, to ask for peace. The campaign of our redoubtable Indian fighter was marked by consummate strategy, and the victory, attained with the loss of one life only on the side of our troops, was complete and crushing. Should General Crook's wise suggestions be carried out, and the captured Apaches be distributed in small groups among different reservations, we shall probably hear of no more outrages by this pestilent tribe.

DO SNAKES DRINK?

In Miss Hopley's entertaining work on Snakes is an interesting chapter devoted to this question. M Dumeril says "Snakes rarely drink (that is, not every day, as most animals do), most of them having in dry regions or forests, where for long periods they are deprived of water. The live prey upon which they subsist supplies them with sufficient liquid. Nevertheless, a large number of serpents live close to water, and love to plunge into and to swim. These truly drink, lapping with the tongue, at other times with the head under water, and the neck still lower, so that the water falls into the mouth by its own weight, and is then swallowed. But this, he repeats, does not go into the blood, or very little of it, its functions being principally to moisten the intestines.

Lenz, a German ophiologist of still earlier date than Schlegel, went very concisely into the subject of whether snakes drink or not, having adopted various means in order to test them. His personal experience was, however, of a more limited range. He says "The numerous snakes and other animals which inhabit arid mountains or plains destitute of water can only quench their thirst with rain or dew. Snakes require but little water for living as they live in the open air. It is an established rule that no water is found in the maw, stomach, or entrails of snakes killed in the open air, even when it is destroyed by or in a piece of water. Snakes are never seen to go to drink in any part of the world."

This last clause is a too positive assertion, and has not subsequently borne out by other capable conscientious and intelligent writers. Livingstone, who was a close observer of nature, informs us that he has known some of the African snakes come a long way in pools and rivers to drink.

STATUE OF GENERAL LEE, IN THE UNIVERSITY CHAPEL, LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA.—From a Photograph by M. Miley.

TABLET TO BE PRESENTED TO THE CITY OF BALTIMORE BY THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC. From a Photograph by Pach.

A FRATERNAL TESTIMONIAL.

The National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic held its annual meeting in Baltimore June 21, 22, and 23, 1882. This organization is established in nearly every State and Territory of the Union, is composed exclusively of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war of the rebellion, and now numbers nearly two hundred thousand members. Its annual national meetings call together a larger number of persons than any other event of the year. That at Baltimore last year was especially significant in the generous welcome given to the veterans of the war, by contrast with the sentiments of the citizens through whose midst, three years before, these same veterans marched to the battle-fields of the Union, and the General Army Encampment unanimously voted that a suitable testimonial should be presented to the city in recognition of the "cordial and enthusiastic welcome, unbounded hospitality, and elaborate entertainment" given by "the Mayor and Common Council and the people of Baltimore" to the Union veterans of the war. General Hugh A. Hastings, of New York, General John F. Hartranft, of Pennsylvania, and General William Ward, of New Jersey, were appointed a committee to prepare and present such testimonial.

The accompanying cut represents the souvenir which the committee will present with appropriate ceremonies on the 10th inst. It is a bronze composed of metal from Union and Confederate cannon used in the war of the rebellion, and is thirty inches in height by eighteen inches in width, and is to stand upon an ebony pedestal three feet in height. It was designed and executed by Mr William Hunt, sculptor, of this city. The legend of the G. A. R., "Fraternity, Charity, and Loyalty," is inscribed on the ribbon held in the beak of the dove which surmounts the piece; the names of all the States are upon the disks of the emblem chains which constitute the border; the national flag, at right and left, is grouped with military and naval emblems; the base is festooned with laurel, and upon the scroll is engraved the following address:

THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE CITY OF BALTIMORE, MARYLAND:

In the spirit of "Fraternity, Charity, and Loyalty," greeting: Whereas on the occasion of the elaborate annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, held in the city of Baltimore June 21, 22, 23, 1882, when the parading column and escort of the Grand Army of the Republic and visiting military organizations from other States, commanded by Chief Marshal, General R. B. Ayres, United States Army, and numbering fully 12,000 men, was reviewed from the portico of the City Hall by Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, accompanied by members of his cabinet, General James W. Keyes, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and other distinguished members of Congress, William T. Sherman, General of the United States Army, and his Staff; Honorable Wallace T. Rasin, Governor of Maryland, and his Military Staff, Honorable William Pinkney White, Mayor of Baltimore, his secretary, Major J. Monroe Hoffman, and other representatives of the city government, ex-Mayors Latrobe, Banks, and Vansant, General Felix Agnus, General Alfred E. King, and many other distinguished citizens of Baltimore, and of other cities and States, the Union Veterans of the Common Council, and the people of Baltimore did extend to the Grand Army of the Republic and accompanying organizations and friends a most cordial and generous welcome, unbounded hospitality, and elaborate entertainment, whilst many ex-Confederate soldiers joined. The Grand Army of the Republic expresses its profound appreciation of the kind and loving [illegible] and its gratification at the abundant evidence then shown that [illegible] only a union of States, but also a union of hearts throughout [illegible] that one is, in truth, "a government of the people, by the [illegible] ple"; and that all are devoted to one common purpose of [illegible] and happiness, now and [illegible]

That the Grand Army may ever hold the noble virtues over the [illegible] memorial [illegible] that also may grow [illegible] of all law peoples may be the [illegible] is the fervent prayer of [illegible]

By order of the Encampment.

[illegible]

Digitized by Google

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,
VALUABLE IN INDIGESTION

Dr. Daniel T. Newton, Chicago, says: "I find it a pleasant and valuable remedy in indigestion, particularly in unwearied men."—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.

"It is no near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.

"The odor of new-mown hay, the perfume of countless roses, the soft breeze, the trim lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune.

Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Foot of 10th St., East River, and Astoria Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.

The Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel lists, and tours covering the White Mountains, the Coast of Maine, The Maritime Provinces, and all the Shores, Mountains, and Lake resorts east of Boston will be mailed free to any address on application to LOUIS TUTTLE, Gen. Pass. Agt., Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

THE GREATEST DISCOVERY OF THE AGE.

For over thirty-six years Dr. Thomas's Vegetable Liniment has been successful in cases of croup, colic, spasms, diarrhœa, and dysentery, taken internally, and sore throat, pains in the limbs, chronic rheumatism, cold sores, pimples, blotches, and eruptions, externally, and not a bottle has been returned, many, indeed, stating they would not be without it even if it was $20 a bottle. Sold by the druggists at 25 and 50 cents. Depot, 42 Murray street.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE,

The best of all hair-dressings. It allays irritation, removes all tendency to dandruff, and invigorates the action of the capillary glands in the highest degree, thus promoting a luxurious and healthy growth of hair. Its effect upon the glossiness and pliability of the hair is much as opposed to overgreased. BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are the best.—[Adv.]

ELECTRICAL INVENTIONS which wish to take out Patents, should address W. B. HALE, Attorney, 614 F Street, Washington, D. C. Book free.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate the best preparation of pure Chocolate for drinking.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested as delicately adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery is a delicious article; highly recommended by doctors.—Baker's German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An unfailing and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "In success and a boon for which suffering humanity has reason to be grateful."—"Medical Press." "Lancet." "British Medical Journal." &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. Thus rendered necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Pemberton Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, MCKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. R. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Gentleman Lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, cures the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Rashes, Blemishes, Roughness, and Chapping Skin.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents. Soap, 35 cents. Resolvent, $1.

POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

Print Your Own Cards, &c., Presses $5. Large class for students. Any boy can print for profit. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory.

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

From a re[illegible] of "Yolande."

WILLIAM BLACK'S YOLANDE.

Yolande. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "A Princess of Thule," &c. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25. Uniform with the Library Edition of William Black's Novels. Also, Cheap Edition, 4to, Paper, Illustrated, 20 cents.

"Yolande" displays, along with the graces that fit soldiers to unite in Mr. Black's manner, an amount of strength and weight that shows an advance even upon such of them as we have had; there has been little food to feed * * * In it the author has conceived and drawn to the full one exceptionally fine character; he has shown a power of creating a really strong story of love and richly elaborate romance worthy both, and in certain passages of the book he attains real depth with success as interest when may be easily termed tragic. Perhaps the author has never before risen to the height which is reached in "Yolande" in the scenes wherein the daughter bravely struggles, at a personal risk unknown to herself, to save her mother from indulgence in a besetting vice. * * * Hence arise tension complexities which are old fully managed, and which, as has been said, at some points lead to the display of much power. * * * Mr. Black reaches, as it seems to us, a higher point than he has touched before. * * * A book which is full of perfect feeling, and which does much credit to the author than any work he has produced for some time past.—Saturday Review, London.

WILLIAM BLACK'S NOVELS.

LIBRARY EDITION. Yolande. Illustrated.—Shandon Bells. Illustrated.—That Beautiful Wretch. Illustrated.—Sunrise.—Macleod of Dare. Illustrated.—Green Pastures and Piccadilly.—Madcap Violet.—Three Feathers.—A Daughter of Heth.—A Princess of Thule.—In Silk Attire.—Kilmeny.—The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton.—White Wings. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25 each.

CHEAP EDITION, in Paper Covers: Shandon Bells. Illustrated. 4to, 20 cents.—That Beautiful Wretch. Illustrated. 4to, 20 cents.—Sunrise. 4to 15 cents.—Macleod of Dare. Illustrated. 8vo, 60 cents. 4to, 15 cents.—Green Pastures and Piccadilly. 8vo, 50 cents.—Madcap Violet. 8vo, 50 cents.—Three Feathers. Illustrated. 8vo, 50 cents.—A Daughter of Heth. 8vo, 35 cents.—An Adventure in Thule. 4to, 10 cents.—A Princess of Thule.—8vo, 50 cents.—In Silk Attire. 8vo, 35 cents.—Kilmeny. 8vo, 35 cents.—The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton. 8vo, 50 cents.—White Wings. 4to 20 cents.—The Maid of Killeena. The Marriage of Moira Fergus, and other Stories. 8vo, 40 cents.—The Monarch of Mincing Lane. Illustrated. 8vo, 50 cents.—Yolande. Illustrated. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the price.

Peck & Snyder's
CELEBRATED
STATEN ISLAND
Tennis Racquet.
Used by all experts.
Complete Catalogue on application.

PECK & SNYDER, 126, 128, and 130 Nassau St., New York.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It assures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic kills their worms. But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion? But Castoria.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 1057 Second Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

WANTED 8 OR 10 BOOK AGENTS in each of Lancaster to operate as GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great reliability. Best terms ever offered. $1,200 to $2,000 a year. Address, stating full particulars and experience, age, &c., HUBBARD BROS., 30 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

CARDS New Styles. Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards, great quantity, largest variety and lowest prices ever known. 50 chromos, each name, 10c., a present. Sunday Card Co., Northford, Conn.

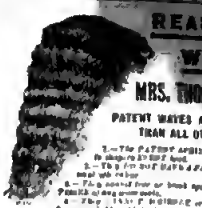
IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. J. M. MILLER & Co., Cleveland, O.

50 Large Chromos, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. J. M. Bean & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

LUBRIN'S
RHENISH COLOGNE.



REASONS
WHY
MRS. THOMPSON'S
PATENT WAVES ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.

1.—The PATENT ARTICLE requires neither to be shaped or put up.

2.—They are not hard & stiff, especially on the edges.

3.—They will not break or break apart, no matter how much or how great a pull is given them.

4.—They will not shrink or curl up when exposed to the dampness of the person.

5.—They are not affected by perspiration, and will not change color or fade.

6.—They are not liable to get out of order, and can be worn for any length of time without requiring dressing or shaping.

7.—To a person dressed with a WAVE they absolutely give WEIGHT, and to a person with a head of long hair, without redressing.

8.—THEY LOOK AS GREAT AGE AS TO CURLS WHEN, or what the coloring is of.

9.—ARE IMPORTANT, Especially on hot and humid occasions and in a THUNDER STORM, as an umbrella will be found to be of no use, as the hair will not be affected by the dampness of the atmosphere.

10.—ARE A GREAT SAVING of time and money, as a person with a WAVE can be ready for any fashionable party or reception in one-fourth the time usually required by those who do not wear them.

PRICES from $0.75 to $12. Hand and Gent's extra. Also, a very ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of SWITCHES, at $5 to $50. GREY HAIR A SPECIALTY.

Testimonials of parties endeavoring to sell our Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

SEND FOR CIRCULAR AND PRICE LIST.

MRS. C. THOMPSON,
No. 53 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON.

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, Piles, Irritation of the Bowels, Indigestion, Nervousness, Congestion, &c.

Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmaceutist 1st Class, 16 rue de Jussieu, Paris, and 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.

Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH
(MORDAN'S PATENT, U.S.A., JAN. 15, 1867.)

A self-feeding reservoir pen, writes continuously with any ink, and by means of a pen-wiper ordinary ink.

PENS TO REFILL (Fine, Medium, or Broad Points), 40c. PER BOX.

MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET without LEAKING and IS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE

$1.00

REQUIRES NO ADJUSTMENT

THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS of the BROAD-NIB are ENTIRELY PRESERVED

$1.50

FITTED WITH A NON-CORRODIBLE PEN.

$2.50 PALLADIUM PEN $3.00

Flexible as Steel, durable as Gold

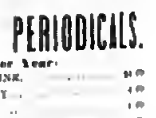
SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.

THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

PHOTO. COPYING AGENTS!

Splendid portraits of any size or kind looked in the most reliable manner from any kind of old picture. Reliable agents wanted in every county in the U. S. Profits Large. Address THE AMERICAN COPYING CO., 58 Genesee St., Auburn, N. Y.

THE AMERICAN



Double Action Revolver,

32, 38 and 44 Calibres, put sold at retail by the manufacturers. Sent by the Gun and Hardware trade, and sporting goods by the Gross. Made by HARRINGTON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass. (the manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Hammerless Gun.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:
HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, } HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, }	8 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, (One Year (52 Numbers))	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

ASTHMA & HAY FEVER
THEIR CAUSE & CURE.

KNIGHT'S NEW TREATISE sent free.

Address L. A. KNIGHT, 19 E. Third St., CINCINNATI, O.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no Rubbish, 10c. Name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Written and sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

BRUSHES of every description at 58 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN K. HOPPEL, Manufacturer and Importer.

$72 A WEEK, $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

THE PREMIUM
to the Wives of Grocers has been pronounced by all who have seen it to be the handsomest and most valuable ever offered by a manufacturer to make the trade familiar with his name. The Case itself is a magnificent one, and the Silver Ware elegant, of beautiful pattern, and of the best quality.

DONT BE A CLAM

CLAMS ARE NOT A PROPER MODEL FOR A HUMAN BEING TO COPY AFTER

they are wedded to their old clam-like notions:—they open their shells to take in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS

AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS:—

TO GROCERS' WIVES
We offer a Special Premium of a beautiful set of Plated Silver Knives and Forks, for simply giving The Frank Siddalls Soap a thorough trial.

A Clam is not a good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after:—
A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after:—is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after:—

A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will TRY new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers:—
A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Better Worker or a Grain Binder:—
A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for:—

Of course if a woman tries every new thing that she hears of she will often be duped:—But there is no sensible man or sensible woman who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such continuous use of their papers for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they had not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways!

SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water or fuel is scarce remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes—it is the only Soap that leaves the dish rag Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish rag [illegible] blame the servants: it is not their fault, but you [illegible] a foul dish rag. Use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper [illegible] Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing [illegible] Glass, Windows, and all Glass Vessels: ordinary soap as is well known, is not fit for washing glass, while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for the purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Bureau Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantlepieces, etc.—it is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding [illegible] of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the sick-room it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat [illegible] out The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] be pure and solid.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles [illegible] wash these only with this Soap and they will [illegible] always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease and without causing scratch [illegible]

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Bather at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy will all reap great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is so different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost incredible. The face never [illegible], no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how closely shaved, and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet smelling.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE.—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Sores, Galls, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable; while for washing cars and car windows, cleaning the running gear and bodies of fine carriages it [illegible]; by its use paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and safer, no shocking accidents as are often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children use Artists' or Painting Boxes should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for immediate use and will take the ink readily.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient [illegible] Hospital.

INSTEAD OF INGROWING TOE NAILS

In place of cotton wool a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing Old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns; for Bathing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults [illegible] with Salt Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face [illegible] afflicted with Scaly Incrustations [illegible] when other soap is used, [illegible] it is a most valuable aid to the Physician [illegible] of the pores and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

For Washing Sore [illegible] Feet caused by walking or wearing tight shoes.
[illegible] the lather [illegible] the lather off.

[illegible] better than anything else.

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the Skin [illegible] has an agreeable odor [illegible] It should always be used for washing the hands and face of those [illegible] it always [illegible]

No tooth powder or tooth wash will compare with it.
A little on the tooth-brush [illegible] teeth and gums [illegible]
It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste [illegible]

PERSONS WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE or WASH RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Whenever either a Sponge or Wash rag has a disagreeable smell it is due entirely to the use of [illegible] the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash rag sweet and clean and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any necessity to expose it to the air [illegible]

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing [illegible] Hat Linings and neck-wear will keep clean much longer.

—Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles.

The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible]

ODD USES—QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

[illegible] Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., are [illegible] and [illegible] each washing.

[illegible]

[illegible] Photographers' Plates [illegible] possibility of scratching [illegible] of Designs for washing

[illegible] Diamonds, and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Plate [illegible] it is considered by Jewelers superior to any [illegible]

Wash [illegible] keep its hair, and you will [illegible] Barber Soap

[illegible] for cleaning rag carpets, also for cleaning [illegible] than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning clothing [illegible]

[illegible]—IT KEEPS THE LIQUIDS BRIGHT, [illegible] last much longer,

The [illegible] will not chap from [illegible] home-made soap, toilet [illegible]

[illegible] before selling it

[illegible] with The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] NOT require scalding or putting in the sun. [illegible] the hands after milking.

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY

at Places where it is Not sold at the Stores

Send the retail price 10 cents in money or Postage Stamps [illegible]

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash day after receiving it, and that every bit of the family wash shall be [illegible]

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular full size cake of Soap will be sent, postage prepaid; [illegible] in Postage Stamps [illegible]
All this is done for 10 cents
[illegible]

If your letter gets no attention, it will be because you have not made the promises, or because you have sent for more than one cake.

Make the promises very plain, or the Soap will NOT be sent.

A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Dealer if the above TWO promises are made.

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

A Person of Refinement at the [illegible] new easy way [illegible], in place of the old hard ripping way.

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

A Person of Intelligence [illegible] is modest [illegible] the very [illegible] traditions.

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

A Person of Honor will [illegible] as to try the Soap [illegible] strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

Sensible Persons will [illegible] but thankful that there is [illegible] been directed to better methods.

And one dont get the old wash-boiler mended, but next wash-day give one honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for, but after trying it dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses [illegible], or you can order direct from the Factory.

You must NOT send for more than one cake:
if a friend wants to try it she must send in a separate letter.

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions [illegible] child over 12 years of age who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used, NOT EVEN TO HEAT THE WASH-WATER, and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle
THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last water soapy: the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; dont use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap on any of the wash.

[illegible] it out on a wash board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as [illegible] soapy [illegible].

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as [illegible] it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After waiting the FULL time commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board AND THE DIRT WILL DROP OUT; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DONT use any more Soap: DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DONT wash through two suds. If the wash water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold for the hands add some hot water out of the tea-kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, AND IS FOR THE PURPOSE OF GETTING THE DIRTY SUDS OUT, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY SMART HOUSEKEEPER WILL KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold. Use little or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

ASSISTED IMMIGRANT FROM KERRY WORKHOUSE

"Who says I'm a pauper, or will be a burden upon the country?"

TIGER PLAYING CARDS.
SPORTSMAN'S
ARMY AND NAVY CARDS.

Russell & Morgan Printing Co.'s New Factory, Lock Street, Eggleston Avenue and Sixth Street, Cincinnati, O.

CONGRESS GILT EDGES.
ARMY AND NAVY GILT EDGES.
CONGRESS PLAYING CARDS.

THE RUSSELL & MORGAN CO.'S

U. S. PLAYING CARDS.

ALL INDEXED, ALL ROUND CORNERS, AND EVERY PACK IN A NEAT BOX.

VICTOR E. MAUGER, General Agent, Cincinnati, O.
New York Office, corner of Reade St. and West Broadway.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.
WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

TREAT THE HUMAN MACHINE GENTLY.

NEITHER CONSTIPATION, COLIC, DIARRHOEA, DYSENTERY, OR OTHER BOWEL COMPLAINTS, CAN BE CURED BY ABUSING THE DELICATE MACHINERY OF THE SYSTEM WITH FURIOUS PURGATIVES. THE BEST AND SAFEST REMEDY, PARTICULARLY AT THIS SEASON, IS A TEASPOONFUL OF TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT, TAKEN IN A GLASS OF WATER, WHICH WILL GENTLY RELIEVE, WHILE TONING AND HEALING THE IRRITATED INTESTINE.

DR. FENNER'S ST. VITUS DANCE SPECIFIC. One bottle always cures. Circular, Fredonia, N. Y.

GOLD PENS.
PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.
THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.
A GOLD PEN and RUBBER HOLDER, containing ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.
MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.
Send for Price-List.
Our Goods are Sold by FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

Round Writing
BOOK FOR SELF INSTRUCTION & PENS
Mailed for $1.40 by stationers, or
KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

THE NEW
SWEET BOUQUET Cigarette.
Delicate, Mild, and Fragrant. A Dainty Whiff for Connoisseurs.
S. JACOBI & CO., Manufacturers, New York.

"Two boxes of Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills cured me of neuralgia, when the doctors couldn't."—Clifford Smith, Windsor, Nova Scotia.

BY ALL ODDS
The BEST-EQUIPPED RAILROAD
IN THE WORLD.

Let it be forever remembered that the

Chicago & North-Western RAILWAY

is the best and shortest route to and from Chicago and Council Bluffs (Omaha), and that it is preferred by all well-posted travellers when passing to or from California and Colorado. It also operates the best route and the short line between

CHICAGO
— AND —
ST. PAUL and MINNEAPOLIS.

Milwaukee, La Crosse, Sparta, Madison, Fort Howard (Green Bay), Wis., Winona, Owatonna, Mankato, Minn., Cedar Rapids, Des Moines, Webster City, Algona, Clinton, Marshalltown, Iowa, Freeport, Elgin, Rockford, Ill., are amongst its 800 local stations on its lines.

Among a few of the numerous points of superiority enjoyed by the patrons of this road are its DAY COACHES, which are the finest that human art and ingenuity can create; its PALATIAL SLEEPING-CARS, which are models of comfort and elegance; its PALACE DRAWING-ROOM CARS, which are unsurpassed by any; and its widely celebrated

NORTH-WESTERN DINING-CARS,

the like of which are not run by any other road anywhere. In short, it is asserted that IT IS THE BEST-EQUIPPED ROAD IN THE WORLD.

All points of interest North, Northwest, and West of Chicago, business centres, summer resorts, and noted hunting and fishing grounds are accessible by the various branches of this road.

It owns and controls over 6000 miles of road, and has over four hundred passenger conductors constantly caring for its millions of patrons.

Ask your ticket agent for tickets via this route AND TAKE NONE OTHER. All leading ticket agents sell them. It costs no more to travel on this route, that gives first-class accommodations, than it does to go by the poorly equipped roads.

For maps, descriptive circulars, and summer-resort papers, or other information not obtainable at your local ticket office, write to the

GEN'L PASS. AGENT, C. & N.-W. R'Y,
CHICAGO, ILL.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S
Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes
HAVE
SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES
AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE P&A MARK.
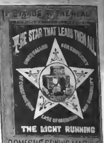
ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
MANUFACTURED BY
THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED

Send Stamp for Catalogue.
E. I. Horsman,
80 & 82 William Street, New York.
LAWN TENNIS.



SYPHER & CO.
ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.
739 & 741 BROADWAY.

BEATTY
27 STOPS 10 SETS REEDS. BEETHOVEN ORGANS.

Price only $125
CATALOGUE
VISITORS WELCOME
DANIEL F. BEATTY, WASHINGTON, NEW JERSEY.

THE NATIONAL PARK OF THE YELLOWSTONE

A ... "THE WEST SHORE," ... contains forty-one engravings of the NATIONAL PARK OF THE YELLOWSTONE, LAKE COEUR D'ORELLE, the COLUMBIA RIVER PYRAMID PARK, and the HEAD-WATERS OF THE MISSOURI, together with a complete description of the route of the NORTHERN PACIFIC ... and the country bordering its line. Mailed, postage paid, on receipt of 25 cents. Address "THE WEST SHORE," Portland, Oregon.

Paillard's
MUSIC BOXES

ARE THE BEST.
They are the only ones that are sold by first-class dealers the world over. Send 3 cents for circular.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,
Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.
Send for Descriptive Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS
SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD
GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

PAVARA PILLS.

These Pills are the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. No pain, nausea, or purging. A new and perfect remedy. Recommended by physicians. Sold by Druggists, or sent by mail for 25 cents.
C. N. CRITTENTON, General Agent, 115 Fulton Street, New York City.

BY THE USE OF
BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

THE BLACKMAN WHEEL.

PATENTED.

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.
From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to HOWARD A. MORSE, 45 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID of superior quality, claiming special excellence in the essentials of Fluidity, Color, and Durability.
IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 753 and 755 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL Seaside, Lake, and Mountain Resorts.—Just out. With illustrations and maps. Describes all resorts and 2000 hotels and boarding-houses. Price 25c., postpaid. American Summer Resort Directory. Rand McNally & Co., Pubs., 5 Murray St., N. Y., or Railroad Railway.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure cured my skin disease." C. B. McDonald, Plantersville, Ala. $1, druggists.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

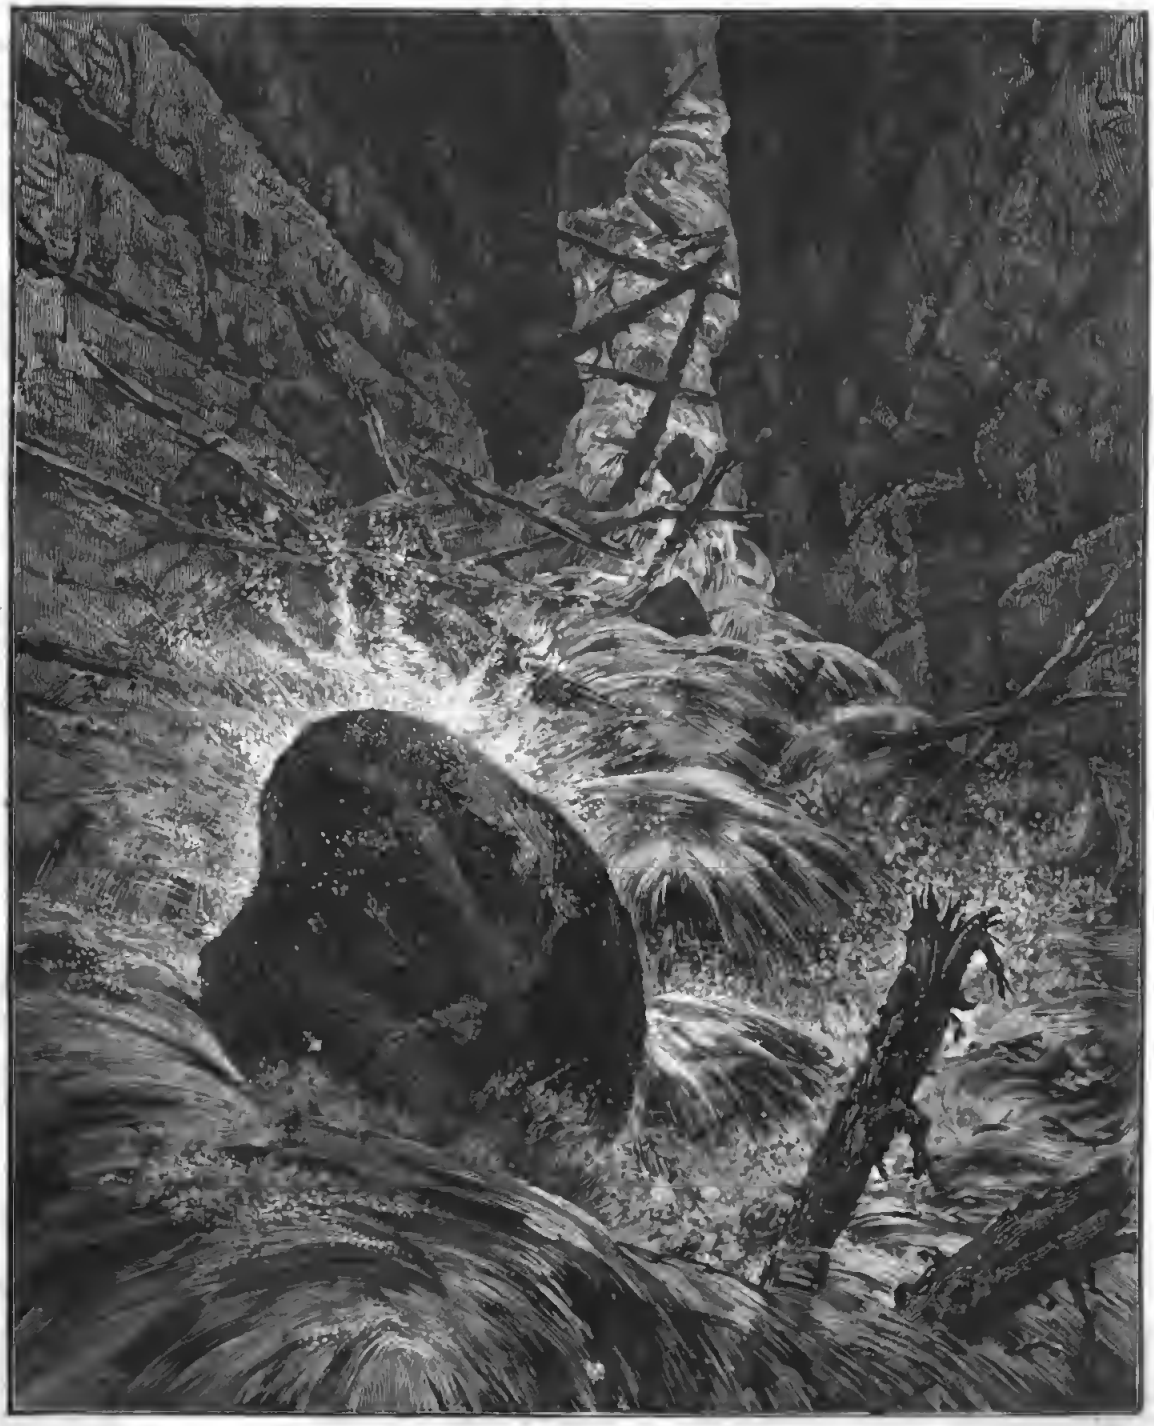
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1386.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.



THE FALL OF THE BOWLDER.—DRAWN BY W. H. GIBSON.—[SEE PAGE 442.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1883.

WARNING.

We are informed that a person unknown to us, who calls himself W. C. ALEXANDER, is soliciting railroad passes on a letter purporting to be owned by HARPER & BROTHERS. The letter is fraudulent. HARPER & BROTHERS do not solicit railroad or other passes for themselves or for persons employed by them.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same few the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "*ART Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as our page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is available, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the time of issue and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOMETT have been published. That published in 1837 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE CAUCUS.

THE contest for the Senatorship in New Hampshire, like that in Pennsylvania two or three years ago, and like the more recent contests in New York, Michigan, and Minnesota, shows that the caucus is no longer supreme, and that a caucus nomination is not necessarily equivalent to an election. In all these instances it was the Republican party which declined to be controlled by a caucus, and the fact illustrates a characteristic of that party which its leaders, especially the "machine," constantly forget. The Republican party is essentially intelligent and independent. It is the party of American principle and policy in their best and most generous sense, and there are always enough Republicans to decide an election who will not be dragooned, but who will do what they think best for the country. The mere party politicians suppose that any measure or any nomination which is "regular" will receive, of course, the support, however reluctant, of every member of the party. This is a fallacy which experience steadily refutes, but it is as steadily maintained by political Bourbons. They have but one cry, which is that parties are impossible if the decision of the majority upon party action be not respected. The simple persistency and air of triumph with which this proposition is repeated is pathetic. They say "an undisputed thing in such a solemn way."

The caucus is a great practical convenience under certain circumstances. But it is not indispensable even in the selection of a Senatorial candidate, as the practice in Massachusetts proves. It is convenient when but one man can be selected from a dozen equally excellent men, after due deliberation, to allow the majority to decide. But this agreement presupposes both equal fitness and perfectly fair dealing. The moment that any kind of dishonest influence, bargain, or patronage is introduced, the whole proceeding is void. Nobody is bound, and a majority, being a dishonest majority, has no moral significance whatever. Under the system of patronage known as the spoils, a caucus is always under just suspicion. It is presumptively not a body of free and honest voters. It is "put up" in the interest of this or that candidate, and the "managers" of the candidates are generally agents who stick at nothing.

It is the knowledge or the conviction of this state of things which makes intelligent men very wary of a caucus. It is used as a trap to catch them. If they can be induced to take part, they are aware of a general understanding that if they can not decide the action they are yet honorably bound by it. This, however, is true only under the conditions that we have mentioned. But it is thoughtlessly held to be true of every caucus. To a great many honest and independent men, therefore, it seems better to avoid a caucus altogether. This is the course which the opponents of Senator ROLLINS have pursued in New Hampshire. They are not satisfied with him as a suitable representative, and they naturally feared that his position would give him an illicit advantage in a caucus. The argument that when they find it impossible to elect a successor whom they prefer, they ought to vote for him because he has a larger number of supporters than any other candidate, has no weight whatever if there are circumstances which cause them to distrust the larger number. This is one of the inevitable evils of the spoils system. While it exists, a caucus must always be suspected, and so long as it endures the caucus system will fall justly more and more into disrepute.

A MISCHIEVOUS PLOT.

A SECRET movement to procure the removal of one of the most efficient and upright officers in the public service is a matter of great public interest, and such a movement has been undertaken to displace the Postmaster of New York. It is, of course, not a project for the improvement of the public service, it is the plot of politicians who wish to control the patronage of the office, a control which is impossible while MR. PEARSON is Postmaster. Under the management of MR. PEARSON and his predecessor, MR. JAMES, the New York Post-office has been placed among the few best offices of the kind in the world. Its immense business is transacted with a smoothness, dispatch, and accuracy which would be impossible in any such office which was not conducted upon sound business principles and under a strict business supervision. The thorough organization of the office and its admirable efficiency have been secured in great part by withdrawing it from politics. It has ceased to be a "placer" for ward politicians. It is a public office managed solely for the public benefit, and it is therefore one of the strong arguments for retaining in power a party which has the good sense to see that honest and effective public service is the best appeal which a party can make for public confidence.

The real object of the effort to displace MR. PEARSON is to throw the Post-office back into the mire of venal politics. But while this is the object, the plea for MR. PEARSON'S removal is that he is connected with a company which was instituted to violate the postal laws. The truth is that having signed an application for the incorporation of a District Telegraph Company, his name, we believe, appeared for a year, without his knowledge, as trustee. But he was never notified of his election, and has never attended a meeting, and owns no stock, and has nothing whatever to do with it. If a branch of the company is engaged in illicit business, he is entirely unconcerned in it.

The plot for MR. PEARSON'S removal has hitherto miscarried. Both the President and the Postmaster-General are undoubtedly aware that a change of the head of the New York Post-office, except for plain and conclusive reasons, would be a blow at the public convenience and service which would not be readily condoned. As "politics" it would be a very great mistake. But there is no good reason to suppose that the plot will succeed. It is opposed, not because MR. PEARSON has any "vested right" in his office, but because the public has a right to protest against the removal of an experienced and efficient and honest postmaster as a move in a petty political game.

THE DANGEROUS SISTER-IN-LAW.

THE defeat of what Punch calls the Deceased Wife's Brother Bill in the House of Lords has naturally produced a great deal of disappointment and indignation in England. There is no question that public opinion strongly favors the bill. Its second reading passed the Lords by a majority in a very large House. The third reading was defeated in a smaller House by the vote of the bishops. And why should bishops make the laws? is the question which is instantly and angrily asked. Their action will certainly not deepen public attachment for the episcopal bench, nor increase confidence in the House of Lords.

One of the most curious incidents of the debate upon the subject, which has been carried on in religious newspapers as well as in Parliament, was the publication some time ago of a letter from the United States, which was said to have been written by a clergyman, and which contained the most extraordinary statements of the direful consequences which had arisen in this country from the permission of marriage with the sister of a deceased wife. A more ridiculous and false assertion could not have been made. But it was widely circulated in England, and seemed to have influence, for it was thought by Lord DALHOUSIE, who had charge of the bill in the House of Lords, to be sufficiently important to require confutation. He inclosed, therefore, extracts of this letter to many persons in the United States requesting an expression of their views upon its remarkable allegations, and the replies, promptly and completely disproving the calumny, were of great weight in carrying the second reading in the Lords. The domestic unhappiness, jealousy, infidelity, and crime, in various degrees and kinds, which the anonymous clergyman represented to be the consequences of a practice which is familiar in this country, were shown to be unknown, and it would be interesting to learn who it is that was willing so to slander his countrymen.

In point of fact, as reason and experience show, not only are such marriages often most desirable because of the children, but they are often singularly happy. The prohibition is a gross interference with that wise freedom of choice which is the truest social safeguard. It is an old ecclesiastical tradition which the good sense of England has outgrown, and the present defeat of the appeal is but an illustration of the stolidity of British conservatism, which wishes to do what has been always done, and to find in the existence of a law a reason for its continuance. The pertinacity with which the English clergy are said to resist the repeal suggests a singular domestic experience. Do they, as a class, acknowledge that the allegations of the opponents of repeal are true? Whatever their position, or the reasons for it, there seems to be no question that the bill will be passed at the next session, and the anxious clergy who have protested will be abandoned to the mercy of their sisters-in-law.

MR. KELLY ON MR. TILDEN.

WHETHER MR JOHN KELLY was born in this country we do not know, but he has a very imperfect idea of American laws and of characteristic American conduct if the report of a speech made by him at Springfield be correct. In that speech MR KELLY remarked that MR. TILDEN should have told Congress in February, 1877, that he had been elected President, and that if it did not announce that fact and seat him, he should appeal to the people. This remark by a conspicuous Democratic leader, who controls a vote without which Democratic victory in New York is impossible, is made at the same time that MR RANDALL is denounced for not promoting civil war when he was Speaker. They are both illustrations of a spirit in the Democratic party which deepens the great distrust with which it is regarded. They deal with revolution in a way which in a free and intelligent country does not commend a party to popular favor.

If MR. KELLY will glance at a document known as the Constitution of the United States, he will see that if MR. TILDEN had taken the course that he recommends, MR. TILDEN, trampling upon every form of law, would have asked the country, upon his simple assertion that he had been elected President, to sustain his claim by armed force. If he could produce adequate evidence that he had been elected, there would have been no need of appealing to the people. It was because he could not produce it, because the country was morally sure that his honest election could not be shown, that the question arose. To insist upon his assumption and to appeal to the people would have been merely to array the Democratic against the Republican party in arms. MR TILDEN was a very much better American and a very much wiser man than MR. JOHN KELLY. He knew that revolution, however justifiable under certain circumstances, is not justifiable when based upon the alleged results of an intimidated election. He knew that however great Republican election offenses might be, Democratic election crimes were as perfectly well known. The forms of law, the spirit of law, and the moral probabilities were all against him, and his mentor JEFFERSON had taught him too well the grounds upon which alone revolution can hopefully appeal to the judgment of mankind to permit him to do as MR. KELLY thinks that he ought to have done.

MR. KELLY objects to MR. TILDEN that he did not plunge the country into a bloody civil contest in which the republic would have perished. In making such an objection MR. KELLY "gives his own measure," but nothing more. Even he does not venture to say that the country would have been to-day more peaceful, prosperous, freer, and more promising if MR. TILDEN had invoked civil war instead of yielding to a lawful decision. A party in which MR KELLY is a powerful leader is a good party to keep out of power.

GOVERNOR BUTLER AT CAMBRIDGE AND AT TEWKSBURY.

As the general estimate of General BUTLER as a public man has been formed upon observation of his conduct for many years, it is not likely to be reversed by his adroit speech at the Harvard alumni dinner. The General is quite shrewd enough to know that, of the author of the familiar remark, "Harvard professors? Oh yes; we hanged one of them the other day," is going to dine with Harvard alumni, his best cue is flattery. He is an advocate of experience, and he addressed himself upon this occasion as upon other occasions to carry the jury. MR CHOATE, in his capital and skillful speech, led the way for the Governor, and, as it were, gave him the key. He bespoke the courtesy of the graduates for the Chief Magistrate, and showed the Governor the character of the instrument upon which he was to play. The Governor is quick, and he said only what Harvard men were sure to applaud. The whole performance upon his part was excellent. But it will hardly reconcile loyal Masschusetts men to the shame which he has tried to cast upon the State in his Tewksbury investigation.

This raid upon Tewksbury has been the great effort of the BUTLER administration. Could it have ended with the statements of the accusers, the Governor might have succeeded in staining the honor of Massachusetts. But the remorseless revelation of the rebutting evidence, and the report upon the condition of the almshouse by Mrs. LEONARD, of the State Board of Health, Lunacy, and Charity, have effectually baffled the Governor. Misconduct at Tewksbury, as in other public institutions in Massachusetts and elsewhere, has been exposed from time to time, and it has been corrected. Mrs. LEONARD, who has been in the habit of visiting the almshouse without official associates and without previous notice, gives a carefully detailed account of the institution as she has found it. The building was clean and free from vermin, the bathing arrangements were sufficient, the old men's and old women's wards comfortable and cheerful, and the inmates generally contented. The sick were as well cared for as the number of nurses would permit, and the nurses were too few because of the stinted appropriations. The food was of fair quality. There are now no children at Tewksbury without mothers. Miss WILKIN, the physician of the women's ward, is skillful, kind, and devoted, and does all that is possible; and the patients, who knew by experience that Mrs. LEONARD would not betray them, spoke to her with entire freedom.

The report of Mrs. LEONARD shows that while, as in all such institutions, there are undoubtedly instances of carelessness and inhumanity, they are not characteristic, and that the general management of the almshouse has been quite as good as the building and the appropriations would allow. The Governor declares that the expenses must be reduced. Mrs. LEONARD, with an intimate knowledge of the whole subject, says that she does not know where they could be reduced, but that she sees very plainly where they ought to be increased. The Governor evidently attacked Tewksbury not to secure reform of abuses, but to make political capital, and notwithstanding the adroit speech at Harvard, the discredit to Massachusetts will apparently prove to be not Tewksbury, but the Governor.

OF RASCALS.

"WHAT do you think of the Democratic campaign cry, 'Turn the rascals out'?" was the question addressed by one Republican to another as they met at lunch.

"That is about the size of it," answered his friend, with a smile, as he handed him the following paragraph from the Boston Herald:

"To the cry, 'Turn the rascals out,' the reply will surely be made, 'Keep the rascals out.' How would the Democratic leaders enjoy a campaign on this line? The Democratic party is the party of STARTWEIT and TWEED. 'Keep the rascals out.' The last Democratic cabinet and the last Democratic Collector at New York stole more than all their successors for nearly twenty years. 'Keep the rascals out.' The Democratic State of Tennessee has had three defaulting treasurers in succession. 'Keep the rascals out.' A full proposition of the votes cast in Congress for the river and harbor jobs have been Democratic. 'Keep the rascals out.' Eight of the jury that acquitted the Star Route thieves were Democrats. 'Keep the rascals out.' The Democratic Mayor of Albany has just resigned to prevent a trial that would have exposed the gross frauds by which Democrats seated him. 'Keep the rascals out.' The Union League Club of Chicago has just discovered incontestable proof that the worst kind of ballot box stuffing was resorted to to reelect the Democratic Mayor Hanson, who has nullified a law of the Legislature to pay his debt to the ruffianism and criminals who supported him. 'Keep the rascals out.' Elections in more than half the Southern States have been turned into farces, and the rights of majorities openly trampled under foot to insure Democratic ascendency. 'Oh, keep the rascals out?'"

"What's that?" said another Republican who joined them. "Turn the rascals out? Why, certainly. They were turned out twenty-two years ago, when they had knocked the bottom out of the Treasury, sent the navy to the basin of the earth, and, could the last Democratic Secretary of War have had his way, would have sent the army to join it. The rascals were very effectually turned out, and they'll have to struggle hard to get in again."

FROM OHIO.

AN Ohio Republican of the straitest sect sends us the best interior view of the political situation in that State that we have seen:

"When you say about HOADLY's nomination, as 'the defeat of the reactionary faction, and in itself a kind of new departure,' may have some truth, but the nomination has not that significance in Ohio. There was no Bourbon candidate, unless GIBSON was one, and he had no following. The contest was between a Union moderate soldier and an abolition Republican. The THURMAN Bourbon supported WARD; the PAYNE Bourbons, HOADLY, each moved by personal considerations.

"The Convention nominated HOADLY to catch the German vote. HOADLY has long had friendly relations with the Germans, and was their special champion in excluding the Bible from the schools, in making Sunday free to them, and in fighting the liquor laws. THURMAN understood the situation, and warned the Convention not to 'subordinate Democratic doctrines and aspirations to a single issue'—meaning the liquor issue—which the nomination of HOADLY would do. HOADLY is the whiskey candidate, and he is nominated to retain the German vote. He is a 'smart,' but not a wise man. He is alert, ever on the qui vive, quick to detect the weak point of his adversary, and to expose it with éclat. His views on any subject are never commonplace, sometimes striking, usually extravagant, picturesque, sensational, and unsound. In two conspicuous instances he has manifested these qualities. In the Oregon case, of which you are informed. Then WARNER had been of the opinion that the fugitive slave clause of the Constitution was to be enforced by the States. HOADLY adopted this opinion, and as judge applied it to the fugitives from justice clause, releasing on habeas corpus a criminal on the ground that the United States have on that subject were unconstitutional.

"While he is a gentleman, so upright, honorable man, most genial in his personal intercourse with all men, yet in public speech he is extravagant, ferocious, often grotesque. He has had a chronic antipathy to the old Whigs, was always apprehensive they would obtain undue control of the Republican party, and for this reason was ever ready to 'jump' that party. In the liberal movement of 1872 he joined, and urged the nomination, I think, of TRUMBULL. When GREELEY was nominated he denounced him in the most frantic manner as an 'infernal rascal.' He meant only that GREELEY was a Whig. When the election of 1876 was finally decided he denounced HAYES as 'that fraud,' 'that thief.'

"I do not see how his nomination is 'a new departure.' It is true he proclaims 'a new Democracy;' but this is mere fiction, an old trick at his in the sensational game. It is also true that he is vice president of a civil service reform association, but since he fixed his eye on the office of Governor he has made no allusion to the subject, but has constantly pointed with pride to his youthful enthusiasm for VAN BUREN. Now the significant act in VAN BUREN's career is his introduction of the New York spoils system into the general government. In his last days Justice MACLEAN was most to tell young men that when the news reached Washington that VAN BUREN had been elected in the Senate, President MONROE told him that the election of VAN BUREN was to be profoundly regretted, for he would introduce the New York spoils system into, and thus demoralize, the general government.

"No doubt that Judge HOADLY thinks sometimes of the Presidency. But should he ever reach that goal, one thing is certain. He would not give us the quiet, conservative, business-like administration of ARTHUR. He would be sensational."

A NEW VIEW OF THE FOURTH OF JULY.

AT the Woodstock celebration on the Fourth of July Bishop COXE spoke well of the value of traditions in a nation and the necessary decay of traditions among a people which is constantly recruited from aliens. His practical suggestion was that we should admit aliens to citizenship only when they are really fitted to become Americans.

The utter ignorance among large numbers of those who are called Americans of the significance of our traditions was curiously illustrated by a conversation which we know to have occurred. An Irish cook remarked to her mistress upon the Fourth of July that it was supposable the day of "her people." "Your people?" said the mistress; "pray what have they to do with it?" "Why, and sure, ma'am, it is the day on which the Irish first came to this country."

The cook did not say that she derived her information from Mr. JOHN KELLY's lecture upon the Irish settlers in America. But her remark perhaps explains the proposition of the Hon. W. E. ROBINSON, that Ireland must be restored to the United States—or the United States to Ireland, we forget which it was.

THE RESTORATION OF A FLAG.

THE pleasantest and most significant incident of the day in New York on the Fourth of July was the restoration by the Virginia Cadets of the flag captured from the One-hundred-and-sixty-fourth New York Regiment near Alexandria in 1863. The Virginia Cadets are pupils of a State institute which receives students from every State, and the company had just been to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where President ARTHUR, with a few fitting words, had presented the diplomas of the graduating class.

Under an escort from the New York Sixty-ninth, the cadets then marched, with admirable precision and through a heat which tested their endurance, to the City Hall, where they were received by Mayor EDSON and a body of distinguished citizens. Colonel PORTLOCK, for the cadets, warmly praised the One-hundred-and-sixty-fourth, and spoke in a very patriotic strain. He was followed by Colonel BALL, who described the incidents of the capture, and rejoiced in the fraternal feeling in which the memory of the war is buried, now that slavery, a blot upon free institutions, has disappeared forever. Mayor EDSON and other gentlemen responded in the same generous tone.

The event was another illustration of that union of hearts and of hands which is rapidly replacing the old union of irreconcilable divergencies which were bred by slavery. The scene was symbolical of the sincere and friendly regard which between honorable foes follows every honest contention, however bravely and tenaciously maintained on both sides. The young Virginians have doubtless returned feeling that the flag of New York is no less the flag of Virginia, and that happily over both flags hang in common benediction the old Stars and Stripes.

PERSONAL.

THE health of Mr WILLIAM PAGE continues to cause his friends the gravest anxiety. Ever since he was forced to leave his studio in this city and to discontinue painting they have hoped for a favorable turn to his disease, but they have waited more than five years in vain. Occasionally the artist in his home at Totterville, Staten Island, rouses himself to express his old enthusiasm for SHAKESPEARE or LOWELL, but the respite is short, and in a few minutes he reverts to a condition of chronic indifference toward the great interests that once engaged his genius and his busy hands. Saddest of all, the paintings that mark the farthest reach of his artistic endeavor are yearly becoming black and indistinct, owing, it is believed, to the strong drying oil which used to be his favorite vehicle, and which he was accustomed to say had been pronounced by no less an authority as the late Professor FARADAY to be the best of all oils for the painter's purpose. In some cases, moreover, the pressure of gamboge, which Mr PAGE employed freely to produce several of his most sparkling and vitalized yellows, after it had been dissolved in alcohol, has caused the pigments of his pictures, notably of his famous "Venus," to melt and run down the canvas. But there are in Albany some very beautiful portraits of thirty years ago, in which Mr PAGE used neither gamboge nor strong drying oil, and which to-day are as fresh and bright as if still on the easel.

—Some mention has been made in the newspapers of the heroism of the Rev WILLIAM H REED, an Episcopal clergyman of Brooklyn, at the recent disaster on the East River Bridge. The facts of the case we have ascertained to be as follows. Mr REED, while caught in the crush just east of the fatal steps down which so many victims were pushed or be trampled upon, heard a father screaming, "Save my daughter." The girl was eight or nine years of age, and the brave preacher, dropping his valise and umbrella, seized her firmly with one hand, while with the other he fought his way above the pressure forms below him, until the two were borne in safety beyond the steps. He had seen that the only hope for either of them was in maintaining an upright position in the midst of that turbulent and swaying crowd, and he bent all his strength of muscle and of resolution to the accomplishment of the task, knowing that if he fell both he and the child were in immediate danger of being crushed to death. Mr REED never learned the name of the man he saved, but the gentleman has heard his name a score of times, and perhaps will tell him so one of these days. His friends, who have long admired his abundant personal courage, were not surprised at this striking manifestation of it.

—Mr SOL EYTINGE, Jun., the artist, whose Blackville sketches are among his most popular contributions to this journal, resides in Passaic, a New Jersey village about twenty minutes' ride by rail from the metropolis. Though one of the oldest of American humorists, he appears to be about forty years of age, and has the head and shoulders of a typical commanding general, and the tapering fingers that one reads about much oftener than one sees. His home is a charming cottage adorned with profuse roses and climbing vines, affording from the piazza a superb view of New York, the upper bay, the Narrows, and the green hills of Staten Island. Mr EYTINGE's accomplished wife, MARGARET EYTINGE, is one of the lights of American literature.

—Mr S J GUY is painting a genre picture in his best style, representing an elder sister holding out a strawberry to a baby, who lies smiling on his back, and is old enough to be attracted by its color, but not old enough to miss or to eat it. It is a pretty story, and in the elaboration Mr GUY will prepare his usual feast of delicate gradation of light and shade and color. Considering the amount of work he puts upon a picture, Mr GUY is one of the fastest painters in America; but he is not easily satisfied, and his pet aversion is slap-dash. A truly serene spot on the uproarious Fourth was the Tenth Street Studio Building, where GUY, W H BEARD, and CARLTON celebrated the Declaration of Independence in separate rooms.

—One of the Roman Catholic societies or brotherhoods is called the Third Order of St Francis. The Pope has recently given it a new set of by laws, because—strange to tell—the old set was "not in all points suited to the present age and present customs." The members must be more than fourteen, of good morals, of peaceable disposition, and exact in the practice of the Catholic religion; and they are required to refrain from excessive cost and elegance in their dress and toilet, from dangerous stage-plays and dances, and from all revelry; to be frugal at eating and drinking, to confess their sins every month, to settle quarrels whenever they can do so, and to assist daily at mass when it is convenient.

—There is a little tavern in Paris where men of letters and of art meet to scintillate their wit. The scintillations are reported in a small periodical, which bears the name and emblem of the tavern, and can be bought at the neighborhood for a few sous. The tavern keeper, an author of considerable proportions, has adorned the place with curiosities of carte, and caused it to look more like a studio than a cabaret. His example is said to be exerting an influence over Paris tavern-keepers generally.

—The sportsman-naturalist, or the man who shoots birds and learns what he can about them while taking aim, is described by a late writer as generally lacking in that psychological sympathy with the creature he studies without which there can not be any of the very deepest insight; "but, on the other hand, he has many compensating advantages; for is not afraid of boring the birds or beasts, and he is still less chary of disturbing them in their native haunts. That belated expression of sympathies and feelings which goes with the notion of stealing up to and aiming at a bird, in itself insures a steadiness of eye and an accuracy of observation under emotional surroundings which the non-aggressive naturalist generally lacks."

—The Bishop of Para and Amazonas, South America, proposes to use the Amazon River as "a means of spiritual life and fecundity" to the rude native tribes who wander along its banks. He desires to construct a large and handsomely decorated ship, which shall serve the purpose of a church or floating cathedral, with pulpit and confessional, organ and baptismal font, and all the ornaments of furniture necessary for "the solemn and splendid exercise of Catholic rites." The name of this missionary vessel will be Christopher, or Christ-bearer; and as she sails, "the dulcet sounds of the swelling organ, accompanying the full sonorous chant of the priests, will spread over the tranquil surface of the river, and give notice of the approach of Christ, ambulans super aquas."

—An old New-Yorker recently showed to a friend a copy of a Philadelphia newspaper sixty-two years old, which item had inked to a section cream-color. It was Poulson's American Daily Advertiser, of January 26, 1821, and one of the first advertisements to strike the eye was the following:

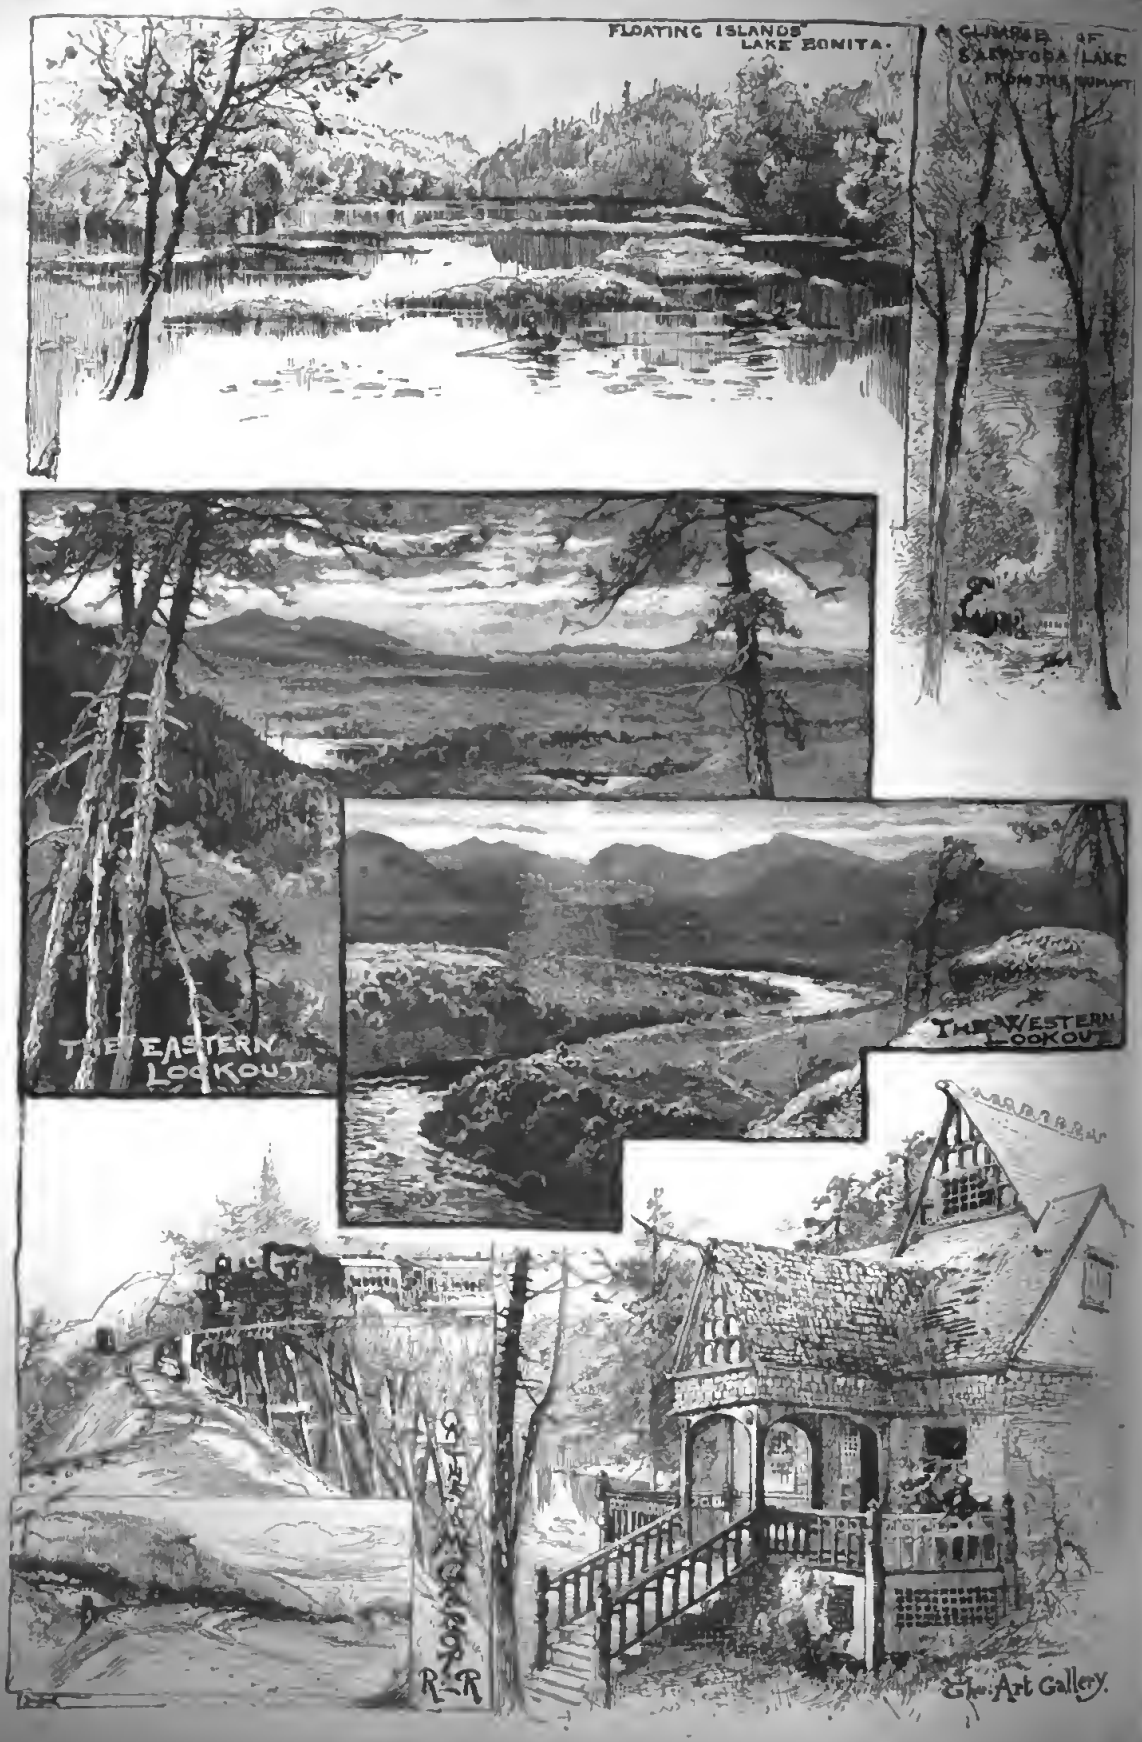
"Six Cents Reward.—Absconded from the subscriber, on Wednesday, the 26th inst., ANN MARY ROBINSON, an indented servant Girl, between 15 and 16 years of age, dark complexion, and black eyes,—had on when she left her master, a green frock and black Beaver Hat. She was born at Bladensburg, in Prince of Maryland.

"Whoever will secure and return her to me will receive the above reward, but no charges. JAMES W. MUNSON."

Civilization in America has made some advance since the year 1821.—Another advertisement in the same journal presents another curious phase of social life. A man named DR MOSSHART, who had rendered himself obnoxious to political rancor, refers his customers to some genealogical statistics. "The persons," he says, "who have payed a Piper and a Trumpeter to insult me, by playing upon their instruments before my windows, until 1 o'clock, after midnight, during the first month I lived in Philadelphia, at South Ninth Street, No. 62 (the neighbours may attest the fact), could take information about me in the aforesaid cities, and in that of Avranches (Bass Normandie), where I was born, and where my father died, he being fifteen years the President of the Tribunal; my station double in that town, and is married to Mr HERZ, a retreated Captain and Knight of the Legion of Honour, and my brother is a Judge at the Tribunal of Vervins."

—Mr RUSKIN is never more pleasantly eccentric than when talking ex cathedra about girls. Ever since the date of his Sesame and Lilies, when he drew the outlines of his model damsel as an analysis of one of Wordsworth's poems, he has not failed to make a stir when bewailing or advising the better half of the race. His latest utterance is that "extremely good girls usually die young," probably because the gods, not less than Mr RUSKIN, love them. But to say so seems rather hard upon good girls now living who are not young. As for courtship, "when a youth is fully in love with a girl, and feels that he is wise in loving her, he should at once tell her so plainly, and take his chance with other suitors. No lover should have the insolence to think of being accepted at once, nor should any girl have the cruelty to refuse at once, without severe reasons. If she simply doesn't like him she may send him away for seven years or so. The whole meaning and power of true courtship is probation, and it ought not to be shorter than three years at least, and a girl worth anything ought always to have half a dozen at so suitors under love to her." Mr RUSKIN's engrossing dream is to be founded upon the assumption that a good girl—even an extremely good girl—is not at likely to fall in love with a young man as a young man is to fall in love with her, and to be just as desperate about it as; but we are assured by the mother of a good girl, who has made an extended study of the case, that such an assumption would be groundless.

Digitized by Google



SUMMER RESORTS—MOUNT McGREGOR.—Drawn by Harry Fenn.—[See Page 439.]

"—WHAT! YE HAVE DARED TO COME BACK ALIVE, HENRY?"

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Far from the Madding Crowd," "The Return of the Native," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a-milking, sir," she said

CHAPTER VII.—(Continued.)

Many days after the young man's interview with the Baron he drove up in front of Jim's house at noon a wagon laden with trunks and packages, large and small. They were all addressed to "Mr. Hayward," and they had come from the largest furnishing warehouses in that part of England.

Three-quarters of an hour were occupied in getting the cases to Jim's rooms. The wary Jim did not show the amazement he felt at his patron's munificence; and presently the senior partner came into the passage, and wondered what was lumbering upstairs.

"Oh, it's only some things of mine," said Jim.

"Bearing upon the coming event, eh?" said his partner.

"Exactly," replied Jim.

Mr Vian, with some astonishment at the number of cases, shortly after went away to the kiln; whereupon Jim shot himself into his rooms, and there he might have been heard ripping up and opening boxes with a cautious hand, afterward appearing outside the door with them empty, and carrying them off to the out house.

A triumphant look lit up his face when, a little later in the afternoon, he ran across the meads to the dairy, and invited Margery and her father to his house to supper.

She was not unwilling that day, and her father expressing a hard and fast acceptance of the invitation, she perforce agreed to go with him. Again at home, Jim made himself as mysteriously busy as before in those rooms of his, and when his partner returned he too was asked to join in the supper.

At dusk Hayward went to the door, where he stood till he heard the voices of his guests from the direction of the low grounds now covered with their frequent fleece of fog. The voices grew more distinct, and then on the white surface of the fog there appeared two trembling heads, from which bodies gradually extended as the approaching pair rose toward the house.

When they had entered, Jim pressed Margery's hand and conducted her up to his rooms, her father waiting below to say a few words to the senior line-burner "Bless me!" said Jim to her, on entering the cutting-room. "I quite forgot to get a light refreshment, but I'll have one in a jiffy."

Margery stood in the middle of the dark room, while Jim struck a match; and then the young girl's eyes were conscious of a burst of light, and the rise into being of a pair of handsome silver candlesticks containing two candles that Jim was in the act of lighting.

"Why — where — you have candlesticks like that?" said Margery. Her eyes flew round the room as the growing candle-flames showed other articles. "Pictures too, and lovely china! Why, I know nothing of this, I declare!"

"Yes, a few things that came to me by accident," said Jim, quietly.

"And a great gold clock under a glass, and a Cupid swinging fan a pendulum; and oh, what a lovely work-table!—woods of every color—and a work-box to match. May I look inside that work-box, Jim? Whose is it?"

"Oh yes; look at it, of course. It is a poor enough thing, but 'tis mine; and it will belong to the woman I marry, whoever she may be, as well as all the other things here."

"And the curtains and the looking-glasses—why, I declare I can see myself in a hundred places!"

"That tea-set," said Jim, placidly pointing to a gorgeous china service and a large silver tea-pot on the side table, "I don't use at present, being a bachelor man; 'but,' says I to myself, 'whenever I marry will want some such things for giving her parties, or I can sell 'em—but I haven't took steps far't yet."

"Sell 'em! no, I should think not," said Margery, with earnest reproach. "Why, I hope you wouldn't be so foolish! Why, this is exactly the kind of thing I was thinking of when I sold you of the things women could want—of course not meaning myself particularly. I had no idea that you had such valuables—" Margery was unable to speak coherently, so much was she amazed at the wealth of Jim's possessions.

At this moment her father and the line-burner came upstairs, and, to appear seemly and proper as Mr Vine, Margery recovered the remainder of her composure. As the two elderly worthies, it was not till they entered the room and sat down that their shower eyes discerned anything brilliant in the appointments. Then one of three made a glance at some article, and the other at another, but each being unwilling to express his wonder in the presence of his neighbors, they received the objects before them with quite as unrestrained air—the line-burner inwardly trying to conjecture what all this meant, and the dairyman musing that if Jim's business allowed him to accumulate at this rate, the sooner Margery became his wife the better. Margery retreated to the work-table, work-box, and tea service, which she examined with hushed exclamations.

An entertainment thus surprisingly begun could not fail to progress well. Whenever Margery's crusty old father felt the need of a civil sentence, the flash of Jim's fancy articles inspired him to one, while the line-burner, having renounced any his first confluous thought that all this had come out of the firm, also felt proud and blithe.

Jim accompanied his dairy friends part of the way home. Her father, finding that Jim wanted to speak to her privately, and that she exhibited some cloudiness, turned to Margery and said, "Come, come, me lady, no more of this nonsense. You just step behind with that young man."

Margery, a little scared at her father's perspicuousness, obeyed. It was plain that Jim had won the old man by that night's stroke, if he had not won her.

"I know what you are going to say, Jim," she began, less ardently now, for she was no longer under the mixed influence of the shining silver and glass. "Well, as you desire it, and as my father desires it, and as I suppose it will be the best course for me, I will fix the day—not this evening, but as soon as I can think it over."

CHAPTER VIII

NOTWITHSTANDING a press of business, Jim went and did his duty in thanking the Baron. The latter saw him in his fishing-tackle room, an apartment littered with every appliance that a votary of the rod could require.

"And when is the wedding day to be, Hayward?" the Baron asked, after Jim had told him that matters were settled.

"It is not quite certain yet, my noble lord," said Jim, cheerfully. "But I hope 'twill not be long after the time when God A'mighty christens the little apples."

"And when is that?"

"St. Swithin's—the middle of July. 'Tis to be some time in that month, she tells me."

When Jim was gone, the Baron seemed meditative. He went out, succeeded the mount, and entered the weather-screen, where he looked at the arms, as though re-entering in his fancy the scene of that memorable morning of fog. He turned his eyes to the angle of the shelter, round which Margery had suddenly appeared like a vision, and it was plain that he would not have minded her appearing there then. The juncture had indeed been such an impression and critical one that she must have seemed rather a heavenly messenger than a passing milkmaid, more especially to a man like the Baron, who, despite the mystery of his origin and life, revealed himself to be a melancholy, emotional character — the Jacques of this forest and stream.

Behind the mount the ground rose yet higher, ascending to a plantation which sheltered the house. The Baron strolled up there, and bent his gaze over the distances. The valley of the Sweon lay before him, with its shining river, the brooks that fed it, and the brimming carriers that fed the brooks. The situation of Margery's house was visible, though not the house itself, and the Baron gazed that way for an indistinct long time, till, remembering himself, he moved on.

Instead of returning to the house he went along the ridge till he arrived at the verge of Chillington Wood, and in the same desultory manner roamed under the trees, not pausing till he had come to Three-Walls End, and the hollow elm hard by. He peeped in at the rift. In the soft dry layer of wood dust that floored the hollow Margery's tracks were still visible, as she had made them there when dressing for the ball.

"Little Margery!" murmured the Baron.

In a moment he thought better of this mood, and turned to go home. But behold, a form stood behind him—that of the girl whose name had been on his lips.

She was in utter confusion. "I—I—did not know you were here, sir!" she began. "I was out for a little walk." She could get no further; her eyes filled with tears. That spice of willfulness, even harshness, which characterized her in Jim's company magically disappeared in the presence of the Baron.

"Never mind, never mind," said he, making under a severe manner whatever he felt. "The meeting is awkward, and ought not to have occurred, especially if, as I suppose, you are shortly to be married to James Hayward. But it can not be helped now. You had no idea I was here, of course. Neither had I of seeing you. Remember, you can not be too careful," continued the Baron, in the same grave tone; "and I strongly request you as a friend to do your utmost to avoid meetings like this. When you saw me before I turned, why did you not go away?"

"I did not see you, sir. I did not think of seeing you. I was walking this way, and I only looked in to see the tree."

"That shows you have been thinking of things you should not think of," returned the Baron. "Good morning."

Margery could answer nothing. A heartbeaten glance, almost of misery, was all she gave him. He took a slow step away from her, then turned suddenly back, and stooping, impulsively kissed her cheek, taking her as much by surprise as ever a woman has been in her life.

Immediately after, he went off with a flushed face and rapid strides, which he did not check till he was within his own boundaries.

The hay-making season now set in vigorously, and the wear hatches were all down in the meads to drain off the water. The carriers ran these selves drs, and there was no longer any difficulty in walking about among them. The Baron could very well witness from the elevations about his house the activity with followed these genial names. The white shirt sleeves of the mowers glistened in the sun, the scythes flashed, voices echoed, snatches of song floated about, and there were glimpses of red wagon-wheels, purple gowns, and many colored handkerchiefs.

The Baron had been told that the hay-making was to be followed by the wedding, and had he gone down to the dairy he would have had plenty of evidence to that effect. Dairyman Tucker's house was in a whirlpool of bustle, and among other difficulties was that of turning the cheese-room into a genteel apartment for the time being, and finding the unhandiness of having to pass through the milk-house to get to the parlor door. These household contrivances appeared to interest Margery much more than the great question of dressing for the ceremony and the ceremony itself. In all relating to that she showed an indescribable backwardness, which later on was well remembered.

"If it were only somebody else, and I was one of the bridesmaids, I really think I should like it better," she murmured one afternoon.

"Away with thee—that's only your shyness!" said one of the milkmaids.

It is said that about this time the Baron seemed to feel the effects of solitude strongly. Solitude revives the simple instincts of primitive man, and lonely country nooks afford rich soil for wayward emotions. Moreover, idleness waters those unconsidered impulses which a short season of normal work stamp out. It is difficult to speak with any exactness of the bearing of such conditions on the mind of the Baron—a man of whom as little was ever truly known—but there is no doubt that his mind ran much on Margery as an individual, without reference to her rank or quality, or to the question whether she would marry Jim Hayward that summer. She was the single lovely human thing within his present horizon—for he lived in absolute seclusion—and her image unduly affected him.

But leaving conjecture, let us state what happened. One Saturday evening, two or three weeks after his accidental meeting with her in the wood, he wrote the note following:

"DEAR MARGERY,—You must not suppose that because I spoke somewhat severely to you at our chance encounter by the hollow tree, I have any feeling against you. Far from it. Now as ever I have the most grateful sense of your considerate kindness to me on a momentous occasion which shall be nameless.

"You solemnly promised to come and see me whenever I should send for you. Can you call for five minutes as soon as possible, and disperse those plaguy gloams from which I am as unfortunate as to suffer? If you refuse, I will not answer for the consequences. I shall be in the summer shelter on the mount to-morrow morning at half past ten. If you come, I shall be grateful. I have also something for you.

"Yours, X."

In keeping with the tenor of this epistle the despairing, self-oppressed Baron ascended the mount on Sunday morning and sat down. There was nothing here to exactly signify the hour, but before the church bells had begun he heard somebody approaching at the back. The light footstep moved timidly, first to one recess, and then to another, then to the third, where he sat in the shade. Poor Margery stood before him.

She looked warm and weary, and her little shoes and the skirts of her dress were covered with dust. The weather was sultry, the sun being already high and powerful, and rain had not fallen for weeks. The Baron, who walked little, had thought nothing of the effects of this heat and drought in inducing fatigue. A distance which had been but a reasonable exercise on a foggy morning was a drag for Margery now. She was out of breath, and anxiety, even unhappiness, was written on her everywhere.

He rose to his feet and took her hand. He was vexed with himself at sight of her. "My dear little girl!" he said. "You are tired—you should not have come."

"You sent for me, sir, and I was afraid you were ill; and my promise to you was sacred."

He bent over her, looking upon her downcast face, still holding her hand; then he dropped it, and took a pace or two backward.

"It was a whim, nothing more," he said, sadly. "I wanted to see my little friend, to express good wishes, and to present her with this." He held forward a small morocco case, and showed her how to open it, disclosing a pretty locket, set with pearls. "It is intended as a wedding present," he continued. "To be returned to me again if you do not marry Jim this summer—it is to be this summer, I think?"

"It was, sir," she said, with agitation. "But it is so no longer. And therefore I can not take this."

"What do you say?"

"It was to have been to-day; but now it can not be."

"The wedding to-day—Sunday?" he cried.

"We fixed Sunday not to hinder much time at this busy season of the year," replied she.

"And have you, then, put it off—surely not?"

"You sent for me, and I have come," she answered, humbly, like an obedient familiar in the employ of some great enchanter. Indeed, the baron's power over this innocent girl was curiously like enchantment, or mesmeric influence. It was so masterful that the sexual elements was almost eliminated. It was that of Prospero over the gentle Ariel. And yet it was probably only that of the commonplace over the reverse, of the experienced man over the simple maid.

"You have come—on your wedding day! Oh, Margery, this is a mistake. Of course you should not have started me, since, though I thought your wedding would be soon, I did not know it was to-day."

"I promised you, sir, and I would rather keep my promise to you than be married to Jim."

"Margery, that must not be—the feeling is wrong," he murmured, looking at the distant hills. "There seems to be a fate in all this. I get out of the frying pan into the fire. What a recompense to you for your goodness! The fact is, I was out of health and out of spirits, as I—But no more of that. How fortunate to repair this tremendous blunder that we have made—that's the question."

After a pause, he went on, hurriedly. "Walk down the hill, get into the road. By that time I shall be there with a phaeton. We may get back in time. What time is it now? If not, no doubt the wedding can be re-morrow; so all will come right again. Don't cry, my dear girl. Keep the locket, of course—you'll marry Jim."

CHAPTER IX

HIS hastened down toward the stables, and she went on as directed. It seemed as if he must have put in the horse himself, so quickly did he re-appear with the phaeton on the open road. Margery silently took her seat, and the Baron seemed set to the quick with self-reproach as he noticed the flatness and indifference with which she acted. There was no doubt that in her heart she had preferred obeying the apparently imperious mandate that morning to becoming Jim's wife; but there was no less doubt that had the Baron left her alone she would quietly have gone to the altar.

He drove along furiously, in a cloud of dust. There was much to contemplate in that peaceful Sunday morning—the windless trees and fields, the shaking sunlight, the pause in human stir. Yet neither of them heeded, and thus they drew near to the dairy. His first expressed intention had been to go in-doors with her, but this he abandoned as inapolitic in the highest degree.

"You may be soon enough," he said, springing down, and helping her to follow. "Tell the truth; say you were sent for to receive a wedding present—that it was a mistake on my part—a mistake on yours; and I think they'll forgive."

And, Margery, my last request to you is this; that if I send for you again, you do not come. Promise solemnly, say dear girl, that any such request shall be unheeded."

Her lips moved, but the promise was not articulated. "Oh, sir, I can not promise it!" she said at last.

"But you must; your salvation may depend on it!" he insisted, almost fiercely. "You don't know what I am."

"Then, sir, I promise," she replied. "Now leave me to yourself, please, and I'll go in-doors and manage matters."

He turned the horse and drove away, but only for a little distance. Out of sight he pulled rein suddenly. "Only to go back and propose it to her, and she'd come," he murmured.

He stood up in the phaeton, and by this means he could see over the hedge. Margery still sat listlessly in the same place; there was not a livelier flutter in the field. "No," he said, "no, no—never!" He reseated himself, and the wheels sped lightly back over the soft dust to Mount Lodge.

Meanwhile Margery had not moved. If Jim Baron could disseminate on the side of sensibility, she could dissimulate on the side of calm. She did not know what had been wrung by the rapid promise to manage matters in-doors. Having at length, she first turned away from the house, and he-and-by, having apparently forgotten all then that she carried it on her hand, she opened the case and looked at the locket. This seemed to give her courage. She turned, set her face toward the dairy in good earnest, and though her heart faltered when the gates came in sight, she kept on and drew near the door.

On the threshold she stood listening. The house was silent. Decorations were visible in the passage, and also the carefully swept and washed path to the gate, which she was to have trodden as a bride; but the sparrows hopped over it as if it were abandoned, and all appeared to have been checked at its circumference. The clock stopped on the stroke. Till the moment of confronting the suspended sensation of the scene she had not realized the full shock of the convulsion which her disappearance must have caused. It is quite certain—apart from her own repeated assurances to that effect in later years—that in hastening off that morning to the sudden engagement, Margery had not counted the cost of such an enterprise, while a dim notion that she might get back again in time for the ceremony, if the message meant nothing serious, should also be mentioned in her fans. But upon the whole she had obeyed the call with an unreasoning obedience, worthy of a disciple of primitive times. A conviction that the Baron's life might depend upon her presence—she she had by this time divined the tragical event she had interrupted on the foggy morning—must from her all will to judge and consider calmly. The simple affairs of her and hers seemed nothing beside the possibility of harm to him.

A well-known step moved on the sanded floor within, and she went forward. That she saw her father's face before her; just within the door as he hardly he said: it was rather Reproach and Rage in a human mask.

"What! ye have dared to come back alive, hussy, to look upon the dupers you have practiced on honest people?" You've mortified us all I don't want to see ye. I don't want to hear ye. I don't want to know anything!" He paced up and down the room, unable to command himself. "Nothing but being dead could have excused ye for not meeting and marrying that man this morning; and yet you have the brass impudence to stand there as well as ever! Who be you here for?"

"I've come back to marry Jim, if he wants me to," she said, faintly. "And if not, perhaps in much the better. I was sent for this morning early, I thought—" She hinted. To say that she had thought a man's death might happen by his own hand if she did not go to him would never do. "I was obliged to go," she said. "I had given my word."

"Why didn't you tell us then, so that the wedding could be put off, without making fools o' us?"

"Because I was afraid you wouldn't let me go, and I had made up my mind to go."

"To go where?"

She was silent, till she said, "I will tell Jim all, and why it was, and if he's my friend of mine he'll excuse me."

"Not Jim—he's no such fool. Jim had put all roads for you. She had called at each one, a dressed up in his new wedding clothes, and a smiling like the sun; Jim had told the parson had got the ringers in tune, and the clerk a-waiting, and then—you was gone! Then Jim turned as pale as ramilemeal, and hooted out, 'If she don't marry me to-day,' a said, 'she don't marry me at all!' Now, let her look elsewhere for a husband. For two years I've put up with her hoitish tricks and her tohings,' said. 'I've drudged and I've traipsed, I've bought and I've sold, all as ye ever to her; I've suffered hereafter, he says—yes, them was his noble words—'but I'll suffer it no longer. She shall go.' 'Jim,' says I, 'you be a man. If she's alive I command ye if she's dead, I pity ye old age.' 'She isn't dead,' says he, 'I'm I've just heard she was in walking off across the fields this morning, and a-ing all of a sorrowful triumph' He turned round and went, and the rest o' the neighbors read and here be I left to the reproach o't'

"He was too hasty," murmured Margery. "Is now he's said this, I can't marry him to-morrow as I sought he' done, and perhaps as much the better."

"You can be as cabo about it, can ye! Il say arrangements nothing, then, that you should break 'em up, and sar off-hand a-tat must done to-day might be' been done to-morrow, and not flick back? Out o' my sight! I won't hear ye more. I won't speak to ye any more."

"I'll go away, and then you'll be sure."

"Very well, go. Sorry'—out I."

He turned and stamped his way into the dining-room. Margery went upstairs. She was excited own, and instead of furnishing herself in her bedroom till her father's rage had blown over, as she had often done on lesser occasions, she packed up a bundle of articles, crept down again, and went out of the house. She had a place of refuge in those cases of concern, and her father knew it, and was less alarmed in leaving her depart than he might otherwise have been. This place was Rook's Gate, the house of her grandmother, who had once been Margery's part when that young woman was particularly in the wrong.

The devious way the pursued to avoid the vicinity of Mount Lodge was tedious and she was already weary. But the cottage was a rueful place to arrive at, for sin was her own mistress there — her grandmother never came down-stairs—and Edy, the woman who lived and attended her, being a cipher except in mat-and voice. The approach was by a straight open road, bordered by thin bank trees, all sloping away from the southwest wind quarter, and the scene bore a strange resemblance to certain bits of Dutch landscape which have been imprinted on the world's eye by Hobbema and his school.

Hiering explained to her granny that the wedding was put off, and then she had come to stay, one of Margery's first acts was to carefully pack up the locket and case, her wedding present from the Baron. The conditions of the gift were unfulfilled, and she wished it to go back instantly. Perhaps in the intricacies of her bosom there lurked a grease satisfaction with the reason for returning the present than she would have felt just then with a reason for keeping it.

To send the article was difficult. In the evening she wrapped herself up, searched and found a game veil that had been used by her grandmother in past years for hiving swarms of bees, buried her face in it, and sallied forth with a palpitating heart all she drew near the tabernacle of her dead god the Baron. She ventured only to the back door, where she handed in the parcel addressed to him, and quickly came away.

Now it seems that during the day the Baron had been unable to learn the result of his attempts to return Margery in time for the event he had interrupted. Wishing, for obvious reasons, to avoid direct inquiry by messenger, and being too unwell to go for himself, he could learn no particulars. He was sitting in thought after a lonely dinner, when the parcel intimating failure was brought in. The footman, whose curiosity had been excited by the mode of its arrival, peeped through the key-hole after closing the door, to learn what the packet meant. Directly the Baron had opened it he thrust out his feet vehemently from his chair, and began cursing his ruinous conduct in bringing about such a disaster, for the return of the locket denoted not only no wedding that day, but none to-morrow, or at any time.

"I have done that innocent woman a great wrong," he murmured. "Deprived her of, perhaps, her only opportunity of becoming mistress of a happy home!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

MOUNT McGREGOR.

"THE most persistent case of hay fever completely cured be one week's sojourn at Mount McGregor, or no charge for board," is the guarantee offered by the proprietors of this new and most charming summer resort. In a sense, Mount McGregor is a new resort, although its formation shows it to be one of the oldest of the everlasting hills. It is ten miles north of Saratoga Springs, and is the highest peak, south of the Hudson, of the Palmertown range of mountains, the outermost of the five ranges traversing from north to south the wilderness of Northern New York. Beginning with the most eastern, they are, respectively, the Palmertown or Luzerne, the Kayaderosseras, the Scarpon (Schroon), the Bonquet, and the Adirondack ranges, though these designations have become gradually merged in the general term Adirondacks. Some years ago Mr. Duncan McGannon purchased the mountain, to which he gave his own name, and undertook its reclamation from the primeval wilderness. By built, with infinite labor, a winding carriage-road up its rugged sides, erected a comfortable house on its summit, and invited summer visitors at Saratoga Springs to drive out and examine his view. Many accepted the invitation, but the drive was long and tedious, and Mount McGregor did not attain the popularity to which its unrivalled situation gives it a claim. Last year the property passed into the hands of a company of wealthy gentlemen, who conceived the idea of locating their summer cottages on its breezy heights, and of erecting on its very summit a magnificent hotel, which should form the nucleus of their elevated Arcadia. The vice-president of the company, an enterprising young man named ARNOLD, possessed of advanced ideas of the value of rapid transit, declared a railroad from Saratoga to be indispensable to the success of the enterprise, and advocated its construction. He was told that the idea of building anything but a cog wheel road up the mountain side was preposterous, and that his scheme was wholly impracticable. To prove himself right, Mr. ARNOLD called to his aid an engineer who had learned among the Peruvian Andes to overcome the obstacles presented by mountains, and, after making five surveys, they discovered a line which they deemed practicable. A thousand men were set to work hewing a roadbed from the solid rock on the mountain side, bridging wild gorges, and constructing embankments, for which they had to scrape the county covering of earth from acres of rocky ledges. In ninety days from the time the first spadeful of earth was upturned the road was finished, and cars were running to the summit of the mountain. In its construction this Saratoga, Mount McGregor, and Lake George Railway is not only a marvel of engineering skill, but of strength and solidity. It is a narrow gauge track laid on a broad-gauge road-bed, of which all the trestles are calculated to support the heaviest-laden trains of standard gauge and weight. Leaving its pretty station on Broadway, in Saratoga, the train rolls easily and swiftly over six miles of the level farming country of the Upper Hudson, and then begins its four-mile climb of from 212 to 235 feet to the mile, the steepest railroad grade in the State. To attain its object, the little road twists and turns until it is as crooked as the Ochlawaha River, in Florida, and has directed its course toward every point of the compass. Now the train approaches the precipitous verge of the mountain-side, allowing its passengers momentary glimpses of the broad valley far below, and then it plunges back into the depths of the forest; but its progress is ever upward until it has climbed 1000 feet, and stands puffing, as though from its recent exertions, on a little plateau close beside the summit.

Mount McGregor is a bold outlying spur of the mountains in which the Hudson rises, and around it, on the north, the great river sweeps in a sharp curve, and after flowing almost due east through this last barrier, turns to the southward on its majestic course to the sea. Being thus almost isolated from its range, this mountain offers two glorious outlooks, one to the east and south, and one to the west and north. The eastern lookout, which is that of the great Balmoral Hotel on the very summit, is over fifty miles of the Hudson Valley, covered with its farm lands and clumps of dark woods, gleaming here and there with bits of water, and stretching away to a distant background of the Green Mountains in Vermont. Far to the southward Saratoga Lake sparkles in the sunlight, and the opposite horizon is bounded by mountains cradling the waters to which the pious Father Jogues gave the name of "Lake of the Blessed Sacrament"—a name changed a hundred years later by loyal Sir WILLIAM JOHNSON to "Lake George." In the immediate foreground the various greens of cultivated field and standing timber offer rich contrasts to the deep red of the barns and pure white of the farm-houses which dot the landscape. From the foot of the mountain extending northeasterly across the valley as far as the eye can see is the southerly outlet line of the twenty-second allotment of the Kayaderosseras Patent, surveyed in 1720, and easily traced by the growth of bushes along its fences and walls.

A few miles to the east, and very plainly visible, rises the battle monument at Old Saratoga (Schuylerville), marking the scene of BURGOYNE'S surrender. This upper valley of the Hudson during the years of the old Indian wars was the scene of many a fierce conflict between the Iroquois of the Mohawk and the Algonquins of the North, and the trail leading from the Mohawk to the St. Lawrence, over which the war parties of each nation passed on their forays, may still be easily followed as it winds around the foot of Mount McGregor.

Three miles from this point of view the mountain terminates in an abrupt headland known as the Western Lookout, the view from which is overwhelming in its grandeur as the visitor emerges from the forest and is suddenly confronted by it. A thousand feet below him the Hudson, a brawling mountain stream, laughs and tumbles down its rock-locked bed of rocks. Its course is choked by thousands of saw logs working their troubled way from distant forests to their destined mills and lumber-yards. Close beyond the river, and extending back, range upon range, until lost in the purple distance, rise the tumultuous mountains awful in their unbroken solitudes and grand in their towering might.

Nothing can be more interesting than to stand on this bold overlook and watch the approach of a thunder storm down the valley of the Hudson. The masses of slate-colored cloud blot out the distant peaks, and roll on toward the spectator, still bathed in sunlight, like the veil of oblivion, dimly illumined by the glare of far-off lightnings, and heralded by the low mutterings of thunder. The sunlight gradually fades, and a gray darkness creeps on; birds, with frightened cries, fly low and seek shelter from the impending storm, and leaves shiver fitfully in the sudden gusts that stir the heavy air. With terrible rapidity the irresistible cloud wall moves on, enveloping and hiding each feature of the landscape; the muttering thunder increases to a roar, and then to a deafening, stunning crash, following instantly each blinding flash of the electric fires, and with a howling of wind, a rending of branches, and a deluge of rain, the storm bursts over and around the mountain with a fury inconceivable in the sheltered valleys below.

The heavy forest growth covering the summit of Mount McGregor is intersected to all directions by roads and paths leading to points of observation, to the several lakes that nestle in the hollows, and to other places of interest. Of the lakes the largest and most beautiful is Bonita, a mile west of the hotel, and reached by a heavily shaded wood road. The lake is encircled by forest-clad hills, and on its sparkling surface rest a number of the curious floating islands or bogs common in most Adirondack lakes. They are covered with sphagnum mosses, which here in the season rival the autumn foliage of the trees in the richness and beauty of their red, yellow, and purple tints. Amid the mosses bloom the modest Kalmia—offering its humble tribute to the memory of PETER KALM, the great Swedish botanist who discovered it—gaudy cardinal-flowers, the yellow iris, the sweet scented river rose, the stately dear-de-lis, and hundreds more, vivid in color or sweet in perfume, forming patterns on the green groundwork that rival in color the fairest products of Persian loom. The deep coves of the lake offer delicious landing places of moss-carpeted rock, almost hidden in dark cool shade; it is well stocked with fish, and with its beauty, its wildness, and manifold attractions, it is no wonder that it tempted the hermit whose log cabin still stands in a short distance to the right of the boat landing to renounce the world and linger on its dreamy banks.

On the Lake Bonita road stands a novel auxiliary to the usual attractions of a summer resort, in the shape of an art gallery. It is a picturesque Queen Anne building, containing several hundred specimens of the best work of a number of American artists. Among the well-known names appearing on the catalogue of this exhibition are BIERSTADT, QUARTLEY, MORAN, WYANT, CROMEY, Miss COMANT, STORY, TAIT, ILEY, BRADY, VAN BOSKERCK, CHAPMAN, MCENTEE, SILVA, DE HAAS, H. P. SMITH, SHEBLEY, SHILLER, BOLTON JONES, DE LUCE, PARTON, HOWLAND, and many others. An admission fee is charged, and the pictures exhibited are for sale on commission. After the expenses of the gallery are deducted from the receipts thus arising, the remaining fund is devoted to the encouragement of American art. Near the art gallery is a romantic chest of water called Artists' Lake, which in times of freshets falls over its dam in a silver cascade.

Although Mount McGregor is but 1300 feet above Saratoga, this elevation is sufficient to insure a wonderful lowering of temperature. Cool breezes always sweep across its summit, the night is rare on which a blanket is not a comfortable addition to the bed-clothing, and the cheerful wood fires that occasionally blaze on the hearths during evenings and early mornings of July and August days are very welcome.

Sites have been selected and the plans drawn for several woodland cottages, many of which will in time be scattered over the mountain top, and in the near future Mount McGregor promises to be one of the most popular of American summer resorts.

THE ROSE IN THE GARDEN.

In the garden grew a rose-bush,
And it bore one single flower,
That through summer rain and sunshine
Fairer grew from hour to hour,
Till it was a perfect flower.

Two youths by the garden wandered,
Saw the rose, and calmly sighed,
Each in wear it in his bosom—
White rose, sweet as a sweet bride—
But, alas! both vainly sighed.

Then said one, with angry scorning,
"It would never do for me;
'Tis not white, nor sweet, nor perfect;
Quite a common rose, I see;
It would never do for me."

"Nay," the other said, "of roses
This rose is the very best;
Whitest, purest, sweetest, rarest—
He who wins it will be blest.
Oh, to wear it in my breast!"

And he lingered near the garden
Till he heard a whisper sweet—
"Enter"—and the rose of roses
Rent his loving hand to meet;
Made his life forever sweet!

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

OCEAN GROVE leads all the other sea-side resorts in the rage of its observance of the Lord's day. Fishing, boating, and bathing on Sunday are regarded as sinful diversions. It is said, however, that this resort is rather liberal in respect to the allowance with which it looks upon the use of bathing suits on street dresses on secular days.

It has occurred to many of the writers who are struggling with the great questions of the day to suggest that, in view of England's sending her paupers to the United States, our government might solve the Indian problem by shipping the troublesome and expensive red men to London and Liverpool, beginning with General Crook's captured Cheyennes. "Free trade in paupers implies reciprocity," is one way of putting it.

From a financial point of view the NATIONAL Exhibition of Railway Appliances, in Chicago, was not a success, but it is acknowledged by all that it was one of the most interesting displays ever made in this country.

It is inferred from a dispatch recently received in Washington from General SCHOFIELD that there has been an exceptionally destructive tornado somewhere in the far West. He telegraphs from his camp that hostile Indians are "dropping in from all sides in small fragments."

Three great divisions of the human race were represented on the same gallows recently in Arkansas. The condemned men were a negro, a white man, and a Creek Indian.

The railroad contractor who identifies his Indian shareholders by means of numbers painted gleefully on the most conspicuous parts of their trousers is credited with having introduced into the country a sort of Indian count that is not likely to turn the heads of the daughters of liberty.

A writer in London says that "conspicuous idiots in English society" imitate the guttural accent of the Prince of Wales and his brothers, of whom the Duke of Edinburgh is the most intensely German in speech and manner. Can it be that the conspicuous idiots to American society have been on the wrong track all this time?

The Marquis Demores was attacked recently in Dakota, where he has an extensive ranch, by a number of men whose ill-will he had incurred. In the fight that ensued one of his assailants was killed. A court held that the killing was justifiable so far as the marquis and his helpers were concerned, but decided to detain for trial two men who were with the slain man's party, on the charge that they are guilty of manslaughter in having provoked the fight.

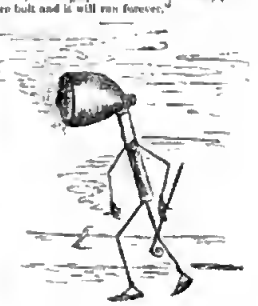
An interesting question has been raised in one of the civil courts of this city by a colored man, who claims that he should be paid $250 for eight ounces of blood which was transfused into the veins of a man who was suffering from having inhaled illuminating gas. The complaint sets forth that when the colored man consented to part with that much of his blood the sufferer was barely alive, and that three hours after the operation he could recognize friends, and in twenty four hours was a well man. Perhaps the trial of the case will bring out answers to questions which will suggest themselves to every speculative reader—whether the patient's complexion was less fair or his hair less straight after the operation, and whether he believes that he has suffered any disadvantage because of prejudice against those who have negro blood in their veins.

A Georgia merchant says, "We are selling this year a great many farm bells of large size for use in country neighborhoods as alarms in case of trumps." Some of the bells are large enough to send their notes of alarm out to a dozen or more of the surrounding farms.

The most startling information that has been printed concerning the East River Bridge appeared in a recent issue of the Brooklyn Eagle, which paper announced that the heaviest load that has crossed the bridge went over on a Saturday afternoon, and "consisted of a thirteen-ton mound Morris Kerrigan," and that subsequently officer Gebhardt "arrested a young man aged fifteen feet in height and drawn by six horses." To those who understand the mysteries of the composing-room the two statements appearing to proximity are less startling than either of them would be if alone.

The first white male child born in Tehama County, California, grew up to be a murderer.

An inventor in Louisville has outdone all others in the struggle to produce a perpetual motion machine. He actually made a contrivance which took off three of his fingers. When a surgeon was dressing the wounded hand, the inventor exclaimed, exultingly, "it worked splendidly; one more bolt and it will run forever."



THE IRISH DUDE(SINE).

The largest piece of glass ever made in the United States, it is said, is sent by an Indiana manufacturer to the Southern Exposition at Louisville. It is fifteen feet long and eleven and a half wide, and the Boston Post says it has probably more protection to the square foot than any other manufactured article that will be shown there.

"The United States consumes more lemons than all the rest of the world," paradoxical as it may seem to readers of circus and Sunday-school picnic lemonade.

The St. James's Gazette raises the question in England whether the United States is to be the great wine-producing country of the future. The fact that a Dutchman in the interior of Pennsylvania is manufacturing ancient Dutch clocks which can not be distinguished from those made in Holland a hundred years ago, would seem to indicate that America could produce pretty fair French champagne on a pinch.

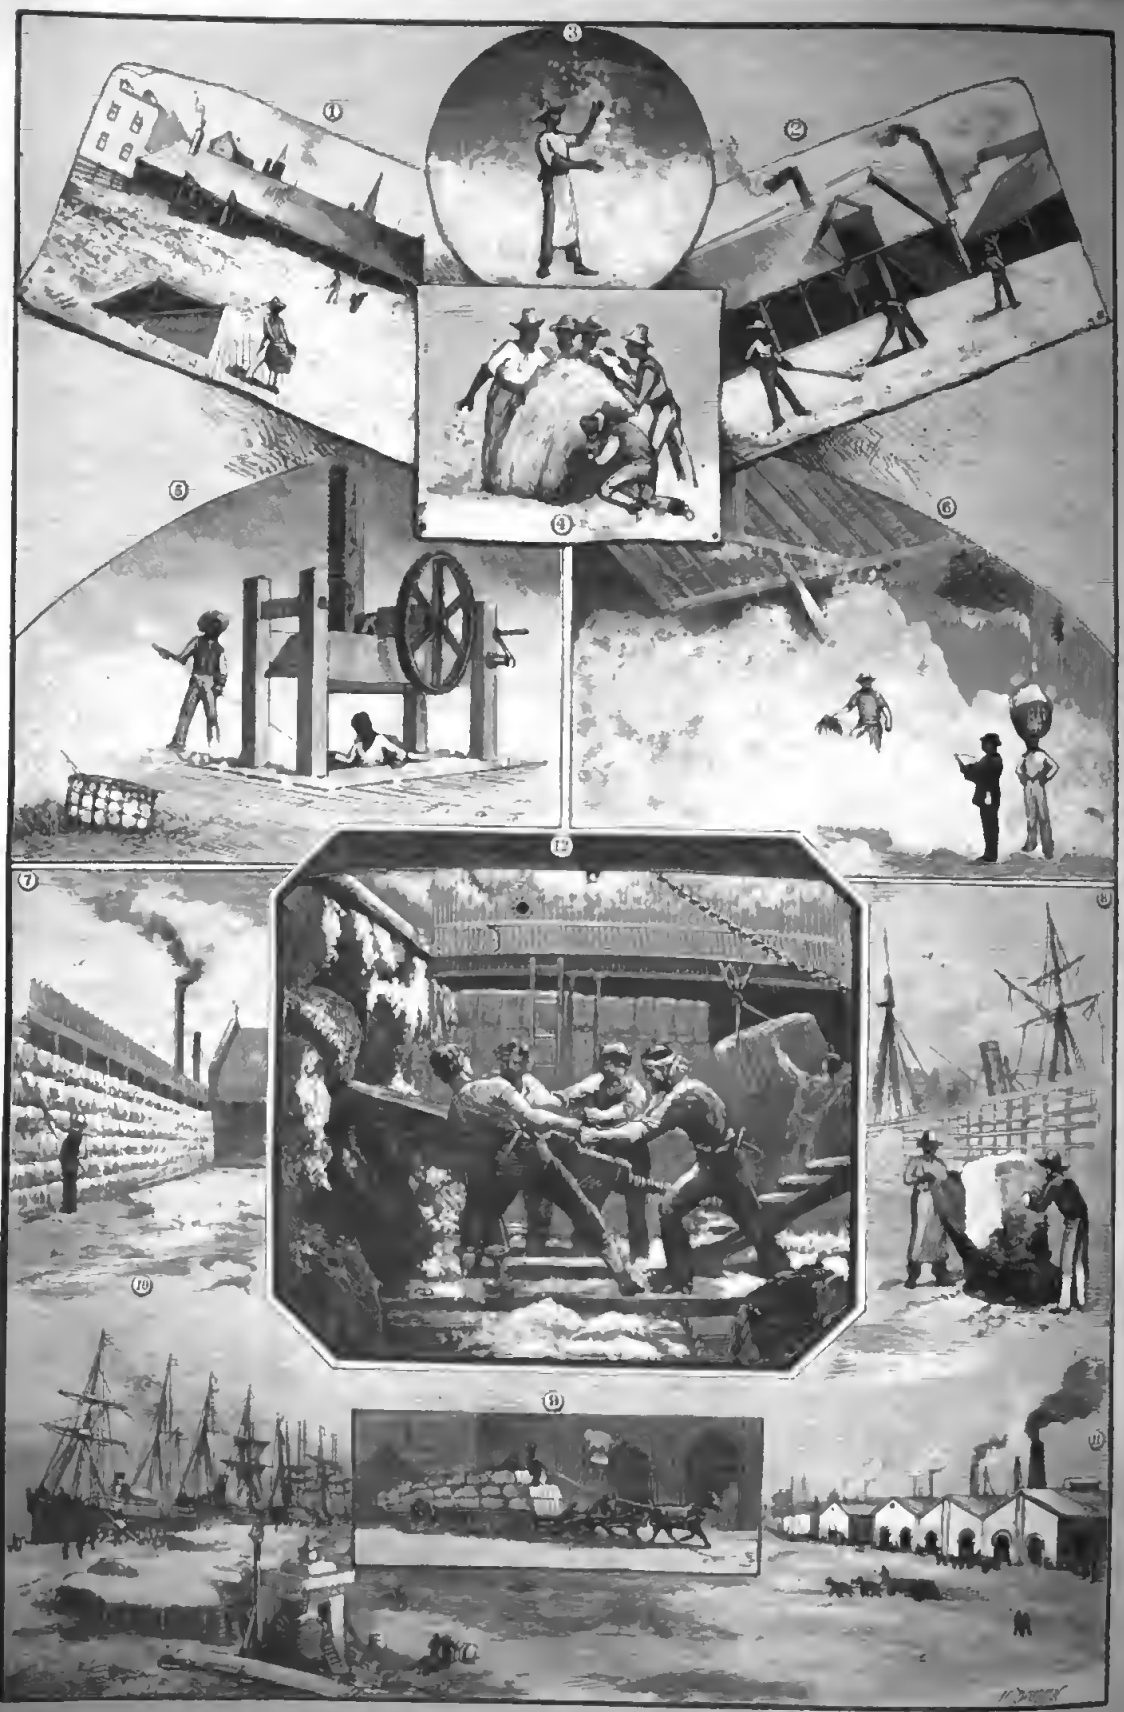
No one would have dared to suspect that the Adams family "pouted" its Greek if a scion of the fourth generation hadn't given his ancestors away.

A new gas main four feet in diameter, running from Charing Cross to Pall Mall, is believed to have the largest capacity of any in the world, with the possible exception of the United States Congress when engaged in the discussion of a measure to revise the tariff.

Now comes from the far West another illustration of the eternal fitness of things. Calico, a town on the Pacific coast, has a newspaper called The Print.

"A fresh ostrich egg now costs only one hundred dollars." Easter is a long way off.

When the veteran Boston correspondent of the Hartford Courant sets out to voice the sentiment of that city, his words are rewarded throughout New England as having the facility of a veritable echo. Of Governor Hunter's going from Boston to attend the Harvard Commencement with his six horse carriage, his mounted staff, his cavalry escort in the showy Lancers, his broad brimmed Panama hat, and his Lieutenant-Governor, "who apparently has much reverence for his colleague in office," and of the Governor's doings after reaching Cambridge, he says, "The general opinion is that the Governor, though he was too splurgy in his manner of going out to the college, acquitted himself with much success after reaching there." The colored people who lined the way to a part of the city through which the procession passed "have sworn before," he writes, "been so impressed by the spectacle of the Executive party on the way to Harvard."



1. A [illegible] Plantery. 2. Drying Sheds. 3. Mixing. 4. Picking or Cleaning a Bale. 5. Making up a Bale. 6. A Lint Room. 7. Running Racks. 8. A damaged Bale. 9. A Cotton Float. 10. European Steamer loading. 11. Cotton Presses on Levee. 12. Packing Cotton in a Steamer's Hold.

COTTON CULTURE IN THE SOUTH, NO. 2.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 444.]

KEEP THE RASCALS OUT.—[See Article, "Of Rascals," Page 433.]

Uncle Sam (to the hungry party whose rascals were turned out more than twenty years ago). "Up to your old tricks again, eh? Well, you must think I'm a fool, if you suppose you can climb up here in that way."

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Holidays in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Stevensteins," etc.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Valerian took possession of his new quarters in about as uncomfortable a frame of mind as was possible for any human being to be. Everything had gone wrong, yet he felt obliged to confess that everything had gone according to his wishes. He had played a desperate game, and wanted his adversary. He was not only master of the position, but master of himself, free to go whither he willed, to do as he would with his life. All these facts he repeated to himself again and again, but they failed to bring re-assurance. Whichever way he looked, he was himself hemmed round by problems and obstructions, on straight open path anywhere. His best friends in the world were these three—Christina, Stephana, Arthura. How was he requiting their friendship? A letter from Stephana lay on the writing-table, and he sat down to answer it as to a heavy task. It was the kind, confidential letter that any woman would write to a dear friend; the style could not be displeasing to him, but the gist of it lay in a question he found it impossible to answer.

How had he obtained a knowledge of the facts on which his play was based? asked Stephana. Was it mere supposition? Had he drawn inferences only and acted on them, or were the data actually in his possession, and if so, how came they there—honestly or by a fraud? Stephana's question was not framed thus, but as it shaped itself to Valerian's uneasy mind; and long he sat, pen in hand, unable to indite a syllable. The explanation forced upon him must be easier by letter than by word of mouth, and he knew it was inevitable. Yet he hesitated. When at last he put pen to paper, his mind underwent one of those curious phases not uncommon with those who are ever moved by two impulses. Valerian always intended to follow the straight course, but could not help reasoning himself into the advisability, even necessity, of the crooked. He wanted to have Stephana's confidence and sympathy at any price, and at first he said to himself that this should be paid even at the risk of self abasement. Stephana should know the truth, and nothing but the truth. Words, however, on paper have a hard look. They put an end of countenance sooner than the same confession made by speech; and on the first page was torn, and the second, and the third, and when the fourth was begun not a trace of the original letter remained. Style and substance were remodelled till both became unrecognizable from the original copy. Valerian, in the first instance, had set out with the intention of adhering to the unvarnished truth, but finally ended in romancing. The first page, however, contained vanity.

"You will most likely be astonished to learn," he wrote, "that the earliest notion of my possible relation to Christina arose from a consciousness of antipathy, the kind of antipathy that belongs to nearness of kin—indeed, that arises from consciousness of kin. Why should people not nearly related ever dislike each other? There are a dozen reasons why those of the same blood should do so. They see their own faculties and defects, mental as well as physical, reflected, often distorted, as in a mirror. They can not get rid of a perpetual monitor, or at least reminder, of what they would fain forget. If the shining qualities predominate, a sense of comparison is evoked no less painful than self-criticism. So it was with Christina and myself. The shining qualities were not there, certainly, but others as forcibly challenging comparison. I was unreliable to my prosperous—nay, essential to her comfort—and she always showed consideration and open-handed generosity to me, for which I am not ungrateful. There was never any pretense of affection between us.

"The truth, or the probable truth, having once flashed across my mind, a thousand circumstances seemed to confirm it. I knew that one person, and one only, was in Christina's confidence. Colette might—must—know, but Colette would never tell. Her attitude was always that of a mediator between her patroness and myself. She would give offense twenty times a day by interference on my behalf, always of a conciliatory nature, and always in matters of little moment. She had evidently made up her mind that at some future time, and by dint of her own efforts, Christina and I should become attached to each other. I could not help remarking this, and it seemed to me, viewed by the light of a steadily growing conviction, evidence of secret remorse on Colette's part. She herself felt concerned in the wrong that had been done me, and hoped to make amends. But for some such feeling, why her apologetic behavior, her reiterated mediations, her supererogation of friendly offices? It is my firm belief that the kindly little French woman often remonstrated with her mistress in secret, and that I formed the only subject of contention between them. Christina would not love me enough, and Colette could not make her. Another point struck me: Colette never seemed satisfied with our mistress's hostility toward myself. She seemed—so at least I began to fancy—as if I ought to be treated like the master of the house, as if I ought rather to share than serve the rich Miss Hemingage's fortune. In trifling matters Colette could put in a word. Mr Valerian should have his riding-horse; Mr Valerian should have his valet. I could not be made too much of, she seemed to think. We were always on the best of terms, Colette and I, and in our free and easy conversations of many years she had dropped statements I now turned to account.

"I gathered that one conspicuous incident, and one only, had broken the monotony of Christina's past life. This was a quarrel with her father, and on absence following it of many months from home. Concerning this quarrel Colette was extremely reticent. The pair of friends, the Squire's daughter and her companion, had travelled for more than a year. Where did they go? How did they occupy themselves? Such questions Colette would ever answer vaguely and with evident reluctance. Yet at times she would advert to this epoch as if it had especial charms for her, and as if she were compelled to do so against her will. Was it that she felt the burden of a secret? Was it that she would fain have spoken out but dared not? One or two hints she did let fall of a love affair, of Christina's determination to marry against the Squire's will, of a final reconciliation. She named no names in conjunction with this love affair, but on former occasions had often mentioned a personage whom I could but associate with it. This was the riding master of the pair, who, somehow or other, Colette could not seem to get out of her head, although he was never alluded to in her mistress's presence. My suspicions were aroused here, and I felt that I had a clew. Knowing as I did the character of the daughter, and of the father also, I put these things together till a coherent story shaped itself in my mind, a runaway marriage, on after-confession, a final sacrifice of natural feeling to pride, and for the rest silence. But you will say there was a third voice that must have made itself heard if these suspicions were true. The lover, the husband, the father of the child, where was he? You may be sure I had pondered on this often, and many a time had tried to elicit some inadvertent explanation by throwing Colette off her guard. It was only by chance, however, that I learned more. She had been sitting from what French women call a nervous attack, and I overheard her murmur to herself that 'never since getting the news of Henry's sudden death had she suffered from such palpitations.' By the name of Henry she had always called the riding-master."

So far Valerine's explanations were genuine, but he knew that more would be required to satisfy Stephana. He added, now writing deliberately, letting the words do with him as they would:

"I have no proofs to give you. Had proofs been in my possession, should I have acted as I did? There would have been no necessity for shift and stratagem. Do not blame, therefore, but rather pity me for being driven to such extremities; and what is more—yes, Stephana, I say it for once and for all—you are said to possess subtle fascinations over your fellow-creatures. Use them now. Exercise two evil spirits; reconcile me to my mother if you can.

"Valerian."

But what if Valerian had added a postscript hinting at betrayed confidence and violated trust, private documents surreptitiously handled, and secret places pried into? For Valerian had told a part of the truth only. The basis of his play had been a fragmentary journal in Colette's handwriting, and of that diary and the means by which he had obtained access to it he said never a word. The Molly, the Lizzie, the niece, the swain, of Valerine's idyllic play all lived in these sentimental pages, penned for her own satisfaction, and as a relief to outward secrecy, by a girl, more than thirty years before. The outline of the story, with some reservation, was there. He had but hazarded the sequel, put in a few details, and made of the scattered incidents a consistent whole. On the other hand, might not Valerian have urged on his own behalf that he had combated fraud with fraud, and forced his way as the owner of stolen treasure into the thief's house? His birthright had been filched from him. Was he not justified in using any means to wrench it from the hands of those who held it back? All these arguments, and many more, Valerian might have put before Stephana, passionately, vindictively, maybe unscrupulously. Because he dreaded a shadow of discredit he held his peace when it most behooved him to speak. In Stephana's eyes, at least, his conduct should appear lawless.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The ink had not dried on the page, and Valerian lingered, seal in hand, when a clear, joyous voice called his name. How man's word finds a soul's depth, as a pebble the well's bottom! In a moment he felt conscious of himself—that hidden self, dark and unfathomable to other eyes. It was but his own name he heard, and a maiden uttering it. Yet he stood still, hesitating painfully.

"Valerian! Valerian!" again exclaimed Arthura, no cloud on her brow, no uncertainty in her movements. The true, transparent colors shone out of her steadfast eyes and betrayed itself in her welcoming smile. An apparition, an apparition of joy and beauty, she seemed as she stood there, an impersonation of the daring guileonly love that thinketh no evil.

There was wintriness in the heavens and in the air, but the warm carnation of her lips and cheek, and the touches of bright color relieving her dress, cheered the place if they could not cheer Valerian's heart. Unclamored by his silence—attributing it, indeed, to overpoved surprise—she now moved to the writing-table by which he was standing. Then, with indescribable, almost infantine satisfaction, she unclosed her palm and dropped several bank-notes on to his writing case. Each was crumpled, for, regarding them as far too precious to consign to purse or pocket, she had brought her treasure from one end of London to the other in her hands.

"Count those notes," she said, blushing with pride and pleasure. "There are one, two, three fifty-pound notes. It is my whole worldly fortune, and I make it over to you."

Still crimsoning with delight, she bent over the paper money, fondling each by turn as if in those symbols she was deciphering Valerian's future weal and her own. The mere suspicion that her lover was out at one with her, and that boundless confidence no longer existed between them, as in the matchless French days, never entered into her mind. It must be with Valerian as with herself. Once more together, the ills of separation were surely as if they had never been. Her heart once open to his, and his thoughts commune freely with her own. Love made them artless and trusting as children who have mingled each other's tears for comradeship.

She babbled on blithely: "I had hoarded up this money for the remainder of papa's debts, but my step-mother has had a little fortune left her, and insists on paying the debts herself. So I have a hundred and fifty pounds for my poor Valerian. Mr Constantine tells me you have come to London to make your way; you will need money. You will not refuse my little all? But what is the matter?"

She uttered the last words suddenly raised with consternation. She was now looking him full in the face, all the glow and gayeomeness faded from her own, all her painful entirety told without a word. He stooped down and kissed her pure forehead. What a kiss! Arthura felt chilled by it to the very veins. No words could have so utterly disconcerted her. Reading that expression of distress once more, once more he bent down and touched her cambl brow with his lips, Arthura waiting pale and expectant as one to whom the next moment may bring sentence.

"You should not have brought me your money," he said at last, looking as speechless and unhappy as herself. He added, slowly, "And you should not have come."

It was the first time Arthura had ever been directly reproached by Valerian, and the truth began to dawn upon her painfully. Her best friend was angry, coy, affronted with her. Tears of vexation rose to her eyes, and her cheeks crimsoned again, this time from shame and indignation. She might have done wrong, but Valerian of all others had the least right to blame.

"We are not in France, remember, dearest," he went on. "There are things a young lady may do, and things she may not do. You have acted generously, but without taking thought."

"I only wanted to be kind," murmured Arthura.

"Kind! kind!" cried Valerian, running his fingers desperately through his hair. "First be kind to yourself. We are not in Madame Henri's drawing room at Nantes. What would my friends think if they chanced to call and found you here?"

It was a brusque, even brutal speech, yet Arthura could but acknowledge the truth of it. She crushed the unwelcome conviction at once. Her conduct was not only inconsequent, but wanting in maidenly reserve. Whose, however, was the fore that should have risen up as an advocate? Where the tenderness that should have pardoned all for the sake of the suitor? She rose proudly to go, no plaintive vindication on her lips now, no arch remonstrance in her eyes.

"Pardon me, a thousand pardons, my darling," Valerian said, hurriedly and apologetically, evidently anxious to get the interview over. "I will come and see you in your home. I will tell you everything. Forgive me if I expressed myself plainly. I thank you heartily for your generous intentions. But you should not have come. It was wrong of me to let you go on that holiday trip to France. We must become circumspect in the future. We must have some regard to the world."

The world! Arthura stood still with sealed lips and a pale, anguish stricken face. For a stronger, more cruel light played on the reality now, and brought it home to her. Not for the first time to-day had the fallen below Valerian's standard. He had, then, been dissatisfied with her a year ago without ever saying a word! She thought she could understand that part of his conduct hitherto mysterious, the long interval between letter and letter, the silence as to his changed fortunes, the chilling reception of to-day, the spoken, and what was hardest of all to bear, the implied reproach.

That little word with which Valerian's sentence finished seemed to rise up as a wall between them. The world! What but the world had divided them from the beginning? What but the world prompted Valerine's wokludness now? Might not the world end by separating them more and more, and wearing away their love for each other? Her quick, impatient mind went farther. She thought she could date every change in Valerian's behavior from that French holiday, and recollected happiness rose up as a Nemesis to smite her now.

She was but justly punished for having loved too well. She looked at him, no longer, as she deemed, her adoring lover and closest friend in the whole world, rather her judge and discommender. At last she said, very quietly and pathetically, her mind full of the lost trustingness and joy and hope, and of the precious blush and uncertainty: "I know that I ought not to have gone on that holiday excursion with you. But never let any one blame me except yourself. I could not bear it."

She went on, struggling now not with tears, but an agitation deeper still:

"If my step-mother and the children should ever hear of it, I mean. You made me promise to say nothing of our engagement to them. And now, if they should hear what I have done, and that you blame me for it!"

She paused, as Valerian thought, on the verge of sobs, and, wishing to comfort her, he took her hands in his own and clasped them close. But the action did not soothe, it only served to heighten the contrast in Arthura's mind. There had been a time when Valerian adored her, and now!

And a thought flashed across her mind that made her brain reel and her knees tremble. What if evil report did reach the ears of Dolly and the children! What if they should doubt or the truth, the baleful truth she saw as plain as day and believed in.

She had been very dear to Valerian, but he loved her no longer; she had ma only forfeited his love, but his esteem.

"I am the stay of the house," she went on. "It would break their hearts to have me thought ill of."

A deep blush burned on her cheek for a moment, leaving her paler than before, and the last words which rang in Valerian's ears for days afterward were rather a cry of desolation than an appeal to him.

"Oh, Walter! Walter! Walter must never know," she cried. Then she fell down by the side of Valerian's chair for a few moments, sobbing hitterly, unconscious of the cruel world outside her little brother's adoring love. Her passion of grief over, what could Valerian do but entreat forgiveness? She was his own, his very own, he said. All could come right with them in time. She must love him a thousand times more fondly than ever.

The anguish in his turn was smitten Valerian's conscience did indeed reproach him for the ill-considered words of a quarter of an hour ago. Arthura let him whisper what he would in his ear, let him clasp her passive hand, then went away without a smile or a word. Their could never more be to each other as they once had been. She felt it to be supreme retribution.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE FALL OF THE ROWLDER.

Ten hundreds of visitors who this summer will visit the White Mountains will find more change in one of the striking scenes in the picturesque and charming district that the near Franconia Notch. The Eagle Cliff still towers up, with its craggy precipices covered or festooned with beeches, maples, and vines. The great Stone Face still looks down, as if, in Hawthorne's words, an enormous Titan had sculptured his own likeness there. Echo Lake still is worthy of its name. The Basin still brims with its pellucid waters. But the Flume has lost one of its wonders. All visitors remember the spot where a narrow flume in the mountain forms a passage for the stream. The cleft in the rocks is fifty feet high and several hundred feet long, and narrows at the upper end till it becomes only twelve feet wide. The little torrent rushes foaming past the smooth frowning walls of rock on which the green mosses are dripping, and beneath the little bridge which spanned the narrowest part of the ravine. Just there was the huge bowlder, egg-shaped, that had been caught between the walls of rock. It had hung there for centuries, and every one thought it would still hang threateningly for centuries to come, but the late storms have removed it from its place.

On Wednesday, June 20, a storm passed over the mountains. The clouds began to thicken and sink down, the lightning flashed far and wide while the heavy roar of the thunder told of the approaching thun-pour. Rain fell in torrents. During the heaviest part of the shower a thunderbolt that jarred the country for miles around struck Mount Liberty near the top. The bolt started a mass of rock down the steep side, which widened and deepened as it pushed its way forward, leaving a channel fifty feet wide and thirty feet deep. The flood of water carrying the huge mass entered the stream about half a mile above the Flume, cutting away both sides of the stream. It then entered the Flume, swept away the pine log lying across the top of the high walls, and carried the great bowlder about a thousand feet below its old resting-place beside the newly cut channel. The water rose to the height of fifty feet in the Flume. After passing it the flood spread right and left, taking down nearly two acres of heavy forest. The great bulk of the stone that was carried down lodged at the "apron," covering it to the depth of it with huge blocks of stone. Nearly all the space from the bridge up to the lower end of the Flume is covered with stone and broken timber. This is not the first time that such a landslide has happened in this region. Indeed, some people have explained the presence of the bowlder in its old position by the large land-slide that took place many years ago.

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Mathewby," "Miss Du Barry," "No New Trains," "Heads of Hours," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

HOT WATER AND COLD.

The golden mediocrity which has ever characterized me and all my ways prevented me from achieving distinction of any kind, good or bad, during my first term at Oxford. I read a little—a very little; I enjoyed myself a great deal, and every evening, before going to bed, I put on that water-color sketch of Mund, and sighed over it for quite five minutes. I went in for all reputable amusements; but then (as I pointed out to George, who would sometimes hear down upon me with a censorious face), I did not abuse them. We used to throw the dice in those days, we were fond of arranging ourselves in waistcoats of brilliant design; we followed the hounds—that the most part upon hired screws—and some of us believed ourselves to be such consummate whips that nothing but driving tandem would serve us. I did all of these things, but not in such a manner as to make myself conspicuous, and it will be seen that, with the exception of the first, they were innocent pastimes enough. I was, in short, so exactly like other young men, and my life at Oxford so completely resembled their lives, that it seems hardly worth while to say another word about the matter.

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1393.

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1395.

But if no change was wrought in me or my experiences by the substitution of Oxford for Eton, it was otherwise with the inhabitants of Thirlby, whose social history was just now entering upon the revolutionary era which so often succeeds to long periods of stagnation. I heard nothing about it at the time, my sole correspondent being a reticent person, who never cared to dwell upon matters whereby he was himself disagreeably affected; but afterward I received various accounts from various quarters of what all were agreed was no ventured calamity for the parish. It was Mrs. Farquhar's fault from beginning to end, my informants declared, but, as an impartial historian, I feel bound to record my conviction that if Mrs. Farquhar had been alone and unopposed, matters would have passed off much more smoothly, and some useful little reforms would have been effected without any great disturbance. For Mrs. Farquhar was like some statesmen whom I have heard of, who took things topsy-turvy not so much because they are consumed by an ardent love of progress as because they have a rival, whose names they find it absolutely necessary to counteract, and whose glory must at all hazards be outshone. One or former may be accepted with resignation, and even with a modicum of thankfulness, but when two reformers appear in the field it is a poor lookout for peaceable and unenterprising folk.

Now all the acts of Mrs Maud Bennison, and the poor whom the relieved, and the drunkards whom she brought to attend the services of the Church, have they not been fully chronicled in a previous chapter? These were noble and praiseworthy deeds, and, as a matter of abstract speculation, I say that Mrs. Farquhar would probably have done as much—as nearly as much—and no more, had not Maud unfortunately anticipated her. But that an energetic and God fearing lady of seventy-five should sit still, with her hands before her, and allow a mere chit of a girl to usurp all authority over the surrounding district, together with the prestige resulting from the same, was what no reasonable person could expect. Accordingly, no sooner had Maud returned home from Barrow than Mrs Farquhar furbished up her arms and prepared to descend into the arena.

First she struck a blow at the Establishment. For three consecutive Sundays she went to church, and sat in the square family pew opposite the pulpit, determined to give the Rector a fair hearing, and as the third Sunday she definitively summed up against him. On the fourth Sunday she drove down to the village, and, in the sight of the sun and within hearing of the church bells, marched into the little red brick chapel which had been lately erected to the members of the Baptist Connection. This was a truly scandalous thing to do, for Mrs Farquhar had always known the scandal by explaining audibly to Lady Welby and others that the preaching of "that unfortunate Mr Bunnacle" was "just intolerable." But she did not stop short at that. Thirlby Church was a spacious edifice, which never, at the best of times, was more than half filled, and it had been evident to Maud that the congregation—unlike the power of the British Crown at a certain famous period—had diminished, was diminishing, and ought to be increased. Now I am afraid there can be no doubt that the means adopted to secure this desirable result had not in every case been of the purest kind. There had not, perhaps, been anything amounting to what an election commissioner would consider direct bribery, but it is a fact that certain dishes of tea, tobacco, and snuff had been distributed to some aged parishioners who had suddenly taken to church-going, while more than one hardened Daddy Longlegs, who could not be prevailed upon to say his prayers at any price, was conspicuously left out in the cold. Mrs Farquhar found out all about this, and declared that such methods of dealing with the poor were worthy of the worst days of the Inquisition. If we could not look for edification or spiritual encouragement from the pastor of the flock, she said, let us at least have religious toleration. Let us not put a premium upon hypocrisy. Let us not descend to such unworthy shifts as pampering the body in order to make a fair show of having saved the soul. Her subsequent behavior was marked by that calm and astounding inconsistency to which she owed her greatest successes. She actually set to work to unbind Maud. First of all, the got hold of the decent parishioners aforesaid, and instructed their whole systems with tea, tobacco, and snuff, till they were ready to promise anything; then she attached the recalcitrant ones, and—to use Bunce's forcible if somewhat coarse expression—"skivered the livers out of 'em," with vivid pictures of a future place of torment. After which they also received creature comforts; and the end of it was that the parish church became more empty than ever, while Ebenezer was filled to overflowing. I regret to add that in this brief and brilliant campaign Mrs. Farquhar was ably seconded by that lieutenant, Mrs Bunce, who, to be sure, was a Dissenter herself, but who was probably actuated in this instance by sheer pugnacity and love of rebellion against constituted authorities. This was the beginning of the great Farquhar Bunce schism, whereby the parish of Thirlby was distracted long after the originators of the controversy had fallen out and become double enemies, which latter event, indeed, occurred within the space of a very few weeks.

When Mrs. Farquhar had succeeded in putting the whole of that little world by the ears, and in storming up universal dissension as well as Dunsmuir, she was comfortable and consented, feeling that she had done her duty. For the man one of those thrice-happy people who always believe that their sire doing their duty, and who follow the dictates of their own sweet will with the most thorough conscientiousness. She did not mean to work mischief, on the contrary, it was her earnest desire to do good; but she could not let sleeping dogs lie. The sight of a sleeping dog irritated her beyond everything. Her first impulse (and the invariably acted upon her first impulse) was to kick him; and if he jumped up and bit her, the rather liked it.

After having harassed the Church, she turned her attention to secular matters, and began to overhaul my uncle's accounts. Then arose a terrible disturbance. Peculation, it appeared, had been going on for years—peculation and malversation, and goodness knows what else besides. Perquisites here, perquisites there!—Mrs. Farquhar was horrified, and vowed that such a state of things could not be allowed to go on for another hour. My uncle absolutely declined to take any action in the matter, he tried to mediate Gallio, while Thompson, the bailiff and Mrs Peters, the housekeeper, were dragged and beaten before the judgment-seat, so to speak; but it wouldn't do. He had to step down and take a side; and the side that he took was that of the accused. Hence arose wars and fightings, which would assuredly have ended in bringing about a resignation to some of the servants, had not these been really attached to their master—and also, no doubt, to their place, which was an easy and profitable one. Mrs Farquhar was unsuccessful here; but, alas! she was not disheartened; and what my poor uncle must have suffered from her at this crisis I shudder to think of. Her name means as other she obtained possession of a certain little red volume, known as "Burke's Book," which, as I well recollect, used to be brought up to the Hall once a month, and which set forth to a bold and phonetic style of orthography the expenses incurred during the previous four weeks in the preservation of game and in "bad jobbs" (I quote from the original). So shocked was Mrs Farquhar by the statistics thus laid bare before her that she wasted no time in vain remonstrances with Bunce's employer, but marched straight off to the cottage of the delinquent himself, where, by all accounts, she met her match. Bunce, who was nothing if not independent, and who, according to his own code, was as honest as the day, was the last man in the world to sit still and have himself called a thief. He gave Mrs Farquhar his opinion of her in a few well chosen words, held open his garden gate for her to walk out, and then, having allowed her ten minutes' start, proceeded up to the Hall, where he saw my uncle, and requested to be relieved of his functions. A stormy scene ensued, in the course of which I believe that Mrs. Farquhar actually shed tears of mortification; from which I am led to conclude that Bunce must have hit her very hard indeed. She partly withdrew her accusations at length, but Bunce could by no means be persuaded to withdraw his resignation; and the upshot of it was that my uncle was compelled to order him out of the room, saying that the matter should be more fully discussed between them in private, and when they should both be a little less heated.

It was at this juncture that I returned home for Christmas, and great was my wrath on hearing of the tribulation into which my old friend had fallen. My uncle told me about it in the evening, laughing a little in spite of his vexation.

"I am afraid my mother is very angry," he said, "though really she brought it all upon herself. Of course Bunce does not mean to go; but, to tell the truth, he was extremely insolent, and I can not allow him to give his tongue such freedom. So I have put him under my commendation with him for three whole days, and I trust that he is now beginning to be frightened. You and I will go down and see him to-morrow, Charley, and put matters straight."

"I wish Mrs Farquhar would mind her own business," I exclaimed, angrily.

"My dear boy, you can't wish it more devoutly than I do, but as we grow older you will be surprised to find how very few people do mind their own business. After all, one must judge by motives, not by words or actions."

I held a diametrically opposite opinion, and I said so, but my uncle only smiled and changed the subject.

Immediately after breakfast the next morning we started on our mission of peace. The weather was bright and frosty. As we rode our way across the hard frozen fields the whole of the with bare landscape around us stood out in sharp black and white, and every distant object seemed close at hand. Among other distant objects as described Bunce, who was standing on a ladder, propped against the side of the wooden lean-to which adjoined his dwelling, and was hammering vigorously at some started planks. I have not the slightest doubt but that he was perfectly well aware of our approach, for he had the sharpest eyes and ears in the county, but he was pleased to ignore us, and remained elaborately unconscious even when we had reached his garden gate.

Mrs Bunce came hurrying out to receive us, dropping courtesies at every step, and the ceremonious politeness of Mrs Bunce's manner was such that it was evident that the moment mischief. Her sleeves were rolled up above her elbows, and she explained how grieved she was that she was having a thorough clean up of her parlor place afore lovin' of it for good, and consequently could not ask us to honor her by stepping inside and taking a cheer. She then informed herself minutely as to the state of our health, returned pious thanks to Heaven on hearing that I had never been better in my life, and expressed a hope that I might be spared for many years to be a comfort to my uncle, who, she was kind enough to add, deserved a deal more comfort out of life than he got. All this time her husband, with his back turned toward us, was hammering away for dear life, making as much noise as a whole gang of shipwrights in a dock-yard.

"Bunce!" called out Mrs Bunce, softly, "come down directly, will you? Bunce!— Dear the man! I do believe he gets a little hard o' hearin'. We're none of us as young as we once was, sir, and what we're to do for to make a livin' when we leaves this, Providence alone can tell, though Bunce he's a active man for his years, and hard-workin'—Lord! I never see such a man for work. Wears hisself out, I tell him, but he don't pay no heed to me. Might I make so bold as to ask, sir, whether you've found a new keeper yet? Bunce he did hear of a young man as might be noticable, though a little given to drink at times, they tell me, and experience of course he have not got it. But thine, it's that difficult to meet with a experienced keeper nowadays—"

"So difficult, Mrs Bunce," interrupted my uncle, "that I have not the slightest intention of looking me for one. If you will kindly induce your husband to stop making that noise and come down, I shall be able to convince him, I hope, that there is no need for us to part."

Mrs. Bunce shook her head mournfully. "He's terrible obstinate, sir," she said, "and full o' sinful pride, as I've told him many and many's the time. 'Mark my word,' says I, 'pride 'll have a fall.' And, sure enough, I was right, you see, sir, for if it isn't enough to abase any man's pride to be likened to a common pickpocket, and thet liv a stranger, as you may say—"

"Come, come, Mrs. Bunce," broke in my uncle; "if no one is to be called bad names, he is surely better to receive them from those who don't know as than from those who do. But Mrs Farquhar never meant to call your husband a pickpocket, and if she said more than she should have done, as did he. I think he must admit that."

"So I telled him, sir—so I telled him," answered Mrs. Bunce, raising her voice a little. "'Thin shear,' I says, 'o' your speakin' up so near bettees like that.' Why, you ought to be ashamed o' yourself. Don't you know,' I says, 'that 'twas your duty as a Christian, bit alone a keeper, to hold your tongue, and allow the lady to say what she pleased?' What if she did tell you you was dishonest?—you that wouldn't take a farden as didn't belong to you to sets yourself from start in!' What if she did curse a meddlin' and a makin' with things as was on concern o' hers, and blackeneb' a'racters as would bear lookin' into better than her own, maybap? 'Tis our dooty to forgive such,' I says, 'and to turn 'an t'other cheek.' But Bunce he were that hurt in his feelin's that his little didn't seem to do him ona mossel o' good. He's a-regret'n it, sir, and that's the truth. Why, to hear him talk one wash think he expected as you should take his part—him being unnerved, you see, sir—against your own mother! Clean out of all reason! And as for him stoppin' on, after all thet's past, why, I am bound to confess as I wouldn't 'ventur' for to propose it to him, sir."

While Mrs. Bunce had thus been playing the part of Antæus, the hammering overhead had been going on in a subdued and spasmodic manner, which showed plainly enough that her husband had not lost a word of her discourse, and its peroration was saluted by a salvo of tremendous raps sequipmously like applause.

My uncle was really vexed. "Upon my word, Mrs Bunce," he said, "I think you are both of you making rather too much of this. To the best of my recollection the word 'dishonesty' was never used, and if it had been, you ought to know that it would have produced no impression upon me. It was quite unnecessary for me to 'take Bunce's part,' as you say, upon a question of honesty, and if there has been any irregularity, I have been fully as much to blame for it as he. When he chose to use the language that he did to Mrs Farquhar I was obliged to stop him, but if he will now make a proper apology to her—"

"Sar-r" shouted Bunce, suddenly facing about, and brandishing into dudgeon, as his habit was when strongly moved—"sar! I think 'tis her ows to 'pologise to I, not me to she." And having thus delivered himself, he returned to his hammering with renewed energy.

But I thought it was high time that we should be relieved from this deafening din, so I picked up a clod of earth and pitched it at him, calling out to him to come down, and not play the fool any longer.

Bunce obeyed my summons somewhat stiffly, a slow grin overspreading his wooden features as he descended the ladder. "How do you do, Mr. Charls? Glad to see you home agin, sir, and lookin' so well, too—what I said so that there lady I sticks to," was his greeting, uttered all in one breath.

"Bunce, Bunce, don't force me into telling you that you must go your own way," said my uncle. "We are too old friends to quarrel over a trifle."

"'Tain't no trifle as should part me and you, squire," returned Bunce. "If you'd ha' told me there was anythin' wrong in my book, it should ha' ha altered, even if I was not n' pocket by it, and I shouldn't ha' ha'n on stalice, but, as the Scripture says, No man can serve two masters, much less a master and a mistress; and when a man o' my age finds his accounts overhauled by a stranger, and hears himself called a cheat into the bargain, why, he naturally eats up a bit rough. Beggin' your pardon, Squire, I think you'd ha' done the same in my place."

My uncle considered for a moment, and then answered, "I suppose I should."

I have never been able to determine satisfactorily to myself whether my uncle's keen sense of justice was or was not one quality to be envied. Its immediate and apparent results were certainly unfortunate for him, as a general thing. Assuredly Bunce did not mean to leave—would probably have apologized to Mrs. Farquhar sooner than leave, if the affair had been brought to issue upon him, and this my uncle knew perfectly well. But he would not take advantage of his power to turn the screw; and the consequence was that Bunce not only kept his place without apologizing, but—as was quite natural—cherished a grudge against my uncle for a long time afterward. "He hadn't no call to turn me out o' the room afore I'd had my say," the old fellow would repeat, with a growing sense of injury, and I am sorry to have to add that from that time forth the tyranny of Mars increased fourfold.

The reader will no doubt conclude that as an ale was a weak man, who deserved to be bullied, and indeed this was very much the view taken of his character by those who knew and loved him best. For although we here a good deal about the courage of acknowledging one's self to be in the wrong, that particular form of introspective has, for obvious reasons, never yet commanded popular respect, and never will. My dear old uncle did not meet popularity. He cared only to obey his conscience—and a very troublesome sort of conscience it must have been to him at times, I am afraid.

Bunce having thus dictated terms of peace, it seemed only natural to expect that Mrs. Farquhar, as representing the defeated party, would feel and express some little anger, but that curiously equable old lady astonished me by doing nothing of the sort. She only smiled and shook her head, and as soon as she and I were alone, confided to me that poor Bernard was quite incapable of holding his own against any one who tried to get the better of him. My warm retort that Bunce was as honest as any of us only caused her to smile more than ever. "Oh, ay," she said, "very likely I wasna on names." And after that only musical utterance she began to talk about something else.

Mrs Farquhar was defeated, but she was very far indeed from being put to silence, and not a day passed without many and many an allusion of the above nature failing from her. She was always cheerful, always good humored, and never, apparently, conscious of giving annoyance, yet she exasperated me both to the verge of madness. Most people, I suppose, have, at one time or another of their lives, had to do with a nagging woman, and know the feeling of angry despair which is apt to be aroused by endeavoring to withdraw out topics, and reiterating all arguments which have been fifty times answered. Many excellent women do nag, and perhaps the more excellent they are the more intolerable is their system of nagging. My uncle bore it all with the patience of Job and the meekness of Moses; but he grew more and more silent, and the harassed expression which I had noticed upon his face in former years after one of his visits to Scotland had become habitual. Even I, who had a naturally thicker skin than he, and who was, besides, exceptionally favored by Mrs. Farquhar—even I fretted under the regimen of incessant pinpricks, until at last I could stand it no longer, and boldly attacked her miserable tormentor.

"Mrs Farquhar," I said to her one day, "what is at the use of your going on as you do about Bunce? He isn't going to be sent away, I tell you, and you only worry Uncle Bernard to death by perpetually."

She looked a good deal surprised, and said she didn't know what I meant. She was not aware of having persisted in anything—except indeed in her opinions (to which, surely, she was entitled) that accounts ought to be made intelligible. "So one," she added, "can be more anxious to spare your dear uncle worry than I am, but when I think a thing wrong, I must say so."

"Yes, but might not once be enough?" I ventured to suggest.

She stared, and then laughed, saying that I was a very impertinent young gentleman. I was certainly a very foolish one to suppose that nature and the habits of threescore years and ten could be changed by anything that I could say. Mrs. Farquhar went on as usual, and I can not flatter myself that my remonstrance produced as much as a transient effect upon her.

But with a hard frost which had held for ten days and showed no signs of yielding, and with the broads and dikes frozen the whole way from Thirlby to Yarmouth, I had no much leisure for breaking over domestic troubles. By great good luck the cold had come upon us without either word or sign, so that the hundreds who honored Thirlby Broad with their company daily during the continuance of this splendid skating weather had a coolness like that of a vast mirror upon which to perform their evolutions. Gas shades were not quite as common in those days as they are now, while ladies who could be induced to put on skates at all were far and away better skaters than they are now. Hand Dennison, who never dreamed of taking the trouble to be effected at all, revealed herself that winter as a skater whom the whole county beheld with admiration. She did not do much in the way of figures; but she had thoroughly over come the difficulties of the outside edge, and to see her skimming across the Broads, bounding and bounding into the gray distance like a bird, was enough—as old Sir Digby Wallby declared, in an uncounted access of enthusiasm—"to make a gouty man sit down and cry with vexation."

(to be continued.)

JOHN BAPTIST PURCELL, ARCHBISHOP OF CINCINNATI.

THE death of Archbishop PURCELL, on the 4th inst., removes a notable figure from the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the United States. He was born in Mallow, Ireland, February 26, 1800, and came when yet a child to the United States. He was educated, as so many of the Catholic bishops here been, partly in the United States and partly in Europe. The first college attended by him was Mount St. Mary's, at Emmittsburg, Maryland. After leaving the college, he completed his education in St. Sulpice, Paris, and in that city was ordained priest. Upon his return home he was appointed Teacher of Theology at Mount St. Mary's, and President in 1829. In 1833 he was made Bishop of Cincinnati, the diocese embracing the entire State of Ohio.

Protestantism has grown rapidly in the States which cover the Ohio Valley, but Romanism has also advanced with prodigious strides. In 1833 there was but one Roman Catholic church in Cincinnati. The diocese of Cleveland was set off in 1847, and the diocese of Columbus in 1868. There are now in Hamilton County alone seventy-one Catholic churches, the archdiocese, notwithstanding its losses of territory, contains 180 churches and chapels, 213 priests, 1396 persons under monastic vows, and a Catholic population of 150,000. It is a fact strongly illustrative of Catholic methods of growth that the so-called "religious," who have taken vows, number one to every 107 of the Church population of all ages in the diocese. Through the energetic efforts of the Archbishop, Homes, Orphanages, and Protectories were founded; parochial schools were established to the number of eighty, providing for over 19,000 pupils. It was his purpose to place Catholicism, at this great centre of Western life, in the very front rank, and he spared neither labor nor money for the accomplishment of his object.

In his earlier life Archbishop PURCELL was a keen controversialist. His most famous debate was that with ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, the founder of the Church of the Disciples, on the "Infallibility of the Church of Rome." CAMPBELL was, like himself, an Irishman—an Irish Presbyterian by birth, one of the race who have for several centuries been sternly and relentlessly hostile to the claims of Romanism. He was a born debater, and lived all his days in an atmosphere of controversy. The discussion between the two champions lasted for seven days, during the year 1836. The period was one of theological ferment all through the West. Indeed, the only knights-errant ever known there were the knights-errant of doctrine, their tournaments were held in school houses, town halls, and groves, and were attended by hundreds and sometimes thousands of admiring backwoodsmen. This passion for controversy was a symptom of advancing civilization; the rough antagonisms of the frontier had been turned into the channel of theological polemics. The report of this debate was afterward published in a volume. Archbishop PURCELL also published during his life Lectures and Pastoral Letters, KENRICK DUBAN'S Ages of Faith, and DONALD MACLEOD'S History of the Heathen to the Blessed Virgin Mary in North America.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP PURCELL.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY LOSEE.

It is to the honor of Archbishop PURCELL that during the civil war he unhesitatingly supported the national government. Under his episcopal vestments there beat a warm American heart. He publicly rebuked the Freeman's Journal and the Metropolitan Record for "instigating" the Catholics of New York to "evil words and deeds" during the draft riots. During that critical year he issued a pastoral containing these manly words: "We confess that it has greatly pained us to hear that certain rash, irreverent, and thoughtless men of our communion be so cursed the government, the administration, and their abettors. Now God commands us to bless and curse not. And when men cursed the supporters of the government, did they not reflect that they cursed the more than hundreds of thousands of Catholic voters and soldiers in our army who defend that government in the field?" He exhorted his people to join, on the day of national thanksgiving, with their fellow-citizens in prayer for peace.

The diocese of Cincinnati was erected into an archiepiscopate in 1850, and Bishop PURCELL was made the first Archbishop. He was, indeed, almost the first Bishop of Ohio, having had but one predecessor, the Rev. Dr. EDWARD FENWICK. It may be fairly claimed that the enormous growth of the Church within the bounds of his jurisdiction has been effected under his inspiration and guidance. Where all the money was procured for so many and such various undertakings was a mystery until within a few years. The period from 1875 to 1880 was one of trial and disaster to the business men of the country, and of fatal disaster to Archbishop PURCELL. It was found that he had been interested with the savings of his flock, and had acted as their banker, in this capacity he failed, and the failure of the banker clouded the last days of the Archbishop. He was indebted to his people for money loaned to him on interest to the amount of $4,000,000; the available assets were under $500,000. The ambition of the prelate had conquered his prudence. He had invested the funds placed in his hands in vast fabrics erected for charitable and devotional uses, which could neither pay interest nor be turned into money. The sufferers were the poor. The censures which fell upon the head of the Archbishop were heavy, and not wholly unjust. His misfortunes was practically at an end—a fact recognized by the appointment in 1880 of a coadjutor with the right of succession. It has seemed strange to Protestants that the Catholic Church has not assumed and paid these debts. Pastoral letters were issued by the bishops in this country recommending collections in the churches, but the proceeds have not met the claims of the Archbishop's creditors.

In 1869 Archbishop PURCELL went to the Vatican Council, and voted with the minority against "the opportuneness of the definition of papal infallibility." This was as far as the minority dared to go. Although the Catholic bishops in the United States may be classed as ultramontanes, in Archbishop PURCELL the ultramontane spirit was less pronounced than in others. He had many warmly attached friends, and was a man of blameless life. When his misfortunes became known, he appealed to the fact that the last money had not been spent in luxury and self-indulgence. If one may judge from his manner on some important occasions, he was fond of the pomp and splendors of his office. He cherished the dream of the Catholic clergy in the United States, of the triumph of their Church, and did his utmost for its realization.

"HE HELD OPEN HIS GARDEN GATE FOR HER TO WALK OUT."—[See Serial, "Terrible Hall."]

SANTA FE, FROM FORT MARCY.

It requires perhaps a slight stretch of the quality in honor of which the chief town of New Mexico was named to accept the present celebration as really a "tertio millennial," or three centuries and a third, since the settlement of Santa Fe. It is not yet four centuries by nine years since the landing of COLUMBUS. CORTEZ first saw the Mexican coast in 1519, and did not discover the peninsula of California until 1536. The discovery of the site of Santa Fe itself by the officers of CORTEZ is assigned to the year 1540, ten years before the date accepted, for tertio-millennial purposes, as that of the actual founding of a European colony.

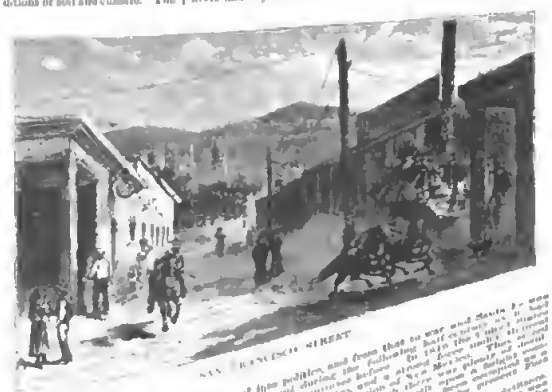
But even if the antiquity of Santa Fe is exaggerated a few years, it is only a very few years, and it is a hoary antiquity compared with any of the settlements in the United States: 1550 strikes us as a mediæval date. Think of it! CERVANTES was a child four years old; SHAKSPEARE for fourteen. The great conflict between Catholicism and Protestantism had scarcely passed from the closet to the field. The revolt of the Netherlands, which first attacked the supremacy of Spain in Europe, did not begin for sixteen years. The destruction of the Armada, and with it of the Spanish power, was thirty-eight years off. JULIAN III. succeeded PAUL III. in the seat of St. PETER, and CHARLES V. extended the blessings of the Holy Inquisition to the Netherlands [illegible] Santa Fe were leaving [illegible] the colonies to the Carolinas [illegible] The oldest of the Carolina [illegible] reorganization [illegible] small town [illegible] It was easy to [illegible]

Spanish priesthood followed the conquerors, of course, and there are more than churches enough in Santa Fe to do all the business, according to American notions, especially as all of them are of one ecclesiastical variety, with no distinction beyond that of being placed under the special patronage of different saints. One of these, the Chapel of San Miguel, is "the oldest church in America," having been "rebuilt" in 1710.

The Spaniards by no means found it plain sailing after they had once possessed themselves of Santa Fe. The Indians of the sixteenth century were of a different type from their descendants, degenerated by strong waters and Spanish marriages. The town was the prize in many battles, and in 1680 an Indian confederacy was formed strong enough to drive the Spaniards out of the country, to which they did not return in triumph until twelve years afterward. In 1693, under DE VARGAS, the Spaniards reconquered the town, after a desperate fight, and from that time Santa Fe went the usual Spanish-American road. The arrangement of its houses recalls old Spain, the street front a mere dead wall with a patio, within which is at once the garden and the central court of the house, and from which its rooms open. The old Indian workings of the gold and silver mines were abandoned, at first as part of the terms of the capitulation, and afterward through laziness and lack of enterprise, and the place, in the process of its vegetation, went tranquilly and unobtrusively to seed.

But the Yankee cometh, in the which no man can play, neither can he sleep. It was in 1846 that PIKE, whose name is best known by that of the eminent Peak, his namesake, appeared in Santa Fe, which struck him, as he recited it from the neighboring heights, as resembling a "fleet at flat bottomed boats on the Mississippi River." The contrast between the splendors of the churches and the squalor of the houses also struck and disgusted the prosaic and Protestant mind of PIKE. He found in the town only one citizen of the United States, JAMES PURCELL by name, who had been a fur trader, but had established himself at Santa Fe as a carpenter, where he was thriving. But it was a long time before those pioneers had any successors. The "Greasers" and the Indians were

THE OLDEST HOUSE IN AMERICA.



SAN FRANCISCO STREET.

RUINS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH AT SAN [illegible]

THE SANTA FE CELEBRATION.

an exhibition of the mineral resources of the Territory, and a revival of the three civilizations which have successively swayed the destinies of Santa Fe. The explanation of the existence of the town through so many vicissitudes is that there is here an enfolding supply of water in a particularly arid land. That fact gives to promise a future of extended usefulness to Santa Fe, now that it has become the centre of a region obviously destined to a rapid development.

TO THE FUCHSIA.

Pretty fuchsia, fresh and quaint,
Then and dainty, art thou not
Spirit held in sweet constraint
Of an old gavotte?

There's a lass I have in mind,
With a blithe old-fashioned face,
Time her nature, frank and kind,
Thine her quiet grace.

Long-forgotten, old-time dance,
Modest, cheery little flower,
Wealth nor beauty could enhance
This my sweetheart's dower.

COTTON.

FROM THE PLOUGH TO THE LOOM.

By W. M. BUTWELL.

III.

The Warehouses.—Arrived at New Orleans, the cotton, which has been stowed, and piled up in tiers until it reaches to height the upper or hurricane deck, is discharged under a foreman and gang with great system and rapidity, covered with tarpaulin if necessary, and at once conveyed in drays and floats to the warehouse. Here it is sampled by the factor, and placed on tile tables in the most favorable light for inspection by the buyer. The float in a vehicle peculiar to the cotton cities, being a long, low, and very strong wagon, drawn usually by a splendid pair and a leading mule, and driven by a darky, who stands erect, as proud of his team, its harness, and its wheelmanship as Captain Leathers is of the Natchez steamboat. There are in New Orleans warehouses having a capacity for storage far beyond the present receipt of the port. That storage, handling, and transfer require a vast force of men and animals among the boats, ships, and warehouses. The vehicles used for this purpose may be estimated at 8000, and the mules and horses at 15,000. The longshoremen and other laborers may be set down during the winter at 20,000.

More recently the relations between the white and colored races have been so well re-adjusted that the colored men have an association which parades in the same procession with the white men's association, and they constitute a common force upon all questions of wages at hours of work. The turn-out on these occasions is highly creditable to the colored members. They are dressed in black cloth suits, and present a favorable specimen of physical force and of orderly conduct. Being generally citizens of New Orleans, they do not partake of the vices and follies of the unregenerate roustabout or the rascalities of the saddle-colored statesmen.

Besides the warehouses, there are many private pickeries in which loose or damaged cotton is cleaned, dried, baled, or even compressed. The handling of a million and a half of bales must occasion more or less waste. This would be increased by torn bales and by packing handfuls of the staple into the "hickory shirts" and blouses of the employés. If this waste should average a pound per bale, it would amount to more than 3000 bales; but the damage to cotton by fire and water, on steamboats, warehouses, and ships, so increases this quantity that the city crop in sometimes estimated as high as 25,000 bales. This represents in chief part salvage and theft, and not the spoils of theft.

Facilities of Transfer.—It may be remarked that the city of New Orleans was founded upon the theory that as there was no other outlet to the ocean than by way of the Balize, the exports and imports of the Mississippi Valley could only be conducted through the agency of factors and middle men. There was then no necessity for economy of labor or cost; on the contrary, all charges were laid in view of the fact that the business season was short and the epidemic dangerous. Exceptional profits were therefore certainly justifiable. Drayage and storage earn a large part of the legitimate business of the city, and any attempt to dispense with either was regarded with disfavor.

The modern competition of other ports, and the diversion of the valley trade upon lines offering superior facilities, with less cost of transit and transfer, have compelled the adoption of similar facilities in New Orleans. Hence she has built elevators, constructed railroads and transfer machinery, instead of the manual labor formerly used for the same purpose. While the rates of transit goods will be thereby greatly increased by way of New Orleans, the men and mules now employed in this transfer may be sent as the plantation for the production of ample crops.

Shipping the Cotton.—Loading a vessel is always a work of much skill and responsibility. With cotton it is especially the case. It is conducted by a stevedore (a name left by the Spaniards), who is a somewhat humanized improvement on the mate of the steamboat—generally, we may say, a man of experience and a property owner. The process of stowing the compressed bales requires good judgment not only as to the economy of space, but as to the strength and trim of the vessel. The vessel sometimes takes in a ballast of bulk grain, and the cotton is stored fore and aft and amidships by the use of immense screws, which so condense the already compressed cotton that it becomes a compact mass, and as well act almost as a part of the vessel in the buffets which she is to receive from the winds and the waves on the voyage to which she is about to be exposed.

The increased capacity of transportation effected by the compressing by steam at hydraulic presses is demonstrated by the fact that steamers carrying 10,000 bales of cotton have crossed the bar of the Mississippi, when formerly 4000 to 5000 bales were a large cargo. But a further compression is practicable. It is the manufacture of cotton into yarns and cloths. This would bring a bale of raw cotton into perhaps one-fifth of the space now occupied by it. Already, however, this improvement in the carrying capacity of the ocean steamers and the improved facilities of inland transportation to expedite the preparation and exportation of the staple that the cotton season closes perhaps two months earlier at present than formerly.

We have thus conducted the growth and preparation of this important staple from the seed to the spindle, and having bid the noble steamer which leaves the port of New Orleans for the mills and looms of Manchester good-by, must take our leave of the reader.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
AS A NERVE FOOD.

Dr. J. W. Sarre, Wellington, O., says: "In impaired nervous supply I have used it to advantage."—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.

"It is an near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.
"The odor of new-mown hay, the perfume of countless roses, the soft breeze, the iron lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune
Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Foot of 23d St., East River, and Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.

The Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel-lists, and tours covering the White Mountains, the State of Maine the Maritime Provinces, and all the Shore, Mountain, and Lake resorts east of Boston will be mailed free to any address on application to Lucius Tuttle, Gen. Pass. Agt. Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

HOTEL KAATERSKILL,
CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.

Largest mountain house in the world. Open June 25th to October. Accessible by all rail route within half mile of hotel, via the New Kaaterskill Railroad. Address, E. A. Gilbert, Kaaterskill P. O., N. Y.—[Adv.]

Ammoniated Quinine do not only distinguish themselves by their flavor and aromatic odor above all others generally used, but they are also a sure preventive for all diseases originating from the digestive organs. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Will save the Hair and keep it in a strong and healthy condition, because it will stimulate the roots of the hair and restore the natural action upon which its growth depends. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are absolutely pure.—[Adv.]

Hobson's Salve is conceded the standard relief. Rallroad Sauce Improves soups, fish, gravies, meats, &c.—[Adv.]

C. C. Shayne, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N. Y., sends For Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

Royal Baking Powder Co., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

"Boker's Bitters," the old and Best Stomach Bitters known—established for their medicinal properties, and for their flavor as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. L. Funke, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1926.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.
EDENIA AND MARÉCHAL NIEL ROSE.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate is a fine preparation of pure chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa is made from which the excess of oil has been removed, nicely digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, an drink or cuisine in confectionery is a delicious article highly recommended by tourists.—Baker's Aroma, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

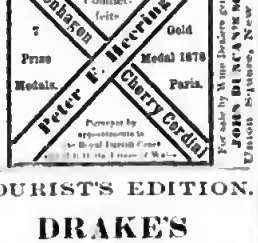
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "In a success and a boon for which mankind should feel grateful." See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "Clinical Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's signature in Blue Ink across the Label. The caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States and Dominion only, C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, M. ROBINSON & ROBBINS, H. B. & F. T. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.



TOURIST'S EDITION.

DRAKE'S
WHITE MOUNTAINS.

ILLUSTRATED BY
W. HAMILTON GIBSON.

The Heart of the White Mountains: their Legend and Scenery. By Samuel Adams Drake, Author of "Nooks and Corners of the New England Coast," "Captain Nelson," &c. With Illustrations by W. Hamilton Gibson. Tourist's Edition. Large 8vo, Ornamental Cloth, $3 00.

It is no mere record of miles, elevations, and comparative size of mountains; it is rather an experienced and friendly guide, who beguiles the uphill way by legends, pleasant anecdotes, and bright sayings, and teaches much of the woodcraft to be learned near the mountains' heart.—Portland Press

The entire region is described, not in guide-book style, but rather as a record of the author's own experiences, interspersed with interesting incidents and old romances, but at the same time containing all needed information as to routes to the different portions of the region.—Troy Herald, N. Y.

It will be better than all the guide-books for those who are going for the first time to New Hampshire this summer; and the frequent visitor will also find it a charming souvenir.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The tourist to the White Mountains will not deem his "outfit" complete unless it includes a copy of this "full, precise, compact, sensible, and honest" guide to the peaks, passes, and ravines of that famous region.—Chicago Journal.

No pleasanter guide to the White Mountains can be imagined. A map, a tourist's appendix, and an index adapt it for the use of travellers.—N. Y. Times.

The volume runs neck and neck with any wide popularity among White Mountain tourists, its convenient form adapting it to temporary, and its beauty and value to permanent, uses.—Boston Journal.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

REPOUSSE WORK.

Price of Tools and Materials mailed free. Book of Instructions mailed for 20 cents.
GOODNOW & WIGHTMAN, Boston, Mass.

BRUSHES of every description at 316 Pearl Street, New York.
JOHN L. HOPPEL, Manufacturer and Importer.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

Distressing Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Humors cured by the Cuticura Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Blemishes, Skin Blemishes, Pimples, and Grease Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers. Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

H.W. JOHNS'
ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,
Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Millboard, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.
Send for Descriptive Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

WAR VOLUMES
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Some nine pages in the Weekly, containing one of the illustrations then appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
163 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

A warm iron passed over the back of these PAPERS TRANSFERS the Pattern to any fabric in Marking, Threads, Embroidery, Braiding, and Initial Letters.

New Book bound in cloth, showing all Briggs & Co.'s Patterns, Stocking Darner or new designs, sent on receipt of seven 3-cent stamps.

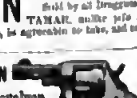
100 Franklin St., N.Y.

Retailed by the leading Zephyr Wool Stores.

BRIGGS & CO.'S
PATENT TRANSFER PAPERS.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty
TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bilis, hereditary tendencies, cerebral congestions, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.
Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, milder pills and the most purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

THE AMERICAN
Double Action Revolver,



32, 38 and 41 Calibres, and sold at retail by the gun dealers, but by 325 Gun and Hardware trade, ask your dealer for them. Made by HARRINGTON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass., also manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Ejecting Gun.

HARPER'S BAZAR
CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, Nos. 109 to 103 Cherry street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

EDUCATIONAL.

1883. The NEW CALENDAR of the
NEW ENGLAND
CONSERVATORY of MUSIC
Beautifully illustrated 64 pages, SENT FREE to yourself and musical friends. Send names and address to E. TOURJEE, Franklin Sq., Boston, Mass.
The Largest and best appointed Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies, in the world.

Lady Agents wanted everywhere to sell our new and only white Queen City and Gold Band Dinner Sets. Largest sale. Profits immense. Address Queen City Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, O.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, postpaid. 25c. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding. Fabric made. Strength and style.
Send for circular. The heritage
HENRY TIMKEN,
Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.
CHICAGO, ILL. ABBOTT BUGGY CO

The Best Work of its Class,

SAYS THE N. Y. TRIBUNE,

In M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE.

This great work is complete in Ten Volumes, with 1500 Illustrations, numerous maps, and 80,000 subjects.

NOTICES.

From the Rev. Noah Porter, D.D., President of Yale College.

I am very favorably impressed with the thoroughness of the work.

From the Rev. Bishop J. P. Bence

It embodies the best that Germany has produced, while its range of topics is far more comprehensive than in Herzog or any book of the encyclopædic class.

The most important and compact library of reference in the English language for the Biblical student. —Jewish Messenger, N. Y.

No religious library can pretend to being complete without this noble and great work.—Boston Advertiser

There is probably not in the English language a cyclopædia of religious literature which can compare with this in breadth, scope, and thoroughness of execution.—Evangelist, N. Y.

The most valuable single work accessible to the Bible student.—Examiner and Chronicle, N. Y.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY

Parties wishing to examine the above work, with a view to purchasing, can have an agent call on them by addressing

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY.

MAGIC LANTERNS WITH VIEWS $5

Also Catalogue of Lanterns, Plates and Lectures 10c.
MAGIC LANTERNS & SLIDES Wanted
THEO. J. HASHAGEN, 667 Broadway, N. Y.

BOSTON SCHOOL OF ORATORY.

Full courses in elocution, oratory, English and literature, music, dramatic art. The Boston system of gesture. Delsarte gymnastics. Term begins Oct. 1. 4th. Apply at School, No. 154 Boylston, Mass., after Sept. 1st, personally or by letter. Catalogues address at any time E. R. MAYNARD, Pres.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR 4 00
The THREE above publications 10 00
Any TWO above named 7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE 1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE } 5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers) 10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 20 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be published gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

IT PAYS to sell our Hand Rubber Stamps. Samples free. FELTMAN & Co., Cleveland, O.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

ABSINTHE DRINKING—THE FAST PREVAILING VICE AMONG OUR GILDED YOUTH.
Before After two years indulgence three times a day

Peck & Snyder's
CELEBRATED
STATEN ISLAND
Tennis Racquet.
Used by all experts.
Complete Catalogue on application.
PECK & SNYDER, 123, 125, and 130 Nassau St., New York.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion, and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D.
82 Portland Av., Brooklyn, N. Y.

"Dr. Castoria."
When babies feel and cry as if in pain
What cures them every time, kills those worms
Dar Castoria.
What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach Colds, Indigestion
Use Castoria.
Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

PURE INDIA TEAS.

From the Districts of ASSAM, CHITTAGONG, CACHAR,
SANCHA VALLEY,
DARJEELING,
DEHRA DOON,
And Others
Absolutely Pure, Superior Flavor.
TWO POINT BURDETT AT TEA.
Requires only half the usual quantity.
SOLD BY ALL GROCERS.
JOHN C. PHILLIPS & CO.,
Agents of the Celebrated Tea Syndicate,
130 Water Street, New York.

NOW READY.—The Phonographic Dictionary. By Benn Pitman and Jerome B. Howard. Price $2 00. Send for specimen sheets. Sold by all book sellers, or address PHONOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE, Cincinnati, O.

LADIES!
Tonjes-Pillsen, who has served Queen Victoria, Prussian Royal Family and Crowned Heads of Europe and Brazil, is sending ordered pure, delightful tea or coffee pots to any lady for 3 stamps to pay postage. The CITIZENS' TEA CO. PREPARATORY CO. formerly Tonjes Tea Importing Co. 366 Spruce St., Phila., Pa.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

Is the only perfect pile pipe ever made. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, $2.50. Endorsed by the profession. Used by all first-class hotels. Can be carried in the vest pocket, ready for use without putting together. Sold by all druggists. Send for circular. Beware of worthless imitations offering cheap pipes, often using remainder of Seeley's Original, and which are pirated the moment they appear. Sold by all druggists, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. SEELEY'S PILE PIPE MANUFACTORY, 1206 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 76 Great Russell Street, London, England.

A WHOLESOME CURATIVE,
NEEDED IN
Every Family.
AN ELEGANT AND NUTRITIOUS FRUIT LOZENGE for Constipation, Biliousness, Headache, Indigestion, &c.
SUPERIOR TO PILLS and all other strong regulating medicines.
THE MOST SAFE, USE AT ALL TIMES, PROMPT, AND TASTE DELICIOUS.
Ladies and children like it.
Price 50 cents. Large boxes $1 00 cents.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

TROPIC FRUIT LAXATIVE

ASTHMA & HAY FEVER
THEIR CAUSE & CURE.
KNIGHT'S NEW TREATISE sent free.
Address L. A. KNIGHT, 32 E. Third St., CINCINNATI, O.

SITUATIONS Furnished teachers. Application form and copy of our paper sent free. Address National School Supply Bureau, 10 Fifth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

$72 A WEEK. $5 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.
MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, MORGAN DIX. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $5 00.

II.
TWELVE AMERICANS. Their Lives and Times. By Horatio Carmichael. Containing Sketches of Horatio Seymour, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Hannibal Hamlin, John Sullivan, Robert C. Winthrop, Frederick Douglass, William H. Wadsworth, G. Thurman, Joseph Jefferson, Ethan B. Woodward, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

III.
SPANISH VISTAS. By George Parsons Lathrop. Illustrated by Charles A. Kinsella. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $1 00.

IV.
MORALS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record, with Illustrative Parallel and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By Barnas Sears and Rossiter Worthington Raymond. Two Volumes. 16mo, Cloth, $3 00.

V
COMPARATIVE ZOOLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A. M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 60.

VI.
GEMMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Illustrated by William Wade Nagell. 4to, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $2 00.

VII
LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. Carlyle Edition. Paper, 20 cents. Also, Library Edition, 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VIII.
SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. Edited, with Notes, by WILLIAM J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

IX
SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS. Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, and other Poems. Edited, with Notes, by WILLIAM J. ROLFE, A.M. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; 4to, Paper, 40 cents.

X.
NAN. By Lucy C. Lillie, Author of "Rhoda's Recognition," "Prudence," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XI
FREDERICK II AND MARIA THERESA. From Hitherto Unpublished Documents. 1740–1746. By H. Hüffer. Translated by Mrs. Chas. Gayley and Mr. John Lillie. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XII.
THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE. A History of the Brooklyn Bridge. By W. C. Conant. (Reprinted from Harper's Magazine for May, 1866.) The Bridge as a Monument. By Montgomery Schuyler. (Reprinted from Harper's Weekly, May 27, 1866.) Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Two Portraits and Twenty-eight Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XIII
LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Fellows of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. Drisler, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $16 00.

XIV.
HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Seventeenth Edition, containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1883. By BENJAMIN VINCENT. Revised by American Readers. Large 8vo, 960 pages, Cloth, $5 00.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Ant Cover Ant Moll. By the Countess M. Von Bothmer. 50 cents.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated. 50 cents.

Yolanda. By William Black. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 00; Paper, 50 cents.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Ardath. By A. Mary F. Robinson. 15 cents.

Mr. Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 50 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 50 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 20 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 20 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Fancy Farm. Memoirs of Margaret Ap Rhisiart, Vivandiere of Buffalo. By Constance M. Tuson. 20 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, 13 varied Premium List, 10c. W. [illegible] best sell. Agents wanted. Address J. [illegible], Nassau, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

IGNOMINIOUS END OF THE TRADE DOLLAR.

THE TRAVELERS,

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

IS THE

LARGEST ACCIDENT COMPANY in the WORLD,

ONE OF THE BEST OF LIFE COMPANIES,

With Rates as Low as Consistent with Safety.

Assets, $6,667,000. Surplus, $1,675,000.

Pays all Honest Claims in full, without scaling or waiting for an assessment which may be paid or not.

Paid Policy-Holders, $8,300,000.

REGISTERED ACCIDENT TICKETS,

25 CENTS A DAY, $4.50 FOR THIRTY DAYS,

SECURING

$3000 in case of Death, $15 a Week if Disabled.

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES,

$5 to $10 per year for all ordinary occupations.

JAMES G. BATTERSON, President. RODNEY DENNIS, Secretary.
JOHN E. MORRIS, Assistant Secretary.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 178 Broadway; BOSTON, cor. State and Kilby Streets;
CHICAGO, Montauk Block. Agencies at all important points.

DECKER BROTHERS'

MATCHLESS

PIANOS

33 Union Square, N. Y.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

738 & 740 BROADWAY.

Our Carts carry Canopy Tops as steady as any Four Wheel Vehicle.

We GUARANTEE the "Spider" of our Carts free from ANY Horse motion and perfectly easy and satisfactory.

ALL STYLES

LADIES'

VILLAGE CARTS,

with our patented method of Hanging and Shaft Adjustment.

THE BOSTON BUCKBOARD CO.,
155 to 163 East Street, Foot of Wooster
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

RAWSON'S (SELF-ADJUSTING) U.S. ARMY SUSPENSORY BANDAGES.

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed. Support, Relief, Comfort.

AUTOMATICALLY ADJUSTABLE.

DISPLACEMENT IMPOSSIBLE.

The instructed wearing is will not be conscious of its presence.

Lecture on Nervous Tension and Circular mailed free.

Sold by Druggists. H. F. G. RAWSON, Patentee,
Sent by mail safely Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or
REUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

MONEY RAPIDLY MADE

by Beginners in My Markets. Artificial Hatching the only successful way. $1 to $5 per pair for Spring Chickens early months. The only reliable instruction for operating in the "Perfect Hatcher and Poultry Yard." Circulars.

PERFECT HATCHER CO., Elmira, N. Y.

CONSTIPATION.

Send your name and address to P. O. Box 99 New York City, for a circular, sent free, giving full information about the cause and cure of the above complaint.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Hoopy Capsules. All Druggists.

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure is super excellent for ringworm."—Mrs. E. L. D. Meriam, Deer Hill, Mass.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

PLACE IT IN YOUR SAFE.

Invest $8 for a $10,000 Accident Policy with $50 Weekly Indemnity in the United States Mutual Accident Association,

320 & 322 Broadway, N. Y.,

and place it in your safe. Twenty five dollars a year will carry this insurance, and should misfortune overtake you in the way of fatal or disabling injury, there will never be cause to regret your forethought and prudence.

European permits without extra charge

Print Your Own Cards, &c., Press $3 Largest sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $90. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

MICROSCOPES Photographic Outfits for Amateurs, Opera Glasses, Spectacles, Telescopes &c. R. & J. BECK, Manufacturing Opticians, Philadelphia, Pa. Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

DR. PENNER'S ST. VITUS DANCE SPECIFIC. One Bottle always cures. Circular, Fredonia, N. Y.

THE BLACKMAN WHEEL PATENTED.

BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to HOWARD & MORSE, 46 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS. In 186 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial, by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 20c. in stamps. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES

ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by Arst-class dealers the world over. Send 3 cents for circular. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

THAT "KNOWLEDGE IS POWER,"

NEEDS NO DEMONSTRATION, AND HE WHO BY EXPERIENCE KNOWS THE VALUE OF TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT DOES NOT NEED TO BE TOLD THAT HE HAS IT WITHIN HIS POWER TO WARD OFF FEVERS, BILIOUS ATTACKS, HEADACHES, AND ALL THE ILLS ARISING FROM A DISORDERED STOMACH, LIVER, OR BOWELS. A TEASPOONFUL IN A GLASS OF WATER, BEFORE EATING, ACTS LIKE A CHARM, AND NO WISE MAN WILL BE WITHOUT IT. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND BEAD EDGE "CUFFS" ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

"Dr. Benson's Celery Pills cured my mother of severe nervous headache."—J. Miller, State Hill, Pa.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS.

Call on any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER

SAYS OF

DR. TOWNSEND'S REMEDY FOR

Hay-Fever, Asthma, and Catarrh:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1877.

"I believe it will be sure in ninety cases in a hundred."

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1878.

"I am happy to say that your remedy has served me a second season fully as well as the last year."

Pamphlets, with Mr. Beecher's full letters and other testimonials, furnished on application.

Prepared only by

DR. H. H. TOWNSEND, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Price 50 cents and $1.00 per bottle

For sale by CHARLES DENNIS, First Pl. and Court St., Brooklyn, N. Y., and by all Druggists.

THE NEW

SWEET BOUQUET Cigarette.

Delicate, Mild, and Fragrant. A Rarity Whilst for Connoisseurs.

S. JACOBY & CO., Manufacturers, New York.

ALL Seaside, Lake, and Mountain Retreats—Just out With Illustrations and maps. Descriptive and Price-lists and hotel and boarding-house. Free by mail, postpaid. AMERICAN SUMMER RESORT DIRECTORY. Railroad & Co., Pubs., 9 Murray St., N. Y., or Bryant Building

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1387. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?

BRITANNIA HAVING BEEN REBUKED FOR LEAVING HER STARVING CHILDREN AT OUR FRONT DOOR, NOW DROPS THEM SLYLY OVER OUR BACK FENCE.

WASHINGTON.—Special Agent HOWELL, now at Plattsburg, New York, has called the attention of the Treasury Department to the large number of immigrants arriving at Quebec and Montreal, who have neither money nor friends, and are too feeble by reason of age or infirmity to support themselves. Most of this class are paupers who have been assisted in procuring passage, and are ticketed to points in the western part of the United States. Twenty-eight [illegible] who [illegible] Ireland only twenty days before were found helpless and starving in the [illegible] Buffalo [illegible] were committed to the Erie County Almshouse. All of these people [illegible] and Canada.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED BUNNETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $300, one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200, one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED BUNNETT have been published. That published in 1882 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

DEMOCRATIC MISCALCULATION

A GREAT many Democrats are evidently of opinion that if serious misconduct can be proved against Republicans, all Republicans who desire honest administration and progressive legislation will at once join the Democratic party. This is an error akin to that of those who hold that if a party Convention can be induced to proclaim a certain policy in its platform, every voter who knows that policy will immediately support that party without regard to the natural history of platforms, or to the character and conduct of the party, or to the general probabilities of the situation. The sole defect of this view is that in both cases it disregards entirely the nature of parties and of politics. Those who hold the view are very apt to remark with emphasis that politics is the most practical business in the world, forgetting that that undoubted truth makes their reasoning unsound. It is because politics is a very practical business that a voter does not immediately leave his party when another party makes a plausible profession, or when his fellow partisans are taken in fault. The government of the country is carried on by the convenient agency of parties. Theoretically they represent certain general principles of administration, and the policy which naturally proceeds from them. Actually they do something more. By association and common organized action they acquire a living interest to their members, touching their pride, their emulation, their personal feeling, until a party comes to exist almost for itself, and to be sustained by a powerful esprit de corps. Unconsciously it thus changes its nature, and is judged not by its distinctive declarations, nor as an agency for special ends, but as a body whose claims to support rest not upon certain abstract principles, but upon the general character of its membership, and the general tendency of its conduct as proved by experience.

A man, therefore, who has long or always acted with a party because of his confidence in its practical patriotism and wisdom abandons it, not when another party declares its own virtue, but only when, upon a deliberate survey of all the circumstances, he decides either that he can no longer trust his own party to secure the objects which he has at heart, or that some other party will more certainly secure them. To produce this conviction something more is necessary than to point out offenses that have been committed in the name of his party, and to insist that the pledges of better conduct from the opposing party must be accepted as valid. Something more is necessary, also, than to argue that there is but a simple alternative, that a party responsible for offenses must be abandoned, and that the only possible practical course is to vote with the opposition. There are obviously two preliminary questions which must be satisfactorily answered. Do the facts show that the offending party is a hopeless offender, and that the accusing party will do better? Until the voter is persuaded that his party is hopeless as an agency of honest government, he will naturally sustain its national dominance, however sharply he may criticise certain actions, and however resolutely he may refuse to support certain local nominations. And even when he despairs of his own party, although he may throw away his vote, he will certainly not give it to a party which has been at the same time equally on trial with his own, and which has equally failed.

This is the fallacy of the Democratic argument in the present juncture. During the period of Republican executive supremacy the Democratic party has had a majority in the House of Representatives, if not in the Senate, and undisputed control of many great States and cities. Its appeal to the country, therefore, is simply this: "We waive our hideous pro-slavery record before the war, the betrayal of trust by the last Democratic Administration, and our venomous Copperhead attitude during the war, and we say that the Democratic attempt to baffle the peaceful Presidential decision of 1877, our endeavor to starve and paralyze the government during the extra session, our financial charlatanry, and our general conduct in the city of New York and wherever we can control, ought to persuade the country to withdraw its confidence from the Republican party, and give it to us." At present this is the only Democratic cry for 1884, and it is certainly worthy of the rarest of the party for the last generation.

THE UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION.

THE twenty-first Convocation of the University of New York was held last week in Albany, under the auspices of the Regents of the University. The Convocation is a congress of the Regents, the teachers and trustees of the colleges and academies, the normal schools, and academical departments of union schools, in the State, which are "under the visitation" of the Regents, and its object is the promotion of personal acquaintance among the teachers, and the advantage to be derived from a comparison of methods of education. The Convocation was established in 1863, in the midst of the war, and, as was to be anticipated from the general interest which it aroused among the higher schools, it has been of very great service.

The Convocation assembles on Tuesday, usually about the second week in July, and closes on Thursday. During that time it is devoted to the reading of papers and discussions, of which a general conception can be gathered from a summary of those which were delivered at the late meeting. The topics of essays and discussions were: College Education, Academic Instruction, The Study of Literature in Schools, Teaching Science in Academies, Pedagogy, School Sanitation, The Regents' Examinations, and Discussions on Philosophy. Under each of these heads there were specific papers and debates upon them, the papers treating current and open questions, and teeming with valuable practical suggestions.

The Convocation is one of the good services of the Regents to the interests of education in the State of New York. The colleges and academies are generally established and endowed by some religious denomination, and their tendency, therefore, is to separation, isolation, and consequent jealousy and injury to the common cause. The Convocation brings all together, softens differences, and stimulates friendly co-operation and a generous emulation. It is in this way that the title of the charge of the Regents, the University of New York, is in a sense justified. The fiction that the various colleges compose in effect a university is made fact in the union which the Convocation secures, and it is not impossible that the kind of union which the New England colleges have long proposed in the identity of the entrance examination, but which is not yet accomplished, may be ultimately effected in New York by the agency of the Convocation. It is one of the means of elevating and extending the standard of the higher education, of adapting it to the time, of promoting accuracy and thoroughness in teaching and in study, and in cultivating that generous spirit of scholarly fraternity which helps both the teacher and the student by ennobling study.

THE LIQUOR QUESTION IN OHIO.

THE temperance question is a chief issue in the Ohio canvass, and Judge HOADLY has lost no time in stating his position upon it. The constitutionality of the SCOTT law, which provides for a high license, has been affirmed by the courts, and the law is sustained by the Republicans. It is opposed by the liquor interest—which, as an interest, is certainly not that of good order nor of good morals, but of crime, and of great taxation to repress it—and the liquor interest is identified with the Democratic party. Judge HOADLY is evidently aware of the difficulty of his position, and of justifying to the intelligent citizens of his State the opposition of his party to so fair and reasonable a law. The difficulty is only increased by his frank avowal of his approval of a license system. This reduces his plea to an objection to a particular form of license. Judge HOADLY is an able lawyer and an ardent politician. But this situation baffles him; and while his argument has the dexterity of desperation, it can not even confuse an intelligent voter, and to such a one only is it addressed, because no other is affected by argument.

Judge HOADLY states strongly his abhorrence of intemperance, and says that if he believed that alcohol was poison and its use a sin, he should advocate absolute prohibition. But the right principle, he says, for dealing with the liquor traffic is regulation of its abuses, and not prohibition. So far the great multitude of all good citizens would agree with him. Undoubtedly the great general sentiment of the country is that the sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage should be strictly regulated by law. When, therefore, the Judge proceeds to say that to prohibit drinking a glass of such liquor is to infringe upon private right, he ingeniously but palpably shifts his ground, because the proposition in its terms is not to prohibit drinking, but to permit drinking under certain conditions. This shift is an open attempt at sophistry, which of course miscarries. The Judge then lays down what he holds to be the true rule of license, namely, a graduated system proportioned to the amount of the traffic, and to the amount of injury which the traffic may do. "The SCOTT law," he is reported to have said, "makes no distinction, but says that any man for $300 may make as many drunkards as he can." But the Judge had already agreed that there should be a graduated license system, which, therefore, according to his own rhetoric, is to say that, for a sum proportioned to his ability to pay, any man may make as many drunkards as he can. He can not therefore logically object to the high license for granting the very same permission in a more restricted form. If it be wrong for a man who pays $300 for a license to make as many drunkards as he can—which is the implication of his remark—it is quite as wrong for a man who pays $20 for a license to do the same thing.

But what is the object of a license? Why not allow any man to sell intoxicating liquor for a beverage at his pleasure and without a license, as he sells bread and sugar? Because by common consent it is a commodity, like gunpowder, the sale of which may be regulated by law. The regulation must have due reference to the object sought. That object is public order, and as public order is promoted by diminishing drunkenness, to restrict the opportunity of getting drunk is to fulfill the purpose for which licenses are granted. It is a question of expediency. A nominal license is no regulation at all. A high license actually regulates. The only fair alternative, therefore, is plain. It is either unlicensed dram-selling or dram-selling so licensed as to attain the object of licensing. To agree that license is just, but to insist that a $50 license is equitable, while a $300 license is an invasion of personal right, is ludicrous. It is the daring makeshift of political desperation. If this be "new Democracy," it is the same "old mole."

THE NIAGARA FALLS RESERVATION.

A QUESTION has arisen between the Niagara Falls Reservation Commission and the State Engineer. The law provides as follows:

"Before any proceedings shall be had as taken for acquiring the title to any of the said lands, the said Commissioners shall cause to be made a map of the land, by the State Engineer and Surveyor, which they shall determine to take, which shall be certified by a majority of said Commissioners, and filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and in the office of the Clerk of Niagara County."

This law plainly devolves a duty upon the State Engineer at the demand of the Commissioners, and it is made part of his official duty, to be compensated in the usual way, because if the Commission were to pay for making the map, it would be left free to select its own surveyor. The law directs the Commission to do a certain technical act by the aid of a State expert. This is the simple and obvious interpretation.

Another question which has arisen in the board is that of the extent of the survey. Mr. CALVERT VAUX, the eminent landscape architect, has written a letter suggesting the inclusion of a much larger space than has been hitherto contemplated. It is, however, to be considered that the whole project has thus far proceeded upon a general design based upon a survey of Messrs. OLMSTED and GARDINER, and all the estimates have conformed to this proposition. It is scarcely possible that gentlemen so accomplished in their profession could have omitted from their project any land which is essential to the main purpose of the reservation. That purpose is not, as we understand, a reservation of all the adjacent land, which would make a delightful park, but of such only as is indispensable to free the cataract from the obstructions which now threaten to obliterate it as a spectacle of natural sublimity.

Undoubtedly a generous interpretation should be given to this purpose. A certain space is essential, but it is very easy so to extend it as to imperil the whole project by the prospect of enormous expenditure. The office of the present Commission is simply preliminary. It is to cause a survey to be made of the land which it deems proper for the reservation, to ascertain its probable cost, and to report to the Legislature for further action. The subject had been carefully considered by those interested, and upon the general plan of Messrs. OLMSTED and GARDINER their specific statements were made which were very influential in securing the passage of the bill. A radical change of the scheme and a great increase of the expense would seriously prejudice its chances in another Legislature, and while the Commission is composed of gentlemen who would not hesitate to enlarge the scope of the enterprise if upon mature reflection they found it to be necessary properly to attain the object proposed, they would require very conclusive arguments to show them that the original scheme was inadequate and the careful calculations at fault.

THE DEMOCRATIC ENFANT TERRIBLE.

In the lazy season all kinds of personal political speculations flourish luxuriantly, and none of them are more lively than those about the election of Mr. RANDALL as Speaker. The discussion is universal in both parties. The Democrats are radically and sharply divided upon the subject, and the Republicans therefore naturally "take a hand in," and genially encourage the fraternal dissension. The amusing fact in regard to Mr. RANDALL is that he can neither be taken nor left without great damage to the virtuous Democratic party which proposes to turn the rascals out.

His nomination by the Democratic caucus would be a plain declaration that the Democrats abandon the tariff issue in 1884, which would disgust the strenuous Democratic free-traders, who declare that his nomination would be the dissolution of the party. His rejection would startle the country as practically a Democratic free-trade pronunciamento, and the Democratic interest in protected industries would withdraw an important Democratic contingent from the hearty support of the party as a free-trade propaganda. The only reasoning course, that of dropping both Mr. RANDALL and a distinctive free-trade candidate like Mr. CARLISLE, would be a mere dodging of the question, which would disgust the positive men upon both sides of the party, and attract no independent or Republican sympathy or support.

The silent Mr. RANDALL is the enfant terrible of his party. The free-traders, who can neither argue nor bully him down, are now with artless innocence trying to wheedle him. He and his friends the Democratic protectionists look on with a smile. And so, indeed, do the Republicans. "Take him or leave him," they seem to say to the esteemed Democratic brethren; "we shall be satisfied with your decision, and we hope that you will be an item."

A STRANGE STORY.

IT is a phantasmal tale that has been recently daily told in the morning papers, that the legitimate King of France, who has never sat upon a throne, so dying in Austria, and that the great grandson of a man who voted for the death of his cousin, Louis XVI., and the heir of the Revolutions of '93 and '30, is selected as the royal successor, and has been invited to Rome by the Pope.

The practical argument against the execution of King CHARLES I in England was that a King can not be executed. CHARLES STUART might be beheaded, but the King would presently come over or not come over, but wherever he might be, and whatever his fate, he would be always a national menace, because the King can not die. The Comte de Chambord never sat upon his ancestors' throne, and his father never sat upon it, and he has no child. But when he dies, the King remains. The logic of legitimacy is irrevocable. Time and long possession and the will of the nation may practically interfere with the conclusion. But a royal family so breathless and its claim never expires. If the Comte de Paris renounces it for himself, it is at once valid in his heir.

Even the Napoleonic royalty asserts itself at this juncture. Like all others, its origin is mere brute force, but compared with the ancient BOURBON tradition the Napoleonic royalty is parchment and parvenu. NAPOLEON BONAPARTE was an able and unscrupulous man as ever founded a monarchy. But he lived too late. The spirit of the age was hostile, and made his imperialism, when detached from his personality, ridiculous. If France is not really republican, she may cry, "A plague on both your houses." But none the less they can perplex and even overthrow her. Since GAMBETTA there is no commanding and inspiring Republican leader in France, but that very situation would make her steady adherence to the republic more significant.

ANOTHER REMOVAL.

THE folly and bitter injustice of displacing excellent public officers to bestow their positions upon the henchmen of politicians is constantly illustrated. It is a practice which is fast and in spirit is forbidden by public opinion; but the prohibition is constantly evaded, as in the case of Commissioner EVANS. The instances are known only when circumstances make them conspicuous, but the wrong is always the same.

A recent case of the kind is the transformation of the consular agency at Düsseldorf into a consulate, and the dismissal of the consular agent, Mr. LEWIS, an experienced and upright officer, to make a place for a successful personal by political influence. Mr LEWIS has held the position for about twenty years, and has undoubtedly been able to be of great service to his countrymen—a service which he never failed to render. The Americans in Düsseldorf know no legitimate reason for his removal, either official or personal, and we believe that "political reasons" alone were pleaded for the dismissal. The office is one solely of convenience to Americans and Germans, and one of the most indispensable qualifications is experience, familiarity with local laws and customs, and all the knowledge that a prolonged residence alone gives.

In such offices no more preposterous system could be devised than that of arbitrary rotation. As insecure tenure is a premium upon dishonesty, and wanton removal in both a disgrace and an injury to the country that tolerates it. No man, indeed, as we have often said, has a vested right to any office, as no clerk in a business house has a vested right to his place. But the business man who should turn out competent, honest, and experienced clerks and replace them with inexperienced [illegible] upon the plea that none of his clerks had a vested right to his place, would be a fit subject for the writ de lunatico. That, however, is precisely what the government does in turning out a faithful agent like Mr. LEWIS, and it is an abuse which public opinion in this country has happily taken in hand and is steadily correcting.

FOREWARNED.

THE announcement of the ravages of the cholera in Egypt reminds everybody that the terrible plague has periodically swept over the world, and awakens the apprehension that our own country may not be spared. Fortunately the laws of health are so much better comprehended and observed than formerly that there is no reason to anticipate a panic even should the disease reach us.

Communities and individuals know that cure, cleanliness, and a due consideration carry them safely even through such a tainted heat as was recently known in New York; and the same precautions generally and stringently observed will be equally serviceable in dealing with a plague like the cholera. Relaxing food, relaxing and fiery drinks, careless exposure to changes of temperature, a failure to recognize abnormal conditions in every detail of living, are the chief causes of the unusual mortality of a hot summer.

The same negligence, the want of positive reasonable precautions, and of conduct regulated by common-sense, would greatly heighten the fatality of a cholera epidemic. To keep cool is the best exhortation, because it means, to be sensible. Of course, in view of the possibility, a great responsibility devolves upon the Board of Health at every sea-port in the country, and especially upon that in New York. Its powers, which are large, should be exercised with as much vigor as wisdom, and every citizen should cordially co-operate. Forewarned is forearmed, and we are distinctly warned by every fresh report from Egypt.

WISE GENEROSITY.

MR. and Mrs. OSWALD OTTENDORFER have made a splendid gift to the German Hospital in the city, the value of which is greatly enhanced by their wise disposition of it. Mrs OTTENDORFER gives the land and building for a dispensary, which will be amply and thoroughly furnished for the free treatment of every kind of disease among the poor, while Mr. OTTENDORFER gives the land and building for a library and reading-room which he will supply with books and periodicals.

Such gifts allay the jealousy with which great wealth is coming to be regarded. They are public benefactions in the highest sense, and they are noble private monuments. ASTOR and LENOX, COOPER, CORNELL, and VASSAR, PEABODY and SLATER, and other munificent givers, live in the great public institutions which they have founded or aided, and the admiration and gratitude with which they are regarded might well stimulate those who are able to do likewise.

There have been most generous gifts to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, which offers one of the most delightful and instructive resorts not only to the general public, but to skilled workmen. But it is not yet thoroughly independent, and a gift which should secure an ample endowment and an adequate building would be a public benefaction which the public would gratefully remember. Mr. and Mrs. OTTENDORFER have chosen to spend their money in a way which makes everybody glad that they are rich, and makes everybody wish, also, that all rich men and women were of the same disposition. Riches can certainly buy nothing more valuable than such good feeling.

PERSONAL.

No member of the family of the late PETER COOPER has been consulted about the proposed public monument to that philanthropist, although in thousands of places in the metropolis subscription lists have been opened, money-boxes filed, and appeals so constantly placarded. Neither the shape nor location of the monument, nor the best manner of providing the means to erect it, nor the propriety of instituting any such enterprise at all, has been made a subject of consultation with the nearest relatives of Mr. COOPER.

—Not long ago LECKY, the historian, said in a New York friend that his works are modelled on those of BUCKLE, and showed his dog-eared and battered copy of BUCKLE's History of Civilization as an evidence of his study of that author. But LECKY's style certainly does not suggest BUCKLE. His admiration for BUCKLE stopped this side of plagiarism, inspiring him with BUCKLE's spirit rather than loading his memory with BUCKLE's ideas and phrases.

—One of Colonel BOMBA's famous sharp-shooters, who behaved so handsomely in the war for the Union, is now a successful dentist in a New Jersey town. He recalls with mild merriment an order given by the gallant colonel to his hundred men at the second battle of Bull Run, when the field in front of them was teeming with masked batteries of the most formidable description. "Capture those batteries," cried the eager colonel, "and report them as fast as captured." This veteran survivor of the regiment declares that he never experienced the slightest compunction after killing a man, but was, on the other hand, as indifferent, mass fin the joy of the deed, or if he had just shot a muskrat.

—We congratulate Mr HENRY WARTMANN and his colleagues on the quality and size of the loan collection of art works which they have secured in this region for the Louisville Exhibition. The principal picture owners of this city, though often in other instances prompted to impatient refusals, have succumbed to Southern eloquence, and lent the best things in their galleries. Visitors to the Louisville Exhibition may rest assured that the paintings which are to go thither from New York are so good that New Yorkers themselves could think it a treat to study them.

—Mr BRAIN's recent confessions are so interesting that it is to be hoped we shall be treated to many more. One of the least welcome of them is the announcement that notwithstanding his well known protests against the ignorant contemplation of STRAD, "I had yet formed my own precious 'style' by perpetual reading of him and imitation of him."

—A writer in our esteemed contemporary the Critic does unintentional injustice to the management of the Astor Library. "When the directors," he says, "are urged to open its treasures to the public in the evening they reply that no library of reference in the world is open after candle-light," but "it is known that the Bodleian at Oxford is open in part during the evening, and the great Brussels library, and the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris is contemplating a similar step." It was primarily through the directors themselves that, several months ago, the public were informed in the Tribune that these very libraries had made arrangements for opening one or more rooms in the evening; and it was because of the success of this move on the part of those foreign libraries that the directors of the Astor Library were requested to be considering the expediency of a similar course. We are able to add that the directors were correctly reported, and that the project of bringing the treasures of the Astor Library within reach of scholars who can not consult them as day is likely to be realized.

—We have received (and read) a copy of Mr CHARLTON T. LEWIS's poem, called modestly by the author "A Rhymed Medley," which was recited last month at Yale College before the class of 1853, on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of their graduation. The public, to whom Mr LEWIS is known as a scholar, a lexicographer, an editor, not a successful man of affairs, was perhaps unprepared to recognize in this latest effort the inspiration of a true poet as well. But Mr LEWIS has a habit of doing handsomely what he puts his hand to, and we expect to see Yale honor herself one of these days by giving him an LL.D.

—Colonel KEATING, of the Memphis Appeal, who is visiting the city, speaks with enthusiasm of the present condition of the South. "The South," he says, "is the most prosperous section of the country, and this prosperity is due chiefly to the development of its mining interests, and to the intelligence with which, under the new régime, the soil is cultivated. The people are satisfied with the state of the Union, and so far from regretting the abolition of slavery, they would fight rather than see that patriarchal institution established again among them." It refreshes a patriot to hear such sentiments from an ex-Confederate chieftain who represents a big constituency. Colonel KEATING has passed through six or seven yellow fever epidemics in Memphis, and has gathered, in a valuable book, the contributions of his own experience and observation as to the treatment and eradication of that disease.

—The Hon AMOS S. HUBBY sailed for Europe with his family on the 10th inst. He will return in November, but his family expect to make a longer stay.

—On the evening of the day when the news of BAYARD TAYLOR's death reached the city several of his friends found their way to a club-house which the dead journalist and poet had been in the habit of frequenting, each of them expressing in the manner peculiar to himself his sense of his loss. One member showed the strength of his grief by the incoherent jerking of his head and arms, and seemed at times as though his reason was shaking. But another, whom Mr. TAYLOR especially admired his breadth of culture and catholicity of taste, walked the floor in silence, and, after waiting himself in an absent-minded fashion, remarked quietly to the person who sat next to him. "It seems to me that I have seen BAYARD in each one of those chairs as I passed along, and his eyes were full of tears." The pathos with which the words were uttered made a lasting impression upon the listener.

—Senator BAYARD, of Delaware, in a recent conversation, said that one thing surprised him during his last journey through the Southern States, namely, that it was from the ladies of the South that he heard the greatest rejoicing over the abolition of the peculiar institution. The reason for the joy was, he believed, the relief from the care of supervising the purchase of clothing and food for the youthful negroes. In those days the mothers of those dark barbarians attend to the wants of their own children just as the mothers of little white savages do; but in the days of slavery the load was fastened to the back of the planter's wife.

—We notice in the columns of some of our contemporaries the expression of anxiety respecting the final issue of what is expected to be a war of extermination between the new Metropolitan Opera house and the old Academy of Music as soon as the respective forces of Mr ABBEY and Mr MAPLESON are in the field. We are, however, no cause for serious apprehension. The best singers will draw the largest audiences, and the house that secures their services will be the successful and fashionable one, at least for the time being. If, on the same night, NILSSON should sing in the Metropolitan Opera house and PATTI in the Academy, New York would be large enough and rich enough to fill both buildings; and if, on the other hand, the attraction in one building should be a prima donna of genius, and the attraction in the other building a prima donna of mediocrity, as (so in former years has frequently been the case) of no rank at all, the place that has the real singer will draw the crowd. In any event, the musical public, which hereafter has been drawn upon for much long suffering, will be the gainer by the establishment of another head quarters of song. Let the rival managers enter the lists; whichever wins, the musical public is likely to get some of its money's worth at last.

—Mr C KEENAN PATT on l'Italian KEENAN. For some twenty years he was the most popular clergyman in England. Others have been equally loved, or reverenced, or notorious, each in his own circle, none in more than one circle, but no man ever supposed to our large numbers and to so different classes. Dr NEWMAN, Dr MARTINEAU, Dean STANLEY, and, in their degrees, Mr HAWEIS or Mr SPURGEON BURNS (heterogeneous mixture), all represent, or have represented, considerable bodies, Ramsgate's fame has greatly widened since his death; but none of these names express at all the sort of influence which KINGSLEY exerted. He was not a profound or subtle thinker; but his large, genial nature attracted alike the masses who strove to alleviate the sufferings of his last hours, and the gypsies who strewed, and still strew, flowers on his grave.

—A young New Yorker, Mr R. H. HAVEN, has made a successful début in London as an elocutionist. "Among the audience," says Society, "were Mrs. GLADSTONE, Princess CHRISTIAN, and many other celebrities, and the distinguished audience accorded a very cordial greeting to the young American. Mr HAVEN's first recital was a touching American poem entitled 'How he saved St. Michael's,' and this was marked throughout with a grace of style which at once won the sympathy and admiration of the audience. Mr HAVEN is the possessor of a voice of strong emotional power, and as an elocutionist of high culture and commanding self-possession he appears to possess in a large measure what may be termed a popularizing manner."

—The leading art dealers are in a quandary. The supply of fine MILLETS, COROTS, ROUSSEAUS, and DUPRÉS is practically exhausted, and although every important auction sale of pictures in any capital of Europe is visited by themselves or their representatives, the difficulty of procuring such works has well-nigh become an impossibility, while the pictures of them have left an enormous Boston, prices are enormous, and are beginning to drop of their own weight. Mr RACHEMILLER, of this city, paid $30,000 for MILLET's "Gleaners," the highest price ever given by an American for an example of the Fontainebleau school; Mr GEORGE I. SEney, of Brooklyn, drew a check for $20,000 after receiving ROSEAU's "Morning on the Oise." It is not believed [illegible] worthy buyers will inaugurate a "boom" for old [illegible] Mr H. G. MARQUAND recently paid a [illegible] for a [illegible] and Mr MAYER has given $45,000 for [illegible] for $8." But nobody in this [illegible] has yet [illegible] reputation as an expert in old masters, and a fear of being defrauded would prevail should buyers generally turn their attention to such wares. There seems to be a good opening for zeal on the part of one American artists. Four or five of them have had the honor this year of selling their works to the French government, and anybody can tell what the future has in say of their success. And everywhere here observed with much [illegible] the [illegible] ity manifested in every part of the [illegible] with reference [illegible] art [illegible] of [illegible]

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF LOUISIANA.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 434.]

1. View in Sugar District of Louisiana. 2. Stripping and Cutting. 3. Bringing in the Cane. 4. Plantation Quarters. 5. Planting. 6. Sugar Planter's Residence. 7. Young Sugar-Cane.

EXTERIOR.

THE LINCOLN BANK.

The burning of Monell's storage warehouses two or three years ago alarmed all persons who had trusted their own goods and chattels to similar repositories. In very many cases, perhaps the majority, the possessions intrusted to them are of a kind for the loss of which their value or money can not compensate. People who are breaking up their homes generally find it cheapest and most convenient to dispose outright of whatever movables can be replaced, and to store those only which are irreplaceable. The result is that the smallest part of the loss caused by the destruction of such things is that which can be recovered even from a responsible bailee.

This consideration has determined the building of several storage warehouses, of which the object is not to insure compensation for the loss of goods intrusted to them, but to insure the return of the goods themselves on demand, and in as good order as that in which they were received. One of the most interesting of these, and in its scope the most extensive, is the Lincoln Safe Deposit Company, the fine new building of which has lately been opened for business in Forty-second Street, opposite the Grand Central Depot. The Lincoln Bank is a national bank, which has now been in business for about two years, and of which Mr. Thomas L. James, for many years the efficient Postmaster of New York, is the President, having resigned the Postmaster-Generalship, to which he was appointed by Garfield, in order to accept this trust, besides being moved by considerations more familiar, and therefore less ex-cusable to style. The safe deposit company is a separate institution, being organized under the laws of the State, while the bank is organized under the general banking law. But Mr. James is the President of both institutions, and Mr. Van Rensselaer, to whose active interest and supervision both owe much, is the Vice-President, while, with one or two exceptions, the list of trustees of the safe deposit company is the same as that of the directors of the bank, including ex-Mayor Grace, Mr. F. W. Vanderbilt, Mr. Edward Wood, Mr. John W. Harsen, Mr. Frederick Kernochan, Mr. John F. Plummer, Mr. Matthew C. D. Borden, and Chief-Justice Daly.

The banking offices comprise a large suite of rooms on the first floor of the building of the safe deposit company, of which the remainder is given over to the business, or rather the separate businesses, of a storage warehouse and a safe deposit company. The vaults of the safe deposit company are upon the first floor, with a separate entrance and waiting room for ladies at the west end of the building, and a waiting room for men at the rear of the building, both of a large hall-like sky-light of glass and iron, which gives perfect light to the whole of the first floor, although the building is 175 feet in depth by 100 in frontage. The main vault, the steel doors and locks of which are remarkable pieces of mechanism in their kind, is of metal, 25 by 40 feet in area, and is in two stories, of which the upper is intended for the storage of silver, with an additional and equally well protected silver room in the basement. The boilers which supply heat for the building and power for the elevators are under the sidewalk, and so separated from the building as to localize the effect of any possible explosion.

STORAGE VAULTS.

The business of the bank and of the safe deposit company is confined to the first two stories, of which the upper is a "mezzanine." The upper six stories form the storage warehouse. Each is divided by two corridors, lighted at each end into four series of compartments, separated from the corridors and from each other by fire-proof partitions. Although the windows at the ends of the corridors, which are protected by double iron shutters, are the only openings to the front and rear walls, there is no lack of light, and ventilation is looked out for with equal care, in order to guard against mould, each compartment being connected with the outer air by flues built in the thickness of the walls. These stories, which are separated by brick arches turned between iron beams, have no communication with each other except by means of the staircase at the rear, which is in a well cut off from the rest of the building by heavy brick walls, the openings furnished with iron doors. All the machinery of the elevators is also confined to this well. There are two large elevators for goods, to which access is gained from Forty-first Street, each of them capable of carrying to the top of the building a loaded furniture van. The floor of the cellar is blasted out of the solid rock, and covered with concrete. The roof is covered with a heavy layer of cement. The outer walls are three feet thick.

COUNTING-ROOM.

It is hard to imagine, in looking at the effect of these dispositions, how any fire could originate within, except by "spontaneous combustion," and even that unlikely contingency is guarded against by the system of ventilation adopted, or how, if a fire did originate in any compartment, it could be communicated to another, and still more how it could extend beyond the floor on which it arose. It is equally hard to imagine how the building, or any of its contents could be affected by any fire arising outside of it.

While security in the first requisite in such a building, the convenience of customers is only second to it. This is secured by the facilities for examination in all the various departments, and by the general concession to human weakness, in a building of this character, of a passenger elevator in addition to those used for goods, so that depositors can have easy access to the trunk rooms on the topmost floor, as well as to the vaults of the first story, and the silver-rooms of the second.

The reception-rooms of the entrance floor, as well as the rooms of the bank, are fitted with a luxury remarkable [illegible] among the newest commercial palaces of New York. No [illegible] appears except in the movable furniture. The [illegible] are wainscoted with serpentine Knoxville marble in large [illegible] with darker frames of the same material, and [illegible] the [illegible] are hung with glazed tiles, which [illegible] a singularly bright effect, and have the advantage of always being capable of being restored to their pristine freshness with a wet cloth. The mantel-pieces are of a beautiful red Belgian marble, with hands of a black marble from Glens Falls, in this State, a valuable material recently introduced, of a very fine grain and susceptible of high polish.

ENTRANCE TO THE VAULTS.

THE LINCOLN NATIONAL BANK.—From Sketches by Charles Graham and Photographs by Pach.

The exterior of the building is red brick above a rough brown-stone basement, and betrays its unusual purpose as a great field of blank wall, with only two vertical rows of openings, corresponding to the interior corridors.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF LOUISIANA.

I.

Louisiana is no commonly imagined to be one vast marsh, intersected by sluggish water courses, a veritable breeding-place of malaria, where the nights are made hideous by the croaking of frogs, the hissing of reptiles, and the roaring of alligators, while above these swamps, inhabited by a race perpetually trembling with ague, hovers the deadly spectre of yellow fever, grasping in one hand the scythe of destruction, and in the other the yellow flag of quarantine. Consequently there are really many people who deem it an act of courage to descend the Mississippi and land upon the shores of the Mexican Gulf. But those who venture to do this are well rewarded for their pains. They can boast, as well as the pioneer explorers of South or Africa—the Livingstones, Grants, and Du Chaillus—but without intrigue or danger, of having discovered unknown lands—lands near us, nevertheless, and well worthy to attract the attention of tourists from all parts of the world.

Never does the traveller without agreeable surprise traverse Louisiana for the first time and find the land inhabited by a healthy, vigorous, amiable, and industrious people, dwelling in neat and often elegant homes, surrounded by richly cultivated fields, and a semi-tropical vegetation unlike any in the Northern United States or Europe. An infinity of bayous (little water-courses created by the infiltrations of the Mississippi, therefore termed by the Indians Meschacebe—"father of waters") serve as high ways of communication for the population. Nothing could be at once more convenient and more charming than these self moving highways, they convey produce and merchandise cheaply, and their banks, bordered with magnificent sugar or cotton plantations, alternately and almost without transition offer to the traveller's gaze the splendors of the virgin forest, with its lianas and birds of a thousand hues, or the highest manifestations of industrial enterprise and successful modern agriculture.

Therefore Louisiana does not feel the need of railroads to the same degree as the States of the North and East. Steamboats find a facile route for the transportation to market of her rich and varied products. To-day, nevertheless, a number of railroads traverse the State, which will soon have little cause to envy even those countries most favored in regard to means of communication.

In Louisiana, railroads will find a profitable traffic, especially in those natural products which give nutrition to a duplicate industry, at once agricultural and mechanical. Those products consist of tobacco, rice, cotton, and sugar, all of which must pass through sundry manipulations of an industrial character before being delivered for consumption. Sugar especially is rather a manufactured article than an agricultural product, strictly speaking. It constitutes, however, the principal object of agricultural and mechanical industry in Louisiana.

The soil of this State is especially adapted to the cultivation of the sugar-cane. That soil, as everybody knows, has been formed by the slow deposits of the Mississippi, and excepting the Delta of the Nile, there is probably no soil richer, more substantial, or deeper, than the alluvial lands which border the Mexican Gulf at the mouths of the great river.

These lands never suffer from drought—so inimical to the sugar-cane in most tropical countries—inasmuch as they are intersected in every direction by water-courses. As a consequence of these favorable conditions, Louisiana vegetation preserves its freshness and its beauty through the hottest period of the dog-days, and even into the coldest months of winter.

The cold spells, indeed, constitute one of the main disadvantages of sugar culture along the borders of the Mississippi. But it would be erroneous, nevertheless, to suppose that culture inferior in productiveness to any other in the world. Premature cold may, indeed, occasionally diminish the profits of the planter, but what form of agricultural industry, in any part of the world, can assure its undertakers against all chances of loss?

The cultivation of the sugar-cane in Louisiana requires far superior to any which the European planter can hope to obtain from the best root. Twelve tons of sugar to the acre, even if well-manured soil, is considered a good crop to well-manured soil, is considered a good crop to the acre is a result commonly obtained in Louisiana, with no other manure than young bean stalks worked into the soil. The German beet root, richest of all, contains about twelve per cent. of sugar, while the sugar cane contains from four teen to eighteen per cent. of saccharine matter. Moreover, cane growing is infinitely less costly and laborious than beet-root culture, and even the treatment of cane juice be more facile than that of beet-root sap, for it needs only to be boiled in the first vessel at hand, and skimmed like the contents of a soup pot, to yield a saccharine product of highly agreeable taste, and fit for immediate consumption.

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchanged in Honor," "Holiday in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Dysbrowns; or, the Outsiders," etc.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Susanna had now reached a crisis in her singular career. She awaited a mandate from the unseen world as confidently as those who live according to ordinary methods look for the usual deliverance from a dilemma, expecting, maybe, the interference of happier chance, maybe a wiser counsel of friend, or hadly a clearer understanding on their own part. To Stephana no such solution suggested itself. She should be duly enlightened, but neither from within nor without, as far as the actual world and her own individual life were concerned. The voice, inaudible to others, would reach her obsequious ears from afar. The monition would come from no earthly counsellor.

Looking back and recollecting every incident that linked the present with the departure from Italy, she could understand why the last strange summons should have come in the name of Valerian. What no crowd was here! To leave a lie into the light from a darkness to which it had been hid for years, to bring, as she felt she must and should, mother and son together, to sway two mundane natures to her will, and touch their careless spirits to finer issues, here, indeed, was a mission that might well claim her life for a time. But for a time only. Stephana looked far beyond the horizon of an existence that should mean fireside concord and a perfect harmony between Christina, Valerian, and herself. When she looked for reconcilement had been brought about between these two, and her own relations with Valerian determined for once and for all, then, and not till then, should she begin to live indeed.

Her soul exulted and her heart thawed as she contemplated this prospect, for she saw anew how her supreme wishes and most cherished ideals might one by one be realized. Unworldly though she was, she knew well enough that wealth is the key to most doors, and that the would-be regenerator of his age and benefactor of his kind must possess not only Will, but Power, the spirit to stir the law, and the material lever to move the many. She was already rich, Christina was rather still, and their combined fortunes would form a mighty engine indeed, if only Valerian could be taught to work it aright. Sitting down deliberately to count up the aggregate of Christina's fortune and her own, Stephana's eyes grew almost supernaturally bright, and her pale cheeks glowed with exultation. Could she only marry Christian and Valerian to her purpose, not one of the magnificent schemes she had dreamed of need be given up. The accumulated hoardings of the Hermitage Gossip house would at last be appropriated to noble uses. One chapter of their family history, and that a sordid one, would be thus closed forever, and a shining page begun. "I do believe your riches burden you as much as an evil conscience. It is no crime to be born a millionaire!"

Miss Hermitage had often made this remark to Stephana, and in a measure it was true. The enormous and for the most part ill-gotten wealth of her kinsfolk did lie like a heavy weight on Stephana's mind. She could not charge herself with undue softness and luxurious living, and Mr Constantine's money had served the public weal rather than his own interests. But the expensive, the lavish Christina! The wine that sparkled in her crystal, the outlandish cates that furnished her table, the gauds, the frivolities, the mercy-making from day to day! Such a spectacle filled her with a feeling akin to despair. And although she exulterated new in the thought that this had come to an end, and that at least Christina's life would never be child's play any more, she could not yet see how all the rest that she hoped for was to come to pass. How was this hard nature to be made malleable, this iron will to be subdued? But Christina at one with her; Christina moved by an unselfish or single-minded impulse! Then Stephana's own path as a social reformer would be smoothed, and not one of her bright dreams but might be realized.

Two immediate purposes, therefore, at this moment, occupied Stephana's thoughts. She must first reach Christina's conscience, then touch her heart, begin by reconciling her with God, and end by reconciling her with Valerian. All as yet was dark about her path, Christian was feeble, fretful, yielding in small things, but unapproachable on the subject of her private affairs and Valerian. For the first time in her life Stephana failed to fascinate and influence as she willed. That strange power exercised by her over her fellows, and hitherto regarded by all who knew her as irresistible, seemed inert or inadequate. Less the power than the will, indeed, was with Stephana now. She felt strangely alienated from her kinswoman, just when excessive patronage would have served her purpose better. One of those subtle antipathies witnessed among bloodrelations was at work here, and, do what she would, Stephana could not wholly overcome it. Then it came about that her eyes assumed cold, but voice unsympathetic to Christina. The wondrously resonating sweetness and soothingness that had always appeared part of Stephana's self were gone, and a certain pensiveness had overtaken her. The cheerfulness, the animation, the subdued fire of other days were vanished also.

"We are all very dull," said Miss Hermitage one day. "I do wish, Stephana, you would persuade your blind friend Mr Markham to accompany Colette and myself to Italy. Italy always amuses me, and Mr Markham is poor. He would consent, I feel sure."

Stephana suddenly became her old sportive, seductive self. "Dear Christina," she said, seating herself at her cousin's feet, and holding her hands, "will you let me coax you into one thing, a very little thing for you?" Mr Markham will do anything I ask him. But I must be bribed into the asking."

"You want money out of me for what you call your causes," Miss Hermitage replied, smiling ironically. "Well, how much? A hundred pounds?"

"The cost of one of your gala gowns—a few cousins! Is Mr. Markham's company worth no more?" Stephana continued, still gay and genial. "No, cousin, a hundred pounds is so small a sum to you that it is not worth bargaining for. What I want now is no more nor less than five thousand pounds."

"You are dreaming!" Christina retorted, with scorn. "Much good would five thousand pounds do to your hands! Philanthropy does no good. We see this every day. The more rich people give away, the more poor ones there are."

"There are other things to be given away besides soup tickets and flannel petticoats," Stephana replied, in her term caustic and bitter. "Though I do not know that money is worse squandered on these than on strawberries at Christmas," she added, with a playful scorn. "Then you will not give me five thousand pounds?"

"You are dreaming," was the ironical reply. "But to be serious. Write to Mr Markham. Make the proposal to him. I must leave him to Italy."

But Stephana shook her head.

"It is really very unkind of you, Stephana," said Miss Hermitage, fretfully. "You really seem to take pleasure in thwarting me, although you are amiable to every one else. I will write to Constantine, then. He can surely find some one entertaining and clever to go with us to Italy."

"You will not think me unkind when you know everything," Stephana answered. "I can not tell you yet."

"Always dark and mysterious! Well, Colette shall have my trunk packed, and off we will go by ourselves. This humdrum life is killing me."

No more was said. Preparations were made for the Italian journey, and it seemed to Stephana that all chance of the desired reconciliation was over, at least for a time. The travellers progressed to start in a few days, not to return till the spring, and where then would they find Valerian? Not in England, certainly, thought Stephana, and as she pondered on what had just taken place, the first strange phase of the life she had planned by Valerian's side were a look of comfort. Under no large Southern stars and warm azure skies, amid the orange and lemon groves, should their days be spent, shielded from ice and frost and common cares. A hard lot for a while must they lead, yet as she pictured it now her heart bounded. At least there would be sympathy in that home in store for her, the serviceableness born of joy and gratitude. The devotion that breathed through every line of Valerian's letters augured well for the future. He loved her, and she could fully grow a worthy affection in return. But had either of them a right to be dissatisfied with such a compact? The best part of life is made up of thought and deed, not sentiment, held Stephana.

"I have had my romance, my delusion. He insists on having his. There hard were we not henceforth able to leave off dreaming, and live indeed."

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was the eve of Christina's departure. The trunks were packed. The courier had arrived. The paragon of a cicerone found by Mr Constantine was expected every moment. At noon next day the little party, consisting of half a dozen persons, would be on the road.

Miss Hermitage had not been an enterprising since the occurrences of New-Year's Day. She still liked travel for travel's sake. Naveley in the most ordinary circumstance diverted her. A prospect pleased, if for no other reason, because she gazed on it for the first time. The servingmaids who waited on her for a say only were always delightful.

Unaccustomed meals, irrespective of quality, tickled her palate. In fact, like many another, she would have declared life perfect if no day ever resembled its predecessor. The mere prospect of getting away from England, even now, was alone enough to put her in spirits. She was hearing Stephana and Valerian behind, and in Italy there would be no embodiments of Conscience and Retribution. There her history, past and present, could concern no one. In whatever dehiscence place she might halt, she was but one rich woman more, to be welcomed and pampered and bent knee to accordingly. Travel, if it does nothing else for on, at least brings out the amiable aspect of money. Wit, beauty, distinction, all outward lustrous, vanish. Weare mere moneyspenders, but men or women, hardly human beings.

Plottering to herself all the pleasant little nothings that were now to be her daily portion, Miss Hermitage was suddenly discomposed by one of those phenomenal storms that happen from time to time in midwinter, silent and lull cowing close upon thunder and lightning, and a lurid sky and heavy air oppressing on when the logs crackle on the hearth. Miss Hermitage could never relish storms. She liked nature, as well as human kind, to be always in a bright, careless mood. A summer tempest in February seemed, moreover, so abnormal as to prognosticate evil haps. There were the cold white flakes falling and the lightning aglass at the same moment, while the silence of the atmosphere was suddenly turned to sultriness and languor.

"I am suffocating. Will no one relieve me by opening the window?" she cried, fretfully.

Colette and the maids flew to do her behest, but it was beyond their power. A wild elemental drove it through every aperture into the room. It was necessary to make the windows doubly secure. Some dire mischief seemed imminent. Not only the especial properties of buildings in which they lived, but the whole town, seemed threatened by the storm. Wind and thunder, hail and waves—for the sea was in hearing—made up a horrid tumult, whilst the vivid flashes of lightning but heightened the prevailing gloom. It was broad daylight, yet it was night. The dog-days had come in winter.

Miss Hermitage knew no fear, but the storm perturbed her, and gave a sensation of eeriness. She could not shake off the rustic superstitiousness in which she had been brought up, and which ever associated phenomenal occurrences with especial interpositions of the Divine displeasure. This terrific hurricane she knew could but be wreaking all kinds of disaster by land and sea, and why should it happen just when she was on the point of hiding herself from conscience and duty, fleeing from those to love pleasure? Must there not be some visitation here, some portent pointed at herself? The rocking of the solidly built house on its very foundations, the din and clatter within, the elemental hurly-burly without, not frightening her in themselves, inspired a terror of another kind. The roar of the thunder reached her inner ear. The lightning embraced her with spiritual vision. Yes, she must not Stephana was right. She had been wicked toward Valerian. She must make amendment. It was characteristic of Christina that such thoughts should not have troubled her all hour, and that so long as she felt her secret absolutely safe she in no wise concerned herself about the sin. It happened in her case as it often will, that the verdict of others made the wrong doing apparent, and brought conviction to the culprit. She had seen her conduct in its proper light by the aid of Stephana's rebuke. Yet until now, although heartbaited and put out of countenance by good opinions forfeited and daily existence unhinged, the lapse in itself had brought no contrition. The unpleasant consequences lost no sight, she should go on living after the old plan, she said to herself, and the world would be as easy and agreeable as if there were no Valerians in it.

Swiftly and unawares, however, by means on of human reason or interference, but, as she interpreted it, an awful monition of nature, she was troubled with a feeling akin to remorse. She should start for Italy on the morrow all the same she felt no qualms of conscience at quitting Valerian without a word of advice, but she would make some sort of satisfaction to Stephana. All the money she wanted, no Miss Hermitage supposed, for Valerian, she should have, and that ungrudgingly. "Where is Stephana? Will no one bring Stephana to me?"

The query was made in a pettish voice again and again, but without response. The appalling nature of the storm, indeed, and its extraordinary grandeur as a spectacle, were occupying the minds of her household. The men had so far forgotten decorum as to quit their posts and seek some better vantage ground out-of-doors, the women had separated into detachments, the timid huddling themselves in the cellars, the valorous watching the lightning on the sea from the attics. For merely, and under ordinary circumstances, Miss Hermitage would have overlooked such neglect, for she was the easiest task-mistress in the world, always making allowance for her servants when in quest of amusement. The more amusement they got, the better their work was done, she would say. But she was no longer her old self. The shock of that unforgetable New-Year's Day had left her nerveless and feeble, it seemed a personal grievance to be then left alone when every storm gust threatened to force in the windows or bring down the tiles. She was shivering from cold too, for the fire had been allowed to burn low, and the appreciativeness of a quarter of an hour ago was changed to chilliness, while for a few minutes the flashes of lightning were natural in their vividness. Not twice or in lifetime do we behold in like spectacle, the broad span of heaven and the troubled deep up in one vast conflagration, hardly a perceptible interval between blaze and blaze, hardly a lull between peal and peal, horrible it might be of doom as many both on land and sea.

Miss Hermitage rang the bell, but that summons was unnoticed; then she went to the door of the stairs and called Colette, but no clothe came. Something must have happened; she was mild to herself, some one of her household perhaps had received injury from the lightning. How unkind not to come to her!

In this momentary dejection she for the first time realized the usefulness there may be in simple. She was troubled at mind, and she was alone. What if harm had happened to Colette? She should then be alone indeed, and alone for the rest of her days as she was at this moment. How different it might have been! Affection might have been hers, and all kinds of domestic joys. These things were out of her reach now, but she would fain make her peace with Stephana—Stephana, who understood how the debts of conscience are acquitted; Stephana, who seemed to her imagination an embodiment of Justice blindfold with scales in her hand. Could she but satisfy Stephana, she should be able to enjoy herself in Italy as in the old days.

At last Colette did come, the fearful little woman appearing out of breath and out of countenance.

"Why sin you leave me alone?" said Christina, querulously. "You know I am not well. A very little thing upsets me now. And the fire is very low. I am shivering with cold."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

"I have been looking for Stephana," replied Colette, apologetically. Then she put a shawl round her friend's shoulders, and poked the fire with legs.

"What is Stephana doing? Why does she not bear to company at such a time?" asked Christina, in the same fretful voice.

"Stephana can not come," Colette said, mysteriously.

"Then let us go to her. Why should she shut herself up in the midst of a storm like this? There is positive danger for every one of us."

Colette still looked enigmatic. "The storm is abating," she said. "I have told the scouts to come down-stairs and prepare tea. But Stephana can not come."

"Has anything happened to her, or to anybody in the house?" asked Christina, sharply.

"What should happen?" was the reply, accompanied by a shrug of the shoulders. "We must do without her company for a time. That is all."

"I am sure something strange has come to pass. Am I not to know?"

"Strange things are always coming to pass where Stephana is concerned," Colette made reply, with an odd smile. "Let us take our tea coolly, and watch the storm-clouds divide. See the lightning. How it diminishes!"

But Miss Hermitage would not be quieted. She would go to Stephana, she said. Something had happened of which Colette dared not tell!

"Indeed and indeed no harm has come to her," Colette replied. Then finding that the other was determined to see for herself, she followed her upstairs.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ATLANTIC CITY.

WHAT Long Branch is to New York, Atlantic City is to Philadelphia, but while the two places have many features in common, their local belongings are as distinctive as those of the great cities of which they are recreative resorts. In summer Long Branch is cosmopolitan, and Atlantic City is Philadelphian; in winter the former is deserted, and the latter becomes a sanitarium, attracting invalids from all parts of the country.

Atlantic City is sixty-five miles from Philadelphia, or an hour and a half's run by train. It covers the greater part of an island nine miles long and from a hundred yards to a mile wide, and is twenty-eight years old. Its streets and avenues are broad, straight, planted with great numbers of well-grown shade trees, and bordered with the summer houses of city men. Many of the cottages are architectural gems, and all are attractive and pretty. Many of the hotels, of which there are a dozen first-class, and a hundred more of various degrees of excellence, front on the ocean, though set well back from the beach. In front of them, and offering an unobstructed view of the beach, the harbors, and the limitless expanse of ocean stretching away to its far horizon, is the board walk and the great pier reaching far out over the waters. This is the promenade, the centre of life and interest, everybody visits the pier for a few breaths of the very purest and freshest ocean air. Here congregate the photographers, the sellers of "curios" to be taken with your lady, and keep the picture as a souvenir, and the itinerant venders of wines, cigars, tea, edibles, and trinkets, the negro minstrels, and the best-known fungo man. As a study of some of the most unique phases of human character, a stroll down the board walk at Atlantic City is worth a year of ordinary life. Its minute variety presents in from monotony, and never does it present the same aspect two days in succession.

Bathing here attains a popularity unknown to more northern resorts, the near approach of the Gulf Stream to this point so tempers the temperature of the water to a delightful degree, and taking from it the bitter chill from which so many would-be bathers shrink, that life at Atlantic City is never wholly gay. The best hops are decorous affairs, enjoyed principally by the children, who monopolize the floor during the early portion of the evening, and there is none of the bubbling hilarity produced by the morning air of mountain resorts, or the sense of freedom conveyed by the remoteness of a Mount Desert. Here the sea air produces a drowsiness, a desire for quiet and complete rest, an inclination to sit on the piazza and listen to the music rather than to go inside and dance, and a preference for a quiet stroll on the beach in congenial company, or with a meditative cigar over more active forms of exercise. In winter, when the majority of the guests are invalids, any but the mildest forms of dissipation are of course out of the question, and it is only during Lent, when the more extravagant gayeties of the rest of the world are temporarily suspended, that Atlantic City becomes the scene of genuine fun and frolic. During the past two seasons it has been the generally acknowledged correct thing among the most exclusively fashionable circles of New York and Philadelphia to form Lenten parties for Atlantic City. Upon the advent of Lent some good-natured married lady of unimpeachable social standing organizes a party of from a dozen to twenty young people, and offers to chaperon them to Atlantic City. They go for a week or ten days, often staying longer, and while they are there the horrible no-meat hotels ring with the sounds of music, dancing, and merry laughter. The more sober-minded invalids gaze with a mild surprise not unmixed with pleasure at these jolly parties, and by force of example become more sociable and inclined to forget their invalidism. The languor of summer does not exist in the brisk and breezes of early spring which sing and whistle around the cottage gables and through the bare trees, and instead of sauntering on the beach or lounging on the piazza it inspires the members of these Lenten parties with longings for the vigorous exercise of brisk walks and long horseback rides. From these they return with such glowing cheeks, sparkling eyes, and keen appetites that the mere sight of them is a better advertisement of Atlantic City are as a tonic than all the books that could be written.

On account of the proximity of the Gulf Stream already mentioned, the configuration of its coast, and the absence of adjacent high hills or mountain ranges, Atlantic city enjoys a peculiarly equable climate. Its winters are as mild as those of Charleston, and its summers are never as warm as those of New York or Boston. Last year the hottest average of temperature for a winter month was 34°, and during the summer the highest average for a month was 72°.

SALMON-FISHING.

VOLUMES have been devoted to salmon-fishing without exhausting its capabilities, for the fisherman is an unselfish being who likes to inspire his readers with an equal enthusiasm in his favorite and attractive pastime. The time, indeed, is fast approaching when the only solace to the would-be angler will be to read of the exploits of those who came before him. The days of the salmon, like those of all other game—fish, bird, or beast—are numbered.

The variety referred to in this article is the silver or migratory salmon, which, on the breaking up of the ice in the rivers in the spring, leaves the sea, and proceeds toward the head waters of the streams to deposit its spawn. Comparatively but a few years since, every river debouching into the Atlantic north of the forty-first parallel was plentifully stocked with this noble fish. Observers to the last were on the year 1875 have recorded the fact that in certain Canadian streams the salmon swarmed so thickly that "they were thrown out of the water with the shovel, and even by the hand." Through the destructiveness and cupidity of man the invariable result has followed. And it not been for the efforts of the Canadian government, a fresh-look procession of all streams flowing through the crown lands, the salmon would have been exterminated. These streams are leased for five years, and are divided into net holdings and fly holdings. The authorities exercise a despotic and absolute control, the result of which is seen in an increase of fifty per cent in the annual take of fish. And the United States government has permitted to assume a similar supervision, hopefully enforced, those of our rivers which formerly abounded in salmon would out-to-day have been reduced to utter barrenness. A case in point is found in the Columbia River in Oregon. On its banks vast canneries for tinning salmon have been erected. Every device which ingenuity can suggest has been employed to capture the fish on their annual migration to the headwaters. Wheels are erected at certain falls or steep rapids; the fish are drawn into these, and whirled upward into pools, whence they are dipped with nets. These of under size, or unfit for the purposes of canning, are cast returned to the water, but are allowed to rot on the banks of the river. One would fancy that common prudence would suggest a less profligate course.

So soon as the fish leave the rivers the salmon commence to ascend them. Their progress is slow, as they await the periodic occurrence of floods to run high water. In the they go only at intervals, resting for considerable periods at certain points. In the autumn they arrive at the spawning grounds. With the appearance of ice they return to the sea. The fish so then to-to present a very different appearance from that during their ascent. When on the way to the head waters of the stream the male fish are made conspicuous by the lengthening of the under jaw into a curving hook. This the is one as a weapon in the combats which take place on the breeding grounds.

The salmon sometimes attains a weight of eighty pounds. This is exceptional. Those ordinarily taken with the fly vary between eight and twenty-five pounds. The peculiar richness of the flesh of the salmon is owing to the fatty oils found between the flakes of the flesh. These unless the fish be preserved in ice within twelve hours of their capture become rancid.

The open season for salmon fishing is between the 1st of March and the 1st of August. For fly fishing the season is extended to the 1st of September. The fish are at their acme of perfection about the first week in June. This is seen in the color of their flesh, which is of a deeper red, and correspondingly saturated with curd and albuminous fat.

Those who desire to read Canadian salmon rivers or portions of the same must make application to the Superintendent of Fisheries. The northern shore of the St Lawrence is divided into districts. The best and most important rivers lie below the mouth of the Saguenay. They are the St Fareens, Mississquash, the Grande and Petite Bergeronnes, the Boucaumas, Portneuf, Blanche, the Papinachoix, Outardes, Manicouagan, St Austin, Manicou, the Godbout, Trinity, Pentecost, Ste Marguerite, the Moisie, Trout, St. John's, the Mingan, the Natashquan, the Musquarro, and the Kegomenais.

Among these streams every variety of ground is met with: dense woods to the very edge of the stream; steep and rugged banks lined with cumbrous bowlders, among which the angler, when he has struck a fish, must stumble and dodge as he follows down stream. On these wilder rivers only the most active and expert fisherman can succeed. Again, there are streams on which the canoe can be used, when the fishing is within the reach of the most plethoric and short-winded. On them all the black fly reigns supreme, not even princes are exempt from their attacks. To the hardest or easiest earned pleasure there is always a drawback. The black fly is the Nemesis which renders sport on the Canadian rivers a positive martyrdom. In this particular Canada outshines Scotland and Norway to far more enjoyable. We have there the same wild and beautiful scenery, the pure and exhilarating air, without the attacks of annoying insects.

Many Americans have from time to time rented some one or other of these Canadian streams. It is a pleasure reserved only for men of fortune. The first outlay for rental is considerable, as no nothing of expenses of travel, outfit, and pay of guides. The last are indispensable.

Fly fishing for salmon with the modern and latest gear is not excelled by any sport with rod or gun. It carries one into the wildest and most picturesque scenery of the continent. Buried in the wilderness of the North, on the edge of a roaring, rushing stream, one can here, alone, in the excitement of playing a vigorous salmon, forget all the petty miseries and trials of life. Indeed, at such a moment there is not much time for any thought. If the fish is hooked in some quiet pool near a gravelly beach, the sting of the barb turns him down-stream. The fisherman, if he hopes to land him, must follow where he is led, now dashing on the edge of a precipitous bank, stumbling over the debris of fallen trees, or sliding and slipping amid make and bowlders. A momentary rest is insured when the fish ducks under some huge rock in mid-stream. It is an agreeable and welcome omen when one gets a glimpse of him throwing his tail in the air—a sign of growing weakness. After all the labor and fatigue, and the maddening attacks of the black fly, one's cup of bitterness is full when, just as he is about to be gaffed, he gives a last vigorous struggle, and darts away, carrying the fly with him.

The wise man who goes salmon-fishing will choose a river where he can fish from a canoe. There he works at his ease. The labor is assumed by the Indian guide, and the angler follows the doublings of the fish without hurting his shins against every obstruction in his path. Were it not for the black flies, nothing could approach this most perfect form of enjoyment.

The effort has been made to restock certain rivers of the United States with the salmon. The experiment has been thoroughly tested in the Merrimac, the Connecticut, and the Hudson rivers. Millions of the fry have been liberated in the head-waters of these streams. The effort has resulted in failure, and all continue so to end until a new race of people, with more intelligence than those now in possession, shall inhabit the land. There is no reason why salmon should not be artificially hatched, and grow to maturity. The experiment already tried would have culminated in entire success but for one reason. It is the practice of persons, fishermen and others, living on our bays and rivers, to manure the land with fish. Variety or size is of no consequence, quantity alone is sought for. Now these people provide themselves with nets made of mosquito netting. These are several inches in length to the warm days of early spring schools of small fry seek the shallow coves and eddies to bask and play in the sun. The fine meshed seines are run around these, and all are captured, even to specimens a half-inch to size. These swarms of small fry are composed of every species of fish—striped bass, blue-fish, sand-fish, all kinds of the young of edible fish. Indiscriminately all are then spread on the land for manure. It is probable, indeed a moral certainty, that millions of the young salmon placed in the rivers above mentioned were caught in these seines and used as a fertilizer. The same processes are going on on the shores of Long Island. The writer in the spring of [illegible] was has seen lots of the different gangs of men engaged in netting these young fish. Carmath has often led him to examine the catches, and he has seen millions of the young of our best food fishes thrown upon the land as manure. "What are you going to do about it?"

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

CHOLERA is raging in China as well as in Egypt. Somebody has pointed out that the disease appears every seventeenth year, and the question whether it will skip New York on this round has awakened some interest. It is the opinion of Professor Leeuwin that there need be no fear of a cholera epidemic in this city, since the sanitary conditions here are better than ever before.

The South American cable has opened a new source of reports of revolutions for the daily press. It is a dull day in the Southern hemisphere when nothing revolutionary occurs. Cuba and Hayti are dwindling into insignificance.

It is a curious fact that after the many failures of attempts made by aeronauts to cross the English Channel in balloons, a man who ascended from a town in Belgium recently was blown over the water, and descending upon the first land he saw, found himself in England.

The victim of a recent shooting affray in New Orleans was, according to a dispatch from that city, "a prominent city official and leading freeholder of the Third Ward."

At a recent meeting in connection with the Fisheries Exhibition in London Minister Lowell told the assemblage that one important was the calling of fishermen considered in the past that in the State House at Boston a model of a cod fish was hung up over the Speaker's chair as a public recognition thereof. This explanation the puts the theory that the emblem was raised as a recognition of the Bunker Hill supremacy. The Minister from Greece might have outdone Mr. Lowell had he been so disposed, for he could have told how in ancient Greece, and in its city of which Boston chooses to be the antitype, the fish was the emblem of things held sacred, and how much a au mode of the coincidence that each letter in the word ἰχθύς was the initial letter of the name of a being possessing the attributes of divinity.

Under a law of New Jersey a woman was recently arrested as "a common scold," and put under bonds to appear for trial when summoned. The law has been practically a dead letter for many years, but the women in question being an uncommon scold, the temptation to revive the statute was too great to be resisted.

Attention is called to the fact that no weather prophet was ever sun struck. Where there is sun stroke there must be haste.

Writing of American types, a German physiologist, Dr Snellcord, says the Americans have adopted many traits from the Jews, e. g., "from the Indians, who have as much of the Jew in their physiognomy that among all the hypotheses concerning the origin of the Indians, not one is more intentionally adhered to or is founded with more acuteness and subtlety than that which assumes the lost ten tribes of Israel to have been the original ancestors of the Indians." Dr Snellcord believes that the resemblance between the Jewish and the Indian types, and between the manners, religious views, and customs of the two races, is so significant as the analogies that are said to exist between many Hebrew words and words found in the Indian tongues.

There is talk of digging cyclone pits in the Southwest, into which the inhabitants may descend when they hear the coming of a storm. With fleet mustangs which they could ascend when they heard the rushing of the waters, they would be fairly protected.

It seems to have been decided that when an accommodating housewife lends to a neighbor from her stores of baking powder, ginger, tea, or coffee she may have no redress if the borrower refuses to repay or to become a lender. In Georgia an old lady brought suit for eight dollars, her valuation of coffee lent at various times to the capitol to a neighbor. The suit was tried before a justice, and his honor decided in favor of the defendant between.

The Marquis de Lenville in producing something of a sensation in Paris as an "apostle" of healthful beefsteak. It is understood that he came from England. Where he came from when he arrived in England no one has told. He holds that every article of food except his chosen dish penalizes fermentation in the stomach and dulls sense in the intellect, and destroys noble aspirations. He has vegetarian tendencies, but dwells all of them on the ground that he would have to subsist to the deteriorating influences of food other than broiled beefsteak if he were to accept. Where it is explicitly set forth that there is to be no dining, he made his acceptance, and is counted as a great acquisition.

A farmer in Georgia, whose field of a hundred acres of oats was destroyed by a recent flood finds that he is nevertheless a gainer. The mud has enhanced the value of the land by more than the value the crop of oats would have reached, and he is confident of still raising a large crop of corn on the land this season.

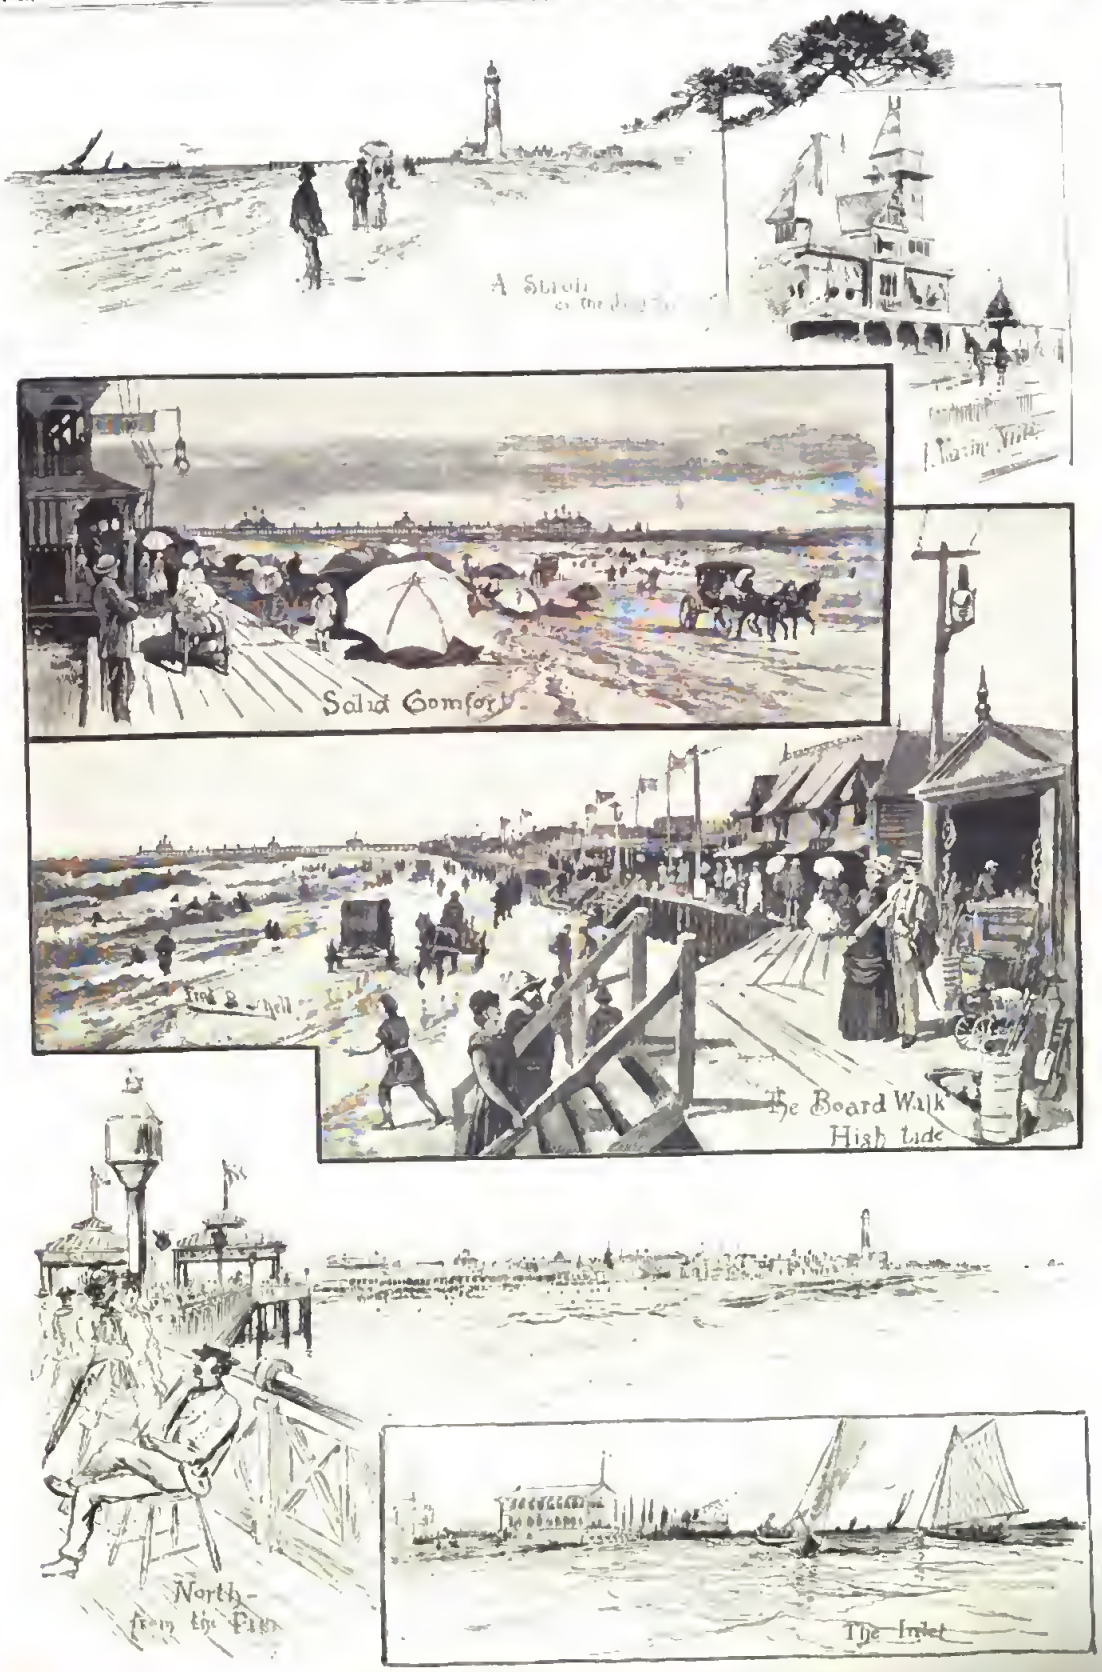
Tahoma, the name suggested for the new State which it is proposed to make out of a part of Washington Territory, is an Indian word, and signifies "almost to heaven." It wouldn't be a bad name for a French flat.

There are two post-offices a mile apart near the boundary between Canada and Michigan which can not communicate with each other by mail in less than about a week. When a letter is mailed in Sault Ste Marie, Michigan, addressed to a person living just across the border, it goes to Detroit in the United States mail, crosses to Windsor, and is taken back over Canadian routes to within a mile of where it was mailed a week or ten days previously.

In a recent number of one of the London comic papers was an amusing pictorial illustration of what might come to pass in the event of the success of the Channel Tunnel scheme. A likeness of the British lion looking seaward toward the continent appeared in the conformation of the headland at Dover. Out upon the Channel, on tiptoe astride a gun-boat, was John Bull in naval uniform, keeping watch through a spy-glass lest an enemy should surprise him. The picture showed the tunnel beneath the water, and the ungranded avenue of approach was fairly choked with enemies in the shape of representatives of the countries of Europe and Asia. The [illegible] bellicerent had just emerged from the mouth of the tunnel, whose [illegible] was waving a banner with "Cock-a-doodle-doo" inscribed on it, and [illegible] ing a war-dance. Instead of being the [illegible] of a dreadful possibility, the [illegible] will [illegible] only to remind the English people of [illegible] dream, the joint committee of the House of Lords and House of Commons having voted down the tunnel scheme by a decisive majority. On the day on which this note was taken however, a bill was introduced in the French Chamber of Deputies providing for the building of a railroad bridge from France to England. To peril arising from the success of such a scheme might not be then that which the completion of a tunnel would bring, but the danger being always present [illegible] water would be somewhat less horrifying [illegible] templates.

Digitized by Google

SALMON FISHING IN CANADIAN WATERS.—DRAWN BY A. B. FROST.—[SEE PAGE 436.]



SKETCHES IN ATLANTIC CITY.—Drawn by F. B. Schell.—[See Page 485.]

TWO SMILES.

I never knew delight until that day
When, in I crossed a dusty city park,
Thought-weary, tortured by foreboding dark,
A child smiled on me from its happy play.

Thenceforward all my fancies were intent
On baby blisses, songs, and childish lore;
And to my days, no less and not before,
The pensiveness of childhood's mirth was lent.

And when old questions for resolvement pressed,
And on my brow drew many an anxious line,
A budding thought looked out to answer mine
From wide young eyes with doubt yet unpossessed.

Her purity enfold me like a prayer;
And white old poets sang for us anew,
Into my chastened thought the maiden grew
As a rose opens in rain-freshened air.

The years filled up a branch unknown before;
Till one day made us one, in truth and heart.
We never dreamed that we had been apart,
Until we knew that we should part no more.

No mom to part! and yet erewhile she lay,
And smiled with lips unruffled by a breath;
And looking on the wan chill smile of death,
I thought of her first smile that far-off day.

Sunnyside, Bonaga.

THE OBELISK-CRAB INSCRIPTIONS.*

When Commander Gorringe removed the Obelisk from Alexandria to New York he brought with it two mutilated bronzes in form of crabs, which he found under two corners of the shaft. On the gigantic claw of one there were two inscriptions, one in Greek, the other in Latin. These inscriptions are among the most interesting and important which have been discovered. The Commander retained the crabs in his own possession while preparing for publication a volume on obelisks, and caused fine crabs to be cast in bronze, fac-similes of the originals, to stand in the Central Park at the four corners of the Obelisk, in somewhat the same position occupied by the originals which actually supported the great stone. While the crabs were in his possession, on the 13th of January, 1881, a meeting of the American Numismatic and Archæological Society was held at the Commander's rooms, at which Mr G. L. Feardent read a paper on the crabs, which the society published in pamphlet. From his expression, "in examining these interesting fragments of bronze, etc.," it appears that the crabs were there examined, and it is stated that Mr Foord and Mr. Phillips, as well as the Commander and Mr. Feardent, discussed them. Mr. Feardent professed to give critical readings of the inscriptions, with translations and explanations. The meeting and the pamphlet are important, as from this is to be traced a series of blunders which, uncorrected, would be for from creditable to the scholarship of the city of New York. Commander Gorringe does not profess to be an archæologist, and with the proverbial confidence of the sailor seems to have trusted the archæology of his book to Mr Feardent. He copied the pretended readings of the inscriptions several times in his costly publication, and, worse than all, they were engraved with the words, "Reproduced from the original," on the new crabs in the Park, and thus a series of errors in abominable Greek and untrue Latin have been perpetuated in bronze on the great monument.

When it became possible for scholars to see the original inscriptions deposited in the Museum of Art, the attention of President Barnard, of Columbia College, was called to the evident errors in the readings which had been published, and at his request Professor Augustus C. Merriam made a careful study of the originals. The result in the monograph now published. If the original errors were disgraceful to New York, this paper amply retrieves the disgrace. It is the thorough work of an accomplished and conscientious scholar, and indicates a vast extent of research and acute discrimination. Professor Merriam has literally exhausted the subject. He not only restores the lost portions of the inscriptions, but finds in other published inscriptions errors which these restorations enable him to correct, and aided by the few allusions to one man, the Prefect Barbarius, in published inscriptions, he construes a considerable portion of the life of a Roman hitherto unknown. Not only to scholars, but to all intelligent readers, this paper will prove of extraordinary interest. The uninformed reader will judge from it of the grasp on hidden things in history which comes from scholarship like that of Professor Merriam.

But it is not alone with old hidden things that Professor Merriam has dealt. He was not content with correcting the blunders in the Gorringe-Feardent readings, but he traced these readings to their genuine origin, to which no allusion is made in the book of Commander Gorringe or the pamphlet of the Numismatic Society. It appears that some years ago, when the British Obelisk was removed, these inscriptions were exposed to view, and a Greek in Alexandria, Mr Nerutsos, published in an obscure newspaper his readings. These are the readings which were given to the Numismatic society as new, although, with the original inscriptions before them, they might here been able to detect the manifest errors which Nerutsos in a hasty view had made.

The publication of this valuable monograph, with its accompanying fac-simile engravings, will enable the Park Commission to make the proper corrections on the Obelisk crabs. The lesson to be learned is that with such institutions as Columbia College in this city, and with hundreds of able scholars besides her accomplished professors, it is desirable, before engraving Greek and Latin inscriptions on public monuments, to consult some of these competent authorities. There is not a Sophomore in Columbia who would have been guilty of the blunder of cutting into two a good Greek word, and thus producing the atrocious collocation in the Gorringe-Feardent publications, ΑΡΧΙΤΕΚΤΩΝ ΟΥΝΤΟΣ, with its accompanying translation, "Being architect." For this Nerutsos is not responsible.

* The Greek and Latin Inscriptions on the Obelisk Crab in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. A Monograph by Addison C. Merriam, Ph. D., Adjunct Professor of Greek in Columbia College. New York: Harper & Brothers.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Two Rivers of the Native," "Far from the Madding Crowd," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER X.

A considerable period of inaction followed among all concerned.

Nothing tended to dissipate the obscurity which veiled the life of the Baron. The position he occupied in the minds of the country folk around was one which combined the mysteriousness of a legendary character with the unobtrusive deeds of a modern gentleman. To this day whoever takes the trouble to go down to Stickleford and make inquiries will find existing there almost a superstitious feeling for the measly, melancholy stranger who resided in the Lodge some forty years ago.

Whence he came, a hither he was going, were alike unknown. It was said that his mother had been an English lady of noble family who had married a foreigner not embraced in its circles where men pile up "the cankered heaps of strange achieved gold;" that he had been born and educated in England, taken abroad, and so on. But the facts of a life in such cases are of little account beside the aspect of a life; and hence, though doubtless the years of his existence contained their share of trite and homely circumstance, the curtain which masked all this was never lifted to gratify such a theatre of spectators as those at Stickleford. Therein lay his charm. His life was a vignette, of which the central strokes only were drawn with any distinctness, the environment shading away to a blank.

He might have been said to resemble that solitary bird the heron. The still, lonely stream was his frequent haunt; an its banks he would stand for hours with his rod, hauling into the water, beholding the tawny lobsters with the eye of a philosopher, and seeming to say, "Bite or don't bite—it's all the same to me." He was often mistaken for a ghost by children, and for a pollard willow by men, when, on their way home in the dusk, they saw him motionless by some rushy bank, unobservant of the decline of day.

Why did he come to fish at Stickleford? That was never explained. As far as was known he had no relatives near; the fishing there was not exceptionally good; the society therabout was decidedly meagre. That he had committed some folly or hasty act, that he had been wrongfully accused of some crime, thus rendering his seclusion from the world desirable for a while, appeared very well with his frequent melancholy. Not much as he was, there he lived, well supplied with fishing tackle, and tenant of a furnished house, just suited to the requirements of such an eccentric being as he.

Margery's father, having privately ascertained that she was living with her grandmother, and getting into an hours, refrained from communicating with her, in the hope of seeing her contrite at his door. It had, of course, become known about Stickleford that at the last moment Margery refused to wed Haverard, by absenting herself from the house. Jim was pained, yet not pained much, for it was said that he ought not to have been so eager for a woman who had shown no anxiety for him.

And where was Jim himself? It must not be supposed that that tactician had all this while withdrawn from mortal eye to tear his hair in silent belligeration and despair. He had, in truth, merely retired up the lonesome defile between the downs to his smouldering kiln, and the ancient ramparts above it, and there, after his first hours of natural discomposure, he quickly waited for overtures from the possibly repentant Margery. But no overtures arrived, and then he meditated anew on the absorbing problem of her skittishness, and how to set about another campaign for her conquest, notwithstanding his late disastrous failure. Why had he failed? To what was her strange conduct owing? That was the thing which puzzled him.

He had made no advance in solving the riddle when, one morning, a stranger appeared on the down above him, looking as if he had lost his way. The man had a good deal of black hair below his felt hat, and carried under his arm a case containing a musical instrument. Descending to where Jim stood, he asked if there was not a short-cut across that way to Budmouth.

"Well, no, there is," said Jim. "But 'tis an enormous distance for ye."

"Oh yes," replied the musician. "I walk to intercept the mirror on the highway."

The nearest way was precisely in the direction of Rook's Gate, where Margery, as Jim knew, was staying. Having some time to spare, Jim was strongly impelled to make a kind act to the lost musician a pretext for taking observations in that neighborhood, and telling his acquaintance that he was going the same way, he started without further ado.

They skirted the long length of meads, and in due time arrived at the back of Rook's Gate, where the path joined the high-road. A hedge divided the public way from the cottage garden. Jim drew up at this point and said, "Your road is straight on, I turn back here."

But the musician was standing fixed, as if in great perplexity. Thrusting his hand into his locust of black hair, he murmured, "Surely it is the same—surely!"

Jim, following the direction of his neighbor's eyes, found them to be fixed on a figure till that moment hidden from himself—Margery Tucker—who was crossing the garden to an opposite gate with a little cheese in her arms, her head thrown back, and her face quite exposed.

"What of her?" said Jim.

"Two months ago I beheld one of the band at the Yeomanry Ball given by Lord Blakemore. I saw this young lady dancing the polka there in robes of gauze and lace. Now I see her carry a cheese!"

"Never!" said Jim, mercifully.

"But I do not mistake. I saw it as an"

Jim ridiculed the idea; the bandsman protested, and was about to lose his temper, when Jim gave in with the good nature of a person who can afford to despise opinions; and the musician went his way.

As he dwindled out of sight Jim began to think more carefully over what he had said. The young man's thoughts grew quite to an excitement, for there came into his mind the Baron's extraordinary kindness in regard to furniture, hitherto accounted for by the assumption that the nobleman had taken a fancy to him. Could it be, among all the amazing things of life, that the Baron was at the bottom of this mischief, and that he had amused himself by taking Margery to a ball?

Doubts and suspicions which distract some lovers to imbecility only served to bring out Jim's great qualities. Where he trusted he was the most trusting fellow in the world; where he doubted he could be guilty of the shrewd strategy. Once suspicious, he became one of those subtle, watchful characters who, without integrity, make good thieves; with a little, good jobbers; and a great deal, master politicians. Jim was roused, and he considered what to do.

Retracing his steps, he peeped again. She had gone in, but she would soon re-appear, for it could be seen that she was carrying little new cheeses one by one to a spring cart and horse tethered outside the gate—her grandmother, though not a regular dairy woman, still managing a few cows by means of a man and maid. With the lightness of a cat Jim crept round to the gate, took a piece of chalk from his pocket, and wrote upon the boarding "The Baron." Then he retreated to the other side of the garden where he had just watched Margery.

In due time she emerged with another little cheese, came on to the garden door, and glanced upon the chalked words which confronted her. She started, the cheese rolled from her arms to the ground, and broke into pieces like a pudding.

She looked fearfully round, her face burning like scarlet, and sewing nobody, stooped to pick up the flavial lumps. Jim, with a pale face, departed as invisibly as he had come. He had proved the bandsman's tale to be true. On his way back he formed a resolution. It was to board the lion in his den—to call on the Baron.

Meanwhile Margery had recovered her equanimity, and gathered up the broken cheese. But she could by no means account for the handwriting. Jim was just the sort of fellow to play her such a trick at ordinary times, but she imagined him to be far too incensed against her to do it now, and she suddenly wondered if it were any sort of signal from the Baron himself.

Of him she had lately heard nothing. If ever mysterious persuaded a lily it pervaded hers at Rook's Gate; and she had begun to despair of any happy change. But it is precisely when the social atmosphere seems stagnant that great events are nearing. Margery's quiet was broken first, as we have seen, by a slight start, only sufficient to make her drop a cheese; and then by a more serious matter.

She was inside the same garden one day when she heard two watermen talking without. The conversation was to the effect that the strange gentleman who had taken Mount Lodge for the season was seriously ill.

"How ill?" cried Margery through the hedge, which screened her from recognition.

"Bad abed," said one of the watermen.

"Inflammation of the lungs," said the other.

"Got wet, fishing," the first chimed in.

Margery could gather no more. An ideal admiration rather than any positive passion existed in her breast for the Baron: she had of late seen too little of him to allow any incipient views of him as a lover to grow to formidable dimensions. It was an extremely pure and romantic feeling, delicate as an ornament, capable of quickening to an active principle, or dying to "a painless sympathy," as the case might be.

This news of his illness, coupled with the mysterious shabbing on the gate, troubled her, and revived his image much. She took to walking up and down the garden paths, looking into the hearts of flowers, and not thinking what they were. His last request had been that she was not to go to him if he should send for her, and now she asked herself was the noise on the gate a hint to enable her to go without infringing the letter of her promise? Thus unexpectedly had Jim's manœuvre operated.

Two days passed. All she could hear of the Baron were the same words, "Bad abed," till one afternoon, after a gallop of the physician to the Lodge, the tidings spread like lightning that the Baron was dying.

Margery distressed herself with the question whether she might be permitted to visit him and say her prayers at his bedside, but she feared to venture, and thus eight-and-forty hours slipped away, and the Baron still lived. Despite her shyness and awe of him she had almost made up her mind to call, when, just at dusk on that October evening, somebody came to the door and asked for her.

She could see the messenger's head against the low new moon. He was a man-servant. He said he had been all the way to her father's, and had been sent thence to her here. He [illegible] brought a note, and delivering it into her hands, went away.

"Margery Tucker" (ran the note),—"They say I am not likely to live, so I want to see you. Be here at eight o'clock this evening. Come quite alone to the side door, and tap four times softly. My trusty man will admit you. The occasion is an important one. Prepare yourself for a solemn ceremony, which I wish to have performed while it lies in my power.

Lastly."

CHAPTER XI.

Margery's face flushed up, and her neck and arms glowed in sympathy. The quickness of youthful imagination and the assumptiveness of woman's reason sent her straight to an error the thought: "He wants to marry me!"

She had heard of similar strange proceedings, in which the orange flower and the sad cypress were intertwined. People sometimes walked on their death beds, from motives of esteem, to form a legal tie which they had not cared to establish on a domestic one during their active life.

For a few minutes Margery could hardly be called excited; she was excitement itself. Between surprise and modesty she blushed and trembled by turns. She became grave, sat down in the solitary room, and looked into the fire. At seven o'clock she rose resolved, and was quite tranquilly upstairs, where she speedily began to dress.

In making this hasty toilet nine-tenths of her care was given to her hands. The summer had left them slightly brown, and she held them up and looked at them with some misgiving, the fourth finger of her left hand more especially. Hot washings and cold washings, certain products from bee and flower known only to country girls, everything she could think of was used upon those little sunburnt hands, till the persuaded herself that they were really as white as could be wished by a husband with a hundred tithes. Her dressing completed, she left word with Edy that she was going for a long walk, and set out in the direction of Mount Lodge.

She no longer tripped like a girl, but walked like a woman. While crossing the park she murmured "Baroness Xaxaxa" as a pronunciation of her own. The sound of that title roused her each agitation that she was obliged to pause, with her hand upon her heart.

The house was so closely neighbored by shrubberies on three of its sides that it was an old one had gone nearly round it that she found the little door. The resolution she had been an hour in forming failed her when she stood at the portal. While pausing for courage to tap a carriage drove up to the front entrance a little way off, and peeping round the corner she saw alight a clergyman, and a gentleman in whom Margery fancied that she recognized a well-known minister from the neighboring town. She had no longer any doubt of the nature of the ceremony proposed. "It is sudden—but I must obey him!" she murmured, and tapped four times.

The door was opened so quickly that the servant must have been standing immediately inside. She thought him the man she had driven them to the ball—the silent man who could be trusted. Without a word he conducted her up the hall staircase, and through a door at the top into a wide corridor. She was asked to wait in a side dressing room, where there was a fire, and to sit at a metal-framed looking-glass over the mantelpiece, in which she caught sight of herself. A red spot burned in each of her cheeks; the rest of her face was pale, and her eyes were like diamonds of the first water.

Before she had been seated many minutes the man came back noiselessly, and she followed him to a door covered by a red and black curtain, which he lifted, and ushered her into a large chamber. A screened light stood on a table before her, and on her left the hangings of a tall dark four-post bedstead obstructed her view of the centre of the room. Everything here smacked of such a magnificent type to her eyes that she felt confused, diminished to half her height, half her strength, half her prettiness. The man who had conducted her retired at once, and some one came softly round the angle of the bed-curtains. He held out his hand kindly—rather patronizingly, it was the solicitor whom she knew by sight. This gentleman led her forward, as if she had been a lamb rather than a woman, till the occupant of the bed was revealed.

The Baron's eyes were closed, and her color had been so conscious that he did not open them. The pallor of his face nearly matched the white bed-linen, and his dark hair and heavy black moustache were like dashes of ink on a clean page. Near him sat the person and another gentleman, whom the afterward learned to be a London physician, and on the person whispering a few words the Baron opened he eyes. As soon as he saw her he smiled faintly, and held out his hand.

Margery would have wept for him, if she had not been too overawed and palpitating to do anything. She quite forgot what she had come for, shook hands with him mechanically, and could hardly return an answer to his weak "How Margery, you see how I am—how are you?"

In preparing for marriage she had not calculated on such a scene as this. Her affection for the Baron had too much of the vague in it to afford her trustfulness now. She wished she had not come. On a sign from the Baron the lawyer brought her a chair, and the oppressive silence was broken by the Baron's words.

"I am pulled down to death's door, Margrey," he said, "and I suppose I soon shall pass through. . . My peace has been much disturbed to this illness, for just before it attacked me I received—that present you returned, from which, and in other ways, I learned that you had lost your chance of marriage. . . . Now it was I who did the harm, and you can imagine how the news has affected me. It has worried me all the illness through, and I can not dismiss my error from my mind. I want to right the wrong I have done you before I die. Margery, you have always obeyed me, and, strange as the request may be, will you obey me now?"

She whispered, or seemed to whisper, "Yes."

"Well, then," said the Baron, "these three gentlemen are here for a special purpose: one helps the body—he's called a physician; another helps the soul—he's a parson; the other helps the understanding—he's a lawyer. They are here purely on my account, and purely on yours."

The speaker then made a sign to the lawyer, who went out of the door. He came back almost instantly, but not alone. Behind him, dressed up in his best clothes, with a flower in his buttonhole and a bridegroom's air, walked—Jim.

CHAPTER XII.

MARGERY could hardly repress a scream. As for flushing and blushing, she had turned hot and turned pale on many times already during the evening that there was really now nothing of that sort left for her to do, and she remained to complexion much as before. Oh, the mockery of it! That secret drama—the sweet word "Baroness" which had mastered her all the way along! Instead of a baron, there stood Jim, white waistcoated, demure, every hair in place, and, if she mistook not, even a deeply spark in the eye.

Jim's surprising presence on the scene may be briefly accounted for. His resolve to seek an explanation with the Baron at all risks had proved unexpectedly easy, the interview had at once been granted, and then, seeing the crisis at which matters stood, the Baron had generously revealed to Jim the whole of his indebtedness to and knowledge of Margery. The truth of the Baron's statement, the innocent nature of the acquaintanceship, his sorrow for the rupture he had produced, were on evident that, far from having any further doubts of his patron, Jim frankly asked his advice on the next step to be pursued. At this stage the Baron fell ill, and desiring much to see the two young people united before his death, he had sent anew to Hayward, and proposed the plan which they were now about to attempt—a marriage at the bedside of the sick man by special license. The influence at Lambeth of some relatives of the Baron's, and the charitable bequests of his late mother to several deserving Church funds, were generally supposed to be among the reasons why the application for the license was not refused.

This, however, is of small consequence. The Baron probably knew, in proposing this method of celebrating the marriage, that his enormous power over her would outweigh any sentimental obstacles which she might set up—inward objection that, without his presence and firmness, might prove too much for her acquiescence. Doubtless he foresaw, too, the advantage of getting her into the house before making the indefeasibility of her husband clear to her mind.

Now the Baron's conjectures were right as to the event, but wrong as to the motives. Margery was a perfect little dissembler on some occasions, and one of them was when she wished to hide any sudden mortification that might bring her into ridicule. She had on sooner recovered from her first fit of discomfiture than pride made her suffer anything rather than reveal her mental disappointment. Hence the scene progressed as follows:

"Come here, Hayward," said the invalid. Hayward came near. The Baron, holding her hand in one of his own, and her future's in the other, continued, "Will you, in spite of your recent vexation with her, marry her now if she does not refuse?"

"I will sir," said Jim, promptly.

"And Margery, what do you say? It is merely a setting of things right. You have already promised this young man to be his wife, and should, of course, perform your promise. You don't dislike Jim?"

"Oh, no, sir," she said, in a low, dry voice.

"I like him better than I can tell you," said the Baron. "He is an honorable man, and will make you a good husband. You must remember that marriage is a life contract, in which general compatibility of temper and worldly position is of more importance than fleeting passion, which never long survives. Now will you, as my earnest request, and before I go to the south of Europe or die, agree to make this good man happy? I have expressed your views on the subject, haven't I, Hayward?"

"Yes, sir," she murmured, "if he'll agree to a thing or two."

"Doubtless he will—what are they?"

"That I shall not be made to live with him till I am in the mind for it, and that my having him shall be kept unknown for the present."

"Well, what do you think of it, Hayward?"

"Anything that you or she may wish I'll do, my noble lord," said Jim.

"Well, her request is not unreasonable, seeing that the proceedings are, on my account, a little [illegible] so we'll proceed. You rather expected this, from my allusion to a ceremony in my note, did you not, Margery?"

"Yes, sir," said she, with no effort.

"Good; I thought so; you looked so little surprised."

We now leave the scene in the bedroom for a moment to describe a very peculiar proceeding that might have been watched at that time in a spot not many yards off.

When the carriage seen by Margery at the door was driving up to Mount Lodge it arrested the attention not only of the young girl, but of a man who had for some time been moving slowly in about the opposite lawn, engaged in some operation while he smoked a short pipe. A short observation of his doings would have shown that he was sheltering some delicate plants from an expected frost, and that he was the gardener. When the light at the door fell upon the entering forms of parson and lawyer—the former a stranger, the latter known to him—the gardener walked thoughtfully round the house. Reaching the small side entrance he was further surprised to see it ceaselessly open to a young woman, in whose momentarily illumined features he recognized those of Margery Tucker.

Altogether there was something curious in this. The man returned to the lawn front and parturiently went on putting shelters over certain plants, though his thoughts were plainly otherwise engaged. On the grass his footsteps were noiseless, and the light moreover being still, he could presently hear a murmuring from the bedroom window over his head.

The gardener took from a tree a ladder that he had used in nailing that day, set it under the window, and ascended half-way, hoodwinking his conscience by seizing a nail or two with his hand and testing their twig-supporting powers. He soon heard enough to satisfy him. The words of the marriage service for the strange parson's voice were audible in snatches through the blind, they were the words he knew to be part of the service, such as "wedded wife," "richer or poorer," and so on; the less familiar parts being a mere confused sound.

Satisfied that a wedding service was being solemnized there, the gardener did not for a moment dream that one of the contracting parties could be other than the sick Baron. He descended the ladder and again walked round the house, waiting only till he saw Margery emerge from the same little door; when, fearing that he might be discovered, he withdrew in the direction of his own cottage.

This building stood at the lower corner of the garden, and as soon as the gardener entered he was accosted by a handsome woman in a widow's cap, who called him father, and said that supper had been ready for a long time. They sat down, but during the meal the gardener was an abstracted and silent that his daughter put her hand tenderly to one side and said, "What is it, father dear?"

"Ah, what is it!" cried the gardener. "Something that makes very little difference to me, but may be of great account to you, if you play your cards well. There's been a wedding at the Lodge to-night!" He related to her, with a caution to secrecy, all that he had heard and seen.

While the gardener was telling his story, Margery was on her way out of the Baron's house. She was, indeed, married. But, as we know, she was not married to the Baron. The ceremony over she seemed but little discomposed, and expressed a wish to remain alone as she had come. To this, of course, no objection could be offered under the terms of the agreement, and wishing Jim a frigid good by, and the Baron a very quiet farewell, she went out by the door which had admitted her. Once safe and alone in the darkness of the park she burst into tears, which dropped upon the gown as she passed along. In the Baron's room she had scarcely marvel and help on, now her reason and emotions returned. The farther she got away from the glamour of that room, and the influences of [illegible] the more she became of opinion that she had acted absurdly. She had absolutely left her father's [illegible] to obey him here. She had dressed everybody but herself.

How yet, thinking was now too late. How she got into the grandmother's house she hardly knew, but without a supper, and without undoing either her relative or Edr, she went to bed

[to be continued.]

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Matrimony," "Miss to. De Mauser," "No New Thing," "Major or Minor," etc.

CHAPTER VI.—(Continued.)

HOT WATER AND COLD.

My own education in figure-skating had not carried me beyond the power to accomplish large swerving 8's, and to execute on occasion al basty 8, and sit down heavily at the end of it; but for speed and long distance I was on good as anybody. Nothing, therefore, could have been more natural than that my manly form should have been constantly seen hovering in close proximity to that graceful one which had as provoked Sir Digby's envy, and I dare say that when the old gentleman beheld the two of us together he became less resigned to the drawbacks of age than ever.

Maud and I traversed miles of ice without interruption or hinderance. It was a glorious time before us, as on swept southward and westward with long even strokes, hung the red sun, like a huge lamp behind the masts; every now and again a lonely skater would loom up ahead, come tearing past us, and be gone before I had had time to do more than call out, "Hullo, George! is that you?" From afar the voices and laughter of our more gregarious neighbors came to us in a confused murmur, and sometimes there would be the chink, chunk, of a stone skimming across the ice, which, like the tinkling of the mower's scythe upon the whetstone, is one of the most delightful sounds that can strike the ear, though I am not enough of a theoretical rusticum to say why. The swift motion, the exhilarating freshness of the keen air, the sense of liberty, combined to excite my youthful brain and to stir up in it bold imaginings and hopes, some of which occasionally struggled hazily into speech, leaving me much confused and my companion supremely unconcerned. Under such circumstances as these it was not likely that I should bother my head much about Mrs. Farquhar.

And yet Mrs. Farquhar's name was frequently upon our lips during those short—too short—winter afternoons. I was too timid, too inexperienced, perhaps almost too much in earnest, to lead the conversation often into that tender channel toward which my heart inclined me. I was not profoundly interested in the Rector's rheumatism, nor did Maud care to be told more than three or four times of the relaxations of undergraduate existence. This left us with a limited range of subjects, and on Mrs. Farquhar came in for a somewhat unduly large share of our attention. It was thus that I learned by degrees the history of those unhappy parochial dissensions narrated as the beginning of the present chapter. It was only by degrees that I reached the facts, for Maud was proud, and did not like either to confess or complain of her discomfiture, but little by little the whole story came out, and I was magnanimous enough to refrain from saying, "I told you so." It is, of course, quite obvious to me now that Miss Dennison was a well-intentioned but headstrong young lady, whom a mule is time was likely to save from nine future ones, and who was therefore rather to be congratulated than commiserated on having fallen in with an equally headstrong opponent, but I did not see the matter at all in that light at the time. On the contrary, Maud appeared to me to be the good angel and Mrs. Farquhar the evil genius of the neighborhood, and I am afraid I was much more angry with the latter for having entered away the old women from church than for tormenting my uncle from morning to night.

Maud herself was evidently much mortified—less by Mrs. Farquhar's hostility than by the terrible depravity of human nature as illustrated in the conduct of those substituted paupers. "I shall never be able to feel any interest in them again," she said. "I keep on telling myself that they are no worse than I am, and that if I were poor and hungry I should very likely not set much store by a mess of pottage, but it won't do. I know quite well that there are depths of meanness to which I never could descend. I might buy the pottage, and eat it, but I should not pretend that I was swallowing it down to satisfy a spiritual craving. Sometimes I feel as if I almost hated the poor. Those old women make me here to be as fond of me as ever, and declare that they would never have left the church if that granny Ebenezer man hadn't convinced them that there could be no earnest religion in an established form of liturgy, and I can't stoop to tell them that I know all about it, and that they have simply sold themselves to Mrs. Farquhar who has bought them, not because she cares a straw whether they go to church or chapel but because for some reason or other she wants to spite me. My father understands them better than I do, and rides like him a great deal better than they do me. He goes on visiting them just as if nothing had happened, and thinks it very natural that they should take a tempting bribe and then tell lies about it. I don't think it natural at all. I can't help despising them, and they see that I despise them, and all my influence is slipping away if it were a mere question of fighting Mrs Farquhar, I might set to work, and at the end of a certain month I dare say I should have a very good chance of beating her, that is unless she is very rich. But I don't choose to fight Mrs Farquhar."

It was not all at once that Maud spoke to me with this openness. At first she was reticent, and only hinted at disappointments and annoyances, without entering into particulars as to their nature; but when she found how deep and unquestioning was my sympathy (for as truth I should have sympathized with her just as much if she and her adversary had changed places), her reserve broke down, and she not only confided to me all that has been related here, but told me of various other trivial slights which Mrs Farquhar had taken pains to inflict upon her, and which were all the more galling by reason of their triviality. She laughed when I expressed a desire to throttle that meddlesome making old woman with my own hands, and said I was talking nonsense; still, doubtless, it was a relief to her to find some one who was ready to adopt her own views in a spirit of blind faith, and who did not hesitate to emphasize them in language more forcible than she could permit herself to make use of.

For two days there had been unmistakable signs of an approaching change. On each afternoon the thermometer had risen a little above freezing point, so fall below it again after sunset, now the ice had become soft and slushy, the wind, after shifting about to all points of the compass, had begun to blow gently but steadily from the southwest, and even the most obstinate optimists had to admit that a pantoon they had yet to. Still, there was supposed to be a sufficient thickness of ice to render skating safe, if not precisely enjoyable.

"It will be our last day," sighed Maud, as she rose from the chair upon which she had been eating while I adjusted her skates, and we determined to make the most of it.

Accordingly we set off on a somewhat longer trip than usual, meaning to cross our own Broad, push on by way of the dikes to Birkling Broad and Horsey Mere, and so return through another series of dikes. I, for my part, spent a very pleasant afternoon, in spite of the raw, damp air and of the ice, which hurt was in about as bad a condition as it well could have been. Uncomfortable as it was to skate through large puddles and over a soft surface more like snow than ice, it did not occur to me that there was anything dangerous in such a proceeding until we reached Horsey Mere, when that aspect of the case was brought under my notice in an abrupt and startling manner. All of a sudden, and without the smallest preliminary warning of any kind, there came a great crash, and I found myself plunged under water. My first impulse, after I rose gasping to the surface and struck out instinctively was to shout, "It's all right!" in order to reassure my companion, but what was my horror on discovering that she had disappeared! As may be imagined, I was tolerably cold already, but I shall not easily forget the chill that went to my heart when I realized what had happened, nor how, to the mere instant that elapsed before I had got hold of her, I had time to picture to myself all the consequences, immediate and remote, of Maud's death and the terrible future that awaited me should I survive her. It was only an instant. As soon as I had got her to place her hands on my shoulders, so as to leave my arms free, I knew I should save her, though, truth to tell, the task did not seem a very easy one. Encumbering as my clothes was a thing I was well accustomed to, having been swamped many a time as Eton; but I had never before been called upon to swim in a heavy great-coat, a fur shuba upon my feet, and a fellow-creature weighing me down; nor did I exactly see how we were to reach the shore, which was only a few yards distant. To scramble up on the ice again was, as I knew, an impossibility, and I was not a little afraid of being sucked under. However, there was nothing for it but to make for the edge of the pool to which we were immersed, and this I did, throwing my whole weight upon the surface. It yielded, as I had expected, we both went down and rose again with some loss of breath, and after repeating this manœuvre two or three times, I had the satisfaction of grasping dry land. We scrambled on shore somehow or other, and sat looking at one another, thoroughly exhausted and half dead with cold.

I dare say we presented a sufficiently ridiculous appearance in our forlorn and draggled state, and I know that we both laughed a little between our chattering teeth. Maud had behaved splendidly throughout. She had never lost her presence of mind for a moment, she had done exactly as she was told, and she had not uttered a word or a cry. She did not say much even now. Only, after I had risen to my feet, and assisted her to do the same, she touched me gently on the arm to make me look at her, and said, "Thank you, Charley."

It does not sound a supplatively grateful speech or make to a man who has just saved you from drowning, but I more than satisfied me. For while Maud was uttering those three short words our eyes met here, and I saw there—how shall I express it?—I saw something which could not be translated into words, which could not even at the moment be expressed in thought, but which sent a thrill of exultation through the whole of my shivering person. Such flashes of happiness come every now and again into a man's life, though never, I think, after a certain age. As we grew older we become less impressionable, more armitycal, less open to vague suggestions of bliss. Had all this happened two or six years later, I should probably have asked myself what was the meaning of that look of Maud's, and whether in truth it signified, as it seemed to do, that my dearest hopes were to be realized, but, as it was, I put no such direct inquiries to my soul. I walked along beside her in silence, a little bit dazed and supremely happy, without quite knowing why.

There was a laborer's cottage some three hundred yards away from the shore. Thither on hotch ourselves, and having been restored with hot drinks, and furnished with such garments as the good woman of the house could provide us with in exchange for our dripping ones, we set off to trudge homeward in the guise of a pair of East-Anglian peasants. By this time Maud had recovered the full use of her tongue, and she now thanked me more warmly and at greater length for having preserved her from a watery grave, saying a great many kind and flattering things, which it would have been delightful to listen to had I not been troubled by a most unfortunate recollection which had occurred to me while waiting in the cottage, and which sadly dimmed the glory of my heroism.

"Maud," I said at last, speaking in a doleful voice, and feeling as if all my bright visions were about to vanish, like Cinderella's coach and horses, "I must tell you something I didn't really save your life at all."

"My dear Charley," she answered, "if there is anything certain in this world, it is certain that I should be lying dead at the bottom of Horsey Mere at this moment but for you."

"I give you my word," I exclaimed, eagerly, "that I firmly believed so until a few minutes ago, but then I remembered what I should have thought of before, if I had had my wits about me. Do you know that we were struggling for our lives in—some feet of water?"

Well, she declared that that made no difference at all, that she was just as [illegible] to as if the pool [illegible] as [illegible] imaginary [illegible] could [illegible] and [illegible] laugh too, though [illegible] It was a cruel practical joke for [illegible] upon a poor hero.

* Began in Harper's Weekly No. 1161.

AS SOON AS I HAD GOT HER TO PLACE HER HANDS ON MY SHOULDERS, SO AS TO LEAVE MY ARMS FREE, I KNEW I SHOULD SAVE HER.

CHAPTER VII.

THE RECTOR HAS FRIENDS TO DINNER.

Taine is a French chasseur, Comme il l'esprit Taine, which every body knows. Comme on aime à regret ses vices! Comme on rit! Comme on pleure!—and all the rest. I heard it sung for the first time when I was but a little more than twenty years old, I heard it sung for about the hundred and fiftieth time at a reunion, only the other day, by a fat old Frenchman, who gave it so pathetic cover it that he made himself cry, and very nearly made me cry into the bargain. Doubtless he was thinking of those days, long, long ago, when he was slim and handsome and twenty. I wonder whether he noticed another fat old man in the audience who was listening to him with a melancholy air, and whose eyes expressed the profoundest sympathy. Ah me! I too hate to think in Arcadia. I too have memories of the golden age. It is ridiculous, it is not worth out an effort that I myself can realize the fact that I was once young; nevertheless, such fact is.

I don't know that the generality of us grow much better or wiser with the progress of time. Experience of course, we gain—a dreary acquisition, after all. It is impossible for a man to grow old and not learn a great many things which it was equally impossible for him to know when he was young; but unfortunately, when the ignorance goes, the bliss is very apt to go too. We are behind the scenes now, we know all about it, we plod slowly forward on the journey of life, surveying the landscape through our spectacles with dispassionate eyes; the color on the distant mountains no longer deceives us; "beyond their utmost purple rim" lies no paradise, as we are very well aware; if rocks or thorny hedges bar our path, we don't make a prodigious outcry, having crossed many such places already, and having learned that the bruises and wounds inflicted by them are soon healed and forgotten. Tout passe, tout lasse: one jogs on more easily than of yore, but certainly less enjoyably. I don't say that I wish to begin my life over again—very few people, I should imagine, would wish for that, but I do wish that the happiest days of it should not be utterly lost and abolished forever. Indeed, I can't believe that they are really dead and gone—those good days. All my life long I have had a conviction that they were only laid aside until the horror and labor of this short existence should be at an end, and that I should go back to them, or that they would come back to me, at last to a world where pain and sin shall be done away with. I don't in the least see how such a thing is to be contrived, but that has never yet been held to be an argument against any creed; and in an age when every one is permitted to form bold speculations as to the meaning and end of existence, nobody, surely, will quarrel with me for tacking my humble little surmise on to the skirts of an orthodox faith in immortality.

I have been trying, since my return to England, after an absence of many years, to understand the theories of the various philosophers—Positivist, Materialist, Agnostic, and other—who have sprung into notice during my exile, and whose gospels, I am assured, are slowly but steadily undermining that which was taught us by our predecessors. So far, I can not say that I have gained much light from these new guides, although I have been favored with the help of an intellectual friend whom I sometimes meet at the club, who outlines the hard passages for me, and who is very anxious that I should adorn his own particular fetich, which I understand to be ff——— with a big H. I have not found myself able to embrace this funny faith; I don't see my way to the deification of my fellow-creatures, or to the worshipping of myself under a collective aspect, nor can I be ——— with the ——— "inconceivable Future existence so complacently offered [illegible] "singing in heavenly quires" may not be situated [illegible] seems preferable to painless extinction. [illegible] Positivist friend [illegible] he tells me that I am [illegible] and yours [illegible] I not capable of rising to the level of his sublime conceptions, and perhaps he is right. It is true that I don't want to rise to them. I never was ambitious.

The whole of the above digression (for which I beg to apologize) has been provoked by my reminiscences of what I was at twenty years of age, and of the remarkable ampleness which distinguished my character at that remote period. After what I said in the last chapter about the look which I surprised in Maud's face while we stood together by the margin of Hawes Mere, it might be supposed that I should have confronted the future with confidence, and looked upon my betrothal in an amatory sense as already three parts made, but no such thing. She had only to treat me with a little reserve and coolness—which she did for some days afterward—to cut all my half-formed hopes in the bud and cast me down into an abyss of despair. My impression was that she regretted of having said as much as she had done, now that she knew my ardent zeal to have been a well-matched foe, and this seemed rather hard, be cause after all four feet of water will amply suffice to drown an educated girl.

Much amusement was caused me by the ecstasy with which the news of our engagement was received about, and by the exaggerated reports of it which found currency in various quarters. Before a week was out I was sick of telling people that I really had not eaten a distance of twenty yards under water, dragging Miss Dennison in my wake, and knocking a hole in the ice with my head to crawl out through at the end of it, also the sprightly arguments and insinuations of the ladies who came to call and hear all about the catastrophe were extremely distasteful to me. Even Rance was quite irritated upon the subject, so that I was obliged to rebuke him for using the things that he did—and in Maud's presence too, which was most embarrassing. As for the Rector, he came tearing up in a state of enthusiastic gratitude which I am sorry to say evaporated in shouts of laughter when he heard my version of the story. George Warren, who was there at the time, laughed unmercifully too, and joined in the chaff to which I had to submit for the next hour.

I told George afterward that I considered this rather a poor class of wit, and he begged my pardon, promising not to offend in the same way again, so I forgave him. But what surprised and angered me most of all was the extraordinary view which Mrs. Farquhar chose to take of the matter.

"Ay, ay," she said, nodding her head, with an infuriating smile, "a clever young lady indeed!—and no doubt she would know the depth of the water very well before she fell in. There was the chance of her catching her death of cold, but she would just make up her mind to risk that. I'm not denying her courage."

And when I indignantly inquired whether Mrs Farquhar meant to insinuate that Miss Dennison had tantalized poor Horsey Mere on purpose, the old lady only pursed up her lips and went on nodding, till I had to leave the room hastily in order to keep myself from throwing something at her.

"What on earth is she driving at?" I asked, impatiently, of my uncle, while we were sitting over the fire after dinner. "Does she suppose that Maud deliberately jumped into a frozen lake on a January afternoon to serve some mysterious ends of her own?"

"Well, yes," answered my uncle; "I believe that is what she supposes. You know—or, on second thoughts, perhaps you don't know—that women are apt to look upon most of the incidents of life as bearing more or less directly upon the all-important subject of marriage. My mother has taken it into her head that you will be a matrimonial catch, and that Miss Dennison is determined to catch you. Of course both those assumptions are mistaken, but I have not been able to convince her that they are so, and perhaps it is hardly worth while to try any more."

"Good heavens!" I ejaculated, "I never heard of such a thing! I wouldn't have this come to Maud's ears for any money. Do you mean to say that you didn't contradict Mrs Farquhar?"

"Oh, I contradicted her—and then she contradicted me, you know. I pointed out to her that you were not a rich man, nor even (saving your presence) a man at all as yet, and I added that, to the best of my belief, Miss Maud was perfectly innocent of any designs upon you; but in the long run it occurred to me that I might as well have held my tongue. So, after that, I did hold my tongue."

"I hate she would do the same!" I sighed, despondently. "But that she will never do, and it is easy to see how all this will end. Some of these days the Rector will begin to think that he has submitted to enough insults, and there will be a quarrel between us and our oldest friends. Then I suppose that—dear old lady will be satisfied."

"I don't think the Rector will quarrel with us," answered my uncle, quietly.

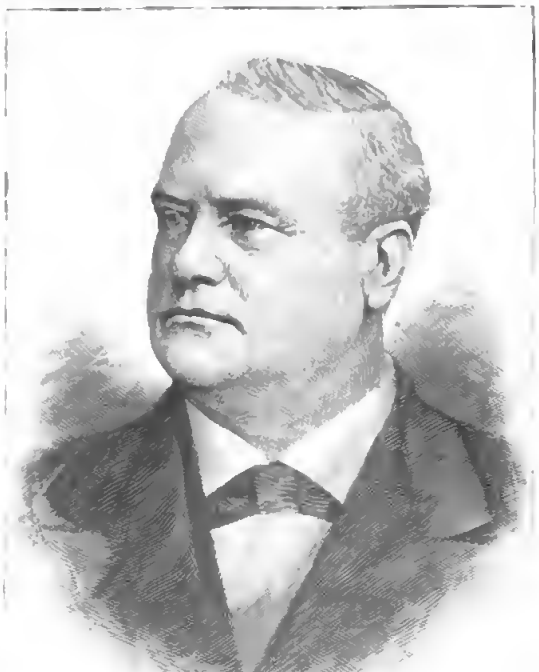
The Rector, I must say, was very magnanimous. If he was host to Mrs Farquhar's acrid and unwarrantable hostility to him in his presence—and, as he was naturally a sensitive man, I have very little doubt but that he was hurt—he allowed none of us to see it. Perhaps he knew that his strength was to sit still, and that the capricious old lady would soon tire of Ebenezer Chapel when she found that no one tried to entice her away from it, perhaps he may have thought it beneath his dignity to dispute on theological matters with unauthorized and ignorant persons. Still, it was not the less magnanimous on his part to refrain from uttering a word of complaint and to come up to the Hall nearly every day, almost shutting me up to my customary curiosity. Mrs. Farquhar used to say to him that he was a well meaning man, but that she greatly feared he was only a nominal Christian.

The date of my return to Oxford was fast approaching, when an invitation came, asking the three of us to dine quietly at the Rectory. I had some hope that, circumstances being what they were, Mrs Farquhar would decline this proffered hospitality for herself, but she disappointed me by merely pursuing her ordinary rule of conduct with regard to invitations. That is to say, she began by declaring that she was much too old to go out anywhere after dark, proceeded to observe that it did not do to neglect one's own conscience alone, and finally sat down to write an acceptance with an air of pious resignation. The truth, I suppose, was that she liked a little society, as was very natural, but I don't to this day understand why she should not have acknowledged as much.

The Rectory was a good-sized, solid, comfortable house, whose the Rector, who appreciated comfort of a solid kind, had for many years been in the habit of giving very successful little dinners. The cooking of these dinners was plain, but excellent, the wine was of the best; and when his guests had done justice to both, it was their worthy host's custom to lead them, either into the garden to admire his roses, of which he was justly proud, or into a spacious study, where easy-chairs and a blazing fire awaited them—according to the seasons were. Nobody was ever asked to enter the drawing-room, which had the forlorn aspect common to the drawing-rooms of all houses in which there are no ladies; the Rector's reception-room was his study. In it was the well-selected library which he on seldom found time to consult, in it was the enormous stuffed pike caught at Thirlby Broad, whose weight I have forgotten, and will not attempt to recall, for fear of being accused of exaggeration, in it, modestly shrinking into a corner between one of the bookcases and the wall, was a small bureau, through the glass [illegible] of which could be distinguished guns, fishing-rods, landing-nets, and rod spears; in it distressed parishioners were wont to receive daily and, spiritual and temporal, and in it the Rector dearly loved to collect a little knot of cronies on winter evenings, and start them on an interminable chat over field-sports. He did not hunt—indeed, it was not much of a hunting country—but in [illegible] other branch of venery, from the breaking in of a puppy to the training of a hawk (which latter art he had practised with equal [illegible] when a young man), he was an acknowledged [illegible] the neighborhood far and wide deferred.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE LATE BISHOP PINKNEY, OF MARYLAND
Photographed by J. Gurney.



ALFRED VAN SANTVOORD, VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE LINCOLN BANK.
Photographed by W. Kurtz.—[See Page 453.]

RIGHT REV. WILLIAM PINKNEY, D.D., LL.D.

Right Rev. Bishop William Pinkney, who died suddenly of congestion of the heart, near Cockeysville, Maryland, on the 4th inst., was born in Annapolis, Maryland, in 1811, on that he died full of years and of the honors of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He graduated in St. John's College, Maryland, and then went to studying law, but subsequently changed it for that of divinity. He pursued his studies partly in Princeton and partly in the Theological Seminary of New York. He was ordained a Deacon in 1836. He received his first call from St. Andrew's, in Somerset County, Maryland, and afterward, in 1838, he became the Rector of St. Matthew's, near Hickesburg, Prince George's County, Maryland, and was pastor of that parish for seventeen years.

In 1855 he was called to the Rectorship of the Church of the Ascension, Washington, D. C., and continued to be its pastor even after he was elected Assistant Bishop of Maryland in 1866, and up to the time of his death. When Bishop Whittingham died in 1879, the Assistant Bishop became Bishop by right of succession. Since he became prelate thirty churches and chapels have been erected and added to the Episcopal Diocese of the State, and since the 1st of January, 1883, he confirmed 1300 persons to full membership. He was the fifth Episcopal Bishop of Maryland, and the hardest worker in the Episcopal House of Bishops. He gave half of his annual salary ($4000) to the poor and needy clergymen in his diocese. He was a firm believer in home missions and the religion of the heart, as much if not more than in that of the "high places" in the synagogue.

PENNSYLVANIA REPUBLICANS.

The State Convention of the Pennsylvania Republicans was held in Harrisburg on the 11th inst., and the proceedings were dignified and harmonious. Protective doctrines were vigorously upheld in the platform, a suggestion was made that the surplus revenue of the nation be distributed among the States, the administration of President Arthur was approved, and the withdrawal of the trade dollar from circulation was recommended.

There were ten candidates for the nomination for State Treasurer, and on the sixth ballot Mr. William A. Livsey, of Pittsburgh, was chosen. He is a man about forty-five years of age, who has never had any connection with politics, but he is a very accomplished accountant, and well fitted for the office for which he has

WILLIAM A. LIVSEY, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR STATE TREASURER OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Photographed by D. C. Bonnie.

THE HON. JEROME B. NILES, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR AUDITOR-GENERAL OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Photographed by D. Bonnie.

Digitized by Google

been nominated. The Independents speak highly of him, although his sympathies are with the CAMERON leaders.

The Hon. JOHNSON B. NEWIN, of Middleburg, Tioga County, who was nominated for the position of Auditor General, is a lawyer of ability and distinction. He was District Attorney in 1862, and again in 1865, and has served several terms in the House of Representatives. He is an "Independent" in politics.

THE INNERMOST ROOM.

THE Singer sang the world a song,
And soon in every tender heart
Its melody, so sweet and strong,
Became a dear and lasting part.
But on one knew, and no one cared,
That from supremest grief and wrong
His breaking heart had learned the notes
That trembled into glorious song.

A woman, who from every cup
Had drank life's glad and bitter streams,
Sat down and wrote a wondrous tale,
As sweet and bright as fairy dreams.
But no one knew, and no one cared,
From what tumultuous scene of thought
The soul in lonely voyages
Its parable of life had brought.

The Teacher, with a burning heart,
With tongue as swift and hot as flame,
Led with a wise and tender heart
The world unto its highest aim
But no one asked, and no one knew,
Through what fierce conflict, day by day,
He won the victory which cleared
For weaker hearts the higher way.

For each soul has one inner room
Where all alone it seeks the grace
To struggle with its sharpest woe,
Its hardest destiny to face,
To lift the duty that it fears,
To love, to trust, through every doom,
And not the nearest, dearest heart
Goes with it to that inner room

'Tis there that souls learn how to sing;
'Tis there the truest knights are made;
There, with the sharp edge of her sword,
Great sorrow gives the accolade
From thence they come with subtle strength
The weary and the sad to lift;
But who remembers that lone room,
Its sleepless and doubt, its grief and gloom,
From which they bring the precious gift?

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

RIVER WATER.

A FAMILIAR sight to me, in years gone by, was the watering of ships in Hilo Harbor from the river Wailuku. Vessels came a thousand miles out of their way to supply themselves at this pure stream. Their boats' crews, putting out from the ship with a long tow of empty casks, perhaps a hundred in line, like a gigantic sea serpent, would pull landward across the beautiful bay and up the entrance of the stream, between picturesque and precipitous banks, until they reached the first cascade. There the water, pure and cool from the upland forests and from the snows of Mauna Kea, came tumbling down a lava cliff into the sea. A long hose was carried to the bank; one by one the casks were filled, and the leaping sea-serpent, a ponderous tow, was tugged slowly back to the ship again.

The Wailuku water was good river water, and if received in tanks on shore, instead of on a rolling ship, it would have given little trouble to the consumer. But kept in casks on shipboard it had to "work," or go through a process of fermentation, lasting perhaps a fortnight, before it got clear of its sediment, stirred up by the constant motion of the ship, and not properly exposed to the purifying oxygen of the air. Bright and clear when decanted from the river, it became turbid and ill-smelling while it was "working," and would then be called quite undrinkable by shore people, though the sailors used it even then. Its chief impurity was decomposing vegetable matters; and these are only one cause among many of the impurity of streams. River waters are more likely to be impure than those of wells or springs; and their causes of impurity may be counted, in the order of their importance, as follows

1. The muddy water of freshets is rather an inconvenience than a danger to health. River water that is turbid from this cause will soon clear itself; if it be exposed to the air in a reservoir, by depositing the earthy matter in suspension, and by absorbing oxygen, it will become pure and sparkling. Nor is it the most turbid water, by any means, that is the most dangerous to drink; water that is merely turbid from containing earthy matters, like the Wailuku water in floodtime, is harmless.

2. In small and sluggish streams the water often loads itself from the decay of animal and vegetable substances that it has itself produced—plants, insects, and fishes. Streams are in general pure according to their size and swiftness. It is not easy to pollute the water of a powerful and rapid stream that pours down over a bed of pebbly or of siliceous sand; the air purifies it as it tumbles along. The Seine received until lately the sewer discharges of the city of Paris; but the Seine is a living stream, flowing over a bed of white sand; and in 1870 it freed itself entirely, even from this enormous mass of impurity, by the time it reached Meulan, about sixty miles below the city. There the water could be used again, as above the city, for drinking.

3. A dangerous fouling of the river occurs in manufacturing countries, it is caused by the almost unrestricted practice of throwing the refuse of manufacturing processes into the streams. These chemical poisons kill the fish, give a bad smell to the water, and make it even visibly unfit to drink. Nothing but stringent legislation can stop this practice, for nowhere in Christendom, I believe, is there Christianity enough among the inhabitants of up-stream towns to keep them from making common sewers of their water-courses, and from thus distributing poison to those who live upon the same water-courses lower down.

4. But the gravest danger is yet to be mentioned. It is not the soiling, or even the chemical fouling, of the stream, but its actual poisoning by means of the germs of epidemic diseases. Typhoid fever and cholera are thus carried from house to house both by river water and through the pipes of a water supply from whatever source; and the resulting epidemics in many cases have been traced accurately to the point of infection. At the Millbank Prison in London, the convicts used the Thames water to drink, and suffered from typhoid fever. The fever stopped when the water supply was changed. The same thing occurred in a London district on removing the source of its water supply to a point further up the Thames. The same thing occurs in the history of nearly every growing place before it stops using the neighboring river, and takes to purer water sources of supply. In 1854 Glasgow lost 3,885 people by an epidemic of cholera. Not long after this Loch Katrine was tapped, and pure water was supplied to the city instead of foul. The next cholera year was 1866, there were only sixty-eight deaths from that cause, instead of nearly four thousand as before. Yet it is seldom that the inhabitants of cities give up drinking river water by any foresight or timely choice; they wait for an epidemic of cholera or typhoid fever, and then they begin to talk about getting pure water. Happy the townspeople who do not have to drink from their rivers!

River water, in fine, while it is generally pure in mountainous or in unsettled regions, is not to be depended on elsewhere as a safe supply for drinking; it is bad in manufacturing districts, and worse in towns and cities. If the fishes here decreased in a given stream, it is a good sign of danger. Water that will kill fishes is not good for man; and in most of our rivers the fishes are grievously thinned—in many of them, as in the rivers of England, the finest are gone altogether. The rivers of France are purer than the English, because the population is not so dense, and because manufactories are not so numerous. Thus the people of Besançon, a city near the eastern boundary of France, stood drink the water of their river, the Doubs, because it freshets it is muddy. But all the year round they catch abundance of delicious fish in it, for the Doubs still flows down unpolluted from that pure hills and mountain ranges of the Jura. TIMES MASSON CLUB.

TOO MUCH BATHING.

THERE are few greater admirers of the bath than I myself am. I like almost every plan of bathing—with the exception, probably, of the Russian moonlit plan of getting in under the stars and burying yourself in hot ashes. I have never tried that, but doubtless it has its advantages—to a moonlit. However, I must say there is such a thing as overdoing even the bath. Although I should wish that every one in this country were like myself—amphibious, so that if thrown into the water he would only ponder, while quietly swimming out again, where the nearest place was at which to procure dry clothes and a cup of coffee—still, it must be remembered that men are not manatees. We could not live most of our time in the water, like those interesting aquatic mammals. People should neither bathe too often in the day, nor remain too long in the water at a time, else they will overdo it, they will have not much of a good thing. The after effects of the bath should in all cases be studied, as well as the state of the general health. Moreover, the temperature of the water deserves consideration. It may suit some people to break the ice on their matutinal tub in winter, with a frozen sponge for a mallet, but a dash of warm water is to be recommended when the mercury crosses the line 32°. One bath in winter, and ten in the heat of summer, I would not call overdoing the thing.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,
FOR ALCOHOLISM.

DR. C. S. ELLIS, Walnut Ind., says: "I prescribed it for a man who had used intoxicants to excess for fifteen years, but during the last two years his entirely abstained. He thinks the Acid Phosphate is of much benefit to him."—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.

THE Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel-lists, and hints concerning the White Mountains, the State of Maine the Maritime Provinces, and all the Shore, Mountain, and Lake resorts east of Boston will be mailed free to any address on application to LOCKE TUTTLE, Gen. Pass. Agt., Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Promotes the Growth of the Hair, and renders it dark and glossy. It holds, in a liquid form, a large proportion of deodorized Cocoanut Oil, prepared expressly for this purpose. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair.—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.

"It is as near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.

"The color of sea-mown hay, the perfume of cucumber vines, the cool breeze, the trim lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitor."—N. Y. Tribune

Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Foot of 3d St., East River, and Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

TO OUR LADY READERS

When an article has given satisfaction for over thirty-five years, we are justified in recommending it. Such is the case with Dr. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN LINIMENT. By a few applications of it pimples, blotches, and eruptions of all kinds are removed. It turns gray hair to its natural color, it improves the complexion, and it is perfectly harmless. It also never fails to cure croup, cholera, diarrhœa, dysentery, and all stomach complaints. We are sure no family will be without a bottle after once trying it. All our druggists keep it.—Cincinnati Star.—[Adv.]

C. C. SHAYER, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N.Y., sends Fur Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

DR. PEASLEE'S St. Vitus Dance Specific.—One bottle always cures. Circular, Freeland, N. Y.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery is a delicious article highly recommended by doctors.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty
TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 25, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists
TAMAR, mildly pills and the most purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH
(MABSON & PATENT, U.S.A., JAN. 12, 1882.)
A self-feeding reservoir pen, writes continuously with any ink and by means of a pen with ordinary nibs.

PENS TO REFILL.
(Fine, Medium, or Broad Points), 50c. Per Box.
MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET WITHOUT LEAKING AND IS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE $1.00
POCKET CASE DESIGNED AND ADJUSTMENT
THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS OF HAND-WRITING ARE ENTIRELY PRESERVED
$1.50
PEN REMOVABLE AT PLEASURE
FITTED WITH A NON-CORRODIBLE PEN.
Styles and modifications and our habits to suit out of order.
$2.50 PALLADIUM PEN $3.00
Flexible as Steel, Durable as Gold
SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.
THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

HARPER'S BAZAR
CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to MR. J. G. CROTTY, Nos. 108 to 116 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible in any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE Curative Efficacy of Hill's Patent Electric Appliances exceeds all other inventions ever made. Lady agents make over $20 per week selling them. We want more such everywhere. Prices: Bracelet, $1 00, $1 50; Electric Corsets, $1 00, do. Throat Protectors, $1 00. Mailed on receipt of price. For honest testimonials and terms to agents send postal to HILL BRUCH CO., Reading Mass.

LUNDBORG'S
RHENISH COLOGNE.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."
Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES. CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause. CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair. CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin. CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers. Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 75 cents; Resolvent, $1. POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

TOURIST'S EDITION.

DRAKE'S
WHITE MOUNTAINS.

ILLUSTRATED BY
W. HAMILTON GIBSON.

The Heart of the White Mountains: their Legend and Scenery. By SAMUEL ADAMS DRAKE, Author of "Nooks and Corners of the New England Coast," "Captain Nelson," &c. With Illustrations by W. HAMILTON GIBSON. Tourist's Edition. Large 8vo, Ornamental Cloth, $3 00.

It is an more record of miles, elevations, and temperature nim of mountains; it is rather an experienced and friendly guide, who beguiles the up-hill way by legends, pleasant anecdotes, and bright sayings, and teaches much of the woodcraft to be learned near the mountains' heart.—Portland Press.

The entire region is described, not in guide-book style, but rather as a record of the author's own experiences interspersed with interesting incidents and adventures, but at the same time containing all needful information as to routes to the different portions of the region.—Utica Herald, N. Y.

It will be better than all the guide-books for those who are going for the first time to New Hampshire this summer, and the frequent visitor will also find in it charming souvenirs.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The tourist to the White Mountains will not deem his "outfit" complete unless it includes a copy of this "full, precise, compact, sensible, and honest" guide in the pocket, pamphlet, and various of that famous region.—Chicago Journal.

No pleasanter guide to the White Mountains or to imagined can be, or, besides appendix, and as better adapt it for the use of travellers.—N. Y. Times.

The volume must enjoy a wide popularity among White Mountain tourists, its convenient form adapting it to temporary, and its beauty and value to permanent, use.—Boston Journal.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

KAHNWEILER'S
IMPROVED PATENT
CORK LIFE-PRESERVER.

For Swimming and Boating. Is easily adjusted. Any person can learn to swim in a very short time. Can be worn under the boating-suit without being noticed. Assorted sizes for Ladies and Children. Price $2.50 each; may be ordered or expressed on receipt of $2.50.

O. KAHNWEILER,
146 Worth St., N. Y.

BOSTON SCHOOL OF ORATORY.

Full course, two years elective course, one year. The English and Delsarte systems of gesture; light gymnastics. Term begins Oct. 4th. Apply at 1 Somerset St., Boston, Mass., after Oct. 1st, from 10 to 12 A. M. or for catalogues address as any time R. R. RAYMOND, Pres.

First Prize Medal, Vienna, 1873.
C. WEIS
Manufacturer of Horsehair Cloth
Wholesale and Retail. Send for Circular to 209 Broadway, Factories, cellar to 209 Broadway, Portland, and 69 Walker Street, N. Y.

BRUSHES of every description at 108 Pearl Street, New York.
JOHN L. MOFFET, Manufacturer and Importer.

50 Large Crimson, Navy and pretty in ever published Name on, 10c. YARN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

JULY 21, 1883.

HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST

CONTAINS:

"A Town Garden,"
Frontispiece. From a Drawing by R. A. Ayres, illustrating the poem — with same title — by Bayard Taylor.

The Heart of the Alleghanies,
By George Parsons Lathrop. Illustrated by Harry Fenn.

American Horses,
By Hon. Chas. Hunt. Illustrated by Reduced Prints.

The German Crown Prince,
By George von Bunsen. Illustrated.

The Canadian Habitant,
By C. H. Farnham. Illustrated.

War Pictures in Times of Peace,
Description of French Military Manœuvres, by M. F. Zoetwelt, with illustrations by the artist.

Vallombrosa,
By E. D. R. Brainard. Illustrated.

The British Yoke,
Chapter IX. of T. W. Knox's series of American History Stories. Illustrated.

The Modern Yacht,
By Lieutenant J. D. Jerrold Kelly, U. S. N. Illustrated.

A Castle in Spain,
A Novel. Part IV. Illustrated by Abbey.

Best Laid Schemes,
A Story. By Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Poems
By Margaret Vere and T. B. Aldrich.

Editor's Easy Chair.
The Brooklyn Bridge.—Unemployment and Education of Women.—The Philosophy of Jesuitism.—The Vivisectionists.—A Reminiscence of John Howard Payne.

Editor's Literary Record.

Editor's Historical Record.

Editor's Drawer.
August.—Anecdotes of Bishop Mellvaine, Bayard Taylor, Dr. J. G. Holland, and John Randolph.—A Tragedy of the Palisades.—A Gentle Reminder.—An Easter Catechism.—Southern Humors.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

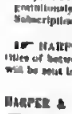
HARPER'S MAGAZINE	Per Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	"	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	"	4 00
The THREE above publications	"	10 00
Any TWO above named	"	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	"	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }	"	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY (One Number)	"	10 00
Index to Harper's Magazine, 1 in 60	Cloth	1 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 20 cents per number. Full Sets of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS. Subscription Price, per Year of 99 Numbers, $10 00.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, comprising the titles of between three and four thousand volumes, will be sent by mail on receipt of Nine Cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.



Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3. Large sizes for circulars, &c. Pay for Press, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

PHOTO. COPYING AGENTS! Splendid portraits of any size or kind finished in the most artistic manner, from any kind of small pictures. Reliable agents wanted in every county in the U. S. Profits Large. Address The American Copying Co., 26 Clemence St., Auburn, N. Y.

MELLIN'S FOOD
For Infants and Invalids.
THE ONLY PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR MOTHERS' MILK. The most nourishing diet for infants and failing mothers. Recommended by all physicians. Sold by all druggists. Keeps in all climates. 25c. Send for the pamphlet. E. MELLIN & Co., 41 Central Wharf, Boston, Mass.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. M. SHAW & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

A MOST PLEASANT MODE OF SUMMER TRAVELLING.
BECOMING QUITE FASHIONABLE AMONG RICH GENTLEMEN:—
Travelling from place to place in a mail phaeton, with three horses (the third horse for hills) and two men.

Peck & Snyder's
CELEBRATED
STATEN ISLAND
Tennis Racquet.
Used by all experts.
Complete Catalogue on application.
PECK & SNYDER, 126, 128, and 130 Nassau St., New York.

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It assures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 86 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What curves their lovers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion.

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
112 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards and a Ring, for 10c., name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

EDUCATIONAL.

1883 The NEW CALENDAR of the NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY of MUSIC Beautifully illustrated 64 pages, SENT FREE to yourself and musical friends. Send names and addresses to E. TOURJÉE, Franklin Sq., Boston, Mass.

The Largest and best appointed Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

OPIUM HABIT

Dr. H. H. KANE, late Superintendent of the Inebriates Home, author of "Dope and Dopers," "Morphia Hypodermically," Opium-smoking, &c., hopes to announce his discovery of a combination of Remedies whereby any habitue can cure himself at home in a short time painlessly. For copies of original letters, testimonials, and endorsements from some of the most eminent medical men, letters from the physicians editor of systematic treatises treating journals, and a full description of the treatment, Address Dr. H. H. KANE, 45 W. 45th St., New York.

ASTHMA & HAY FEVER
THEIR CAUSE & CURE.
KNIGHT'S NEW TREATISE sent free.
Address L. A. KNIGHT, 12 E. Third St., CINCINNATI, O.

TAKE NOTICE.
For 20c. (in stamps) we Elegant Scrap Pictures. No two alike. F. WHITING, 39 Nassau St., N. Y.

BY ALL ODDS
The BEST-EQUIPPED RAILROAD IN THE WORLD.

Let it be forever remembered that the

Chicago & North-Western RAILWAY

is the best and shortest route to and from Chicago and Council Bluffs (Omaha), and that it is preferred by all well-posted travellers when passing to or from Colorado or California. It also operates the best route and the short line between

CHICAGO
—AND—
ST. PAUL and MINNEAPOLIS.

Milwaukee, La Crosse, Sparta, Madison, Port Howard (Green Bay), Wis.; Winona, Owatonna, Mankato, Minn.; Cedar Rapids, Des Moines, Webster City, Algona, Clinton, Marshalltown, Iowa; Freeport, Elgin, Rockford, Ill., are among its 400 local stations on its lines.

Among a few of the numerous points of superiority enjoyed by the patrons of this road are the BAY CAR CHAIRS, which are the finest that human art and ingenuity can create; its PALATIAL SLEEPING-CARS, which are models of comfort and elegance, its PALACE DRAWING-ROOM CARS, which are unsurpassed by any, and its wide is celebrated

NORTH-WESTERN DINING-CARS,

the like of which are not run by any other road anywhere. In short, it is asserted that IT IS THE BEST-EQUIPPED ROAD IN THE WORLD.

All points of Interest North, North-west, and West of Chicago, business centres, summer resorts, and noted hunting and fishing grounds are accessible by the various branches of this road.

It owns and controls over 2000 miles of road and has over four hundred passenger conductors constantly caring for its millions of patrons.

Ask your ticket agent for tickets via this route, AND TAKE NONE OTHER. All leading ticket agents sell them. It costs no more to travel on this route, that gives first-class accommodations, than it does to go by the poorly equipped roads.

For maps, descriptive circulars, and summer-resort guides, or other information not obtainable at your local ticket office, write to the GEN'L PASS. AGENT, C. & N.-W. RY, CHICAGO, ILL.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "In a few cases and a basin full which nauseous should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Finchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, M'KESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE NEW NOVELS
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

The Senior Sophman. By the Author of "St. Olaves," "Mrs. Peck's Patient," &c. 20 cents.

Ant Cæsar Ant Nihil. By the Countess M. Von Bothmer. 20 cents.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated. 10 cents.

Yolande. By William Black. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 25. Paper, 50 cents.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Arden. By A. Mary F. Robinson. 10 cents.

Mr. Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. Illus., Half Bound, $1 50; Cloth, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. Illus., Half Bound, $1 00; Cloth, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 20 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 25 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Step Pearls. Memoirs of Margaret du Ritzmann, Viscountess of Bellaise. By Hamilton M. Towle. 25 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents for postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

CARDS New Styles! Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Hunting Cards & set of agency, largest variety and lowest prices. 50 styles, elegant and new, 10c. A genuine millionaire CHROMO Rose & 14 k. Gold Ring & Vase, IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Sample plan free. J. M. MILLER & Co., Cleveland, O.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

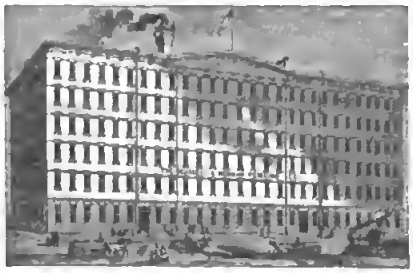
THE PLEASANT PROSPECTS OF DEMOCRATIC PEACE AND HARMONY.

THE RUSSELL & MORGAN CO.'S
SPORTSMAN'S AND ARMY AND NAVY
PLAYING CARDS.

THE BEST EVER MADE AT ANY PRICE.

INDEXED, ROUND CORNERS, AND EVERY PACK IN A NICE BOX.

TIGER PLAYING CARDS. SPORTSMAN'S ARMY AND NAVY CARDS.



CONGRESS GILT EDGES. ARMY AND NAVY GILT EDGES. CONGRESS PLAYING CARDS.

Russell & Morgan Printing Co.'s New Factory, Lock Street, Eggleston Avenue and Sixth Street, Cincinnati, O.

VICTOR E. MAUGER, General Agent, Cincinnati, O.

New York Office, corner of Reade St. and West Broadway.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

712 & 714 BROADWAY.

IT IS A FACT

THAT THOUSANDS OF OUR BUSINESS MEN GO TO THEIR OFFICES IN THE MORNING AFTER AN UNEASY NIGHT, OR A LATE DINNER, FEELING DULL AND ALL OUT OF SORTS. THIS IS ENTIRELY UNNECESSARY, FOR A SINGLE DOSE OF THAT SPARKLING FOAMING SPECIFIC, TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT, TAKEN BEFORE BREAKFAST, WILL IMMEDIATELY DISPEL ALL FEELINGS OF HEAVINESS, REMOVE GENTLY BUT SURELY THE CAUSE, AND QUICKENS INTO HEALTHY ACTION EVERY FIBRE OF THE SYSTEM. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PLACE IT IN YOUR SAFE.

Invest $5 for a $10,000 Accident Policy with $50 Weekly Indemnity in the United States Mutual Accident Association,

320 & 322 Broadway, N. Y.,

and place it in your safe. Twenty-five dollars a year will carry this insurance, and should misfortune overtake you in the way of fatal or disabling injury, there will never be cause to regret your forethought and prudence.

European permits without extra charge.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS.

Call on any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

RAWSON'S (SELF-ADJUSTING) U.S. ARMY
SUSPENSORY BANDAGES.

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed. Support, Relief, Comfort.

AUTOMATICALLY ADJUSTABLE.

DISPLACEMENT IMPOSSIBLE.

The individual wearing it will not be conscious of its presence.

Lectures on Nervous Tension and Circular mailed free.

Sold by Druggists. E. B. E. RAWSON, Patentee, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Send by mail safely

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by first-class dealers the world over. Send 3 cents for circular. H. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

E. J. KNOWLTON, Ann Arbor, Mich.

"THE SEDETTE."

A complete spring, pillow, and mattress combined. The strongest and coolest folding bed. Price $5, at all furniture dealers. M. D. CHURCH SEDETTE CO., 45 Canal Street, N. Y. Send for Circular.

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, rubarts, and all impurities of the blood. Avoid crude, harsh waters, native and foreign. Such waters are positive irritants and impair the digestive organs and kidneys. None genuine on draught.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

CONSTIPATION.

Send your name and address to P. O. Box 993, New York City, for a circular, sent free, giving full information about the cause and cure of the above complaint.

Round Writing

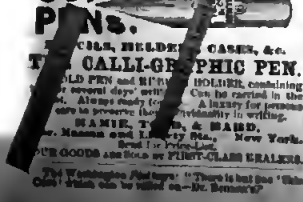
BOOK FOR SELF INSTR...

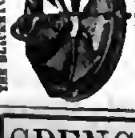
Mailed for $1.50 by Mathushek, 37 KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Pipe Sections, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c. Send for Descriptive Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.





BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Kinzie St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to

EDWARDS & BIDDLE, 45 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

Oh, how my head aches! Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills. It cures.

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID

of superior quality, claiming special excellence in the essentials of Fluidity, Color, and Durability.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 753 and 755 Broadway, N. Y.

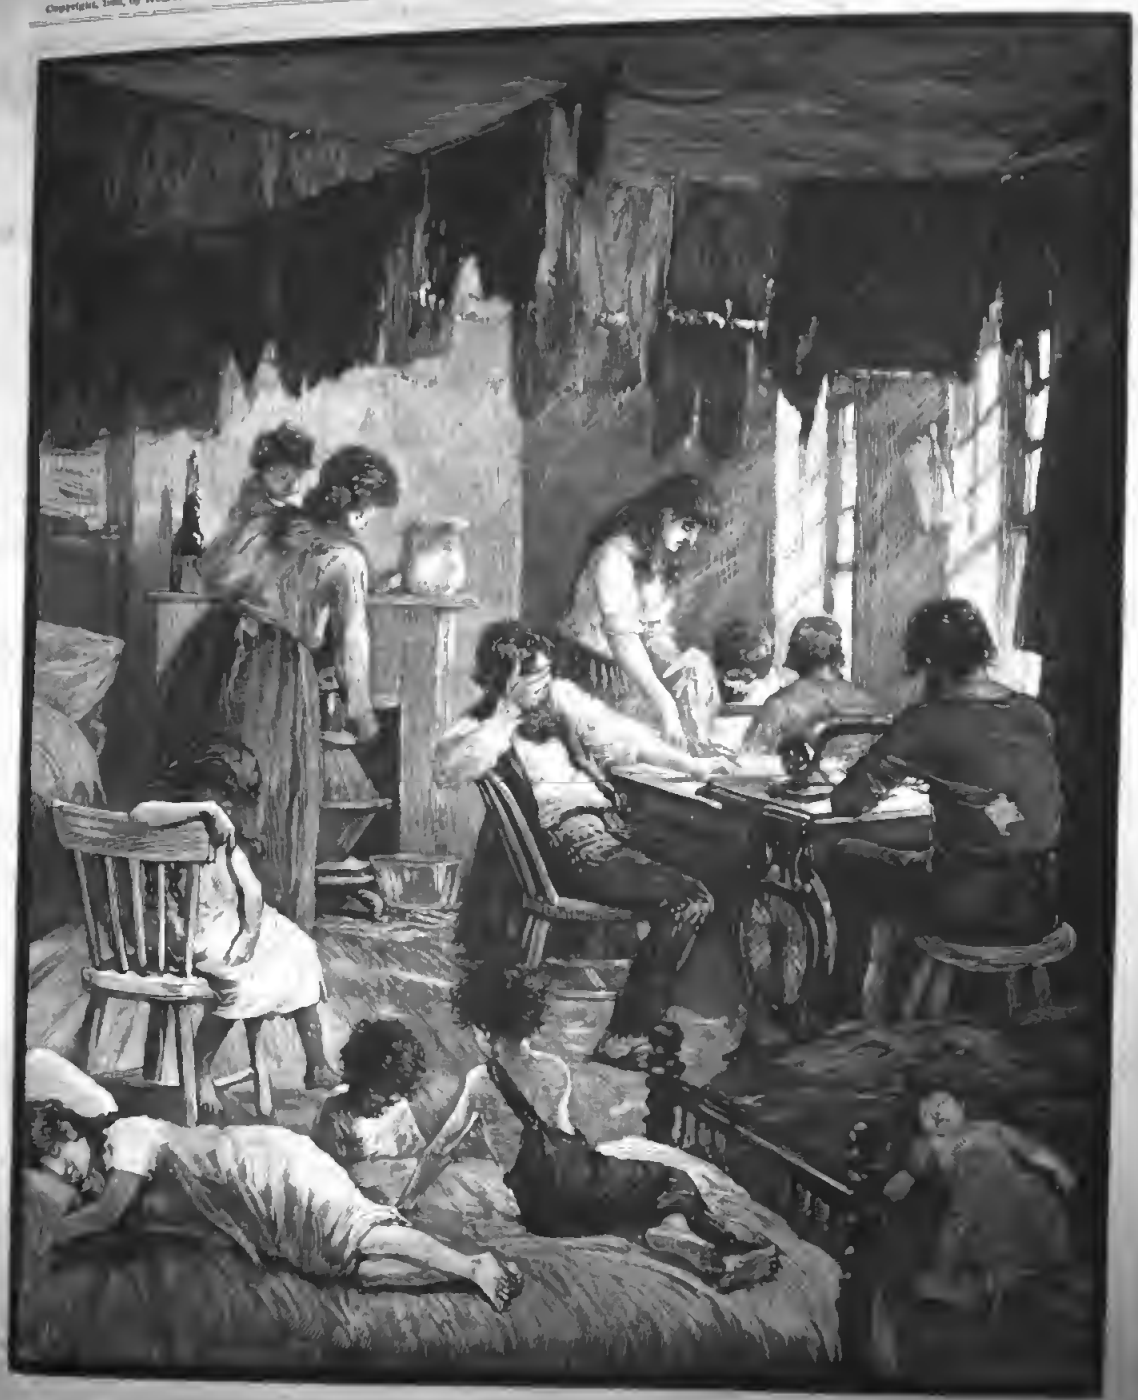
ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1398. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



HOMES OF THE POOR.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup.—[See Page 478.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1883.

A CAUTION.

We caution our Western readers to beware of an alleged book agent who has been soliciting orders for HARPER'S MAGAZINE at a dollar and a half a year. He is acting without authority from HARPER & BROTHERS. The price of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is four dollars a year, and no bookseller or news agent can buy it at double the price for which it is offered by this note.

Why will not persons who wish to subscribe for the periodicals of HARPER & BROTHERS send their orders through parties who are known to them, either the Postmaster or some bookseller or newsdealer, or remit directly to the firm? Agents who may be employed by HARPER & BROTHERS will always be provided with proper credentials.

A FOREIGN VIEW OF 1884

THE London Times is not a very shrewd commentator upon American politics, and its speculations have always a slightly acrid tone. A recent article, however, upon the present political situation in this country is a tolerably fair statement. It perceives that there are no great issues at stake, and that the contest will be "in square stand up fight between the Democrats and the Republicans." It holds that the chief advantage of the Democrats is the fatigue of the country with Republican rule and the curiosity to see what the Democrats will do. But it sees also the Democratic trouble arising from differences upon the tariff. The Republicans, it says, have the glory of their record and the advantage of the national patronage. On neither side is there a commanding personality to secure the nomination, and both parties, it thinks, will find it convenient to run "dark horses" at the last. The Times says truly that the mere desire of change is always stronger than theoretical politicians are willing to acknowledge, and it asserts that the people of this country are heartily tired of Republican rule.

The Thunderer, however, falls into the error of the "theoretical politicians." It is doubtless true that the mere desire of change and of giving the other side a turn is a powerful motive in practical politics. But its force at any particular time depends not upon a general theory, but upon the actual situation. So it is true that there is some sharp Republican criticism of some Republican acts. But what the Times calls hearty popular fatigue of Republican rule is not so obvious as profound popular distrust of Democratic dominance. The very fact which it mentions that the contest promises to be a simple square pull between all that Republicanism and all that Democracy means to the people of this country, is the best augury of Republican success. Among the many Republican advantages in such a situation is the fact that, whatever may be its offenses, the Republican party shows a will and a power to correct itself, which the Democratic party, although always equally upon trial, has never shown. The Times, moreover, forgets that party differences in this country have acquired a significance and gravity from the war which can not be disregarded. After the long national supremacy of one party, it is not unfair to expect that the mere desire of change may sometimes bring in another party which represents a different general policy. But if the other represents still more the tradition of bloody hostility to the government itself, the mere wish of change is much less effective. The Times admits that after the battle of Waterloo, with which the Tories were identified, they retained power, for that reason, for fifteen years.

Again, the desire of change is not strong in a time of general occupation, prosperity, and consequent contentment. Should there be a panic and business convulsion within a year, the dominant party would be thrown out as the VAN BUREN Democracy were overthrown in 1840. But should there be general business tranquillity, mills running, labor employed, enterprise active, the commercial mind quiet, then change would have a suspicious and not a seductive sound. It would mean, among other things, a clean sweep of the civil service, a vast cloud of cormorants settling upon Washington and every chief centre of patronage in the country, and effectually blocking the whole machinery of government at the very moment that its control passed into raw and inexperienced hands. This alone would alarm the true conservative sentiment of the country. The change, also, would be supposed to extend to tariff legislation. But when business is prosperous and sound the proposition to tinker the tariff is not agreeable either to capital or to labor. The hope of the Democracy lies, therefore, in national misfortune. When the ship is apparently sinking, any raft or plank or spar is trusted for the chance of safety. But it is simply "theoretical" to argue that because the desire of change is a powerful factor in politics it will be strong enough in itself to overthrow a party of the most patriotic and glorious record, under whose dominance the country is prosperous and content, in order to replace it with one whose past conduct is abhorred and whose future policy is feared.

THE PENNSYLVANIA IDEA.

THE Pennsylvania Republican platform has excited a great deal of remark, especially for its opening declarations:

"First. We unqualifiedly approve and demand the continuance of that system of protection to home industry which has proved itself to be the basis of national independence, the incentive in industrial skill and development, and the guarantee of a just and adequate scale of wages for labor, and we denounce all attempts to reduce the rates of the tariff below the level which will accomplish these objects.

"Second. That any surplus in the public Treasury arising from a redundant revenue should, after paying the national debt as fast as its conditions permit, be distributed from time to time to the several States, upon the basis of population, to relieve them from the burdens of local taxation, and provide means for the education of their people."

The first of these declarations was anticipated. A Pennsylvanian of any party is presumptively a protectionist, as an Italian is presumptively a Roman Catholic. He holds not only that protection is our true policy, but that it is so plainly seen to be so that the sentiment is twenty times stronger than it was twenty years ago. This Pennsylvania feeling seems to be justified by the platforms of all the political Conventions of the year. Directly or indirectly they all show the conviction that a declaration for free trade would be politically disastrous. They are all adapted for the perusal of the American laborer, who is supposed to study his paper to ascertain which party proposes to reduce him to the level of the pauper laborer of Europe. There is a great deal of juggling with the words "revenue" and "adjustment." But none of the platforms say free trade, and none of them mean free trade, and the tariff is not really an issue.

Those, however, who, with Senator SHERMAN, believe it to be an issue, and who, like him, favor protection, should not criticise too sharply the second of the Pennsylvania declarations. The Pennsylvanians are thorough and sincere protectionists. They may be supposed to understand the subject from their point of view, and what they propose, therefore, is worthy of serious attention. The second of these propositions springs logically from the first. If a tariff should be laid for protection, in other words, if the country should be taxed in order to enable it to compete in its own markets as well as in foreign markets with the industry and skill of other countries, a redundant revenue may be often expected, because it can not be assumed that the amount of taxation necessary for the expenses of the government is the precise amount necessary for protection. The object of the tax is, in the case supposed, not primarily to pay the expenses of the government, and as there is no limit to protection, and as all industries have an equal claim to it, the tendency will be to a constantly larger surplus. This must be disposed of in some way, and the disposition proposed in Pennsylvania is distribution among the States upon the basis of population, in order to diminish local taxation and to foster education. This particular method and object of distribution may not be agreeable to all protectionists; but redundancy and distribution are essential parts of the general scheme of protection, and the party which declares for that policy declares for its logical results.

President ARTHUR in his Message at the opening of the last session of Congress pointed out in very forcible language, and to the general approval of the country, some of the consequences of a surplus, and he also laid down the general principle of taxation in a way which was very acceptable. He said that while there are differences as to the true principles of taxation and the best methods of raising revenue, there is substantial agreement in the view that only such taxes should be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the government. As for the surplus, he said that it must lie idle in the Treasury, or the government must buy its own bonds at an enormous premium, or it would foster, as experience had shown, an extravagant expenditure. This was good Republican doctrine last winter. But the Message of the Republican President, the debate in Congress upon revision of the tariff, and the platform declarations of both the parties during the summer show plainly that the tariff is not an issue upon which the parties divide, and that Democratic protectionists and Republican revenue reformers will each abide with their own party.

A GROSS PUBLIC OFFENSE.

THE case of HORTON in the Internal Revenue Department is of much more than personal or temporary interest. Mr. EVANS, the new Commissioner, is one of the latest important appointments of the President, and his conduct necessarily involves the good faith of the Administration toward the reformed system, which went into full effect on the 16th of July. That system applies under the bill to about ten thousand positions only in the minor public service. But the bill became law in obedience to a decisive public sentiment, which demands—and for the most cogent reasons connected with the public welfare—that the spirit of the law, which in its immediate application is limited to a part of the service, shall be honestly observed in every branch of it, and that the higher appointments shall not be made in a manner which implies that the support given by the Administration to the new system is merely formal and parliamentary. The reformed system is now the law of the land, and any disregard of its plain purpose and scope is an offense which the Administration is as morally bound to correct as the similar infringement of any other law. If under a distinct hard money policy of Congress and the Administration a Secretary of the Treasury, without expressly violating the letter of the law, should be found bringing it into utter contempt by throwing the whole weight of his official influence in favor of soft money and its adherents, the President would justly call him to account. This is the precise position of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to the reform policy which in obedience to public opinion has been adopted by Congress and the President.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, who was summarily removed by Commissioner EVANS, was well known in the department as one of its very best officers. He is a man of conspicuous business ability and experience, and of the most modest fidelity to duty. In one instance alone the recovery to the Treasury of $186,000, a tax rightfully due, which had wholly escaped the attention of the local officers, was entirely owing, as Commissioner RAUM officially stated, to Mr ELDRIDGE'S "sagacious vigilance," and it was but one instance of the "marked ability and zeal" which in "numerous other cases" had resulted in similar advantage to the government. This officer, of the highest character, ability, and efficiency, whose peculiar fitness for the place is especially commended by one of the most capable commissioners who have presided in the bureau, is summarily dismissed as incompetent by a new Commissioner before he knows anything of his official duties, or can possibly judge the competency of his subordinates, and the Commissioner replaces him by a hack politician, who within a week is charged with previously levying black-mail. Driven to order an investigation, the Commissioner declined to publish the report, but declaring that HORTON was innocent, demanded his resignation on the ground that public discussion of the subject injured the Administration. HORTON naturally declined to acknowledge his guilt by resigning, and the Commissioner formally removed him.

It would be difficult to imagine a greater offense against the plainest principles of an honorable public service, or one which merits more peremptory action upon the part of an Administration which professes the principles of reform. The removal of ELDRIDGE was a wanton defiance of every sound principle of administration and of the essential spirit of the new law. Causeless removal of an honest and efficient civil servant is a gross public wrong. The Commissionership of Internal Revenue is a great public trust, which in this proceeding the Commissioner has prostituted to a personal purpose, and has shown himself to be totally unfitted for the office that he fills.

THE TILDEN MYTH.

THE Evening Post had recently an amusing article upon the absurd stories about Mr TILDEN. They are the joke of the season. With very brief intervals some person or paper, assuming to speak with peculiar authority, issues a bulletin of Mr TILDEN'S health and opinions and intentions, and taken together they read like the opening of DICKENS'S Tale of Two Cities: "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity; it was the season of light, it was the season of darkness; it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair; we had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to heaven, we were all going direct the other way." This is the strain of the TILDEN bulletins and the present prospectus of the Democratic party.

The Times adds to this comedy a long and solemn statement from some anonymous source, the result of "recent prolonged interviews" with the "sage of Greystone." According to this historian, the sage does not consider the duties of the Presidency to be very arduous—although, as he is in perfect health and remarkable vigor, that view is not of particular importance, since, however arduous the duties might be, he could turn them off as nimbly as he leaps all the fences upon his morning stroll through his farm. Should a grateful country choose to summon him, with Brother HENDRICKS, to a post which cipher dispatches failed to enable him to reach some years since, the historian is very sure that he would permit the country to have its own way.

Warming to his work, the faithful chronicler proceeds to announce that Mr. TILDEN is the father of civil service reform, and the next bulletin will probably inform us that he is also the author of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States. It is evident that the sage greatly resembles the late Joey Bagstock. He is very "sly"; for, as father of civil service reform, while Mr JUDGE was stating the evil, and proposing a practical method of reform, and seeming to be a leader in the good work, the real author of the movement was promoting it by serving as chairman of TWEED'S Democratic committee in New York. In further vindication of his claims it is only necessary to recall the campaign of 1876, the cipher dispatches, the nincompoop bureau—the campaign, in a word, which President WOOLSEY characterized as more the personal enterprise of the candidate than any in our history. Mr. TILDEN'S familiar methods in politics are so peculiarly those of a civil service reformer that it is surprising how completely it has escaped public attention that he is the real father of reform, and it is an act of great kindness upon the part of the author of the latest bulletin to reveal the great truth. Alas! we say the latest, but we remember that a still more authoritative authority has issued a still later bulletin, describing that which contains all this information as—humbug. We are constrained to believe that it is correct. Indeed, the only difficulty is to determine which of all the TILDEN bulletins is the greatest humbug.

TORTURING CHILDREN.

THE Utica Herald was moved by its observation of the treatment of young children by mothers and nurses in that city on the Fourth of July to say that it believed that there is more cruelty to children in this country than there is cruelty to animals, and that it was wonderful that no society had yet been organized to compel mothers not to torture their children on the Fourth of July. They harness the little helpless ones in fine toggery, says the indignant Herald, and march with them into a riotous crowd, keeping them for hours in the fierce rays of a pitiless sun, until the maternal curiosity is satisfied.

The infantile suffering which moves the ire of the Herald is a familiar spectacle, and it is the thoughtless treatment of children, culminating in training them for public exhibitions, which led to the formation of the excellent society for their protection of which Mr. GERRY is president. The effort of the society, like that of Mr. BERGH'S, has been most beneficial. The mere fact of the existence of an association for the protection of animals against cruel treatment of itself secures better treatment, because the brutes who torment animals know that every blow and kick may be seen by an agent of the society, who will exact the penalty.

The children's protection society renders a similar service. Every parent or manager who exposes a child to danger or to the destruction of its health for public amusement knows that it can not be done with impunity, and the managers do not shrink from discharging the humane duty which they have undertaken. The form of cruelty which the Herald deories, however, can be remedied only by personal appeal. If ladies who meet nurses and mothers every day trundling infants with their faces turned helplessly upward to a blazing sun would remonstrate with them temperately, they would at least save some children, and lessen the gross amount of suffering. Half of the torture which is inflicted arises from thoughtlessness, and many a mother would be grateful for a kindly suggestion which should show her what she was doing.

PRESIDENTIAL PREFERENCES.

SOME weeks since the New York Times sent out 400 letters to as many points in the thirty-eight States of the Union, asking the names of the persons who were most spoken of in that vicinity as candidates for the Presidency upon both sides. Answers have been received from all of the points—an average of about nine for each State—and the Times tabulates the preferences and summarizes the sentiment in each State. The canvass shows that in neither party is there any especial preference.

Upon the Republican side the favorite is Mr BLAINE, who receives 103 voices, against 64 for President ARTHUR, 63½ for Mr EDMUNDS, 19 for General GRANT, 17 for Mr SHERMAN, and 14 for Mr LOGAN. Upon the Democratic side Mr TILDEN leads with 120, against 72½ for Mr MCDONALD, 31½ for Mr. BAYARD, 26 for General HANCOCK, 20½ for General BUTLER, and 17½ for Mr THURMAN. As a straw such a return shows that Mr BLAINE is the Republican who has the largest personal following, and Mr TILDEN the Democrat. But that those who personally prefer these gentlemen would think it good party policy to nominate them is of course doubtful.

The Presidential election is largely a question of the preference of a very few States. The ammunition is not determined by leadership, ability, or standing. It is a matter of close calculation and management. If there were an either side a man who would be tolerably sure of carrying New York, for instance, he would be nominated, unless at the last moment the intrigues in the Conventions were too powerful. Thanks to the attempted brutal tyranny of the unit rule in the last Republican Convention, and to the general situation, the next Convention will be exceedingly independent.

ENGLAND AND NIAGARA.

THE preservation of Niagara is so justly felt to be the interest of all intelligent people in the world that it is not surprising to find a long and admirable article upon the subject in the London Spectator, which says:

"The falls of Niagara can not be regarded as specially belonging to America, but must be considered as raising for the advantage of mankind, an traveller crosses the ocean without visiting them, and England has already taken an important part in the efforts for their preservation indeed, we may almost say that it was on Englishman with whom those efforts originated. It is much to be decried, therefore, that the English public should understand what is involved in the question, how great is the necessity for preservative measures, and what form it is proposed that those measures shall take. If once these points were clearly understood and widely known, there would certainly be such a distinct expression of opinion in England as would render easier the task to be accomplished in America, for in spite of the frequent and half-joking assumption of careless independence, every one who is really familiar with American life knows that by the vast majority of one's kin beyond sea' any genuine word from England is received with kindly respect."

The Spectator describes in detail the nature of the mischief and the proposed remedy. The object is simply to restore the original condition to a sublime and beautiful natural scene. It is to be freed from all that is merely sensational and sordid. The Spectator understands precisely the scope of the action of the Commission, that it is preliminary, and that the final decision lies with the Legislature next winter. In conclusion it says:

"We can not believe that a measure which would be so welcome to the world at large, which would confer both material and moral benefit upon the country, which is demanded by every sentiment of consideration for those who are to come after us—a measure in which future generations will find a proof of the civilization of our age—will be rejected because America, with its embarrassing public wealth and its gigantic private fortunes, can not find the sum of two hundred thousand pounds for such a purpose. We do not hesitate to say that English opinion will be unanimous upon the result, whichever way it may be, and an trust that the unanimity may be in the form of grateful recognition of an act of enlightened legislation."

HENRY IRVING.

MR. HENRY IRVING has certainly received "a good sendoff" from his friends in London. But he seems to be fully aware that English cheers can not secure for him American success, and that he must make every step of his way in this country for himself. He need not fear the result if he have the real power, for in no country is the audience of the theatre less prejudiced or more generous than here. It welcomes and honors the masters of every school, and its censure, when it falls, is never cruel, as in some other lands.

It is not easy to determine from the reports the probability of Mr. IRVING'S success. He is apparently not a descendant of the declamatory school of the KEMBLES, nor of the romantic school of KEAN. He hardly maintains the "great traditions" of the English stage, but relies upon a certain elaborate picturesqueness which permits extreme artificiality. But that his style may be saved will not impair its effect if he be a master.

He will find the audience less homogeneous than in London. New York is as completely a cosmopolitan city that every taste and standard will be represented in its audiences. But the difference and the uncertainty doubtless add zest to his anticipation. Some of the mark that he has made in England, he will await with curious interest the American verdict upon the most noted living British actor.

THE TELEGRAPHERS' STRIKE

AT ten minutes past noon on Thursday, July 19, all but a few score of the telegraphic operators in the city of New York left their instruments. At the same moment several thousand men and women engaged in like work, from New Orleans to Omaha, quit their places, as did a considerable portion of the telegraphers throughout the Dominion of Canada. The strike was brought about by the Executive Committee of the Brotherhood of Telegraphers. It was arranged with great skill, and executed with marvellous precision and determination, and the position to which the employing companies were forced was one well calculated to bring them to terms. Yet, with all sympathy for the telegraphers in their wrongs, so far as they are real, it is a grave question whether the public can hold them warranted in so summary and an avenging a method of obtaining redress. If it be true, as they claim, that nothing short of this would have any effect upon their employers then the blame must rest upon the latter. What is beyond doubt is that the public has been put to very serious and almost universal inconvenience and loss by this dispute.

The function of the telegraph in our highly organized commercial and social life has come to be as general and as important as that of the mail. In some respects it is even more of a necessity. Business could no more be accomplished without it now than without the railway or the steam-ship. Not only is it an indispensable instrumentality in ordinary exchanges, but it is absolutely necessary for the safe and easy administration of the railways themselves. It is a public employment like that of the police, or the gas and electric light companies, or the railroads. It ought not to be exposed to interruption any more than these. That is not to say that the telegraph companies should have irresponsible control of their employés on such terms as they choose to grant; but there should be some established and impartial method by which differences between the former and the latter could be fairly adjusted without throwing the business of a continent into confusion. The business of the telegraph, like that of the railways, only in a far greater degree, is an affair of the public, which the legislative power should regulate sufficiently to guard the public interests. If ever there was a fair field for the exercise of compulsory arbitration, this would seem to be one. Many of the charges brought against the Western Union Telegraph Company, which by its enormous business and extensive influence practically controls the action of all other companies, are unquestionably true. The company has shown in its dealings with the operators something of the same grasping and unscrupulous spirit that it has betrayed in its stock operations. But if all the charges were true there would still be in such a strike as the one recently entered on a public injury against which the authorities ought to protect the community.

PERSONAL.

HAYDEN TAYLOR used to say that of all men he had ever seen RAWTHORNE was most remarkable for possessing eyes that flashed fire, the pupils being sometimes so dilated as to render the iris invisible. GLADSTONE has similar eyes, and some of his friends attribute to them Queen VICTORIA'S lack of fondness for that statesman. Her Majesty, they say, has no several occasions been actually terrified by GLADSTONE'S gaze.

—The conductors on our street cars receive so little mention of a favorable sort that the kind office of one of them toward a blind passenger on the Third Avenue line the other day may fitly be spoken of. Nothing could have been more considerate or kinder than this model conductor's treatment of that blind woman, both while she was trying to enter the car and while she was leaving it. "That is the fourth or fifth blind person," he remarked to a bystander, "whom I have carried to-day."

—A New York woman of genius made about three thousand dollars last season to recitations at entertainments in private houses and on the lyceum stage, her terms for the former phase being fifty dollars a reading.

—The success of the use of the roof of the Casino as a place for evening promenade will remind some New Yorkers that Mr O. B. BUNCE was the first writer to suggest to the American public the expediency of using our city roofs for such a purpose. About eight years ago, in an article in Appleton's Journal, he discussed the subject at length, and pointed out the advantages of utilizing those cool and quiet places as summer evening resorts. The results of the experiment at the Casino seem to indicate that were the owners of fine city houses in the habit of spending more of their time in them during the dog days, they would arrange to spend some time upon them also.

—The question of the best method of clothing the human body so as to make it resemble a marble statue is of some interest occasionally as managers of private theatricals. Persons who have never tried the use of unbleached muslin will be surprised to see how successfully it accomplishes that end when under the influence of gas-light. It hangs in graceful folds, and its tone is exquisitely soft and mellow. Other fabrics, much more expensive, may be made available, but unbleached muslin is at the same time the cheapest and the most illusive. A lady of this city who recently appeared at a private theatrical entertainment in the part of a marble statue, dressed in unbleached muslin, achieved a success that not only delighted the artistic taste of her friends, but noted the financial vigor of her husband. In art it is the manner rather than the matter that charms. The grays of a weather-worn old mill fence are beautiful.

—A well-known sculptor while leaving the hall of a New York club-house had his attention called to a sleek bust of a distinguished actor which stood near the principal entrance. "That's a fine portrait," remarked his friend, admiringly. "A fine likeness, possibly," replied the artist, "but not a portrait. A portrait is an interpretation of character."

—In conversation with a visitor, some time ago, ex Governor HOFFMAN expressed his surprise and regret that in none of the public commemorative monuments in this country has the stalwart figure of the Indian appeared with any prominence. The ex Governor has particularly requested that the negligence shall not be repeated in the monument to be erected on the battle-field of Oriskany, near Utica.

—The author of a forth-coming book on social etiquette has made special and prudent mention of the fact that when a gentleman is calling upon a lady it is unnecessary for his hostess to worry him by persisting in relieving him of the care of his hat and cane. These useful articles, it is presumed, may safely remain in the custody of the caller himself.

—In 1857 M RENAN wrote, "I am proud of my pessimism." In 1883 he writes, "In bidding adieu to life I shall only have to thank the source of all Good for the delightful passage through reality which I have been permitted to accomplish."

—M MICHELET is about to publish a volume of recollections of his childhood and youth. One of his friends, M MORON, who has read the MS, declares that its contents are "truly edifying, and make one love their author."

—The works of WAGNER have become classic in Paris since the composer's death, says a French critic, and are listened to with devout and enthusiastic reverence. Three orchestras have given WAGNER concerts, and one of them—M LAMOUREUX'S—showed rare intelligence in the execution of the selections from Lohengrin, Parsifal, and the Meistersinger.

—The volunteer regiments in England consist mainly of unmarried young men belonging to the working classes and to the clerical staffs of commercial houses, and the commander of one of those regiments declares that in order to be successful a volunteer officer must have military instincts and capacity, power of command and of influencing men, a whole-minded devotion of nearly all his leisure to his duty, and a tolerably lengthy purse, for all of which he receives a title seldom used off parade (the sum of Colonel HAVELOCK being an exception), a shadowy precedence, never exercised, and the more or less expressed opinion of his friends that he is rather a fool for his pains. On accepting his commission he pays about $300 for his uniform, and is subjected to a yearly expenditure of $100 if a lieutenant, and $1000 if a lieutenant-colonel.

—Dr WILLIAM A. HAMMOND says that the reason why life-insurance companies decline to issue policies to women is because of a woman's inability to be exact in regard to her age, in regard to the diseases she may have had, in regard to her mode of life, and in regard to other matters in which exactness is required.

—The life of a popular novelist can not be wholly happy, according to a late reviewer. We feel, whether one is undergoing the mesmeric gale on the Bay of Biscay or watching a Nile steamer from the deck of a smooth-gliding dahabeah, whether one be amid the stern grandeur of the Highlands or in the softer scenery of Oatlands Park, whether one shoot in Ireland or fish in Scotland, that one's sensations and experiences are not one's own, but part of one's stock in trade, must rather detract from the enjoyment of life.

—JULES CLARETIE on ALEXANDRE DUMAS: "When DUMAS died he was almost forgotten. The last years of his life had been sad. His novels were no longer read, and his dramas no longer accepted. But since then justice has been done to him; this great celebrity has recovered his rank, and the next generation will admire him as we used to admire him. I know very clever men who prefer a tale of MÉRIMÉE's to all the romances of DUMAS. I also know lovers of flowers who prefer a rare rose to a leafy forest. I prefer the power of nature and the luxuriance of genius. And then DUMAS was kind, simple, sympathetic, without haughtiness and without affectation. He had all the faults and also many of the virtues of France."

—At a public meeting in London, over which Lady BRASSEY presided, Miss SIMCOX asked "What respectable, responsible lady would offer a char-woman sixpence a day and an umbrella? Yet ladies buy goods of employers who pay women at that rate for their hard work."

—Mr J. A. FROUDE'S latest magazine article is devoted to MARTIN LUTHER. He warms enthusiastic over the Reformer. "The appearance of LUTHER before the Diet of Worms is one of the finest—perhaps it is the very finest—scene in human history. Many a man has encountered death bravely for a cause which he knows to be just, when he is sustained by the sympathy of those made, of whom he is at the moment the champion and the representative. But it is one thing to suffer, and another to encounter face to face and single-handed the array of spiritual and temporal authorities which are ruling supreme. LUTHER'S very cause was yet unshaped and undetermined, and the minds of those around him wavered and followed him were hanging in suspense for the issue of the trial. There was no one side a solitary [illegible] monk, and on the other the legate of the devil [illegible] had broken the spirit of kings [illegible] of Providence say that [illegible] Germany had ever found a peril that [illegible] this

SCENES IN AND AROUND SARATOGA SPRINGS.—Drawn by Harry Fenn.—[See Page 470.]

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Mademoiselle," "Major Du Manoir," "No New Thing," "Heaps of Money," etc.

CHAPTER VII.—(Continued.)

THE RECTOR HAS FRIENDS TO DINNER.

All this was before Maud's time. Her advent had naturally brought about a change both in the appearance of the house and in the habits of those who frequented it, and her skill had effected a transformation in the Rectory drawing room which Mrs. Farquhar either had not been able or had not cared to accomplish for years. In those days the national taste with regard to domestic decoration had not been raised to its present exalted level; nevertheless, it was into an extremely pretty room that I followed my uncle and Mrs. Farquhar on the evening above alluded to. I don't suppose much additional money had been laid out upon it. The carpet, the sofas, and the chairs were the old familiar ones, which had probably been purchased by the late Mrs. Dennison before Maud's birth; but some people have a wonderful knack of re-arrangement, and can achieve the most astonishing results with the simplest of materials to work upon. I did not then scrutinize details as one learns to do with advancing years; all I saw was that by some magic or other a wilderness had been turned into a garden. There were flowers everywhere; a bank of them could be seen in the slim conservatory upon which one of the windows opened. The faint scent of them filled the air. The light did not come from glaring lamps placed on a level with one's eyes, like ours at home, but fell softly from wax candles in the old sconces on the wall. Maud, in a pale blue dress, the fashion of which I will not particularize, lest to the reader's unaccustomed eyes it should seem less charming than it really was, rose from the piano as we made our entrance; the Rector beamed upon us from the hearth-rug, and advanced, holding out both hands.

"Well, Le Marchant, this is a treat. How long is it since you last dined in my house? You don't remember, eh? Nor do I; but I know it's a good many years. Can't say you haven't been asked, though. Yes, yes, my dear fellow, I quite understand. Turning out at night is a nuisance, and one grows lazy as one grows old. Isn't that so, Mrs. Farquhar? We are all apt to grow lazy—all except you. You set us a grand example in that respect. To tell you the truth, I should be inclined to renounce going to dinner parties myself if it were not for Maud. It wouldn't be fair to shut her out of all society. No party to-night, you know—only ourselves. I asked young Warren to join us, but he says he can't spare an evening—reading hard for his degree. Good fellow that—capital fellow. Charley, my friend, go and do likewise. You imitate George Warren, and we'll imitate Mrs. Farquhar, and then it 'll be all right, won't it?"

The good Rector's voluble welcome had a touch of nervousness in it. Very likely he as well as I may have counted upon Mrs Farquhar's refusal of the invitation sent to her, and he may have felt some anxiety as to the spirit in which she would meet his advances. She, while he was speaking, had been letting her eyes roam round the room and its adornments. Obviously she was saying to herself: "Roses in January! And in the parish clergyman's house, too! This is not as it should be; this shows sinful waste and extravagance. How many starving families might have been relieved with the money that has been lavished on rearing these useless flowers!" But she did not express her thoughts aloud. No one could be more agreeable than Mrs. Farquhar when it pleased her to be so, and such was her pleasure now. She made a brisk, sprightly little speech to the Rector in acknowledgment of his compliment to her activity, she took Maud's hand and patted it quite affectionately, whispering, "My dear, what a lovely dress!"—and so by-and-by we all went in to dinner upon terms of peace and harmony.

I really believe that Mrs Farquhar intended to be pleasant and to keep the peace that evening. I think she was indistinctly conscious that there were people who disliked contradiction, that my uncle was one of them, and that the Rector possibly was another; and although this might strike her as a weak and somewhat contemptible trait in a person's character, I am inclined to give her credit for a humble willingness to make allowances for it. I know that she was putting some sort of vigorous restraint upon herself, because I saw her more than once gasp and shut up her lips tightly, instead of uttering the observation which was evidently upon the tip of her tongue.

But it was impossible that she should go on in this way very long. Her notion of conversation was discussion, and when warmth and good cheer had produced the effect upon her which they produce upon all of us, she naturally felt a wish to converse. Then she began to discuss; and my uncle, who had been unusually cheerful and chatty up to that moment, subsided into silence. The rest of us, I think, behaved pretty well. We all knew by this time that there was an sort of use in arguing with Mrs. Farquhar, and we endeavored, by a prompt and unanimous surrender of our opinions, and a hasty skipping from subject to subject, to stave off the denouement for which her soul was thirsting. The worst of this system of dialogue is that it becomes bewildering after the first ten minutes or so, and is apt to lead one into introducing a dangerous topic from sheer inadvertence and lack of something to say. Thus it was that the Rector, putting his brain hard a-port to avoid the Scylla of politics, steered full into the Charybdis of cricket on Sunday afternoons (an innovation which had been introduced during the summer into an adjoining parish), and had declared this to be an excellent idea before he could stop himself.

Mrs. Farquhar threw up her hands in consternation. "Mr. Dennison," she exclaimed, "you take my breath away!"

But this was only a figure of speech: her breath served her very well for the delivery of a spirited homogeon, in which the sin of desecrating the Sabbath, and the consequences entailed thereby, were set forth in the plainest terms.

"Well, well," observed the Rector, when she had done, "I know you don't take quite the same view of the matter in Scotland that we do."

"Mr. Dennison," said the old lady, impressively, "do you or do you not read the Fourth Commandment to the people every Sabbath day in church?"

"Why, of course I do," answered the Rector, turning at bay; "but the Fourth Commandment enjoins abstinence from work, not from play; and, besides, the Sabbath is a Jewish institution, wholly distinct from our Sunday."

Mrs. Farquhar rejoined that if we were to begin explaining away the Commandments in that fashion, it was not easy to see where we were to stop. Did Mr Dennison consider himself at liberty to put his own interpretation upon all the precepts laid down in the Bible? And as the controversy went on for a quarter of an hour, Everybody has heard so often all that there is to be said upon this subject, and everybody is so heartily sick of it, that the details of this particular dispute need not be recorded.

Of course the Rector got the worst of it. He ended by urging feebly then it was better for young men to be playing a healthy game of cricket than fuddling themselves in the village public-house.

"They should be doing neither the one nor the other," cried Mrs Farquhar. "They should be in the church listening to the Word."

"But they won't go to church in the afternoon."

"And whose fault is that? Why is it that the Scots are the most sober and God fearing people in the world?"

"Are the Scotch a sober people?"

"They are. And why? Because the ministers do their duty; because a man who profaned the Sabbath by playing cricket upon it anywhere north of the Tweed would be—eh?—I think he would be just stoned. To say that they will not go to church in nonsense. They should be made to go. Show me a godless parish, and I will show you a godless minister."

"My dear mother," remonstrated my uncle.

"I'm speaking generally, Bernard. Mr Dennison will understand that I'm sure."

The Rector kept his temper. "Admitting, for the sake of argument—" he began.

"Oh," interrupted Mrs. Farquhar, with a shake of her head and a smile, "I would be sorry to admit anything for the sake of argument. I think that would be a very poor reason for making admissions."

My uncle had a little laugh at this; and the Rector continued, with some slight impatience: "Admitting that the Church of England clergy are an inefficient body, the problem remains the same. Here you have a number of young men who won't consent to spend the greater part of their one weekly holiday in church, how are you to keep them from spending it in the ale-house?"

"Not by leading them out of one sin into another," answered Mrs. Farquhar, decisively. "The minister's duty is to uphold his testimony. If they will not hear him, he is not to blame, and he has an authority to interfere with a sinner's liberty of choice. Let him uphold his testimony. I do not think, Mr Dennison," she added, quietly, "that you have given that plan a trial as yet."

"Are you not a little bit illogical, mother?" struck in my uncle, perceiving that the speaker was no longer dealing with generalities, and deeming it time to effect a diversion. "You told just now that the sinners might to be coerced."

"Nay, my dear Bernard," answered Mrs. Farquhar in accents of gentle reproof, "I think it is you who are illogical."

"HERE SHE TOOK UP HER STATION, RESTING HER ELBOWS UPON THE BACK OF A WOODEN CHAIR."

Heaven only knows what she meant, but such retorts were common with her and were most effective. What rejoinder could be made to a woman who turned upon you with an exasperatingly meaningless speech as that? My uncle and the Rector exchanged expressive glances, and said no more. Mrs. Farquhar looked soothingly round the table, as if to challenge further opposition, and obtaining no response, enjoyed her legitimate triumph.

We did not sit long over our wine after the ladies left us, nor was our intercourse of that free and cheerful kind which should have been a natural result of the occasion. I think that my uncle wanted to apologize for Mrs. Farquhar's rudeness, and that the Rector wished to say it was a matter of no importance at all, but it was not exactly easy for either of them to put his thoughts into words, and as the Rector's Madeira hardly received its just need of attention.

When we entered the drawing-room I left the old people to themselves—for it seemed to me that too much time had been fettered away in listening to their disputes—and made straight for the corner where Maud was sitting, with a look of patient resignation upon her face.

"Come into the conservatory," I said, boldly; "I want to see that new flower."

I made this demand upon the sound old principle that it is always well to ask for more than you expect to get. There is something in the very name of a conservatory which suggests flirtation, and I thought that an immediate move thither was just the sort of thing dear would be certain to strike Maud as ridiculous. So that it was something of a surprise to me to see her rise at once and step out through the open window without a word.

I followed her into the dusk and fragrance beyond, not without a commentary uncomfortable consciousness of the smile which was probably stealing over the features of the three matrons [illegible] behind my back, and she passed on till she reached the [illegible] which opened on to the lawn. Here she took up her [illegible] ing her elbows upon the back of a wooden chair, and [illegible] at the pale moonlight of a misty winter night. The [illegible] a delightful and thrilling [illegible] and I [illegible] grange in which to clothe [illegible] that [illegible] ai[illegible] with me, I [illegible] pa[illegible] But I [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible], I held [illegible] peace.

By-and-by she turned round, as if she had only [illegible]

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 301.

Digitized by Google

my presence, and asked, "Was it the auriculas that you wanted to see?"

"No," I answered; "it wasn't the auriculas."

"Nor the hydrangeas?"

"No."

"Nor the unique palmyranian which we would not sell for its weight in gold?"

"Well, no, I think not."

"Ah," she said, gravely, "that is just as well, because none of these flowers happen to be in bloom, so you might have known. It is not an impertinent question, what did you want to see?"

"I wanted to see the most beautiful flower that the Rectory ever possessed, or ever will possess," I replied, ore seriously. "I wanted to see you."

"Oh," said Maud, who did not appear to be either flattered or flattered by this direct and original compliment. "I think," she added, consideringly, after a minute or two—"I think if I were you, Charley, I wouldn't try to say pretty things. At least I would put off all attempts of the kind for several years. Thank you very much, all the same, I know you meant it well; but, between ourselves, it did sound rather idiotic."

"And if I were you," I retorted, warmly, "I wouldn't try to say sharp things. You only succeed in being ill-natured."

She drew herself up, and looked decidedly offended, which was a salve to my wounded feelings. "I do not like to be called ill-natured," said she.

"Neither do I like to be called idiotic," I remarked.

"But I did not call you so. I said you had made a speech which sounded idiotic, and so it did. Besides, I only told you as a friend, and for your own good. If I had not, you might have gone and said the same thing to somebody else, who would have laughed at you in her sleeve, without making an kind allowances, as I do."

"I should never have said the same thing to any one else in the world," I declared.

"Perhaps, after all, somebody else would have been pleased. Some day or other somebody else is sure to be pleased when you say idiotic things to her; only you ought to have more sense of appropriateness. No same person would ever think of telling his sister that she was like a flower, and I sang you to look upon me as a sort of sister—an elder sister."

"Now I do wonder," I exclaimed, "whether you speak like that just to anger me, or whether you really mean it?"

"Why should it enrage you?" asked Maud, with an air of the most innocent surprise. "Would you not like to have a sister?—or is it that you still object to me calling myself older than you? I can't help that, if you will persist in having such boyish ways. Only boys get angry to being told they are young."

This was too much! If in truth she regarded me in the light of a boy and a brother, what had she meant by looking at me as she had done after I pulled her out of the water? I turned away in deep dudgeon. "Had we not better go back to the drawing-room?" I asked, with dignity.

But she burst out laughing. "How easy it is to send you off into a huff!" she exclaimed. "Please forgive me for this once, and I will try not to give offense again. No, we won't go back to the drawing-room yet, unless you are in a particular hurry. Do you know why I came out here?"

"Not to please me, evidently," I answered.

"No, not to please you; only to get you out of the way. I knew they wanted to talk about you, those three, and I suppose they are talking about you to this moment."

"How do you know they are talking about me?" I asked.

"My father let it out—you know how he lets everything out. It seems that Mrs. Farquhar has been consulting him lately upon the subject of the great mystery, and what ought to be done about it. As far as I can make out, he and she don't agree; but then they both disagree with your uncle; and as you were invited to dinner tonight in order that they might make a combined attack upon him."

"I don't know what this precious mystery may be, and I don't care," I said, "but if it concerns my uncle and me, I wish they would let us settle it between us. We have got on pretty well hitherto without help."

"Yes; but Mr Le Marchant is a person who listens to advice."

"He hardly ever takes it, though," I cried, eager to clear my uncle from an imputation which it appeared to me had been uttered with a certain spice of contempt.

Maud made no rejoinder. She had shifted her attitude a little, and was now leaning against the wood-work which supported the tiers of flowerpots, with her elbow resting upon one of the steps, and her hand under her chin. The pale moonlight fell upon her face, which wore a serious look. "How I should have hated to live in the days when there were no railways or telegraphs, and no post to speak of!" she exclaimed at last, quite irrelevantly.

I said the world under those conditions would not have suited me very well either, and asked what had put the thought of that benighted era into her head.

"I was only thinking," she answered, "that it is not quite so bad to part with one's friends nowadays as it would have been then. Of course you will change a great deal—that can't be helped. Still, I suppose you will come down to the old place from time to time, and see us all jogging on in the old way, till some of us jog off altogether. You won't lose sight of us and forget all about us. Fifty years ago a young man went out into the world, and there was an end of him. When he came back his friends had to make acquaintance with him all over again, and there must have been a good deal of mutual disappointment."

"I don't know exactly what you mean by going out into the world," I said. "I am not going to do that, that I know of."

"Oh," she said, quietly, "I think you will go. I think you may make up your mind to that."

"Of course," I agreed, "I shall go into some profession, but it won't take me any farther away than London, most likely, and I shall be down here as often that perhaps you may not be disappointed in me. The process of deterioration will be so gradual that I hope you won't notice it."

"Yes, that is a reassuring thought," replied Maud, gravely. "Also it is just possible that you may not deteriorate. But it does one no to count upon the future." She added, abruptly, turning her eyes full upon me, "I hope you don't count upon things too much."

I was greatly taken aback, and my heart died within me, for it seemed to me that her words could have but one meaning. I stammered out some incoherent reply, and she continued, earnestly

"Don't count upon anything until it is yours, that is as much the best way. All kinds of things may happen. General Le Marchant may marry, and have children, for instance, which would make it rather difficult for your uncle to leave Thirlby away from him. And, after all, I suppose there is some truth in what people say—that it is a much finer thing to earn one's fortune than to inherit it."

"Oh, Thirlby!" I said, greatly relieved; "I that is all, there was no need to caution me against overconfidence. I know well enough that I have no claim upon the property, and I have never looked forward to inheriting it. The fact is that I couldn't look forward to anything that involved the dear old man's death. You don't understand, of course—"

"Oh yes, I do," she interrupted.

"Well, you don't know him as I do, and it would be impossible for you to understand how I feel toward him. He has been a great deal more than a father to me, for has been all and everything until—until lately."

"Until Mrs Farquhar came, you mean?"

That was not exactly what I had meant, but I had not the courage to be more explicit, and Maud went on

"I am wrong about Mrs Farquhar, and you were right, I admit. I would give anything now to get her out of the place, but she won't go, and probably I shall suffer from her more than you will, if that be any comfort to you. I am very glad to hear that you do not take it for granted that you will be Squire of Thirlby one day. Perhaps you will be; but I fancy that there is a doubt about it, and it is best to be prepared for disappointments. Now tell me, what are you going to be?—soldier, sailor, tinker, or tailor?"

This question led us into a protracted and very interesting conversation, during which I quite recovered my temper and spirits, and which ended by my companion's presenting me with a flower, to keep me in countenance, as she said, on my re appearance before the company, and to give me a plausible air of having been engaged in botanical research.

The company, however, when we returned to it, asked no questions, and were apparently not disposed to be censorious. The company wore a slightly flushed and jaded aspect, an after a long dispatation. Two thirds of it were still eager and aggressive, while the minority showed signs of exhaustion, albeit a mock determination to hold his own was legible upon his countenance. Evidently the combined attack had taken place; and it also seemed that the allies had fallen out during the progress of operations as allies will do; for, when we stepped into the room, Mrs. Farquhar, whose back was toward us, was saying, in a high, emphatic voice, "Well, Mr Donnison, I must differ from you altogether, and it is my opinion that you are advising Bernard wrongly as well as foolishly."

"My dear madam," the Rector was beginning, with some warmth, "I might apply those very same terms or yourself, only that I dislike to be rude—"

But here he caught sight of us, and pulled himself up with: "Well, well, there's enough said. What is the night like, Charley? More rain coming, do you think?"

"It is twenty minutes to eleven," my uncle observed, getting up and looking at his watch. "The carriage must have been at the door for the last half hour at least. John will be seriously displeased if he and the horses are kept waiting much longer, and when John is displeased both he and his horses are generally taken ill, and are unfit for service for periods varying from a fortnight to three weeks."

The Rector begged us not to think of moving yet awhile: in those days, and in that part of the country, one's entertainers always made a point of protesting against one's departure. I don't know whether they do it still. But we put on our coats and wraps in spite of these friendly entreaties, and we were soon rumbling away in the heavy old green coach which had belonged to my uncle's father, and very likely to his grandfather too.

The first part of our short drive was accomplished in silence, but although the darkness prevented me from distinguishing the features of my opposite neighbors, I felt instinctively that Mrs Farquhar was in a state of ferment, and before we were half-way across the park the burst out with, "A willful man must have his way, and the consequence will be upon his own head; but I would like just to warn Charley—"

"Excuse me, mother," interrupted my uncle; "but I would rather not re-open the subject just now."

"I'm not re-opening the subject, Bernard, only I think that there should be an end of secrecy. The truth must be told some day, and better now than later."

"We will say no more about it for the present, if you please," answered my uncle.

His voice had an authoritative inflection which was very unusual with him.

Mrs Farquhar, I suppose, was overawed, for she said no more, and, as soon as we reached the house, went upstairs, after bidding us good-night quite meekly.

I was about to follow her example, but my uncle took me by the arm. "Come into the library, Charley," said he; "we have got to go through a disagreeable half-hour, you and I. As my mother says, better now than later."

I glanced curiously at his face, which was pale and very grave, and I noticed that there was a heavy look about the corners of his mouth, as though he were in pain. "My dear old man," I said, "don't tell me any thing, if you would rather not."

He looked back at me, smiling. "I fear we can't shirk it any longer," he answered. "If I don't tell you, somebody else will, and, after all, these things generally hurt more in the anticipation than in the reality. I shall be glad to have spoken, when it is over and done with."

So I gave the arm which he had passed through mine a squeeze, and in that fashion we entered the library, where the fire was burning brightly, and my uncle's arm-chair and slippers were waiting for him.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE INDIAN PROBLEM.

GENERAL CROOK, the hero of the daring though bloodless campaign against the Apaches in Mexico, is the reputed author of the remark that "it is cheaper to feed an Indian than to fight him." This simple maxim is the basis of much of what is vaguely called the Indian policy of the government, and it is perfectly sound as far as it goes. Unfortunately it does not go very far. If it be cheaper to feed the Indian than to fight him, it is still cheaper in the long run, as well as wiser and more humane, to teach him to feed himself, and to conduct himself in all ways as a civilized person and a citizen of the United States. That is the goal which from time to time those in authority in the Department of the Interior and in the Bureau of Indian Affairs here set for themselves, and toward which there has been made irregular but real progress. The first step was to see that the feeding process was honestly and fairly done, thus the Indians got all that was bought for them, and that as much was bought as the means appropriated would pay for. This was accomplished by the appointment of the Indian Commission—a separate body of citizens chosen for their established reputation for integrity and business capacity, to whom was intrusted the supervision of the contracts and the inspection of the goods bought. There was a troublesome and no less a thankless task, but it has finally been done. In their last report the Commission, of which General Clinton B. Fisk is chairman, declared "Under the present joint management of the Interior Department and the Board no favoritism is shown, everything is done openly and fairly, and the parties that offer the most suitable goods and at the lowest prices get the contract."

But while the goods distributed to the Indians are honestly bought and fairly given out, there is one radical difficulty in the existing system. The idle, marauding, turbulent Indians are much more promptly served and better treated than the peaceful and orderly Indians, who are desirous of getting lands of their own, and raising their own supplies. This is due partly to the frequent changes in the Bureau and in the Interior Department, and partly to the carelessness and ignorance of Congress. The Bureau has not money or men enough at its command to do its work thoroughly, and it is extremely natural that when trouble is threatened its tone and means should be devoted to avoid it, while the rest of its work suffers. The result is unavoidable that while the restless savages get pretty much what they want, there are tribes in Oregon and Washington Territory who are yet waiting for the fulfillment of treaties made nearly thirty years since, guaranteeing them separate homesteads, and the Indian Commission name two others tribes in Dakota, Kansas, Nevada, and the Indian Territory whom they know to be anxious for such allotments.

In spite of these difficulties, very considerable progress has been made. In 1868 there were less than 900,000 bushels of grain and vegetables raised by Indians; in 1872 the quantity was nearly 3,800,000, or more than four times as much. The amount of hay increased nine times, the number of cattle and swine more than ten times, while the number of sheep advanced from 2683 to 1,300,780. The acreage of land cultivated increased from 54,207 to 569,982. These are eloquent figures. They are absolutely convincing as to the possibility of ultimately bringing all the Indians into a self-supporting condition. Necessarily the work will be slow and arduous; but it is distinctly practicable, and its accomplishment is the one supreme duty of the national government.

Apart from the obvious duty of the government to encourage the settlement of adult Indians upon lands where they can earn their own living, and their occupation in civilized pursuits, there is the work of education to be energetically pushed. Here, too, there has been a fair commencement, after much doubt, hesitation, and uncertainty. Not only have the normal schools at Hampton and Carlisle done excellent service, but the agency schools, mainly supported by various religious societies, have made a very good beginning. Probably a little more than one in five of the Indian children of school age now actually attend school in one way or another, while the number is steadily increasing. The industrial schools have turned out pupils who make very fair workmen, and will do better as they gain experience. A tribute to their success is paid by some of the whites in the neighborhoods where they are engaged, who are already raising the cry that they are encroaching on the labor market which ought to be reserved for the pale-skins. In this direction [illegible] enough has been done to show that much more it possible, and to make further efforts no longer active duty.

One thing is plain: we ought to hear no more of the senseless and brutal denunciation of all Indians as treacherous. General Canby surrendered his own life and the lives of all his officers in the hands of a body of armed Indian braves, outnumbering the whites five to one, in the heart of a savage country, and in the face of no Indian enemy of the most desperate character. He had hardly plunged into the mountains before the frontiersmen spread the report that he had been murdered, with all his white men, by his Indian escort. There was not a word of truth in it. The scouts were perfectly faithful. In the same connection it must be noted that the government employs some nine hundred Indians as a police force. The experiment was begun five years ago this summer, and its success is entirely satisfactory. The men are distributed among forty agencies. "They are," says Indian Commissioner Pierce, "proud of being considered United States soldiers, and are uniformly faithful and true to the government. Wearing the uniform of officers of the law, they have an educational influence over their associates the value of which can not be estimated." The privates receive eight dollars per month, the sergeants ten, and the commissioned officers fifteen dollars per month. How often does the police force of any city, composed of a base men, and paid ten times as much, deserve such a tribute as these Indians receive? Such tests as those of the capacity of Indians for civilized life are conclusive as to the folly of the old policy of neglect or extermination.

SARATOGA SPRINGS.

THE Indian Se-ach-ta-ga, meaning "the hillside country of the great river," and pronounced by Peter Philip Schuyler, to whom it was sold by the Mohawks in 1684, "Saratoga," did not include the world famous mineral springs of that name. It was the name of the Indian hunting ground lying on both sides of the upper Hudson for fifteen miles south of the "great bend," and bounded on the west by Saratoga Lake. The territory in which the springs are located was known as Kayaderosseras, "the lake country," and was a famous Indian resort, for one can only dot in lakes and streams teem with fish, but it was filled with game of all descriptions, attracted in a enormous numbers by the saline properties of its mineral waters. To this hunter's paradise the Indians of the powerful Iroquois nation, leaving their castles on the Mohawk, betook themselves each summer, erected their lodges near the springs, drank of their waters, and in them sure enjoyed a season at Saratoga as thoroughly as their palefaced successors do to them to day.

Lying to the angle formed by the confluence of the Hudson and Mohawk, and at the intersection of the great northern and eastern war trails, this beautiful valley for hundreds of years formed a debatable ground, and from the time that Champlain found the Algonquins and Iroquois at war with each other until Benedict surrendered to Gates in its very heart, it was the scene of many a sanguinary bloodshed.

The only flowing mineral spring known to the Indians in this valley was the High Rock and the first white man to visit it was an invalid French officer brought to it, to be healed, by the Northern Indians, from Fort Carillon, to the outlet of Lake George. The next white man, and the first Englishman, who tested the wonderful healing properties of these waters was Sir William Johnson, who built Fort William Henry, on Lake George, and who was brought here on the shoulders of his devoted Mohawks from Schenectady in August, 1767.

Until 1773 no white man had attempted to make a settlement near the springs, but in that year a hardy Dutchman named Jans Somers made a small clearing and built a cabin on the bluff just west of High Rock Spring. He quarrelled with the Indians, and was driven away by them before the summer was over, and the following year John Arnold, from Rhode Island, took possession of the deserted cabin, enlarged it, and opened in it a rude tavern, the pioneer hotel of Saratoga. It was surrounded by Indian lodges filled with savage occupants, and the rude lodge on which it was built swarmed with vermin—a habit the Arnold's guests often brag that has been kinder of town for four of them.

In 1783 General Schuyler built the first summer cottage, or, as he called it, "hunting lodge," at the springs, and cut a rude road to them from old Saratoga, now Schuylerville. Nine years later the famous Congress Spring was discovered by Governor John Gilman, of New Hampshire, while hunting in the woods within a mile of the town. These two, the High Rock and Congress, are the only natural-flowing springs of the score or more now existing at Saratoga, all the others having been bored for, and several of them in Greenville are said to have been discovered by persons who were boring for oil. One of the early nights of Saratoga is the Champion Spring scattering its feathery spray over the ever-growing ice-dome with a hich it surrounds itself, and covering it with the most delicate silver frosting. In summer the same spring escapes in a pillar-like jet from the end of a pipe ten feet above the earth. This pipe is being gradually enlarged with an accretion of lime, which causes it to resemble a huge stalagmite.

In 1800, Gideon Putnam, who had settled in the springs ten years before, bought the land on which the Grand Union Hotel now stands, and built what was then thought to be a very large and commodious hotel. It was called the Pavilion Tavern; and its sign-board hangs above the mantle-piece of the Grand Union to this day. Fifteen years later Congress Hall was opened, and in 1824 the United States was built. There are now among the largest hotels on the world, and their fame extends as far as the name of Saratoga.

During the height of a Saratoga season, which in during the month of August, there is no gayer nor more cosmoted scene in the world than that presented by Broadway, the main avenue of the village, and the one on which are situated the principal hotels and the finest private dwelling-houses. As far as the eye can see it is filled with carriages of all descriptions, private and public, the former superbly appointed, and the latter imitating them as far as possible. In their midst tower the lumbering Tally hos, laden with merry parties going to or coming from the races, with horns tooting, horses prancing, and everybody happy. The walks are thronged with finely dressed promenaders, lends play on the hotel pianos, all is glitter and bustle, and over all arch the double rows of stately elms of which the villagers are so justly proud.

The present season at Saratoga opened very early, and is now showing every indication of a prosperity and splendor that recall the "good old times before the war," when to spend a season at the springs was the ambition of every Southern-born American man and woman.

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Holiways in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Sylvestres; or, the Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

There are certain temperaments without doubt as sensitive to atmospheric changes as to give credence to, if not as warrant, the strange theories formed on the subject, and Stephana's was one of these. The superintive grandeur of the storm acted on her imagination than the phenomenal conditions accompanying it, affecting her physical powers. For a brief spell she surrendered herself as a double influence, the one rendering her mental faculties abnormally alert, the other diminishing or subduing bodily force, subjecting it momentarily, out to will, but to something that may be even stronger. At such moments, when given up absolutely to phantasy, spiritual vision, call her mood by what name we please, Stephana would be an unconscious of the actual world as an infant in sweet sleep. The morte having taken possession of her spirit, the physical incumbrance remained inert, and the bodily faculties as sharpened, and although the sublimity and awfulness of nature in this rare mood were apparent to her vaguely as in a dream, to all else she was irresponsive, and indeed insensible. Called by name as such times, she did not hear, wrapt in an ecstasy which others could not understand, she was deaf, blind, unto to the visible material world. And in that dream-world whither none could follow her, she must be united for as some bird that has soared into cloud land, but will duly return to its nest. It was this habit of abstraction that perhaps more than any other characteristic made Stephana an enigma to her friends. What could so absorb her mind as to render it dull to actualities; and why should she thus voluntarily lend herself to speculations having such a result? For, said all, she was mistress of herself, she might overcome this mental habit if she would. But Stephana had every reason for encouraging thoughts and fancies more beautiful by far than those steeped in realities. She was a silent poet, one of those choice spirits that are intoxicated with spiritual and intellectual beauty, and at the same time alive in every fibre to the warfare between good and evil disturbing the tranquillity of the world. The loveliness revealed to her inner vision entranced, dazzled; but the sorrow that followed a contemplation of life as it is, dimmed her eyes with tears. Compensatory are ever the higher gifts. If Stephana suffered much more than her fellows because she realized more intensely the bitterness of sin and wrong, at the same time hope and goodness shone upon her with intenser, mellower light. She sorrowed more, but was rejoiced with equal favor? And just as the inner vision consoles the poet and reveals to him a world of loveliness that is as a relief of this, yet less more lovely, so Stephana, poet without a lyre, had consolations for her own especial sorrows of which others knew not. When Christina and Colette entered the room, she met them with her usual smile of welcome, and except an extraordinary brightness in her eyes and unusual pallor on her cheeks, there was nothing to denote the crisis through which she had just passed.

"I was coming to you," she said, and again she smiled and looked at each doubtfully, uncertain as to the effect her disclosures might have. "Whilst you have been watching the storm and the sea, I have been gazing on light and darkness more awful still. But sit down and I will tell you everything."

The pair obeyed, not loath. It was the first time that Stephana had opened her lips as either on the subject of her dreams and phantasies, and now the two down and told her story as if it were an ordinary narrative.

"The storm came upon me quite by surprise, as it must have done on yourselves," she said, leaning forward in her chair, and seeming to see the things she described. "I had thrown off my heavy gown and opened my window, overcome by the sudden sultriness, when a wondrous flash of lightning—such a flash as I had never before witnessed—threw me back. I sank into my chair, trembling, not with fear, but with emotion. The sight of the dark sea and the lightning playing upon it was so majestic, so indescribably awful! The present and all that was taking place now passed from my ken. I gazed, but not on tangible things. I hearkened, but to no earthly voice."

She covered her eyes as if to shut out all that could interfere with the vividness of the mental picture she was drawing, and went on:

"It was as if the fair face of the earth had vanished from my sight, and instead I saw light and darkness only—light so dazzling, yet so lovely, so splendid, so beneficent, that I seemed new to guess upon it for the first time, while the darkness filled my soul with terror. No words can describe it. A darkness swallowing, engulfing, every luminous particle that approached it, a darkness striving to encroach upon the confines of light. As I gazed and gazed I discovered a broad shining track dividing what prejudiced to my mind not only day and night, but life and death, time and eternity. The immense path, whose end and beginning I could see ere, was garlanded on either side by troops of angelic figures. Most beautiful and terrible were they, all those encircling the kingdom of light being of its very essence, merry, radiant, ineffable, with rays about their seraphic brows, and a whiteness more dazzling than silver on Alpine snow upon their wings, whilst the legion guarding the realms of darkness were as night incarnate, fearful to behold, blackness on their foreheads, gloom of wing, sable-raimented, fit harbingers they of a night that should never see one dawn, children of the Death that has no beginning and no end. I gazed and gazed, and by-and-by discerned the occupation of these angelic battalions. For, gazing down into the abyss in which the fair broad way was lost below, and high into the heavens where it vanished also, I now see what I can only describe as flames or small ring-like appearances fluttering upward. Once having made out their presence, it did not happen to stay-gazers, I mean are twenty where before I had seen but one, and by-and by the space between the two regions I could see was filled with them, fluttering forbits they came, some lighter and more conspicuous than others, some wholly dark, and such moving hither with free voluntary movements like those of a bird. I discovered also that each of these small wing-like flames was followed by a light and a dark angel, who seemed striving to entice it, the one to the right, the other as the left. As I gazed I discerned that when any one was drawn close to the boundaries of the light on the dark kingdom, straightway it was absorbed. Then the light burned brighter and brighter; the gloom grew more and more intense. But that especial little flame was lost to sight, merged either in the supernal day or night. Strange and moving was it to see this contest going on, and the transformation brought about, these myriads upon myriads with their attendant administering sprite, attracted now nearer the light, now toward the borders of darkness, as last absorbed by the one or ingulfed into the horrible abyss of the other. There was music too; whence it came I know not, but it reached my ears from afar, and alternated—now exultant and joyful, a bridal song, a triumphant march, a jubilant chorus, now sad as a dirge or funeral knell, so sad that I ceased to hear. I was weeping then when suddenly I heard a voice anear, and without daring to look up, knew that it was one of the seraphic spirits sent hither to comfort me.

"'Weep not,' he said, in a voice sweet but mutful. 'Gaze and be instructed.' To the mind of man much of the knowledge he desires is denied him, for thou much know and teach others. In yonder track of light are prefigured human life, which is but a warfare between shining goodness and dark sea, each unit of the multitudes born on earth lighting under one banner or the other. If it be ordained that the life after the tomb remain an enigma to earthly sojourners, and all except life itself mysterious, at least know that the soul vanquished by evil makes the sum of universal darkness vaster and more portentous, whilst the gain of the humblest spirit to truth and loveliness is as another ray of light, beaming not only on this world, but throughout the entire universe, and not only to-day, but always. Ask not, then, earthly, much less heavenly rewards, O children of men. In it no reward to have added to God's best gift, man's best heritage, Light, forever and forever?'"

Little was said at the time, but Christina thanked her cousin warmly, and Colette's tearful eyes afforded grateful comment. The next morning the projected departure took place without an needle affectionate ado. Almost an hour after noon, however, Stephana found a note on her desk. It bore the well-known lozenge, with Christina's initials and notice underneath. "For me and the world." There was no letter, but the envelope held merely a slip of paper folded round a check. The draft was for five thousand pounds, and on the slip were written these words, "Save my soul by your prayers."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A few days after these events Valerian suddenly appeared at Steppie's door, just at the time Arthura was at home. Steppie was the first to perceive him in the distance. She was one of those persons who can never so wholly absorb the motives in our occupations as not to see and hear every trifling thing going on around them, and the distant glimpse of Valerian was caught while she busily set up her housekeeping books.

"Oh!" she said, half crying, "misfortune on misfortune! I said that a series of calamities would happen when I overturned the inkstand on Benjamine's when I took this morning. Mr Hermitage, Arthura, and the maid one for a holiday, and the drawing room curtains taken down to be washed, and no fresh butter for tea, and Baby's last clean pinafore stained with blackberry jam, and my best gown at the dressmaker's, and Benjamin's hair in paper for to-morrow's holiday-school treat, and Walter playing at leap-frog in the streets with the baker's boy! Oh dear! At there, you must battle with it. I am ready to sink into the earth."

"Dear little mamma," said Arthura, proudly collected in spite of strange beatings of the heart, "I will let Mr Hermitage in, and must see you tidy the children, and bring them down-stairs as soon as you can."

"But for you to answer the door! Let me do it," said Steppie, housekeepingly.

"Mr Hermitage will not expect to see a powdered footman," Arthura made sarcastic reply.

Then came Valerian's knock, and the next moment he stood on the threshold, eatching sight of Steppie dragging a child by each hand on the staircase.

The lovers had not met since the painful interview of a few days before, the very thought of which stung Arthura to the quick now. Valerian had wounded her past forgetfulness, if not past forgiveness, she said, and the prospect of a talk with him afforded scant pleasure.

"Can I say a word to you?" he said, glancing at the door.

"Certainly," Arthura replied, and she could not resist a smile in the midst of her home thoughts. Who should hear anything they might say, indeed? There were audible indications enough of what was going on in the chamber overhead had not Valerian been too self-absorbed to hear them—Babe wailing at having her face washed out of season, Benjamine clamoring for a clean tucker, Walter throwing off his shoes, a general running hither and thither, an unlocking of drawers, and a prevailing hubbub and commotion.

Valerian glanced at Arthura's calm face with an little apprehension. He had come to make excuses for himself and to beg pardon for the unwarrantable behavior of the other day, but seeing Arthura's cold, collected demeanor, he hardly knew how to begin. "I have come to say many things as you," he said, not venturing even to repeat the hand-clasp. "First and foremost, I was to blame in saying what I did. Pray think on more of it. Forgive me."

"Certainly," again Arthura said.

To Valerian's ears the word had an ill-omened sound. Arthura was not wont to be monosyllabic. Her speech most often resembled herself—bright, sparkling, individual. But that frigid affirmation!—that "Certainly!"

"When I explain all to you I see sure you will make some excuse for me," he went on, feeling that he must go on, whether he made matters better for himself or worse. "I have had many things to harass and perplex me. Let me first of all tell you one. I have come to say good-by for a time. I start to-day and at mid night on a journey to America."

Arthura looked impassive, but not melted. Surprise, however, did win from her a genuine exclamation. She forgot for the moment everything but the delightfulness of seeing a new world.

"Are you really going to see America?" she said.

"You speak as if you would like to see it too. And indeed that may well be, some day," Valerian went on, relieved at the sudden naturalness of Arthura's voice and manner. "But I must make haste, my darling; I have so much to say, and so little time to say it in, that I am at my wits' end where to begin. Well, I am going to America on an errand for Stephana, and may be absent three or four months, not more. Her grand schemes you shall hear of in my letters. You will see me back early in the summer. I will write to you by every mail."

Arthura listened with an responsive eagerness, yet kindly, he thought. Yes, she loved him still.

"All sorts of things have happened impossible to write about. Did Mr Constantine tell you? I am Christina's son, born of a secret marriage. My name is a humble one, but, such as it is, honestly mine."

That piece of news suddenly gave Arthura real pleasure. Her cheeks showed gratulatory blushes. Her eyes sparkled.

"I had not heard a word of this. I am glad indeed," she said.

"The revelation has not mended my fortunes as yet." Valerian went on, grimly. "What my mother's intentions are I know not, but as present I am a mere pensioner on her bounty. I must make my own way."

Arthura broke in with flaming cheeks and hot tears.

"You are going to America on Stephana's account. Tell me the truth, Valerian. Are you going as marry her?" Mr Constantine says so."

Valerian looked ruffled and discomposed, but recovering himself in a moment, pleaded his cause with wonderful dexterity.

"Listen to me, my dearest," he said, speaking in a low, confidential voice, and persuading himself that things were with them as in the sweet French days. "Long before I saw you I gave Stephana to understand that if she could ever marry again I should be proud to mother her my wife. It was a bold proposition on my part, but she was even as beautifully kind to me, and so gracious withal that in any case I felt sure of giving no offence. There was no question of love, only cousinly affection, and let least so one side; on account almost rending to veneration. You know Stephana, who can resist her?"

"Who, indeed?" Arthura exclaimed, still agitated. "If Stephana saw wishes it, you will marry her."

Valerian laughed scornfully, at the same time not loath to let his suppositious infidelity take the shape of fatalism.

"No," he said, speaking slowly, as if exclaim for each word to dwell in her memory like a phrase. "I shall marry you, as as women. But too a time I not in a charmed circle. I do Stephana's bidding whether I will or no. You can not suppose that I wished to undertake this journey to America, and thus absent myself from you and keep my future plans in abeyance for three months. But I can not refuse Stephana, feeling because she casts a sort of glamour over me, and especially because she is my good genius, the best friend (I am here speaking from a worldly point of view) I possess. If ever justice is rendered me by my mother it will be Stephana's work."

Arthura was silent. Valerian could not tell whether or on he had concerned her. She did see indeed know herself. But he certainly had made some kind of explanation.

"You see, my own love," he went on, "I am driven against my inclinations to accept Stephana's behests. What have we two but Love and Hope, and who can live upon these alone? Do not be cast down. I am sure that all will come right in time. Only you must think kindly of me and believe in me. Promise that."

He drew her toward him and kissed her on the eyes, a true-lover's kiss, but it hardly cheered Arthura. She sat still, looking on the ground.

"It makes you happy to be with Mr Constantine?" he said, after a time. "You will write to me cheerfully. And who knows how soon Fortune may smile on as after my return, how speedily we may be able to scatter our wishes! You do love me, you do forgive me, do you not?" I hardly know what I was saying when I spoke so roughly to you, your coming was such a surprise and such a vexation, seeing how ready the world is to rail at those who disregard it. But all is with us as before, now is it not?"

He looked into her eyes with a lover's admiration, certainly without a lover's confidence. How superb in her girlish bloom and strength was this one sparkling, audacious Arthura! All the strength was still there, the self reliance, the courage the will, but something was wanting he fain would see.

"Say that it is so, or that it shall be so," he said, desperately. He had never been more in love with her in his life. "I need not say it to you, who love her, Stephana's designs, spells. If you will, are all beneficent. But were it otherwise, were the toils spread about me wearier indeed, I would break them for your sake. Over my born for you she has no power."

Just then there was a clamor of children's voices at the door. Their interview was at an end.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF LOUISIANA.

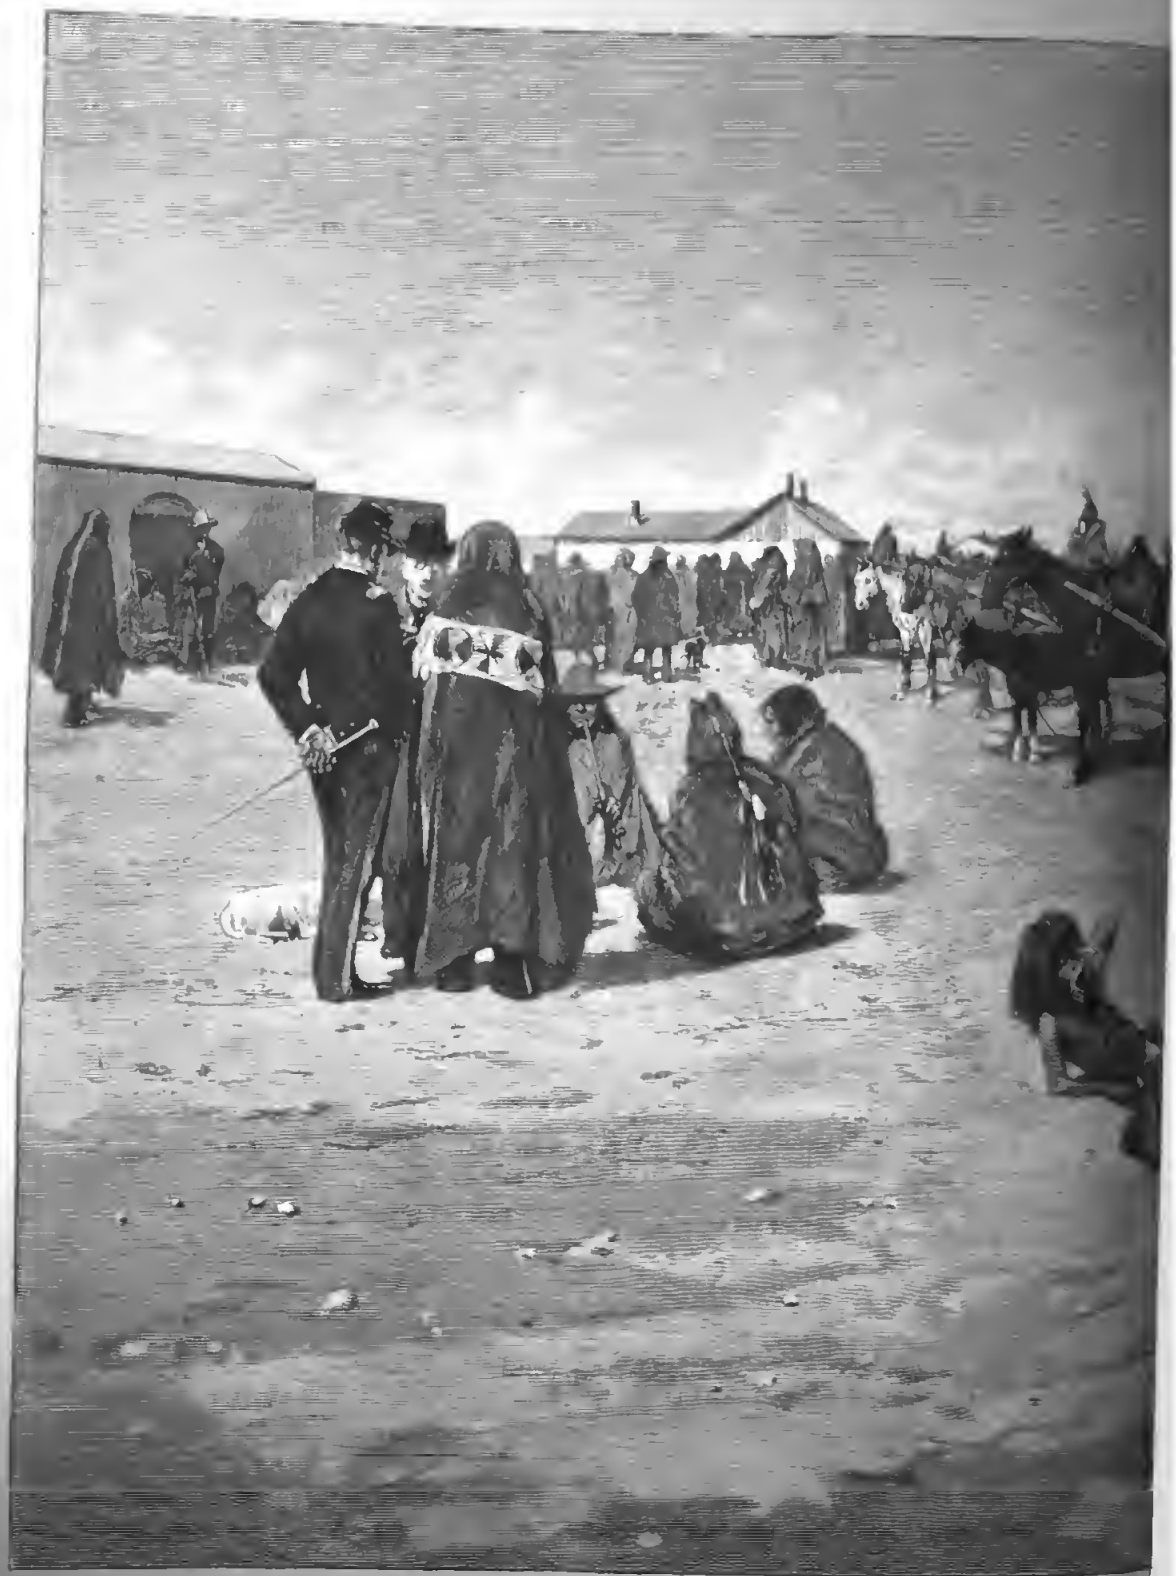
II

It is not so very long ago that the sugars used in the United States were subjected in a very inferior process of treatment, being simply clarified with lime, and passed through a clumsy system of skimming and evaporation in a range of boilers placed in line, and alternately ladled on as to make one furnace do the work for the bell-dozen boilers, which, together with a mill, constituted the whole mechanical apparatus of the sugar planter of a generation ago. Even as this day many of the older planters adhere to the ancient system. The sugars thereby obtained are the same which created so much discussion during the tariff debates of the last Congress, and which are classed, according to the recently established schedule, as below No. 12, Dutch standard.

But the number of these conservatives of the old-fashioned sugar industry is steadily diminishing. There are many intelligent planters in Louisiana, and annually guest improvements are being made in the agricultural as well as the manufacturing departments of the sugar industry. The old-fashioned apparatus is being abandoned; the "open kettle" is giving way to the "double effect" and the "vacuum pan." If there had not been checked the progress of the sugar industry in Louisiana, it would have reached a condition of advancement equal to any sugar industry in the world. It was in Louisiana that Bernard invented that wonderful apparatus for evaporation which made his name famous, and which, in more or less modified shapes, has been adopted in all parts of the world where sugar is made. Doubtless at a future period, not by any means remote, other inventions will be produced, with the effect of greatly modifying the present sugar industry, which needs only capital to enable it to take a position in the very front rank of United States manufactures.

It is not perhaps generally known that before the war Louisiana produced half of the sugar consumed in the entire country. It is also generally unknown that that State could be a very short time produce from 400,000 to 500,000 tons of sugar, or the half of all that is now consumed in the United States. There is an erroneous idea that the lands adapted as the cultivation of sugar cane are wholly confined to a narrow strip of country bordering the Mexican Gulf. Now the fact is that the land actually planted with [illegible] in Louisiana, and which last year produced nearly 150,000 tons of sugar, constitutes at most on more than a fifth part of the soil suited to this industry. Unfortunately [illegible] lands are to great part subject to overflow during the inundations of the Mississippi, and few persons at present care to run the risks of cultivating them, so long as the State [illegible] and the general government will not take measures to confine the waters of the great river as their natural channel. All other great industrial countries—Germany, Austria, France—make great sacrifices in order to develop or preserve their national sugar industries. The United States, on the other hand, not only undertake not sugar production, but even discourage the industry by perpetual threats of [illegible] changes in the tariff—a [illegible] which [illegible] disheartens [illegible] and almost [illegible] to [illegible] to national

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1079.



RATION DAY AT STANDING ROCK

—Drawn by H. F. Farny.—[See Page 470.]

Digitized by Google

THE SUMMER SOLSTICE.

The sun has touched his northern bound,
And southward turns his course to day;
The soft sweet air new charm has found
In fragrance of the new mown hay.
The stalwart farmer deftly swings
His glistening blade the earth anear,
And into swaths and windrows flings
The earliest harvest of the year.

God made the country, saith the sage,
And man has made the noisy town;
Then be my path of pilgrimage
'Mong clover heads and thistle-down,
To walk with nature hand to hand,
In nature's pure and simple way,
And 'neath the elms and maples stand
In fragrance of the new mown hay.

Now boisterous boys and romping girls
Toss here and there the wilting grass;
The wanton winds toss grass and curls,
And hours in toil and pleasure pass,
There's laughter ringing in the air—
But see, a shower! It comes this way.
It clouds the sky, but now so fair,
And perils all the new-mown hay.

Quick! Bend to work your sinews strong.
The growth of healthful country homes;
Work with your might 'twill not be long
Before the drenching shower comes;
Ply fast the rake and fork, and heap
The cocks that shed the rain away,
And then to supper and to sleep,
'Mid fragrance of the new mown hay

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "The Return of the Native," "Far from the Madding Crowd," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER XIII

On going out into the garden next morning, with a strange sense of being another person than herself, she beheld Jim leaning moodily over the gate.

He nodded. "Good-morning, Margery," he said, civilly.

"Good-morning," said Margery, in the same tone.

"I beg your pardon," he continued. "But which way was you going this morning?"

"I am not going anywhere just now, thank you. But I shall go to my father's by-and-by into Ely."

She went on with a sigh, "I have done what he has all along wished—that is, married you, and there's no longer reason for enmity between him and me."

"True—true. Well, as I was going the same way, I can give you a lift in the trap, for the distance is long."

"No, thank you; I am used to walking," she said.

They remained in silence, the gate between them, till Jim's meticulous would apparently allow him to hold his peace no longer. "This is a bad job!" he murmured.

"It is," she said, as one whose thoughts have only too readily been identified. "How I came to agree to it is more than I can tell." And tears began rolling down her cheeks.

"The blame is more mine than yours, I suppose," he returned. "I ought to have said No, and not backed up the gentleman in worrying out this scheme. 'Twas his own notion entirely, as perhaps you know. I should never have thought of such a plan; but he said you'd be willing, and that it would be all right; and I was too ready to believe him."

"The thing is, how to remedy it," said she, bitterly. "I believe, of course, in your promise to keep this private, and not to trouble me by calling."

"Certainly," said Jim. "I don't want to trouble you. As for that, why, my dear Mrs. Hayward—"

"Don't Mrs Hayward me!" said Margery, sharply. "I won't be Mrs Hayward."

Jim paused. "Well, you be the by law, and that was all I meant," he said, mildly.

"I said I would acknowledge us such thing, and I won't. A thing can't be legal when it's against the wishes of the persons the laws are made or protect. So I beg you not to call me that any more."

"Very well, Miss Tucker," said Jim, deferentially. "We can live on exactly as before. We can't marry anybody else, that's true; but beyond that there's no difference, and no harm done. Your father ought to be told, I suppose, even if nobody else is. It will partly reconcile him to you, and make your life smoother."

Instead of directly replying, Margery exclaimed, in a low voice:

"Oh, it is a mistake; I didn't see it all, owing to not having time to reflect! I agreed, thinking that at least I should get reconciled to father by the step. But perhaps he would as soon have me not married at all as married and parted. I must ha' been enchanted—bewitched—when I gave my consent to this! I only did it to please that dear good dying nobleman—though why he should have wished it so much I can't tell!"

"Nor I neither," said Jim. "Yet, we've been fooled into it, Margery," he said, with extraordinary gravity. "He's had his way w' us, and now we've got to suffer for it. Being a gentleman of patronage, and having bought several loads of lime a' me, and having given me all that splendid furniture, I could hardly refuse."

"What, did he give you that?"

"Ay, sure—to help me win ye."

Margery covered her face with her hands; whereupon Jim stood up from the gate and looked critically at her. "'Tis a cruel conspiracy between you two men to—enshare me!" she exclaimed. "Why should you have done it—why should he have done it—when I've not deserved to be treated so! He bought the furniture, did he! Oh, I've been taken in—I've been wronged!" The grief and vexation of finding that long ago, when fondly believing the Baron to have lover like feelings himself for her, he was still conspiring to favor Jim's suit, were more than she could endure.

Jim with distant courtesy waited, nibbling a straw, till her paroxysm was over. "One word, Miss Tuck—Mrs.—Margery," he then recommenced, gravely. "You'll find me man enough to respect your wish, and to leave you in yourself—for ever and ever, if that's all. But I've just one word of advice to render ye. That is, that before you go in Stickleford Dairy yourself you let me drive ahead and call on your father. He's friends with me, and he's not friends with you. I can break the news, a little at a time, and I think I can gain his good-will for you now, even though the wedding ha'n natural wedding at all. At any count, I can hear what he's got to say about ye, and come back here and tell ye."

She nodded a cool assent to this, and he left her strolling about the garden in the sunlight while he went on in reconnoitre as agreed. It must not be supposed that Jim's dutiful echoes of Margery's regret at her precipitate marriage were all gospel, and there is no doubt that his private intention, after telling the old dairyman what had happened, was to ask his temporary absent as her caprice, till, in the course of time, she should be reassured out of her whims and induced to settle down with Jim in a natural manner. He had, it is true, been somewhat nettled by her firm objection to him, and her keen sorrow for what she had done to please mother; but he hoped for the best.

But, alas for the astute Jim's calculations! He drove on to the dairy, whose white walls now gleamed in the morning sun, made fast the horse to a ring in the wall, and entered the barton. Before knocking he perceived the dairyman walking across from a gate in the other direction, as if he had just come in. Jim went over to him. Since the unfortunate incident on the morning of the intended wedding they had scarcely been on nodding terms, from a sense of awkwardness in their relations.

"Why, is that thee?" said Dairyman Tucker, in a voice which unmistakably startled Jim by its abrupt fierceness. "A pretty fellow thou be'st!"

It was a bad beginning for the young men's life as a son-in-law, and augured ill for the delicate consultation he desired.

"What's the matter?" said Jim.

"Matter? I wish some folks would burn their lime without harming other folks' property along wi' it. You ought to be ashamed of yourself. You tell yourself a man, Jim Hayward, and a honest lime-burner, and a respectable, market-keeping Christian, and yet or nie o'clock this morning, instead o' being where you ought to ha' been—at your work, there was neither sail or mark o' thee to be seed!"

"Faith, I don't know what you be raving at," said Jim.

"Why, the vlankers from thy conch heap blowed over upon my hay rick, and the rick's burnt to ashes; and all to come out o' my well-squeezed pocket. I'll tell thee what it is, young man. There's no business in ye. I've human Stickleford folk, quick and dead, for the last couple a' score year, and I've never humored one on three-quoning for harm on thee, my gentleman lime-burner, and I reckon it one o' the luckiest days o' my life when I 'scaped having thee in my family. That maid of mine was right; I was wrong. She seed thee to be a drawlacheting rogue, and 'twas her wisdom to go off that morning and get rid a' thee. I commend her for't, and I'm going to fetch her home to-morrow."

"You needn't take the trouble. She's coming home along to-night of her own accord. I have seen her this morning, and she told me so."

"So much the better. I'll welcome her warm. Nation! I'd sooner see her married to the parish fool than thee. Not you; you didn't care for my hay. Tarrying about where you shouldn't be, in bed, no doubt, that's what you was a doing. Now don't you darken my doors again, and the sooner you be off my bit a' ground the better I shall ha pleased."

Jim looked, as he felt, mutilated. If the rich had been really destroyed a little blame certainly attached to him, but he could not understand how it had happened. However, blame or none, it was clear he could not, with any self respect, declare himself to be this peppery old gaffer's son-in-law in the face of such an attack as this.

For months—almost years—the one transaction that had seemed necessary to compose these two families satisfactorily was Jim's union with Margery. No sooner had it been completed than it appeared on all sides as the gravest mishap for both. Stating coldly that he would discover how much of the accident was to be attributed to his negligence, and pay the damage, he went out of the barton and returned the way he had come.

Margery had been keeping a lookout for him, particularly wishing him not to enter the house, lest others should see the unfriendliness of their interview, and as soon as she heard wheels she went to the gate, which was out of view.

"Surely father has been speaking roughly to you!" she said, on seeing his face.

"Not the least doubt that he has," said Jim.

"But is he still angry with me?"

"Not in the least. He's waiting to welcome ye."

"Ah! because I've married you."

"Because he thinks you have not married me! He's jawed me up hill and down. He hates me; and for your sake I have not explained a word."

Margery looked toward home with a sad, severe gaze. "Mr. Hayward," she said, "we have made a great mistake, and we are in a strange position."

"True, but I'll tell ye what, mistress, I won't stand—" He stopped suddenly. "Well, well; I've promised," he quietly added.

"We must suffer for our mistake," she went on. "The way to suffer least is to keep our own counsel on what happened last evening, and not to meet. I must now return to my father."

He inclined his head in indifferent assent, and she went in-doors, leaving him there.

CHAPTER XIV.

Margery returned home, as she had decided, and resumed her old life at Stickleford. And seeing her father's animosity toward Jim, she told him not a word of the marriage.

Her inner life, however, was not what it once had been. She had suffered a mental and emotional displacement—a shock, which had cast a shade of astonishment on her face as a permanent thing.

Her indignation with the Baron for collusion with Jim, at first bitter, lessened with the lapse of a few weeks, and at length vanished in the interest of some tidings she received one day.

The Baron was not dead, but he was no longer at the Lodge. To the surprise of the physicians, a sufficient improvement had taken place in his condition to permit of his removal before the cold weather came. His desire for removal had been such, indeed, that it was advisable to carry it out at almost any risk. The plan adopted had been to have him borne on men's shoulders in a sort of palanquin to the shore, a distance of only a few miles, where a steam yacht lay awaiting him in a little cove. By this means the noise and jolting of a carriage, and several miles of turnpike road, were avoided. The singular procession over the fields took place at night, and was witnessed by but few people, one being a laboring man, who described the scene to Margery. When the sea-side was reached a long narrow gangway was laid from the deck of the yacht to the shore, which was so steep in the cove as to allow the yacht to lie quite near. The men, with their burden, ascended by the light of lanterns, the sick man was laid in the cabin, and as soon as his bearers had returned to the shore the gangway was removed, a rope was heard skirring over wood in the darkness, the yacht quivered, started her wheels, spread her waved wings to the air, and moved away through the miniature pillars of Hercules which formed the mouth of the cove. Soon she was but a small shapeless phantom upon the wide breast of the sea.

It was said that the yacht was bound for Algiers.

When the inimical autumn and winter weather came on, Margery wondered if he were still alive. The house being shut up, and the servants gone, she had no means of knowing, till, on a particular Saturday, her father drove her to market. Here, in attending to his business, he left her to herself for a while. Walking in a quiet street in the professional quarter of the town, she saw coming toward her the solicitor who had been present at the wedding, and who had acted for the Baron in various small local matters during his brief residence at the Lodge.

She reddened to peony hues, averted her eyes, and would have passed him. But he crossed over and barred the pavement, and when she met his glance he was looking with friendly severity at her. The street was quiet, and he said in a low voice, "How's the husband?"

"I don't know, sir," said she.

"What! and are your stipulations about secrecy and separate living still in force?"

"They will always be," she replied, decisively. "Mr Hayward and I agreed on the point, and we have not the slightest wish to change the arrangement."

"H'm. Then 'tis Miss Tucker to the world, Mrs Maryard to me and one or two others only."

Margery nodded. Then she nerved herself by an effort, and though blushing painfully asked, "May I put one question, sir. Is the Baron dead?"

"He is dead to you and to all of us. Why should you ask?"

"Because if he's alive, I am sorry I married James Hayward. If he is dead, I do not much mind my marriage."

"I repeat, he is dead to you," said the lawyer, emphatically. "I'll tell you all I know. My professional services for him ended with his departure from this place, but I think I should have heard from him if he had been alive still. I have heard not at all; and this, taken in connection with the nature of his illness, leaves no doubt in my mind that he is dead."

Margery sighed, and thanking the lawyer she left him with a tear for the Baron in her eye. After this incident she became more restful, and the time drew on for her periodical visit to her grandmother.

A few days subsequent to her arrival her aged relative asked her to go with a message to the gardener to Mount Lodge (who still lived on there, keeping the grounds in order for the landlord). Margery hated that direction now, but she went. The lodge, which she saw over the trees, was to her like a skull from which the warm and living flesh had vanished. It was twilight by the time she reached the cottage at the bottom of the Lodge garden, and the room being illuminated within, she saw through the window a woman she had never seen before. She was dark, and rather handsome, and when Margery knocked she opened the door. It was the gardener's widowed daughter, who had been advised to make friends with Margery.

She now found her opportunity. Margery's errand was soon completed, she young widow, to her surprise, treating her with preternatural respect, and afterward offering to accompany her home. Margery was not sorry to have a companion in the gloom, and they walked on together. The widow, Mrs. Peach, was demonstrative and confidential, and told Margery all about herself. She had come quite recently to live with her father—during the Baron's illness, in fact—and her husband had been captain of a ketch.

"I saw you one morning, ma'am," she said. "But you didn't see me. It was when you were crossing the hill to right of the Lodge. You looked so ill, and sighed. 'Tis the ha of widows to sigh, ma'am, is it not?"

"Widows—yes, I suppose; but what do you mean?"

Mrs. Peach lowered his voice. "I can't say more, ma'am, with proper respect. But there seems to be no question of the poor Baron's death; and though these foreign princes can take (as my husband used to tell me) what they call left-handed wives, and leave them behind when they go abroad, widowhood is widowhood, left-handed or right. And really, to be the left-handed wife of a foreign baron is nobler than to be married all round as a common man. You'll excuse my freedom, ma'am, but being a widow myself, I have pined you from my heart; as young as you are, and having to keep it a secret, and (excusing me) having no honour out of his vast riches because 'tis swallowed up by Baroness Number One."

Now Margery did not understand a word more of this than the bare fact that Mrs. Peach suspected her to be the Baron's unendowed widow, and such was the milkmaid's nature that she did not distinctly deny the widow's impeachment. The latter continued:

"But ah, ma'am, all your troubles are straight backward in your memory, while I have troubles before as well as grief behind."

"What may they be, Mrs Peach?" inquired Margery, with a slight air of the Baroness.

The other dropped her voice in revelatory tones: "I have been forgetful enough of my first man to lose my heart to a second!"

"You shouldn't do that—it is wrong. You should control your feelings."

"But how can I so control my feelings?"

"My going to your dead husband's grave, and things of this sort."

"Do you go in your dead husband's grave?"

"How can I go to Algiers?"

"Ah, too true! Well, I've tried everything to cure myself—read the words against it, and all sorts. But avast, my shipmate!—as my poor man used to say—there, 'tis just the same to short, I've made up my mind to encourage the new one. 'Tis flattering that I, a new-comer, should have been found out by a young man so soon."

"Who is he?" said Margery, listlessly.

"A master lime-burner."

"A master lime-burner?"

"That's his profession. He's a partner in-so, doing very well indeed."

"But what's his name?"

"I don't like to tell you his name, for, though 'tis night, this covers all shamefacedness, my face is as hot as a Tallan iron, I declare! Do you just feel it."

Margery put her hand on Mrs. Peach's face, and, sure enough, hot it was. "Does he come courting?" she asked, quickly.

"Well, only in the way of business. He never comes unless lime is wanted in the neighborhood. He's in the Yeomanry, too, and will look very fine when he comes out in his regimentals for drill in May."

"Oh, in the Yeomanry," the said, with a slight relief. "Then it can't—Is he a young man?"

"Yes, junior partner-in-so."

The description had an odd resemblance to Jim, of whom Margery had not heard a word for months. He had promised silence and absence, and had fulfilled his promise literally, with a gratuitous addition that was rather amazing, if, indeed, it were Jim whom the widow loved. One points in the description puzzled Margery: Jim was not in the Yeomanry, unless, by a surprising development of enterprise, he had entered a recently.

At parting, Margery said, with to interest quite tender: "I should like to see you again, Mrs. Peach, and hear of your attachment. When can you tell?"

"Oh, any time, ma'am, I'm sure, if you think I am good enough."

"Indeed I do, Mrs. Peach. Come at noon as you've seen the lime-burner again."

CHAPTER XV.

Seeing that Jim lived five miles from the widow, Margery was rather surprised, and even felt a slight sinking of the heart, when her new acquaintance appeared at her door or seen at the evening of the following Monday. She asked Margery to walk out with her, which the young woman readily did.

"I am come at once," said the widow, breathlessly, as soon as they were in the lane, "for it is so exciting that I can't keep it. I must tell it to somebody, if only a bird, to a cat, or a garden snail."

"What is it?" asked her companion, coyly.

"I've pulled grass from my husband's grave to cure it, worn the blades from true-lover's-knots, took off my shoes upon the sod, but avast! my shipmate."

"Upon the end—why?"

"To feel the damp earth he's in, and make the sense of it enter my soul. But, no. It has swelled to a head; he is going to meet me at the Yeomanry review."

"The master lime-burner?"

The widow nodded.

"When is it to be?"

"To-morrow. He looks so lovely in his recontrements! He's such a splendid soldier! That was the last straw that kindled my soul to say yes. He's home from Castertridge for a night between the drills," continued Mrs. Peach. "He goes back to-morrow morning for the review, and when it's over he's going to meet me. . . . But, guide my heart, there he is!"

Her exclamation had rise in the sudden appearance of a brilliant red uniform through the trees, and the tramp of a horse carrying the wearer thereof. In another half-minute the military gentleman, whoever he might be, would have turned the corner and faced them.

"He'd better not see me; he'll think I know too much," said Margery, precipitately. "I'll go up here."

The widow, whose thoughts had evidently been of the same cast, seemed much relieved to see Margery disappear in the plantation, in the midst of a spring chorus of birds. Once among the trees, Margery turned her head, and before she could see the rider's person she recognized the horse as Tony, the lightest of three that Jim and his partner owned, for the purpose of carting out lime to their customers.

Jim, then, had joined the Yeomanry since his entanglement from Margery. A man who had worn the Queen's uniform for seven days only could not be expected to look as if it were a part of his person, in the manner of long-trained soldiers, but he was a well formed young fellow, and of an age when few positions come amiss to one who has the capacity to adapt himself to circumstances.

Meeting the blushing Mrs Peach (whom Margery in her mind sternly denied the right to blush at all), Jim alighted and moved on with her, probably at Mrs Peach's own suggestion, as that was what they said, how long they remained together, and how they parted, Margery knew not. She might have known some of those things by waiting, but the presence of Jim had bred in her heart a sudden disgust for the widow, and a general sense of discomfiture. She went away in an opposite direction, turning her head and eyeing in the unconscious Jim. "There's a fine rod in pickle for you, no gentleman, if you carry out that pretty scheme!"

Jim's military coup had decidedly outmaneuvred her. What he might do next she could not conjecture. The idea of his doing anything calculated brilliant to arrest her attention would have seemed ludicrous, had not Jim, by entering the Yeomanry revealed a capacity for dazzling explosion which made it unsafe to predicate any limitation to his powers.

Margery was now absolutely excited. The sly dancing of the orts in her lap in horse-play no longer amused her or much as to deal of the [illegible] ascendship with the demeanour of Mrs Peach. To go to that review, to catch the pair, to eclipse Mrs Peach in brilliance, to meet and pass them in withering contempt—if she only could do it! But, alas! she was a forsaken woman! "If the Baron were alive, or in England," she said to herself (for sometimes she thought he might possibly be alive), "and he were to take me to the review, wouldn't I show that forward Mrs Peach what a lady is like and keep among the select company, and not mix with the common people at all!"

It might at first sight be thought that the best course for Margery at this juncture would have been to go to Jim, and nip the intrigue in the bud without further words. But her own delicatesse after-days are that a hostess could on that was for [illegible] realizing to [illegible]. It was hard to [illegible] she had then [illegible] saw, and to [illegible] was a too humiliating proclamation of defeat. To [illegible] plan she could think of—perhaps not a wise one in the circumstances—was to go to the review herself, and be the gayest there.

A method of doing this with some propriety soon occurred to her. She dared not ask her father, who seemed to waste time in sight-seeing, and whose immobility herself she knew no abatement, but she might call on her old acquaintance Mr Vine, Jim's partner, who would probably be going with the rest of the lobster folk, and ask if she might accompany him to his spring cart. She had no sooner perceived the feasibility of this than she decided to call upon the old man early the next morning.

[To be continued.]

TENEMENT HOUSES IN SUMMER.

THE "poor Jew" quarter of New York has been for many years on the East side of the town about and not far from Grand Street, and it has been a veritable Ghetto. Since the persecutions in Russia have brought so many Polish and Russian Jews to our shores this quarter has scarcely been extended. It has merely been more and more densely packed. Landlords are averse to devoting any new buildings to the accommodation of this particular class of tenantry. It is difficult to get tenants of any other class or nationality to inhabit the same buildings which they occupy or which they have occupied. They are not very "good tenants" even from the tenement-house owner's point of view. They pay more for their wretched quarters in proportion to the accustomed than tenants of a higher class pay for better quarters, but that is an incident of tenement-house property in all districts. It may be said, in fact, that the lower we go in the social scale, the greater the profit the consumer has to pay. People who buy coal by the ton have very little notion of the enormously enhanced price which people have to pay who buy it by the bushel. The same thing is true of provisions, and the same thing is eminently true of rent. In addition to the exaction made of these poor Jews because they are poor, there is an additional exaction made because they are Jews. This means that the supply of dwellings for them is unusually restricted in comparison with the demand, and that the landlord has to put on—or does put on—an increased rent because this occupancy disqualifies his property from any other occupancy. The consequence is that tenants are more closely packed in this Jewish quarter than anywhere else. The people are very miserly as well as very poor, and they sublet and take "boarders" in quarters not spacious enough to give room for their own families. One would as soon think of opening a dog-kennel for a boarding house as some of the "apartments" which are actually turned to that use. Some of the boarding houses, which are also the workshops alike of the families and the boarders, are cellars, lighted only by the openings in the end on the street. In winter, when the keen air makes its way into those places in spite of all that their inmates can do, and when they really find comfort in the constant proximity which makes their animal heat available to each other as a substitute for fuel, the condition is horrible enough. But in summer what is to be thought of it, especially when we add to what has already been said that their apartments are wretchedly illcontrived or regards light and air, even if they were not occupied by a fourth part of the number which now crowd them, that they have no notion of the sanitary uses of air, or of water, or of soap; and that their standard of personal decency in other ways is or modest as their standard of personal cleanliness?

The one redeeming point, if that is not too strong a term, about these wretched people is their industry and their mistiveness. They seem to be satisfied with their surroundings, but they are certainly not satisfied with their conditions, and are struggling manfully by working early and late, and saving out of the small pay they receive from the carrying in various industries at which they keep themselves busy, to escape from it. When they succeed in accumulating capital enough they set up shops of their own in some other quarter of the city, or outside of the city. But their discontent is evidently not with the filthy surroundings of their life, since they might improve these at very little trouble and no expense, but only with its precariousness. What they seek is not greater comfort, but greater security. And they carry with them wherever they go the degrading habits they have formed, and their acquiescence in those habits. If you do not mend [illegible] you are a pig.

These poor Jews constitute, perhaps, the most degraded class of the tenement-house population of New York, and there is no [illegible] appreciably not only to the eye as [illegible] but to the [illegible] as well. But there are [illegible] in other [illegible] not very far even in degree [illegible] larger classes of the population which crowds the east side and the [illegible] west side of the city. Business men whose daily [illegible] and rob take them [illegible] from town to [illegible] broadway, or the several parts of the upper city, know only a small part of New York. The old saying that half the world knows not how the other half lives is made less true by the truth concerning New York. The well-to-do and well-to-do know nothing about the lives of three-quarters, or a still greater proportion of their fellow-citizens. The Second Avenue elevated road gives its passengers a glimpse of the fringe of the tenement-house population, but it is only of the fringe. Not a dozen writers to know more about it explore the Jewish quarter for himself. I walk [illegible] through a [illegible] through Tenth Street in the East Row, or perhaps [illegible] the [illegible] and Second and First and [illegible] River. If [illegible] of public opinion of [illegible] which [illegible] that something ought to be done about it.

In [illegible] the [illegible] to [illegible] place will be [illegible] habitation to be built and offered for rent. And the great majority of the tenement-houses in New York are unfit for human habitation as being places in which [illegible] or [illegible] physical or moral health. The detestable cookeries like the one described in our illustration are not separated by a great gulf from the next most detestable, but those from it next, and so on. The conditions merge into each other in imperceptible gradations. It can be said with confidence that not one in most hours in a hundred is fit to live in. The hours we go in the social scale the more miserable people are to the requirements of health and [illegible], and the less capable of enforcing even what they may regard as essential to their [illegible]. And it is important, it should never be forgotten, that the numerical majority of the inhabitants and the voters of New York live.

In apartment-houses of the better class it is recognized as absolutely essential that there should be on living room which do not open directly upon the outer air. This as a fundamental sanitary requirement, and as such ought to be enforced in dwellings of all classes, the more especially, indeed, in dwellings in which the space is necessarily contracted and crowded by reason of the poverty of the tenants. And how many tenement houses are there in New York in which this condition is fulfilled? One per cent. would be a very extravagant estimate. In truth, such tenement-houses as are fit to live in have been built, like the block on First Avenue at Seventy-second Street, and like the houses now building, or lately completed, on the property of Trinity Church, on the west side, by owners who had something else in view besides the extraction of the utmost cent of income from the investment.

Nevertheless, these public-spirited and excellent as surprises have vindicated themselves financially as well as in other respects. It is demonstrated that it is all pay to build tenement-houses that are fit to live in, and therefore it will be no hardship to compel all builders of tenement-houses to do what some builders of tenement-houses find profit as well as satisfaction in consonance as doing. Meanwhile the common builder of tenement-houses goes on in the same old rut, sometimes varying his brick box lighted at the ends, and enlightened and unventilated for two-thirds of its depth, by making a "shaft" in the centre, which amounts to nothing at all for light, and to very little for air, and which serves as a receptacle for all the rubbish from the rooms which open on it. The builder of tenement-houses is probably no greedier than other men, but he does seem to be considerably stupider. It is not to save himself money that he goes on in his old ways, but to save himself the trouble of thinking, or of employing an intelligent architect to do his thinking for him. There is no reason why he should longer be suffered to save himself that trouble at the cost of the physical and moral welfare of his tenants. He will vehemently oppose any change or the present building law which will compel him to build healthful houses. The more reason is there why an organized effort should be made by those who see what mischief he is doing to compel a change. Under Professor Chandler's administration the influence of the Board of Health was steadily exerted not only to enforce the existing law, but to bring about the enactment of a better, and we trust the same thing may be said of the department under his successor. At any rate no New Yorker can devote himself to a better cause than to the improvement of the New York tenement-house system, which to his present condition is a public nuisance, a public scandal, and a public danger.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

It seems that the toy pistol did not enter this year into the celebration of Independence-day with its wonted mischief. The time having arrived for loch jaw to supervene, comparatively few fatal cases are reported. Maybe the toy pistol will have disappeared, and the toy horn-gun to meet it, by the time the bicentennial comes around.

Watering place correspondents are writing about the dudes whom they see. One of these writers claims to have seen a dude surprised at the outlandish appearance of another dude. The first mentioned creature couldn't have been a dude, for dudes are never surprised.

Nearly all the recent noteworthy achievements in photography have been made by amateurs. This is true especially in respect to instantaneous photographs, the photographing of animal bodies and the use of the camera for obtaining views of [illegible] processes. Many valuable photographs of parks in the Alps which can not be obtained have been obtained recently by amateurs. At the same time, while many photographic apparatus as part of their outfit

In the course of the recent inquiry as to the loss of the United States ship Jeannette in the [illegible] sailor, one of the brethren, who had stood aside at the last was asked:

"When and how did you leave the ship?"

"I did not leave her at all," he replied, with indignation, "she left me."

Not many weeks ago surprise was produced throughout the country by the [illegible] reports of the [illegible] peach crop, which undoubtedly [illegible] from the [illegible] growing [illegible]. An explanation was offered in these columns to the effect that the [illegible] reports [illegible] had been [illegible] but it now [illegible] that the bad news of a late [illegible] with [illegible] crushing [illegible]. A Wilmington (Delaware) dispatch of July 13 is quoted: "Dispatches to The Every Evening, from nearly all parts of the peninsula, report that the peach crop has felt the effect of the June fall of young fruit with more than usual severity." It is added, by way of consolation, that the yield may be from two-thirds to three-quarters of a full crop.

An Ohio man who chased a burglar till the fugitive plunged into a river and was drowned has been indicted for murder in the first degree in not having gone to the drowning man's rescue. The action of the Grand Jury occasions some surprise, inasmuch as the man's course would have been held justifiable if he had shot and killed the criminal before he reached the river.

The Colored Press Convention, which met recently in St Louis, adopted a resolution urging that "negro" should be written and printed with a capital "N." Unless the question or no ton "g's" this question is one of typography principally.

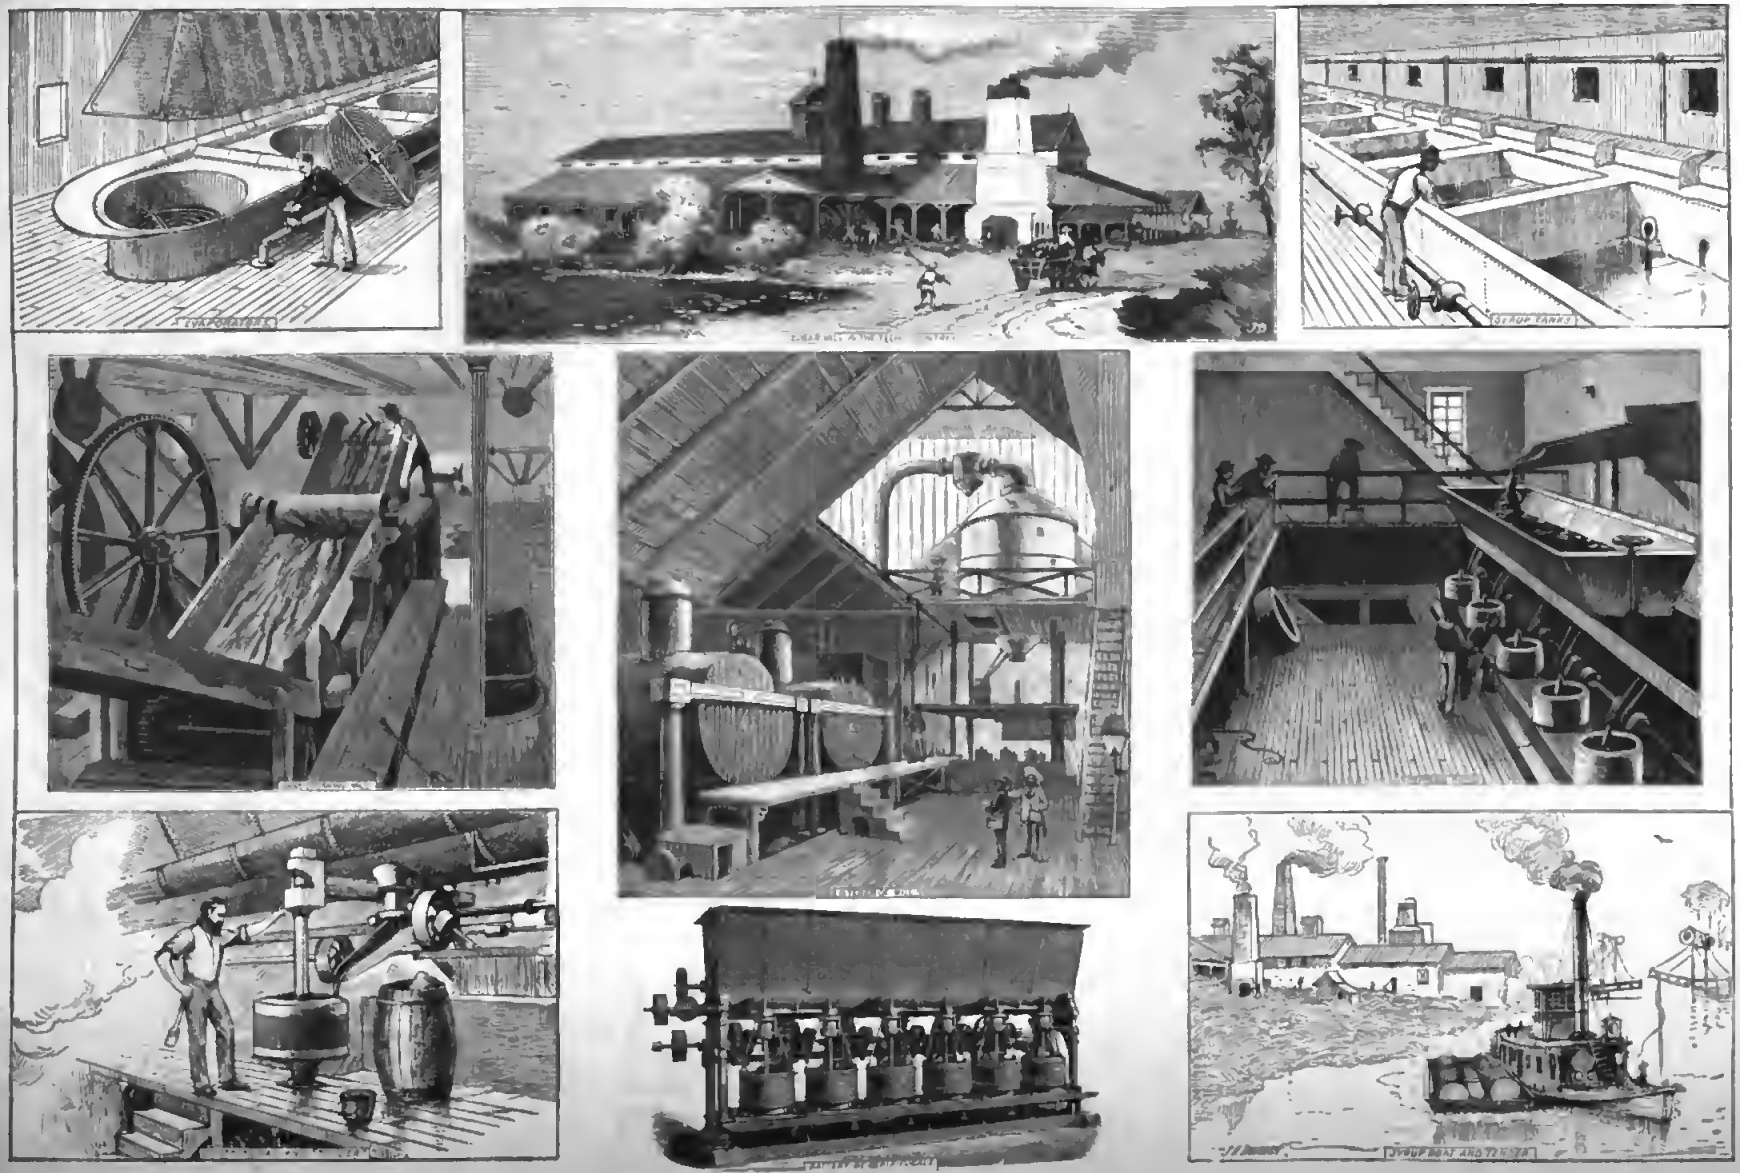
"Mother, may I go out to swim?" is a fashionable request in Washington this summer, according to a correspondent in that city. The West End beau sends a perfumed note to his lady love, asking for the pleasure of her company at the natatorium, where semi-weekly soirees are held. The place is brightly lighted by gas jets, and a band is playing. Around the ascending basin are broad balconies, with opera chairs for the "wall-flowers" who do not swim. Beau and belle meet in their bathing suits on the spring-board as the head of the bath, and "away they go with a plunge in common." The writer says that this form of entertainment is all the rage, and that "nothing else commands the attention of the quality folk who have nothing to do except amuse themselves with some new thing."

"Six cigars for a quarter can't be best," says an east-side sign. They can be cabbage, however.

Persons of moderate means who occupy apartments above the first three will spare themselves considerable annoyance and a little expense if, on returning from their summer vacations, they keep their baggage checks in their pockets instead of delivering them to the Irish young man who go through the trains as they approach the city. The companies which those young men represent agree to deliver trunks for forty cents a piece, but their drivers refuse to carry baggage upstairs. The drivers evidently are so instructed by their superiors, for it seems to respect these refusal at the office of the company see me with impertinence. For a "tip" of twenty five cents they will usually carry a trunk up to an owner's apartments. Persons returning in the city should pack in their hand bags such articles as will enable them to wait for their trunks till the day after their arrival, unless they can time their return so that it shall be before evening, and should give their checks to a trenched expressman who will deliver the trunks on any floor for fifty cents apiece. When starting for the country it is well enough to employ the baggage transfer company, for then are compelled to take baggage from the door on which they find it. If all persons who have once suffered annoyance through the refusal of the companies to help carry out their agreements or to the delivery of baggage would patronize individual expressmen when they return from the country to the city, it would not be long before all the companies would instruct their drivers to carry trunks to any desired floor

THE SPARROWS MUST GO!

ANOTHER CASE OF "ASSISTED EMIGRATION."



THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF LOUISIANA, NO. 2.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 471.]

"TOM THUMB"

People well advanced in middle age count among the earliest of their recollections the sight of Tom Thumb, whose real name was Charles S. Stratton. What a thrilling sight it was when the two black Shetland ponies—mimosettes as he was a homœopathite—and attached to a proportionable cockbot, with a small boy on the box and another swinging behind, pattered furiously through the main street and up to the place of exhibition, which in the present writer's time and place was the Town hall, and then from inside the gilded nutshell was extracted the colonel so to say, only he was already a general—General Tom Thumb! The large man who took out the little man so carefully must have been Mr Barnum himself, unless it was a still larger man whom he had cunningly enlisted to heighten the force of contrast and to belittle the atoms. The dapper youth and white little paint-swung has been cocked hat so he sat in the arms of the attendant giant and was led up to spectators, whilst the juvenile crowd sung at after him. The "entertainment" was artfully contrived by the cunning Mr Barnum that Tom should continually be looked at through the large end of the telescope. Nothing of it all—with the exception of the little song—was childish, which the little man sang in baby him so high up—that is, so low down—in the annals of dwarfdom, but his prettiness, brightness, and grace. Above all it was his felicity in falling in with Barnum

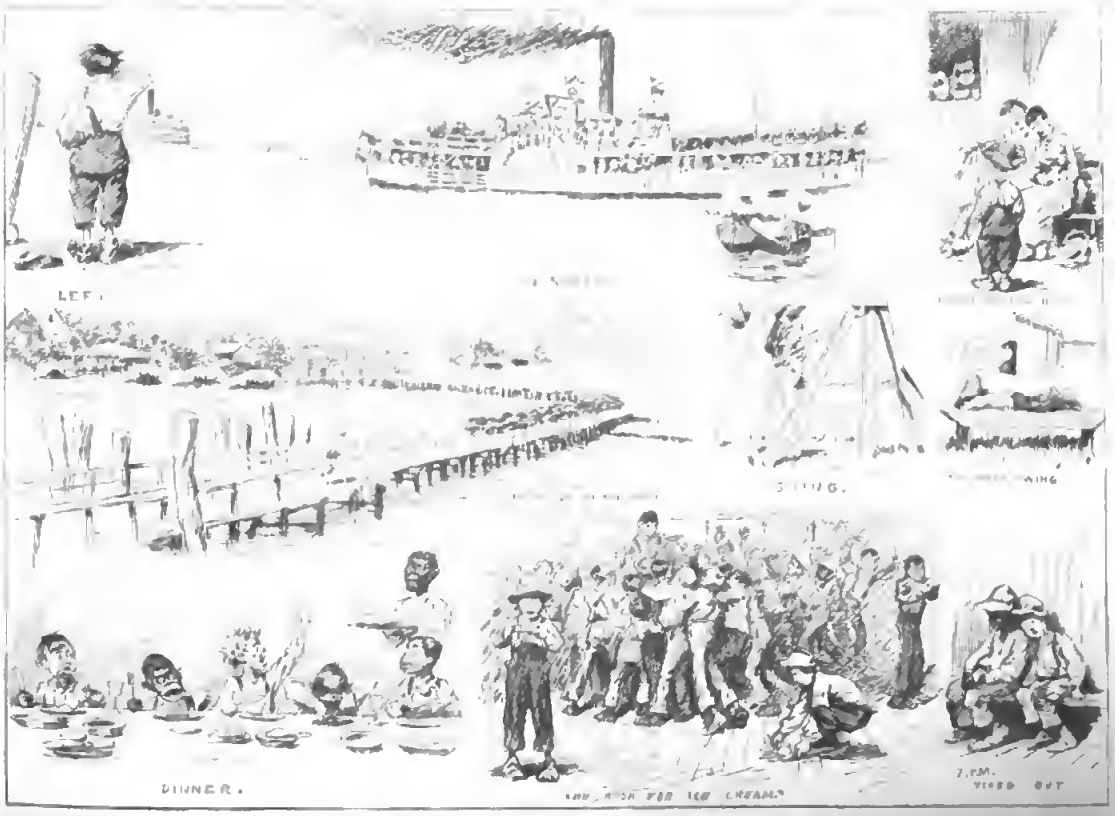
A NEWSBOYS' PICNIC

As most everybody has heard of the "Fresh air fund" which the New York Tribune is raising for the purpose of taking poor boys and girls out into the country, but not so many know about the picnic of a kind-hearted newspaper publisher of Wilmington, Delaware, for giving enjoyment to the newsboys of that city.



A NEWSBOYS' PICNIC, WILMINGTON, DELAWARE.—Drawn by A. B. Frost.

Digitized by Google

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
FOR WAKEFULNESS.

Dr. Wm. P. Clowness, Buffalo, N. Y., says: "I prescribed it for an alcoholic priest, who was a hard student, for wakefulness, extreme nervousness, etc. He reports great benefit."—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.

The Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel Rates, and many interesting Pen Whittlings, of the State of Maine, the Maritime Provinces, and all the Shores, Mountains, and Lake resorts east of Boston will be mailed free to any address on application to Lucius Tuttle, Gen. Pass. Agt., Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR
May be entirely prevented by the use of Benham's Compound. The superiority of Benham's Preparations consists in their perfect purity and strength.—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.
"It is as near fairyland, probably, as any place to this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.
"The odor of new-mown hay, the perfume of countless roses, the cool breeze, the trim lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune
Steamers leave Pier 14, North River, and Foot of 23d St., East River, and Jewett's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

HOTEL KAATERSKILL,
CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.
Largest mountain house in the world. Open June 20th to October. Accessible by all rail route within half mile of hotel, via the New Kaaterskill Railroad. Address, E. A. Gillett, Kaaterskill P. O., N. Y.—[Adv.]

GRAY HAIR
Turned to its natural color, pimples and blotches eradicated, by using Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment. Warranted for 10 years, and perfectly harmless. It also prevents the hair from falling out. Sold by all the druggists. $1 and 50 cents.—[Adv.]

A cocoa entirely free from drugs and heat producing, with a proper degree of mineral elements, is found in Walter's Cocoa. Mothers visiting Walnut Lake should not fail to test this article, which is highly lauded by leading physicians as the best substitute ever offered. All druggists have it.—[Adv.]

Angostura Bitters were prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert for his private use. Their reputation is such to-day that they have become generally known as the best appetizing tonic. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

Halford Sauce is conceded the standard relish. Halford Sauce improves soups, fish, gravies, meats, &c.—[Adv.]

C. C. Shayne, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N. Y., sends Fur Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

Dr. Pepper's St. Vitus Dance Specific.—One bottle always cures. Circular, Pittsburg, N. Y.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

Royal Baking Powder Co., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

PICKET $100 ANTI-STYLOGRAPH DESK $1.50 SIZE

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, overcome congestion, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe, de la Faculte de Paris, 20, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES,
EDENIA AND MARECHAL NIEL ROSE.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery is a delicious article; highly recommended by doctors.—Baker's Bonbons, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

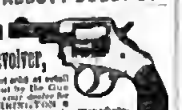
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

IN PREPARATION, The Finest Cigarette, Twelve First Prize Medals, CLOTH OF GOLD,
By Wm. S. Kimball & Co. (STRAIGHT MESH).
☞ WILL BE READY SHORTLY. ☜

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made, with one set of springs. Springs made of the best steel, tempered and shortened according to the weight they carry. Equally well adapted for heavy or light draft. Manufactured and made on Base Rods of either Wood or Steel. Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent on application.
HENRY TIMKEN,
Patentee,
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Trade supplied by ABBOTT BUGGY CO
CHICAGO, ILL.

THE AMERICAN
Double Action Revolver,



32, 38 and 44 Calibres, not sold at retail by the manufacturers, but by the Gun trade and dealers generally. Ask your dealer for one and if he cannot supply you, send to us direct. Made by HARRINGTON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass., also Manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Ejector Guns.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

KAHNWEILER'S
IMPROVED PATENT
CORK LIFE-PRESERVER,

For Swimming and Boating. Is easily adjusted. Any person can learn to swim in a very short time. Can be worn under the bathing-suit without being noticed. Assorted sizes for Ladies and Children. Price $1.50, may also be mailed or expressed on receipt of $1.60.
D. KAHNWEILER,
146 Worth St., N. Y.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "It is a success and a boon for which patients should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Cheesmen. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 6 Pemberton Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, H. KRAMER & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

Sole Agents for the United States, JOSEPH GILLOTT'S SONS, 91 John St., New York.

40 Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., post-paid. Agent's Outfit, 10c. Warranted best 40 Chromo Cards in the world. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

BRUSHES of every description at 615 Pearl Street, New York.
JOHN B. HOPPE, Manufacturer and Importer.

Peck & Snyder's
CELEBRATED
STATEN ISLAND
Tennis Racquet.
Used by all experts.
Complete Catalogue on application.
PECK & SNYDER, 126, 128, and 130 Nassau St., New York.

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me."
H. A. ARCHER, M. D.,
96 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What cures their fevers, makes them sleep;
'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

Strawberry Plants

in fine Pot Layers, planted any time from July 15th to September 15th, will grow a full crop next season. At the late, 18th, Exhibition of the New York Horticultural Society, we were awarded 8 first premiums for Strawberries shown. Circular of the

"CREAM"

of the Varieties for 1882, including the new and famous "JERSEY QUEEN," together with our certain and simple method of culture, sent to all applicants free of charge.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.
35 & 37 Cortlandt St., New York.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."
Testimonial of a Boston lady.

Disfiguring Humors, Humiliating, Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum and Infantile Humors caused by the Cuticura Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, cleans the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is indispensable in curing Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

A WHOLESOME CURATIVE.
NEEDED IN Every Family.
AN ELEGANT AND REFRESHING FRUIT LOZENGE for Constipation, Biliousness, Headache, Indigestion, &c.
SUPERIOR TO PILLS and all other system-regulating medicines. The taste is SMALL, THE ACTION PROMPT, THE EFFECT DELIGHTFUL. Ladies and children like it.
TROPIC FRUIT LAXATIVE
Price 25 cents. Large boxes, 50 cents.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

ELECTRIC FAN
Finest luxury of the age. A breeze of any velocity instantly obtained. The Double Induction Electric Motor, a perfect power for driving the family sewing machine. ELECTRO-DYNAMIC CO., Room, 16 East 15th St., N. Y., 121 N. Third St., Philadelphia, Pa.

EDUCATIONAL.
1882 The NEW CALENDAR of the 1882.
NEW ENGLAND
CONSERVATORY of MUSIC
Beautifully illustrated 44 pages, SENT FREE to yourself and musical friends. Send names and addresses to us. E. TOURJEE, Franklin Sq., Boston, Mass.
The Largest and best equipped Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

"BOKER'S BITTERS," THE OLD-est and Best Stomach Bitters known—unequalled for their medicinal properties, and for their firmness as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. L. P. BOKER, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1068.

OPIUM HABIT
Dr. M. B. KANE, late Superintendent of the Dwight-men Home, author of "Drugs that Enslave"—"Morphia Hydrochloricity"—"Opium Smoking," &c., begs leave to announce to the discovery of a combination of Remedies whereby any habitual user can voluntarily at home, in short time painlessly. The system of original letters, testimonials, and endorsement from some of the most eminent medical men, editors from all the world, editorial comments from leading journals, and a full description of the treatment. Address
Dr. M. B. KANE, 40 W. 14th St., New York.

BOSTON SCHOOL OF ORATORY.
Full course, two years; shorter course, one year. The Delsarte and Delearte systems of gesture, light gymnastics. Term begins Oct. 4th. Apply at Universal Hall, Boston, Mass., after Oct. 1st, from 10 to 12 A. M., or for catalogue address at any time H. H. RAYMOND, Pres.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE
As the only successful remedy in cases of Piles, Hemorrhoids when other remedies fail. Conveniently carried in the vest pocket, ready for use, without pain or inconvenience. Affording a medicinal relief. Sold by all druggists. Each application with a package of Seeley's ointment, to which are attached the directions for its use. Post paid, $2. Seeley & Tyson, Establishment, 1305 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 76 Fleet Street, London, England.

TAKE NOTICE.
For 50c. (in stamps) we will send a Elegant Scrap Picture. No two alike. F. WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

Lady Agents can secure permanent employment at good salary selling Queen City Chilled Sewing Machines, etc. Address Queen City Sewing Machine Co., Cincinnati, O.

40 New (1882) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:
HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

Remittances should be made by Post Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

DONT BE A CLAM

Clams are not a proper model for a human being to copy after they are wedded to their old clam-like notions:—they open their shells to take in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS.

A Clam is not a Good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after:—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after:— A Clam is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after:—

A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will try new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers:

A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Sulky Washer and a Hay Fork —

A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can, and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for—

Of course if a woman tries every new thing that she hears of she will often be duped.—But there is no sensible man or sensible woman who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such continuous use of their pages for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they had not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways: SO DONT BE A CLAM

Even a person of only ordinary intelligence will know for certain that a Soap that is excellent for the skin cannot possibly hurt clothes

Persons who allow articles said to be as good as The Frank Siddalls Soap to be forced on them must expect to be deceived SEE THAT YOU GET WHAT YOU ASK FOR.

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

When washing no fuel to remove remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary, and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 to 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes.... a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls soap and a dish-rag to be proud of

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper.... Marble Door Steps, Bureau Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantlepieces, etc.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

No tooth powder or tooth wash will compare with it

—Try it for washing your Eye Glasses and Spectacles

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy, all . . . from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap

FOR SHAVING

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes....

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for . . .

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

Letters from well known Physicians describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap . . .

ODD USES QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY

at Places where it is Not Sold at the Stores.

Promise No. 1 That the Soap shall be used the first wash day after receiving it . . .

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions . . . the Soap shall be exactly followed

If your letter gets no attention it will be because you have not made the promises, or because you have sent for more than one cake.

A Cake will be sent free of charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister . . .

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

And now dont act the old wash-boiler . . . but next wash-day give our honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent . . . by mail direct from the Factory

You must NOT send for more than one cake:

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions: any child over 12 years of age—who has common sense will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used. HEAT THE WASH-WATER . . . and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere in spite of the most careful housekeeper which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle

THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last water soapy: the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound. dont use Borax, Ammonia or any other soap on any of the wash

FIRST— . . . and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as . . .

Then ROLL IT . . . lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water . . . and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the full time commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board and the dirt will drop out; turn the garments . . . DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW . . .

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, and is for the purpose of getting the dirty suds out . . . AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT . . .

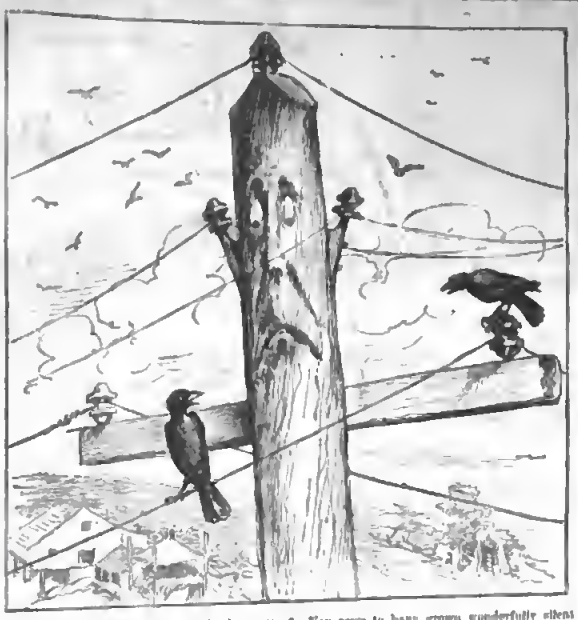
NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold; . . . STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google



MR. CHAVIS. "Hello, Poles, what's the matter? You seem to have grown wonderfully silent all of a sudden"

POLES. "Don't ask me. I believe there has been a break between negative Capital and positive Labor which has suspended the current of Public Interests."

MOUNT McGREGOR.

DON'T FAIL TO VISIT THIS

NEWLY-OPENED RESORT

WHILE IN SARATOGA.

THE BEST WAY TO REACH

SARATOGA

Is by taking the CITIZENS LINE STEAMERS "SARATOGA" and "TROY." Pier 46, N. R., foot of M'r'n every evening except Saturday. "The only line No Palace Steamers on the Hudson."

The popular and fashionable Rooms. Tickets sold 193, 207, 241, 260, 271, and 419 Broadway; New York Tuxedo Co., 125th St., near 3d Avenue, and principal Hotels throughout the City.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, New York.

UNITED STATES HOTEL.

The Largest Hotel in the World.

917 Rooms for Guests. Line of its Range over 1,000 feet long, 4 Stories High; Covering and Enclosing 7 Acres of Ground; the first frontage on Broadway, 675 feet frontage on Division Street. The patronage of the Elite of American Fashion on Residence of the Elite of American Fashion on the Piazzas of the Principal Hotels in the City. The establishment is under the personal management of the Proprietors

ROGERS, TOPKINS, PERRY, OAGE, & JANYRIN.

SARATOGA GEYSER.

It is the only Saratoga Water bottled without loss of its Natural Carbonic Acid Gas, and that drinks From the bottle as fresh as at the Spring.

A high authority says: "The Geyser Spring Water is the best adapted for Lions and kidney Diseases, and is applicable to a greater number of persons than any Spring at Saratoga."

For Dyspepsia this water is unrivalled. It contains more Soda and Magnesia combined (220,875 grains) than any other saratoga spring water.

Cards, &c. Press $3

Print Your Own

Large sizes for circulars, &c. $8 to $30. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

GENTLEMEN'S

BOSTON GARTER.

An exceedingly useful invention, without which every gentleman's dress is incomplete, especially during the Summer months, when low shoes are worn, and when it is indispensable to one's comfort and neat appearance to have the stocking fit smoothly about the ankle and the slack of the drawers kept confined at the knee, all of which the Boston Garter accomplishes.

For Sale by all the leading Gents' Furnishing Houses, or Sample will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Cotton, 25 cents per pair; Silk, 75 cents per pair.

Mention this paper. Address

GEORGE FROST & CO.,

267 Tremont Street, Boston.

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure has driven away all my eruptions."—Ida L. Young, Hamilton, Ill.

EARL & WILSON'S.

PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS.

ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

CONGRESS WATER.

Saratoga Cathartic, alterative. A specific for Diseases of the Liver, Kidneys, Stomach, Bowels, Skin, Blood, &c. Avoid imitations and worthless substitutes. Ask for Congress and Empire Waters, and take no other. Sold by druggists everywhere. Dr. Benson's Skin Cure is the only reliable remedy for Salt Rheum. Sold by druggists.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS

Call on any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

HAVE YOU TRIED IT?

THE OLD ADAGE, THAT "AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION IS WORTH A POUND OF CURE," WAS NEVER MORE APTLY ILLUSTRATED THAN BY HIM WHO TAKES HIS DOSE OF TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT BEFORE THE MORNING MEAL. FOR IT NOT ONLY GENTLY REGULATES AND PURIFIES THE SYSTEM, BUT IS A PROTECTION AGAINST DISEASE, WHICH NO ONE OUGHT TO DISREGARD. ALL DRUGGISTS HAVE IT.

United States Mutual ACCIDENT Association, 323 Broadway, N. Y.

Why insure against fire and not accidents? Is your dwelling or warehouse more valuable than yourself? Are they more likely to be burned than an accident to happen to your person? Statistics say not. Since the low rates for accident insurance offered by The United States Mutual Accident Association, 323 and 325 Broadway, New York is it wise and prudent to be without it? The membership fee is $5. Twelve dollars per annum will carry a $5000 policy, with $25 weekly indemnity, or twice that amount of insurance at proportionate rates.

ELSEWHERE PERMITS WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE.

CHAS. B. PEET (of Rogers, Peet, & Co.), Pres't.
JAS. B. PITCHER, Sec'y.

320 & 322 BROADWAY, N.Y. NEW YORK.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL

UNEQUALED FOR SIMPLICITY

THE LIGHT RUNNING DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

SPECTACLES Lorgnettes, Microscopes, Photographic Lenses, Artificial Eyes, Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Mariners' Compasses, Magnifying Glasses, &c. E. & J. BELIN, Manufacturing Opticians, Philadelphia, Pa. Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also Star Pulmonic Capsules. All Druggists.

NEW PRICE.

Dr. Scott's Electric HAIR BRUSH.

Only ONE DOLLAR. $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50 & $3.

Owing to the SPECIFIED SUCCESS of our $5 beautiful, pure Bristle Electric Hair Brush, and a very large demand for cheaper articles, but smaller in construction, we introduce a full line of these invaluable household remedies retailing at $1.00, $1.50, $2.00 & $3.00.

If you wish to test one of these beautiful Brushes I will send, on receipt of price, with 25c added for packing, postage, &c. Perfect satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded, or buy of your druggist. Beware of wire bristles which injure the scalp and promote baldness. Use "Pure Bristle" only. Scott's Brushes will positively cure headache and neuralgia. Call for Illustrations. Terms, exclusive territory and full particulars.

AGENTS—WANTED.

C. A. SCOTT, 842 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BLACKMAN WHEEL

PATENTED.

BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Lunatics, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 111 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to HOWARD & KOBBE, 64 Pulton St., New York, N. Y.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS.

In 26 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial, by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 25c. in stamps.

Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by first-class jewelers in every part of the world. Send 2 cents for pamphlet.

H. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 5 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

DELICATE MILD & FRAGRANT

Finest Brand Cigarettes.

S. J. & CO.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER

SAYS OF

DR. TOWNSEND'S REMEDY FOR

Hay-Fever, Asthma, and Catarrh:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1881.

"I believe it will be sure in ninety cases in a hundred."

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1881.

"I am happy to say that your remedy has served me a second season fully as well as the first year."

Pamphlets, with Dr. Townsend's full terms, and other testimonials, furnished on application.

Prepared only by

DR. H. W. TOWNSEND, Freeburg, Md.

Price 50 cents and $1.00 per bottle.

For sale by CHARLES DENNIS, Front St. and Lower St., Brooklyn, N. Y., and by all Druggists.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or

SMITH, PYNE, & ROSEN, New York.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM OTHER

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

VER & 741 BROADWAY.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS

PUBLIC, SUNDAY-SCHOOL & HOME EXHIBITIONS

C. T. MILLIGAN

ASK FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OF THE NEW DISSOLVING STEREOPTICONS

CONSTIPATION.

Send your name and address to P. O. Box 991, New York City, for a circular, sent free, giving full information about the cause and cure of the above complaint.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Asbestos Paper, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Send for circulars, price-lists, and sample.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

VICTOR TRICYCLES

OVERMAN WHEEL CO.

"Sick Headache for 40 years. Dr. Benson's Celery Skin cured me."—Lucy A. Warren, Deerfield, N. Y.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

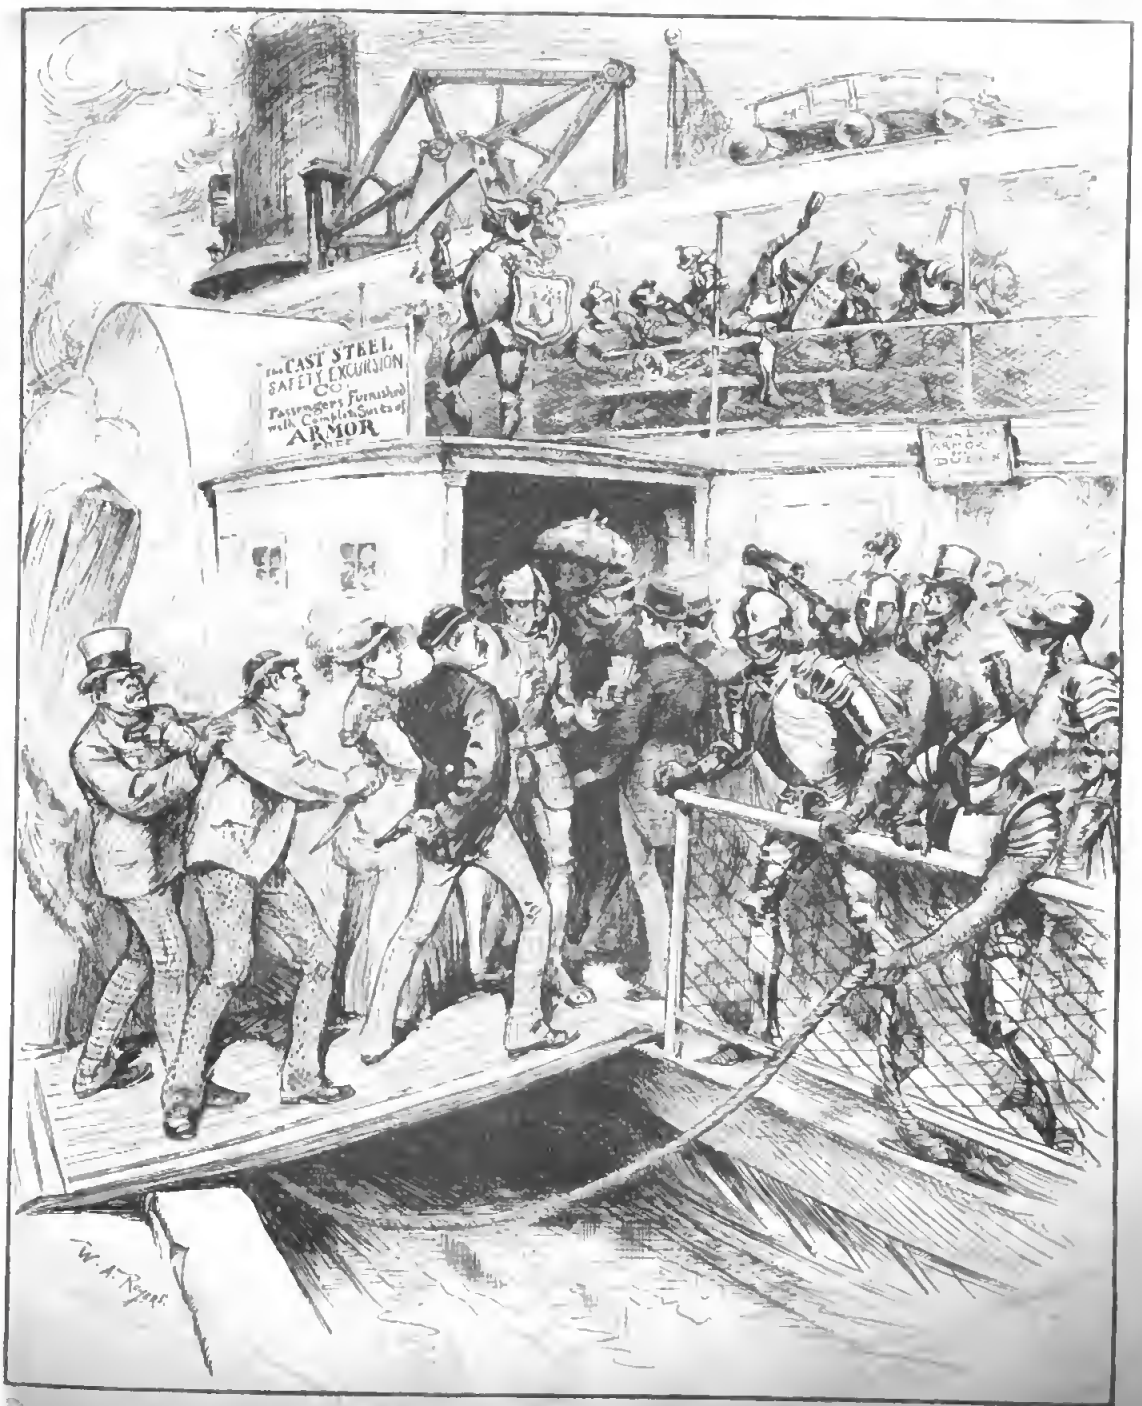
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1389.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE



THE PERILS OF STEAMER EXCURSIONS.—A HINT FOR THE PROTECTION OF PEACEABLE PASSENGERS.—[See Page 491.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1883.

"Bright, sparkling, and brimming over with good things."—Chicago Inter Ocean

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

The current Number of this delightful periodical for little folk contains portraits and a sketch of

GENERAL TOM THUMB AND WIFE, giving reminiscences of their eventful career.

THE ADVENTURES OF PRINCE LAZYBONES is the title of a charming serial story by MRS. W. J. HAYS, author of "The Princess Idleness" and other popular stories for young readers.

Among the other attractions special attention may be called to a full page of sketches by F. S. CHURCH, entitled "Animal Studies in Central Park;" "Cousin Tom's Wedding," a story by MATTHEW WHITE, JR., articles by ELIOT MCCORMICK and MARGARET EYTINGE, and illustrations by W. P. SNYDER, H. P. WOLCOTT, RHODA EMMET, and others.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.50 PER YEAR.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

THE TELEGRAPH STRIKE.

THE great telegraph strike will be always memorable in the history of such events because of the instantaneous action throughout the country. It is very significant also as showing the nature and possible consequences of such movements at a time when enormous corporations and combinations of capital produce similar vast organizations of labor. The tendency of such concentration of capital, against which the feeling called "anti-monopoly" is the protest, is not, however, wholly inimical, as is often supposed, to the interests of labor, considered as an interest distinct from capital. In 1877 it was evident that common action upon the part of railroad employés throughout the country would produce the most serious consequences. They command all transport, and if they decide that transport shall cease, there is no recourse but to the old and long disused methods of communication. The sudden and general interruption of railroad transport in this country would obviously be an incalculable misfortune.

Scarcely second to this would be the misfortune of a similar sudden cessation of telegraphic intercourse. The business of the country at the great centres of trade is now done so largely by telegraph that the instantaneous interruption or destruction of the system would be disastrous. Yet this is always possible because of the absorption of the great bulk of the telegraph business by one huge company, and of the necessary organization of the telegraph operators into one combination. This combination actually controls telegraphic communication as the railroad combination controls intercourse by rail. It is therefore of the utmost importance that the huge railroad or telegraph corporations should cultivate just and amicable relations with the power that can summarily suspend the business. The individual employer may readily find another hand to take the place of the one that leaves him. But it is not supposable that a corporation can at once or easily supply the places of thousands of skilled workmen all over the country. It is obvious, moreover, that the combination and organization of labor will closely follow that of capital, and the greater the aggregation of capital intent upon its own advantage, without perceiving what essential elements of pecuniary advantage are sympathy, justice, and generosity, the greater will be the organized association of labor; and the menace to society in this separation into two hostile camps of interests naturally related is plain.

But the duty of such interests is not less evident. It does not lie in an arbitrary and imperious assertion of will, but in a spirit of mutual understanding and concession. Strikes may be foolish. They may be ill-timed. They may be unreasonable. They may be often ineffective. But they are often the only means open to those who resort to them of declaring wrongs and demanding rights. So universal is the feeling that in a contest between capital and labor the advantage is with capital, because of its greater power of endurance, that whenever there is a strike it may be said almost as a rule that there is a general conviction that it is not without reason. Doubtless there are instances of strikes due to the reckless incitements of knavish demagogues. But a wanton strike is very infrequent. A strike may be generally considered to be the sign of an honest, even if a mistaken, conviction of injustice. In a great movement of the kind, therefore, unaccompanied by violence, as in the case of the telegraph strike, public sympathy will be found with the strikers, as it was with the telegraph operators, and there will be, as there was in that case, a general feeling that the corporation of employers ought to hear the complaint not incredulously, and apply the remedy. The general welfare and the public peace can not be promoted by chopping logic and quoting what are called economical laws. Undoubtedly it is well to remember the great law of supply and demand, but it is not less necessary to remember that there is a great deal of human nature in man.

THE MASSACHUSETTS ELECTION.

No election this year will be more interesting than that in Massachusetts, for General BUTLER is a popularly entertaining figure, and he has arrayed himself against the honorable pride, the character, and the intelligence of the State. The General is almost too transparent a demagogue. He takes the whole thing good-naturedly, and his adroitness always serves him; but he evidently despises the people, whom he treats as stupid and very gullible, and his talk about reform, economy, and civic virtue has precisely the artificial ring of the stage appeals full of noble sentiment to the gallery. The General has plenty of "cheek," and while he poses as the champion of reform and economy, it is amusing to remember that he was the most strenuous and unblushing leader of the salary grab in Congress ten years ago. Nobody takes General BUTLER seriously. There is probably not a person in the party with which he is now acting, or in any other party, who supposes that he has any particular political principle, or that he would hesitate at anything which promised to gratify his ambition.

The General's onslaught upon the management of the Tewksbury almshouse has failed, yet it is the great measure of his administration. There have been abuses in that institution which have been exposed and remedied. But the eager Governor evidently thought that there was a general public suspicion of hidden misdoing which could be turned to account, and assuming the truth of every allegation, he has conducted the inquiry like a Tombs shyster bent upon a verdict at any cost, and not like a magistrate seeking to ascertain the truth and to do justice. His mind has been fixed upon BUTLER rather than upon Tewksbury. His professions upon the abuse of appointments, in an interview published in the New York Herald, were refreshing for their lofty tone, and for their truth if not their novelty. But his performances, according to the accounts from Massachusetts, have been ludicrously inharmonious with his professions. He holds, probably, with Judge HOADLY—who is, however, a very different man—that reform had better wait until his friends have secured the spoils.

This is the man, whom nobody in the country politically respects, who has been selected by the Democratic party of Massachusetts as its especial representative. There could be no more significant illustration of the spirit of that party. Mr. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS described it as being in 1860 a conspiracy against human rights. It is now as truly an organization to secure the "plunder" of the government. It does not even profess a principle upon any practical question. It does not assert that the contest is between policies. It insists that the election of '84 will be merely a struggle between the two parties—a fight for patronage. As such a controversy involves no principle, no national policy, no actual issue—as it must be conducted by personal attacks, smart tricks, taking cries, and the lowest arts of the demagogue, General BUTLER is fitly selected by the Massachusetts Democracy as its representative. It could not do better. He is the type of the present attitude and purpose of the party. He would necessarily occupy a high place in a Democratic national administration, and in carefully observing him every voter can see to what kind of control Democratic success would consign the government. The Massachusetts election, as we say, will be interesting. But the General will have to fight for victory. He can not have gained a single vote by his course, and while every vote that could be cast for him was undoubtedly thrown last year, many of them will this year be thrown against him, with a large number of votes that did not come out. Those who wished "to see what the old man would do" have seen enough, and, having gratified their curiosity, they will probably vote this year for the honor and the principles of Massachusetts.

MR. TURPIN AND THE REV. DR. DODD.

THE Democrats usually carry the election overwhelmingly some months before it takes place. They proclaim themselves to be the party of avenging virtue, and all goes prosperously until the votes are counted, when it turns out that they have not enough. The explanation both of this seeming prosperity and of the fatal want at the polls is obvious. The party in power is judged by every wrong deed and by every wrong-doer. Even its own intelligent and independent members join in the criticism and censure, and to that degree are in sympathy and harmony with the opposition. The general tone of comment seems to be adverse to the dominant party. In this situation the eager but obtuse opposition sees in every Republican critic a Democratic voter. It redoubles its loud protestations of horror and its professions of virtue. The excellent Mr RICHARD TURPIN is deeply grieved that a pocket has been apparently picked, and the Reverend Dr. DODD has heard with inexpressible sorrow that somebody has been forging. It is too sad. But Messrs TURPIN and DODD will be only too happy to guarantee the apprehensive against robbery and forgery.

When it comes to the decision, however, the frying-pan is thought to be quite as secure as the fire, and there is a general suspicion that DICK TURPIN is a queer defense against thieving, and Dr. DODD a droll prophylactic against forgery. This is the reason that the prosperity of the canvass vanishes at the polls, and that the Democrats who walk so gayly and triumphantly over the course before the race begins are, so to speak, nowhere when it ends. In 1868 they assured the country that if it wanted sound constitutional reconstruction, the Democratic party was still doing business at the old stand of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. In 1872 they announced their detestation of the unfraternal attitude of the Republicans, and their ardent desire to shake hands over a bloody chasm. In 1876 they implored a stricken country to rest in their temperate bosom safe from the hands of whiskey thieves. In 1880 they were sure that the only refuge from the Crédit Mobilier rascality was among the allies of Greenbackers and the reminiscent legatees of TWEED. The sirens sang, but the wily Ulysses, half distrusting himself, stopped his ears and held on his course—and saved his ship.

We are again approaching the election. It will take place in November, 1884, and already in August, 1883, the unwearied jesters have overthrown the Republicans, horse, foot, and dragoons. There is nothing left of them; they are sunk in the sea, and such is the awful fate of the once great Republican party. It is certainly dreadful, and it would be even more appalling if, as the boys say, we had not all been there so very often. But the country has had a serious experience during the last twenty-five years, and the one thing in which it will not now be deceived is the character and probabilities of the party to which it commits its welfare. Long tenure of power by a party is undesirable for many reasons. But a long tenure is not the worst of perils. The party which would relieve the country of that evil must be able to show that it will do better. Its protestations and promises will be impartially heard. Its explanations and excuses of its familiar career, of its performances when it has recently obtained local power, of its alliances and its inconsistencies, will all be patiently weighed. But unless something more forcible and promising is presented than has yet been offered, the judicious country will probably inform the deeply grieved Mr TURPIN and the sorrowing Reverend Dr. DODD at the polls that their arguments are very touching, but that, upon the whole, it is not satisfied that they are the safest guardians of the national honor and the national treasure.

REPUBLICANISM AND TEMPERANCE.

THE receipts under the SCOTT law in Cleveland, Ohio, are said to be so large that the general tax levy will be probably reduced; and the revenues of the State of Missouri have been increased to the amount of $1,000,000 by the high license act. These are significant facts, and they will probably lead to a general adoption of the system. The tax upon the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is based upon economical and not upon moral considerations. The moral consideration, however, as doubtless very potent in securing the passage of such laws. The fact that the traffic produces drunkenness, and that an immense proportion of crime springs from drunkenness, and entails great expense upon the community, naturally suggests the taxation of the traffic as the most unobjectionable of taxes. It is a tax which does not touch anything necessary to subsistence. It affects nothing but a dangerous and unnecessary form of self indulgence, and in the highest sense, therefore, it is a tax upon superfluity and luxury. Even those who, in the desire to propitiate the liquor interest, oppose a high license, do not dare to propose free drinking. They insist upon a low license as more equitable. But it is not more equitable, since a high license produces a larger revenue, and consequently lightens the burden upon actual necessaries.

The dullest ground of hostility to the high license act is that it oppresses the poor man by raising the price of his dram. This, however, is not true, for the high license, by limiting the number of traders, enables them to realize larger profits without raising the price, the traffic depending largely upon a low price. "Drunk for a penny, dead drunk for twopence," as the old English sign said. But if it were true, and if the high license did diminish the consumption of liquor, it would consequently lessen crime and the expenses of preserving public order. This argument against high license would then amount merely to saying that sober and honest poor people should be taxed more heavily in order that tippling poor people might get drunk more cheaply. Demagogues are often forced into ludicrous positions, but there could hardly be one more pitiful than this. The appeal for the favor of drunkards under the plea of tender consideration for the poor man is a subterfuge which does not deceive the American poor man, because he is not a fool. It is in accord with the traditions of the Republican party that it should be identified in Ohio with the high license law. There are always two tendencies in society, one to good order, sobriety, industry, intelligence, morality, and progress. The other is against them. Government and politics are but indirectly concerned with them, because the object of government is to secure individual liberty, which may be trusted to promote virtue and social progress. But parties nevertheless will naturally be found, upon the whole, to favor or not to favor specific moral objects. This is especially true of the Republican party in this country, which took its origin and derived its force from a moral impulse. Its natural tendency is even to strain the powers of government to aid general enlightenment and progress. It is the Republican party which favors a generous educational policy, and which naturally attracts the especial friends of temperance. Every reform instinctively expects help from that party. The strength of the Republican feeling for a protective tariff lies in the conviction that protection is, upon the whole, best for the poor man.

This difference of tendency between the two parties in this country was signally illustrated during the tremendous controversy upon slavery. The Republican speeches and papers were full of personal sympathy with the slave. The Democratic orators and press either denied the wrong or were absolutely indifferent and callous to it as if it did not exist. The whole Democratic treatment of slavery regarded it as solely a legal question. The attitude of the party was that of Shylock. He held a bond upon which he asked legal judgment. It was a mere impertinence and extrajudicial to speak of suffering and human life. The Democracy was the Shylock of our politics in their most vital contest. In all the long list of Democratic speeches, letters, articles, reports, and documents of every kind upon the subject there is not a single throb of humanity. There was apparently no consciousness that the question involved the dearest rights of human beings. There was, indeed, an immense talk of rights, but it meant merely the legal rights of slave holders. There was furious denunciation of Abolitionists for inciting attacks upon the domestic hearth and altar, but it was the hearth of the man-stealer, not of the stolen man. The slave was without care or pity or thought from the Democratic party, which made the country, whose government it controlled, and which perpetually boasted of freedom, the contempt of Christendom. By the same tendency the old party of human slavery is now the party of the liquor interest against the friends of temperance. But no Republican need be ashamed or anxious for his party because it is to-day the party of temperance in Ohio and elsewhere. The same impulse that made it antislavery makes it a high-license party.

THE DISAGREEMENT OF THE DOCTORS.

The controversy in the American Medical Association upon freedom of consultation has excited great attention, and the rule restricting consultation has been an zealously defended as it has been assailed. We have received several earnest letters upon the subject, and one recently from Illinois, which is too long for our space, but which is written in excellent temper, except when the writer speaks of the repeal as gratifying a "mandlin sentimentalism." Such an expression shows strong feeling, but it is not an argument, nor even a conciliatory phrase.

The writer admits that there may be honest homœopathists (for this relief much thanks), and he says of the physicians of the old school, although he will not concede the propriety of such a designation, that "they are happy to avail themselves in their practice not only of the accumulated experience of the profession, but also of the aids furnished by anatomy, physiology, pathology, and organic chemistry." Then why not of the experience of an honest and sagacious homœopath? Why arrest the patient from the advantage of the knowledge of his case, of his constitution, of his habits, of the thousand details which are indispensable to a just curative treatment, because the physician who is possessed of the knowledge is a homœopath?

The repeal of the rule simply permits a physician to consult with anybody whom he may think able to give him information. It does not commit him to a reconstruction of his own curative methods, nor of his own theories of disease and cure, nor to a partnership with anybody. It merely acknowledges the professional freedom with which no physician ought ever to part. Indeed, the rule, according to the most authentic accounts, was not adopted to promote the cure of disease and the relief of suffering so much as to proscribe homœopathy. If that be true, it is not a rule which was conceived in a scientific or humane spirit, and which therefore ought to be repealed.

JUDGE HOADLY UPON REFORM.

Judge Hoadly has been supposed to be friendly to reform in the civil service, and some very excellent sentiments upon that subject have been quoted from speeches of his when he was not a candidate for office. But it is, perhaps, because he takes seriously the recent humorous remark that his friend Mr. Tilden is really the father of that reform that he used upon a recent occasion, being now a candidate for the Governorship of Ohio:

"When the injustice of the last twenty-one years of exclusive choice from one party has been remedied by the next Administration, and the Democracy of the country and their allies, representing more than one-half of the people, may perform their fair share of public duty, the time in my judgment will have arrived for a new departure upon the question of political patronage, and for the adoption of a permanent system of low salaries, permanent tenures, and choice according to fitness and not political service—in other words, the thorough abandonment of the spoils system."

If Judge Hoadly has really looked into the question of reform, not as a party advantage, but as a measure of public necessity, he must be aware that the theory of this remark is precisely that of the abuse which the reform would correct. That theory is that the subordinate civil service positions should be filled for political reasons. The principle of reform is that they should be filled in a manner to exclude political influence.

Judge Hoadly's doctrine is that against which the reform is directed. It contemplates dividing the minor public employments proportionately among members of different parties. This was one of Mr. Jefferson's fancies. But Mr. Jefferson never proposed any method of accomplishing the result. Nor could he or any other man suggest a method which would not aggravate every evil which now exists. If party and political and personal sympathy is to determine such employments, the logic is irresistible that it ought to determine them all. And whatever the logic might be, that would certainly be the result. Whatever the intention of Judge Hoadly's remark may have been, the interpretation which will be put upon it by his Democratic supporters is plain. It means to them precisely what General Butler meant in saying that the government belongs to its friends, and Governor Marcy in saying that to the victor belong the spoils.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

Among our English visitors for the autumn the name of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is announced. He is the President of the British Board of Trade, and one of the most liberal and courageous members of the ministry. He represents the more popular and Democratic sentiment which in the Gladstone administration is allied with the old Whig aristocracy, and some of his recent speeches have had almost a startling sound to English ears, so asmonarchical was their tone.

The character of the ministry is one of the most striking illustrations of the singular ascendency of Mr Gladstone. No other man in England could hold so strongly together elements so apparently divergent, and the secret is the extraordinary catholicity of his mind. He understands by sympathy the force of all the different views and tendencies around him.

Mr. Chamberlain is a manufacturer in active business as well as a minister. In this country he will, of course, occasionally make a speech, and the Boston Transcript suggests that as a favorite argument with the high-tariff advocates is that British manufacturers desire to break down our tariff, and contribute vast sums of "British gold" to accomplish their foul purpose of seizing and monopolizing our market, if a manufacturer like Mr. Chamberlain should dilate upon free trade it would be an illustration of the truth of the alleged sinister object which the high protectionists would turn to the utmost account. This is undoubtedly true. But if Mr. Chamberlain comes, and the occasion justifies such a course of remark, we suppose that he will leave nobody in any doubt of his views upon the question of free trade.

A SUGGESTION CORRECTED.

The Easy Chair of Harper's Magazine for August, in commenting upon the interesting scene at the final interment of John Howard Payne, mentioned a letter which it had received, written evidently in perfect good faith, which suggested that Mr. Payne had been married, and that the yearning for home, sweet home, of his famous song was a mere play of the imagination.

This suggestion of a correspondent, although honestly and respectfully made, is decried as a gross error by an authority which is not to be questioned. The correspondent of the Easy Chair doubtless confounded Mr. Payne with a younger brother, in whose house the poet lived for many years, and to whose wife he addressed some of his most entertaining letters.

The same authority deplores the injustice of some of the recently published likenesses of Mr Payne, describing them as even caricatures of a face which was serious and intellectual, but at the same time bright and genial, with deep blue eyes in which shone a gentle light, and wholly without the Mephistophelian air to which the Easy Chair alludes.

That monthly gossip, we are sure, will be obliged to us for correcting, some weeks before he could himself correct it, the suggestion to which he gave currency. But it was a harmless suggestion, unless it might seem to imply some attempt at ridicule. That, however, was not implied. But none of his countrymen would willingly even seem to do injustice to the "courteous, kindly, and handsome" gentleman who wrote "Home, Sweet Home."

PERSONAL.

In confirmation of some statements made in this column several weeks ago, we note that Mr Julian Hawthorne's novel, Fortune's Fool, is resumed in the July number of Macmillan's Magazine. We take pleasure in commending this fact to the attention of several writers for the press who some time ago manifested much anxiety concerning Mr Hawthorne's relations with his London publishers.

—At the time of his death the late Mr. Peter Cooper left in the hands of his family an elaborate Autobiography. The MS. of this work has been submitted to a New York man of letters, who, after an examination, will give an opinion respecting the advisability of publishing it. Mr Cooper used to speak with pride and pleasure of this literary task to which the evening of his life was devoted. His habit was to dictate daily his recollections to a young woman pupil of the Cooper Institute who had studied stenography, and who read to him each day her copy of what he had said the day before.

—We take the following from the London News of July 13: "The friends of the scientific explorer the late Mr Peter Hatton (son of the London correspondent of the New York Times), who accidentally lost his life in North Borneo, will be sorry to learn that the funeral which was to have taken place in London is indefinitely postponed. It will be remembered that the body was rowed by the deceased's devoted followers to Kiqous, where, after an inquest, it was buried with manifestations of Kenian and respect on the part of the population, European, Chinese, and native. Orders were given for its exhumation and conveyance to London. The medical officer of the tropical settlement feels compelled to decline to sanction its removal for the present. The Governor of Sabah sends this information with much regret by the mail that has arrived at Naples. The British North Borneo Company, in whose service Mr Hatton died, will, it is understood, erect a memorial to his memory at Ekopma. A number of wreaths and immortelles will go out from the family and friends next week."

—A friend of Mr William Page's writes to us that although some of his paintings bear traces of having suffered, there are at least twenty-one of them at his residence in Tottenville, Staten Island, executed within the last fifty-three years, which show no signs of deterioration at the hands of Time, also, that such important works as the "Farragut," the "Shakespeare," the "Moses," and the copies from Titian, now in his daughter's studio in the Sherwood Building—some of which will grace the Loan Collection in the Metropolitan Museum next October—are as fresh as on the day they were painted. Mr Page's well-earned fame is not in danger.

—That association of painters known as the American Art Union has had a successful exhibition of the pictures which went from New York to Buffalo, and which are now being placed to the Louisville Exhibition, whose managers have generously promised to give the Union twenty-five hundred dollars if they do not sell ten thousand dollars' worth of these works in Louisville. An art journal, to be called the Art Union Record, and to serve as the organ of the association, will soon be published monthly. It will be edited by Mr. Durrie, of this city, and will contain contributions, pictorial and literary, from American artists and their most appreciative friends.

—A book-reviewer is pleased with Mr. Swinburne because of his scandals with rhymes to "baby." The poet to Thackeray's tale could find an rhyme for "babe" but "Tippoo Saib." Mr. Swinburne is more successful with "gray be" and "may be."

—Castle Frohsdorf, where the Count of Chambord lives, is a plain stone white building, situated within a dense forest, about an hour by rail from Vienna. The word Frohsdorf means frog's village. Frottendorf, an town's village, was formerly the name of the castle. Its chief ornaments are portraits of dead French kings and a life-size statue of the Maid of Orleans.

—The Rev Dr Wordsworth, for many years Bishop of Lincoln, and well known as a Biblical commentator, has resigned, in his seventy-sixth year, because of failing physical health, and "especially because I am overburdened with a sense of solemn responsibility for the spiritual welfare of the county of Nottingham, particularly of its great town containing a population of two hundred thousand souls, and requiring the vigilance and energy of a bishop in full vigor of mind and body."

—Mr Boker-Josse, the greatest colorist among living British painters, has not humbled himself to design a curtain for the back of a piano. The work in outlined in crewels, and has been publicly exhibited.

—Baron Mcmahon, an English judge sitting recently at the Northampton assizes, "strongly complained"—to use the words of a Northampton reporter—of the bad accommodations provided for Mr. Justice Smith and himself. "The sanitary arrangements of their lodgings he denounced as miserable. The drainage was as pestiferous he could scarcely remain in his room. Unless this state of things were remedied, he had given instructions to engage other rooms, as it was not safe to remain in the present apartments." His Honor has an Coney Island to flee to.

—Mr. David Neal, of Munich, writes as follows of the engraving of his painting, "The Kneeling Nun," which appeared in Harper's Weekly for June 16: "Allow some of my experiences with illustrated newspapers. I was not to expectation of one of the best engravings I have seen in a long time. In fact, I make my heartiest compliments to the engraver, who has produced a picture far superior to the average of the best European illustrations."

—Goethe, now sixty-five years old, expresses the opinion that music finds its noblest and highest forms in religious ideas and sentiments. "You will see a religious thread running through all my operas and works of any importance. For instance, the rather-loved scene in Faust, and Polyeucte, which is an absolutely religious opera. It is because of this feeling that I have given up writing for the theatre."

—The Athenæum, in noticing the death of the Rev Charles T. Brooks, "an American translator and poet," speaks of the carefulness and excellence of his translations, especially those of Goethe's difficult as Jean Paul's Titan and Hesperus, and adds: "The most nobly of men, he was dear as man of the world and to all lovers men in America. His beautiful home at Newport was a centre of hospitality."

—Mr Henry Irving is congratulated by one of his countrymen on overcoming a certain restlessness and fidgetiness, ascribable, apparently, to a nervous feeling that if he is not doing something when on the stage the audience will lose interest or grow weary. If Mr Irving can repress another infirmity, namely, that of overelaborating on once no be in at his case, "the American public will be likely to reap the full benefits of his remarkable gifts."

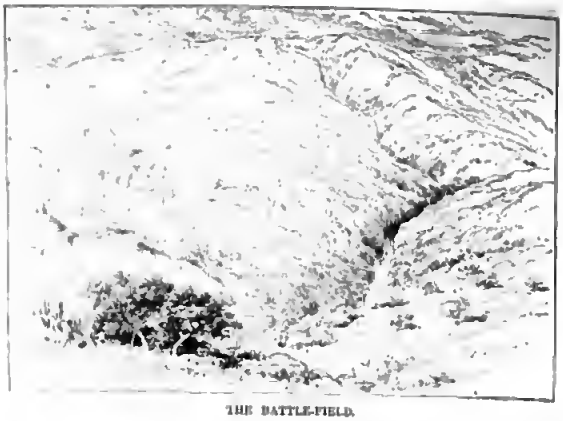
—Strawberry Hill, where Horace Walpole used to live, has been sold. Opinions may differ (says a late writer) about the architecture and the taste of Strawberry Hill, but so long as associations keep fresh their charm Horace Walpole's house will retain one of the most interesting in England. It has been the resort of three generations of wit, wisdom, and frivolity, and it will be a pleasing thing if Baron De Stern, the new purchaser, should carry those associations on to another generation.

—One hundred and fifty Hungarians organized an excursion party to Paris, and on arriving there lived together like one family in the quaint Hôtel Lion d'Or, whose furniture, plate, and linen are a reproduction of the styles of two hundred years ago. They visited Victor Hugo, whom one of them saluted as the seventh great poet of the world, Dante having declared himself the sixth. Victor Hugo complimented the Hungarians as a people who had "conquered liberty," whatever that may mean. A member of the party spoke of having seen Kossuth recently, who was wonderfully well at the age of eighty-one.

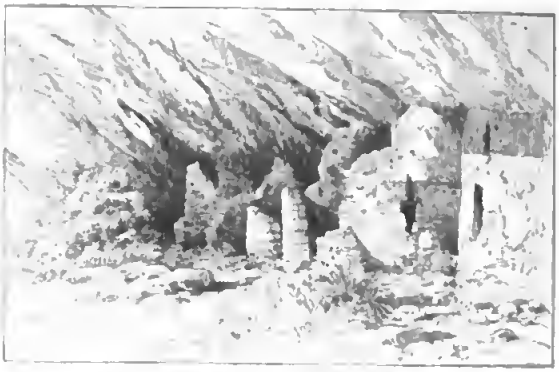
—Lord Shaftesbury is on pessimist. He thinks that notwithstanding "the enormous amount" of infidelity and skepticism, there never was an determined an effort to advance the kingdom of Christ, as much respect for the human race, and so great a desire "to look upon the poorest sort, and lift them from their misery."

—A long letter from Lucas Hoyt to Robert Brownings—long enough to fill half a dozen columns of this journal—appears in one of our foreign contemporaries. The writer partly [illegible] himself of "terribly digressing," and pens [illegible] that in future his [illegible] shall be "of reasonable [illegible]," if Mr Brown [illegible] encouraged him "with a few words in answer to them." About two-thirds of the communication is occupied with extravagant praise of Mrs. Browning's Aurora Leigh, and with first and last lines (or half-lines) of the passages that Hoyt most liked in Robert Browning's poems. "Did it ever strike you," he asks, "how frightful it would be to be wholly prosperous and happy?—happy all your life? I think or fancy it would have made me look upon myself as a sort of outcast from the general lot and its claims, doomed to perish wholly and be put out, as a thing completed and done with. The incompleteness argued against us all here [illegible] by us alone [illegible] after—incompleteness of [illegible] pictures of [illegible] God [illegible] in human trust [illegible] He [illegible] He [illegible] Why [illegible] poor and aimless [illegible]"

THE PACK-TRAIN, SIERRA MADRE.

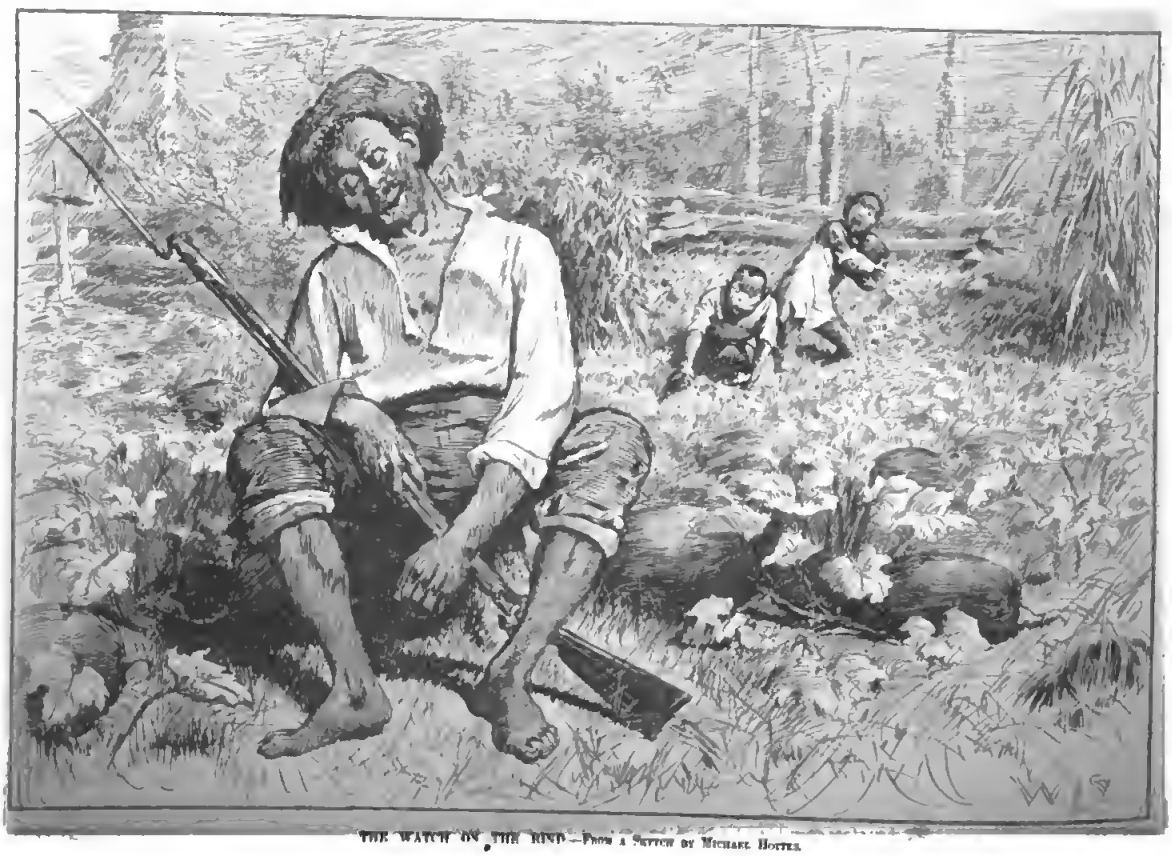


THE BATTLE-FIELD.



RUINS ON THE BAVISPÉ RIVER.

GENERAL CROOK'S APACHE CAMPAIGN.—From Sketches by A. F Harmer.—[See Page 487.]



THE WATCH ON THE RHINE.—From a Sketch by Michael Hotter.

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Matrimony," "Miss. De Marion," "No New Trains," "Heaps of Money," etc.

CHAPTER VIII.

I AM INTRODUCED TO THE FAMILY SKELETON.

It is the commonest thing in the world to hear people say that they would rather bear any pain themselves than see those whom they love bear it; such things are easily said. For my own part, certain reminiscences preclude me from making assertions of that kind, but, to commune with the majority of mortals, I hate to witness suffering, and I think I hate even more to witness humiliation. Now, knowing every line of my uncle Bernard's face as I did, and every trick of feature and attitude belonging to him, I could see plainly enough, when he seated himself in his accustomed place by the fireside, that the communication which he had to make to me was one of shame as well as of sorrow, and I therefore devoutly hoped that he would blurt it out in a few words and be done with it. But he was not a man who cared to spare himself, nor was it his habit to speak without deliberation. He sat looking silently at the fire for some minutes before he began, in the calm, unconcerned tone which he always assumed when he was at all moved: "I have a long story to tell you, Charley." And then, after another pause, "I don't know whether it has ever crossed your mind to suspect that I might have a son living, but such is the case."

This, then, was the great secret? Certainly I might have guessed it before, and the conversation which I had overheard during our drive back from Yarmouth should have enlightened me as to its nature; but somehow or other my conjectures had never brought me within sight of this solution, and its sudden announcement caused me a sharp pang. I can honestly say that my abrupt deposition from the rank of an heir to that of an fehmael disturbed me very little, but I was mortified by the thought that my uncle, who, as I had supposed, told me everything, had concealed a matter of such importance from me all my life, and the only word that I could get out by way of comment was a stupid "Oh!"

"Yes," continued my uncle, who had not removed his eyes from the fire, "no only son. You think I ought to have told you of this long ago, and perhaps you are right, though there is something to be said upon the other side. Either way, I am not accusing myself. I can only make things intelligible by beginning at the beginning and going on to the end; and if I might ask a favor of you, it would be to say nothing until I have finished."

He glanced at me for an instant with an odd, shamed look in his eyes, poor old fellow, and I nodded. Then immediately he turned his head away, and, staring at the glowing coals again, resumed:

"My son Harry was born about five and-thirty years ago. As it soon became evident that he was to be an only child, it was not unnatural that we should have been wrapped up in him, or that we should have talked and thought more about him than about any other subject. His mother may have indulged him a little more than was prudent, but she always gave way to me, and I was determined that the boy should not be spoiled. Then I lost her, and I had nothing but Harry left in the world to live for.

"I say that I had nothing else to live for, because at that time I occupied the Chiltern Hundreds, and turned my back upon public life forever—which was probably a foolish mistake on my part. However, I believed that I had done with ambition and pleasure, and my one wish was to do my duty to the boy. As a younger man I had unlimited confidence in theories, and my theory upon the subject of training was that the Alpha and Omega of it was discipline. I still think that this is sound enough as a theory, but what I had not learned then was that, in a world so full of paradox and unexpected turns as ours, theories must be made elastic enough to adapt themselves to subjects, and that subjects can not be any manner of means be stretched so as to fit theories. I set to work upon Harry, and tried to make him understand that I represented inexorable justice quite as much as fatherly love. I never overlooked a fault, I never remitted a punishment, I never dared to be quite natural with the boy, in order to let him suspect that I punished myself every time that I punished him—and unfortunately he required a good deal of punishment. Once he told me a lie, and I flogged him for it. I haven't a doubt but that this was the right thing to do, theoretically; but practically it happened to be quite the wrong thing. Instead of securing the boy's affection, I taught him to fear and avoid me, and, worst of all, I did not cure him of telling lies. After that first thing he deceived me repeatedly, and I found him out, but I never flogged him again, because the instinct of self-preservation kept him from lying directly, and it was a part of my theory that offenses which could not be proved must be ignored. Of course I saw that I had failed, but I persevered with the system that I had marked out for myself all the same. You are saying to yourself, 'What a fool the man must have been'—what a prig!—what a stupid pedant! Perhaps so; and yet I had taught the boy some good things. I had taught him to keep his temper, for instance, and to show physical courage when necessary, and to be punctual and clean. I don't know that my labors proved much, except that it takes a man of special gifts to make a school master.

"It was then the professional school-master selected me of a part of my duties, and then things went better. Harry was clever and quick at learning, besides which he was good at athletics. He was very much liked by his school-fellows, and he brought home excellent reports from his masters, so that all the neighborhood congratulated me, and gave me credit for being a wise and judicious parent. But only the weary knows where the shoe pinches. I was not proud of Harry, because unfortunately I could not help seeing that he was not to be trusted, and I was not happy with him, because he disliked me. Neither could I overcome his dislike. I tried my best, but it was too late, I suppose, and we never became friends.

"I tell you all this in a matter-of-course sort of way, but it was a great grief to me at the time. Besides Harry I had literally not a soul in the world to care for, for my brother Tom was away in India, and my mother was in Scotland with her husband, and I lived the life of a hermit. To him, naturally, our relations were not a matter of so much importance. He had plenty of friends of his own age, and during his holidays he was a great deal away from home. I made no objection to his staying with those young fellows, for I wished him to enjoy himself, and I believed that their society would do him more good than mine.

"So the years went on, and though there could not be much sympathy between us, I do not remember that we had more than one difference of any consequence. That was shortly before he left school, when he came, with a very frightened face, to tell me that he had been running up 'ticks' in Windsor and Eton, and didn't see how he was to pay. That in itself was no very dire offense, and seeing how ashamed of himself he looked, I made light of the matter, and assured him that if he would let me know what he owed and the names of his trades-people, the money should be paid directly. Well he didn't tell me the truth, there were more bills than he had let me to expect, and the amount of them was about double what he had mentioned. That again, you may say, was nothing to very terrible; people under such circumstances very rarely do tell the exact truth, and the chances are that they seldom have a will, his needless duplicity vexed me, and when it transpired that he had borrowed what between boys was really a large sum of money, from a school-fellow, I fairly lost my temper, and gave him my opinion of his conduct in stronger language perhaps than the occasion warranted. You see, it hurt me to think that my son should have gone to a stranger to ask for money instead of applying to me, for I had never given him any reason to suppose me niggardly. I still wish to reproach him with this so much as to read him a lesson which should prevent him from doing the same thing a second time. So I told him that no gentleman would have acted as he had done, and a good deal more to the like effect, which I ought not to have said, and which did not in the least produce the result that I intended. He listened to me without answering me back—he was a great deal too much alarmed for me, I am sorry to say, even to dream of doing that—but he grew sullen at last, and when I asked him to give me his word that he would not, under any circumstances, request a loan of a friend again, he gave it me, and then muttered, 'Not that it is much use my promising, though, for you never believe a word that I say.'

"THE MAN WHO DETECTED HIM PULLED HIM INTO ST. JAMES'S STREET, AND THRASHED HIM BEFORE A DOZEN WITNESSES."

"Every now and then it happens that some one—probably without knowing what he is doing—says a thing which goes through one's heart like a knife. When the poor boy made that perfectly just charge against me I could have fallen on my knees before him and implored his pardon. Unhappily I know him to be a fastidious liar, but I had never thought that he suspected me of knowing it, and I saw now how cruel my manner must have been toward him, and how inevitable it was that he should shrink from a father who seemed to despise him. Perhaps if I had said so much it might have done some good, but I did not think it would be wise to do that, and being unable to contradict him I made no reply at all, but went away into my study, and was thoroughly miserable.

"Harry was not long with me at this time. He had made up his mind, some years before, that he would like to go into the Guards, and very soon after he left Eton he joined the battalion to which he had been gazetted. For about a year I heard nothing but good reports of him from all quarters. His colonel, whom I knew something of, and who good naturedly wrote me a line from time to time, praised him; he had some of his old school-fellows for brother officers; he went a good deal into society, was much liked by the ladies, and led the sort of life which I suppose that young Guardsmen who have the gift of making themselves popular ordinarily lead. A man may employ his time better than in dancing, flirting, pigeon-shooting, and attending race meetings, but then again he may employ it much worse, and if he have, as Harry had, an amount of intelligence decidedly above the average, such amusements are sure to pall upon him in the long-run. I was quite content to wait and let things take their course, and so long as he had kept out of low company, and behaved himself like a gentleman, I asked nothing more of him. I did not even ask him to come and see me, knowing that it gave him no pleasure to do so; and, as a matter of fact, he never did come when he could find an excuse for remaining away.

"But after a time rumors began to reach me which made me uneasy. Harry was an excellent judge of a horse, and it was said that he was in the habit of turning his knowledge to account in ways which are not considered exactly dishonest, but which certainly do not tend to make a man respected. It also came to my ears that he was losing and winning large sums on the turf—sums very much larger than either he or I could afford to risk. I had to write to him upon both of these subjects, and he sent me p[illegible] replies, which I tried to believe, but did not succeed in [illegible]. And then, to crown all, came a very awkward [illegible] note, which would probably have obliged Harry to [illegible] if his colonel had not rather stretched a point [illegible]. I never heard precise particulars of the affair, and [illegible] importance the bare facts were that Harry [illegible] pounds at play one night, [illegible] ing upon the plea that he was [illegible] to [illegible] lection of what had taken place. That, [illegible] fountain-pen which he [illegible] letter—written, I take it, when the general clamor had reached such a height that it was no longer possible to keep me in ignorance of it. No doubt you will think, as I did, that the excuse was worse than the offense, but I did not say this to him. I merely sent him the money, requesting him to pay what he owed forthwith, and expressing a hope that this would be a warning to him to let cards alone for the future. Meanwhile there had been a terrible fuss in London, where the whole story had been made in a measure public, and where the tide of feeling set strongly against the defaulter. However, as I said, the colonel took up the cudgels for Harry, declaring that the poor young fellow had fallen among rooks (which may have been true, for aught I know to the contrary); and when once the money was paid, the trouble soon blew over and was forgotten. So, at least, my good friend the colonel assured me; but in truth troubles of that description are seldom quite forgotten. I heard afterward that at this time the ladies with one consent shouted Harry the cold shoulder, and that many of their husbands followed suit—as husbands are apt to do, according to my experience. Very likely this drove him into company which he might not otherwise have frequented. As for me, I could not at all forget what had happened, and for months afterward I lived in constant dread of hearing that my son had fallen into some fresh disgrace. Yet I never anticipated anything half so bad as the actual catastrophe which was about to fall upon us. There are things which must always seem impossible—even after they are over.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1311.

"You will understand that it is difficult to me to speak about this. I need say no more than that Harry was discovered cheating at cards. Of course that meant absolute, irretrievable ruin. If it had happened quietly, and among his brother officers, it is just possible that, out of good nature, and for the credit of the regiment, they would have hushed the thing up, and allowed him to sneak out of the service, and hide his head anywhere that he pleased, but it took place at a well known club, and the man who detected him pulled him into St. James's Street, and thrashed him before a dozen witnesses. All London was talking about it the next day, and all England knew of it the day after. The newspapers were full of the scandal, leading articles were written upon it; on disgrace could have been a more complete or more public. The unhappy wretch crept down here to tell me that he had been cashiered, and cruarched before me, looking as if he thought I should strike him—perhaps he did think so.

"I don't know, Charley, what you would have done, or what other men would have done, in my place; but what I did was this. I told him that, after what had occurred, it was quite impossible that he should ever show his face in the county again, or that he should succeed me as owner of a property which had hitherto been held only by gentlemen. The usual having fortunately been cut off, I was in a position to dictate terms upon that point. I promised to pay him therefrom an annual sum sufficient for his needs, upon the understanding that he should never make any attempt to see me again, and I suggested that he should go to one of the colonies. He objected to this, however, preferring a residence upon the Continent, and I did not press the point. There was nothing more to be said, and he left the house for the last time that same evening."

"And have you never seen or heard of him since?" I asked, after my uncle had remained for some minutes without speaking.

"I have never seen him since," he answered, quietly. "I have heard of him more than once, but always indirectly. It is extremely unlikely that we shall ever meet face to face again."

There was a long pause. My uncle, who had not once lifted his eyes to mine during the course of his narrative, was leaning back in his chair now, and looking at me much as usual. He seemed exhausted; but I could see by the expression of his face that he felt the relief of having accomplished a painful task, and I was also sure that he expected me to make some remark upon what I had been told. Obviously it behooved me to say something; but what I was to say I hardly knew, and for the first time, perhaps, in my life I found myself out of sympathy with my old man. He seemed to have been so unlike himself in his dealings with his unfortunate son, his conduct throughout had been, according to his own account, so very nearly the opposite of what I should have expected it to be, that I was disappointed as well as puzzled. I quite understood that he should assume a more or less cold and indifferent manner, and I knew that he would represent his own behavior in the least favorable light; but there was no getting over the facts, and I could not help thinking that he had been harsh and ungenerous, if he had not been positively unjust. At last, in default of any more pertinent observation, I said, "You must have been very lonely after he went away."

"I don't know that it ever occurred to me to consider my situation from that point of view," answered my uncle, with a faint smile; "but if I was lonely, it was not for very long. I had scarcely lost one son before I found another in myself. I adopted you, as you know, and I hope that in bringing you up I did not fall into the same fatal errors as I had done before. I have tried, in all events, to avoid them. And now I must explain to you what you have unquestionably a right to know—the nature of your position and prospects. I have never given you to understand that you would inherit this place at my death; yet it is possible—probable, indeed—that you will. It was certainly my intention when I adopted you that you should succeed me at Thirlby, my natural heir being so good as dead; but I would not make my decision irrevocable; nor can I make it so now, in spite of the urgency of my friends and yours. I admit that this is a little hard upon you; but I am sorry to say that I can't see my way to acting otherwise, and I hope in any case to be able to leave you a substantial addition to your own small fortune."

"I wish you wouldn't talk like that!" I exclaimed, feeling sore and resentful, without any very good reason for feeling so. "I don't want to be the owner of Thirlby, I never thought in my life about whether you would leave me money or not, and I hate to discuss your death in that cold-blooded manner. Don't you know that to lose you would be the greatest misfortune that could possibly happen to me?"

"My dear Charley," answered my uncle, "you may have—and, unless you are very exceptionally lucky, I am afraid you certainly will have—many a worse misfortune than that before your time comes to die. In the natural course of things I shall step off the stage one of these days, and by that time you will see, maybe, that there is nothing to lament over in an old man's going to his rest, though I don't anticipate your adopting the opinion of my mother, who says you will have a right to curse my memory if I don't leave you every acre of which I am possessed. My mother is more convinced than convincing in her views. For years she never lost an opportunity of impressing upon me that it was my duty to 'let bygones be by-gones,' as she called it, and to reinstate Harry in the position which he had forfeited; him now you have made a conquest of her heart, and she is in a terrible fright lest I should die intestate, and the question of succession be settled by the law of the land. The Rector holds a brief for the other side (he has a great deal to say, and says it very well, almost obstruct justice and parental responsibility, and I am sure it has never struck him that I must know every word of it by heart from having said it all to myself in years gone by. Where he and my mother agree is in deprecating eu-pieture. 'Let the thing be decided once for all, in this way or in that,' they say, and then, as I only hold my tongue, they get angry and call me names."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF LOUISIANA.

III.

NATIVE sugar nor any other necessary staple can be cheaply obtained except through domestic production. Domestic production alone can serve as a check to the rapacity of speculators and the greed of foreign producers. The proof of this remarkable truth in each year given by the fact that the only time at which sugar is cheap in the United States is coincident with the production of the sugar crop of Louisiana.

The sugar planter would hardly complain, notwithstanding the lack of aid from the general government, if he had only capital to rely upon, and could obtain money at easy rates. But he has no such advantages. The war of secession swept away his mills, machinery, capital, and credit—even the very seed necessary to produce a crop. Sugar-cane is grown from slips or cuttings buried in the soil. Wheat or corn is produced from seed easily purchased at any market. But sugar-cane, reproduced from its own stalk, can not be then readily transported from a great distance. The cane must have been grown in the very spot where the cuttings are to be covered up, else planting is not of the question. After the war, which left Louisiana waste, the first care of the sugar planter was of course to obtain slips for a crop, and some few canes which had escaped from the general devastation served to accomplish the purpose. How much time, money, and patience were required to make this region again productive will be readily understood from the fact that a whole acre of cane stalks is required for the planting of three or four acres. Is not this a labor of Hercules, and does it not offer a strange contrast to the idea usually entertained that planters are men without energy?

When one obtains a full understanding of the situation in which the results of the war left our sugar-planters, one can not help being surprised that there should be any planting of sugar-cane in the country. First of all, there were no laborers. The negroes were demoralized by the sudden change from slavery to freedom, and deluded by the discourses of adventurers; they would not work. All the live stock had been carried away by the Federal army; the mills had been burned or rendered useless; there was no capital, and there was no credit. Most industries would have succumbed under such circumstances, but the sugar industry did not. It has since then not only revived, but enlarged. This shows the vitality of the sugar industry, its adaptability to this soil and climate, and the energy of those who have developed it.

The lack of capital, together with the dangers of overflow, still forms the chief drawback in the extension of the sugar industry in Louisiana. The industry is so remunerative in itself that it has been able to bear—and does still bear—very heavy burdens. The rate of interest upon money in Louisiana is eight per cent. per annum. The broker forces the planter to pay, in addition to the legal rate of interest, two and a half per cent. commission upon capital advanced, often a brokerage of two and a half per cent., and always two and a half per cent. commission upon the crop sales, and upon the purchase of goods and provisions, which must be made through him. An agent chosen by him—and allowed one-half per cent. in addition to the commissions paid to the factor—is charged with the sale of the products in the market.

Let it also be observed that the planter must sign a mortgage for the loan, which is discounted by the factor. The net amount, after the deduction of all commissions, is placed to his credit upon the books, to be drawn by him from month to month without any allowance of interest for the same thus left in the lender's keeping.

These commissions, the expenses of mortgage papers, and the various terms on which the planter is bound in robust, certainly constitute a total deduction of from twenty to twenty-five per cent. from the capital advanced him. Well, the cultivation of sugar-cane offers so many advantages that the loan is accepted with gratitude, and that planters occasionally make fortunes in spite of these onerous terms. This is because the sugar industry, when undertaken by one who thoroughly understands it, is one of the most remunerative occupations in the world.

One of the conditions now requisite for the success in Louisiana is division of labor. This has become a necessary feature of the industry within a few years, and wherever properly adopted has given excellent results. It has become patent at last that the raising of sugar-cane must be left wholly to the cultivators, and the manufacture of sugar to the manufacturers proper: hence the idea of establishing central sugar-mills for the purpose of purchasing all cane grown within a certain radius, and converting the juice into sugar.

The success which has attended the establishment of these district mills is really surprising. Immense uncultivated tracts have been, within a very brief time, cleared and planted, lands have been parcelled out, and prosperity prevails where want and misery lingered so many years after the war.

In order to give some idea of what has been done, suffice to state that along the Teche—in that region where certain scenes in LONGFELLOW'S "Evangeline" are laid—no less than thirty-four mills have been erected within less than five years, and provided with the most improved machinery. If the planters of other parishes would follow this example, Louisiana might very soon be able to produce annually the four or five hundred thousand tons of sugar previously spoken of.

Unfortunately both capital and labor are wanting. Nevertheless the central mills buy the cane rapidly, thus assuring to the cultivator an ample remuneration for his labor. Cane now sells at from four to five dollars per ton, and as from twenty to twenty-five tons are usually obtained from the acre, it will be readily understood how remunerative sugar-planting is.

The climate is one to which white persons may very easily become accustomed, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary. Many whites farmers from other States have settled in Louisiana parishes, and their fields bear ample witness to the success of white labor in Louisiana.

Furthermore, sugar-cane is raised without difficulty, and demands little hard labor. The ground is prepared in winter, two or four rows being used to plough, according to the character of the soil. A certain quantity of canes selected from the previous crop are laid in the furrows and ploughed over. The subsequent operations are mostly confined to keeping plenty of earth about the bottom of the cane, the plough being always used. About the end of May or beginning of June an opening is made through the middle of the rows, in order to facilitate drainage, and the cane is left alone until crop-time—ranging from October to January. Then the stems are stripped and cut, piled upon wagons, and taken to the mill. The mill has three heavy rollers, through which the cane is passed. The juice of the crushed stems is first treated with sulphuric acid, which whitens it and prevents fermentation. It is then treated with lime, and the mixed juice is subjected to a temperature ranging from 180° to 212° F. to condense its impurities, and render their removal by skimming more facile. Next the juice is evaporated in "steam-trains" or "double-effect" vessels, after which it is granulated in the vacuum pans, and is dried in the centrifugal machines. It is then placed in hogsheads and sent to market, where it fetches from five to ten cents per pound, according to grade. Louisiana cane contains from fourteen to eighteen per cent. of saccharine matter, and with proper machinery, readily obtainable by capitalists, one hundred and fifty to two hundred pounds of sugar can be extracted from every ton of cane, exclusive of molasses. German have been as much with beet-root, certainly far less rich than sugar-cane.

Let capitalists and good farmers settle in Louisiana. There are rich certainties of remuneration for labor and profit for capital in Louisiana, which arest at no distant day become one of the richest States in the Union.

EDWARD SILLAS.

"DISARMED!"*

By MRS. BETHAM-EDWARDS,

AUTHOR OF "KITTY," "EXCHANGE OR ROMANCE," "HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE," "DR. JAMES," "THE SYLVESTRES; OR, THE OUTCASTS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"WELL NOT Mr. Hermitage have some tea? It is quite ready."

For it was Steppie who had entered, followed by the children, all beautifully dressed in honor of their guest, Steppie herself looking too youthful to be the mother of the tall girl clinging to her shirts.

"Come, children, you remember Mr. Hermitage, who pulled Benjamine out of the water at Margate? Say how d'ye do?" she said.

Then the little party went into the next room, Steppie prattling over the tea pot, Valerian cutting bread and butter for the children with charming urbanity, Arthura growing genial by Walter's side.

"I must congratulate you on your improved appearance," Valerian said, addressing himself to Steppie. "You were so ailing at Hampton. It does credit to the London climate."

Steppie's complexion, fairest of the fair, showed to-day a tinge of rose; she looked, as she was indeed, in blooming health.

"Ah!" she replied, sighing, "it is my mother tune to look well. No one pities me for my poor health and low spirits."

"My dear madam," said Valerian, "you are really deceiving yourself. There is no such thing as low spirits."

"I wish I could think so," was Steppie's despondent answer. "Were it not for low spirits I could be the happiest creature in the world. I was born with a melancholy name—Sadgrave. But when I changed it matters did not mend at all."

"The fact is," Valerian went on, "you but mistake the effect for the cause—low spirits for the misfortune that produced them. Now I will tell you, with your permission, how you may get rid of this incubus."

"Do! do!" cried Walter, clapping his hands. "Oh, Mr Hermitage, if you cured mamma of her low spirits we should all jump for joy."

"My pathology is of the simplest," went on Valerian. "Of course on all know that nothing goes wrong without a cause. When a wheel creaks we oil the spring; when we break a leg we get a surgeon to set it. And so it is with what we call low spirits. We either want a doctor to physic us, or we drink a kind of water that disagrees with us, or we set in a room that does not get sun enough. The consequence is some bodily disorder, which straightway, because we don't know its name, we call low spirits."

"Let us get mamma a different kind of water to drink," shouted Walter.

"You must try, not one remedy, but all," Valerian went on, speaking with perfect gravity. "Some people cure themselves of low spirits by chopping wood; their muscles are called into play, and the exhilaration extends to the mind. I knew one lady who was restored by going every day for a month to a children's hospital, and amusing the little patients by making grimaces. She quite lost the habit of looking sad-hearted, and found that it had been nothing but a habit."

"But to rise every morning with the feeling that life is a burden?" asked poor Steppie. "I should like to get up as gay as a lark."

"Will you let me advise you?" asked Valerian. "Then hear me! a manager, join an amateur dramatic society. You would be obliged to play a variety of parts, and would soon begin at regard them as real. So, if you were melancholy one day, at least you would be gay the next."

"That's a good idea," Arthura said. "Yes, little mamma, we will do it. It will amuse us all."

"I am sure I hope so," Steppie made pensive reply.

Nevertheless, she brightened up whilst the subject was being discussed, and promised to learn a part, if Arthura would accompany practising. Valerian had given a happy turn to the conversation. And when he rose to go, after the friendliest meal, with such kindly admonitions to Steppie on the care of her health, such genial interest in the children, such affectionate appeal to Arthura—they had one moment on the threshold to themselves—how could she choose but believe him? He loved her. He would be true to her. Absence would draw them nearer to each other.

That night before Arthura returned to be put Steppie caught her hands, and whispered, reproachfully: "Oh, Arthura, why did you never tell me? Mr Valerino is in love with you. You two will surely be married some day."

Arthura flung her arms round her step-mother's neck with tears and blushes. "Dear little mamma, he made me promise never to tell. That is why. It made me very unhappy to deceive you, but I could not help it."

"I like Mr Valerino; I am very glad," was all Steppie could say, as she fondly caressed the clinging girl.

"You like him, yes, but will he be good to me?" Arthura asked. "You are more experienced than I. Tell me, Steppie, may a woman trust a man? Are his words to be relied on? Scripture?—the words he says when he is in love, I mean."

"Your papa was true and tender as a woman," answered Steppie. "But for the rest I can not answer. I have all my life long been terribly afraid of men. I should never have married at all but for your poor papa's persuasions."

"You were happy?" asked Arthura.

"Yes, I was never what is called happy in my life, but that was not your poor papa's fault. He I cried for the moon he would have fetched it down for me—"

"Or tried to do so," put in Arthura.

"Yes, that is what I mean. There are husbands who will do that, you know, and others who will not."

"And do you think Valerian belongs to the former category, little mamma?"

"Ah! you put me a hard question. But you would never cry for the moon, I am sure."

"Would Valerian be kind?"

"What matter or long as you are not foolish?" was Steppie's reply; and so they parted.

"Holly, tolly, tura!" was Mr Constantine's exclamation as Arthura entered his room precisely at twelve of the clock. "Well, my Pamper, there is one who melts a mightier wand than any of us. Stephana has got five thousand pounds out of Christmas, as I live! 'Tis past belief! 'Tis miraculous! 'Tis witchcraft! But 'tis true. I have myself seen the check."

And tidings heaped upon tidings.

"Valerian lunched with me to-day, and is off to-night to Liverpool, there most sanfo Americo."

Arthura waited expectantly. Doubtless she was to hear that part of Valerian's story he lacked time to tell.

"If it were not for my fourscore and odd years, I would willingly go too. But," added the old man, leaning forward, and speaking with unusual fire and animation, "the world may call Stephana mad, and her schemes froth and emptiness; but mark me, my Prospero, 'tis she who alone is sane, and the rest of us brainless idiots. Let their detractors rave as they will at her Utopias beyond seas, I, for one, as I sink into the grave, will raise my voice on her behalf. Have you heard nothing?"

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1378.

"Nothing of Stephana's schemes, sir."

"Five thousand pounds! Hum! I wonder how the little woman felt when the tooth was drawn out! Matchless, incomparable Stephana! Five thousand pounds from Christina, as I live! Well, my dear, they'll call Stephana mad, but never mind—we will drink to the health of her earthly paradise. Valerian's errand, then, is to choose some fair tract in America which Stephana means to colonize (she gives ten thousand pounds herself, but that is a drop in the ocean to Christina's five), and the colonists she sends thither will find themselves in a strange world, as the gay Greek and his companions who were whisked up to the moon. Poor little London children!—to call a garden their own, to find apples ripening in the sun for them! Seven Dials, then, or at least a section of it, is to be transported beyond sea; houses and lands—we may indeed say souls and bodies—given to those who have hitherto been but misery incarnate. But more to-morrow. It wearies me to talk."

Arthura read a page or two, but Mr Constantine was too full of Stephana and her schemes to listen just yet.

"Remember my words when I am out of your sight, as I must soon be. Stephana may fail, may do foolish things with wisest intent, but she has caught the spirit of the age to come. She realizes the moral standard of the future. For first have we seen Force putting the chaos of human society into order; next, Charity working blindly enough, yet alleviating the sum total of misery. Now has come the turn of sovereign Justice, of Conscience instead of Self, to speak to each man's soul, and make him feel the full measure of his own responsibility as an inheritor of the past, an enricher or despoiler of the future. Ah me! Would I were younger! Yes, this is the real sadness of dying, the bitterness of the grave. Just as the world is slipping from under our feet we see the dawn of the better day we have struggled for and believed in. But your wand, my good Prospero; waft me far from midlife into shadow-land. Away! away!"

Soon he was drowsing indeed, and Arthura stole away, not herself to sleep till the cold wintry morning dawned grayly and the foggy streets were astir. What is untimed gloom in a young hopeful heart?

The first sight that caught her eyes was a letter lying on the table, a last farewell from Valerian, pencilled as he drove to the railway station. "Yes," she [illegible] said to herself, "I [illegible] give him, since he loves [illegible]." [illegible] and wrote a note, to await him on his arrival [illegible] should at least atone for the [illegible] and [illegible] headlongness of yesterday. "What am I," [illegible] thought, "that I should set myself against his giveness?"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Summer had come, and of the four million hearts beating in London none exulted like Stephana's. Her fondest wishes were about to be realized. Valerian, having successfully accomplished his mission, was on his way home. Christina would also reach England in a day or two, and was willing to be reconciled to her son. Her blind friend Markham had fulfilled the behest laid upon him, and found a thousand families willing to go unto "an isle as yet unknown,

And yet far kinder than their own."

A week more, and the ship chartered to transport her colonists to the New World would set sail.

Such a departure was not to be passed over as an event without a meaning, and that sombre old Kensington mansion, with its loans and [illegible], before dedicated by Stephana to [illegible] own use, was now to be given up to an [illegible] ance of felicity. A place of [illegible], a place of benison, consecrated to hope, trust, and thanksgiving; surely here, if anywhere, should joy bells peal on the summer air, banners wave in the blue sky, garlands within vie with the bowers without, and loud triumphant music drown the noises of every day.

Stephana loved the display that symbolizes a generous truth, and she was now spending upon a single entertainment as much money as Christina in her palmy days had spent upon a season. What indeed with the guests about to take up their abode in the house and those invited for the festival, the sumptuary business alone was onerous, but a bagatelle compared to the less substantial part of the celebration. It must be brilliant, it must be emblematic, it must be picturesque, and as Valerian was by to anticipate her wishes, she had to do the imaginative part herself, and finding such subordinates as she could. Song, dance, a fairy masque or allegory, these formed but a part of the programme which was to be carried out on really a splendid scale, and the whole ending with a banquet under tents.

Busiest of the busy, Stephana yet found time for audiences, one visitor after another being admitted to the presence-chamber. The first to come was Markham. Alas for the eyes that could not behold his sovereign lady then! The [illegible] of the hour, unable to lose a moment of the too precious time slipping away before the eventful day, was occupied in making angels' wings—an [illegible] employment for one who only wanted wings herself to be mistaken for a seraphic being. The whole picture was lost to her blind adorer, but let us console ourselves with the thought that maybe he conjured up a vision even lovelier. Stephana no longer wore white for mourning, but over her morning dress, pure as snow, had thrown a shawl of the warm red color worn by blissful angels in old pictures. The richness of this glowing scarf, contrasting as it did so strongly with the clear paleness of her complexion, lent almost an unearthliness to the calm pure features and the dark eyes now full of repose. She had carelessly placed on the back of her chair the last piece of handiwork, veritable wings, pearly, iridescent, ethereal, although fashioned by human hands, and of celestial down. Winged then she was indeed, a fair apparition alighted, as it seemed, for a moment only, ready the next to wing upward flight.

But Markham, whatever pictures he may have had before his inner eye, saw not this one. Only the sweetness of Stephana's voice reached him where he sat.

"What ought not I to do for you?" she began, gayly, "you who have moved mountains for me. But I am ungrateful of the ungrateful. Expect scant thanks."

He sighed. "Thank me as little as you please, only do not banish me from your presence."

"What can you do for me?" asked Stephana, in the same bright manner. Then recalled to the painful thought the speech might call up in her listener's mind, she added: "One thing already occurs to me out of a thousand. You can hear my mothers repeat their parts. A rehearsal is to take place this very afternoon, and no one is here to give judgment on it. And then—and then— But let us talk for a little first. Report on your mission."

"Do not hurry me, dearest lady," he said, with a little sigh of satisfaction. "The work of months can not be told in so many minutes."

"Hold this ribbon for me, then," laughingly, interposed Stephana. "Let it slip gently from your fingers as I draw it. That is right. Now begin."

Well pleased, he began:

"You will not be surprised to learn that I found some difficulty in convincing these good people of your favorite dictum—the Golden Age lies before us, and not behind. Indeed, they would have nothing to say to a Golden Age at all. Some thought me mad. Others a charlatan or a knave. Some at first regarded me as their well-wisher. I had been their friend once, when I sat down in courts and alleys and told stories. But now that I wanted something of them 'twas a wholly different matter—so hard is it for any ill-used human being to credit another with a perfectly disinterested motive."

"My poor friend!" ejaculated Stephana. "You were not reviled, hooted, pelted with mud?"

The blind man smiled pathetically. "My misfortune protected me. Had I been as others are I might not now live to tell the tale. At first, then, the apostle of your Golden Age was only scoffed at for his pains. My best friends of the [illegible]. The wags made fun of me. The [illegible]. All [illegible] against the great fortune [illegible] would fain force upon them. But as soon as [illegible] became clear and the guiding principle [illegible] was made plain as day, then the [illegible]."

He touched with one hand a roll of parchment that he had deposited by his side on entering.

"It was a happy thought of yours to exact some title of honor, some proof, if not of gentle birth, at least of nature's nobility, from these poor folks. To be sent into a new country and made a man of because you have only one shirt to your back is a kindness that humiliates. To be promised food and shelter for your children because you have not been able to provide them yourself galls, even whilst it brings a sense of relief. But to be made to feel that, naked as you are and [illegible] you have [illegible]! Ah, [illegible] the ground, the [illegible] a [illegible]!"

He [illegible] the parchment [illegible] his knee, and, as [illegible] knew its contents by heart, with one hand holding Stephana's ribbon, the other fingering the scroll, went on:

"I have had the list made out alphabetically for the sake of convenience, but let your eyesight where they will, you are sure to find a list of writing emblazoned in colors and gold. There is one. I know it comes almost first in the list: 'John Ames, waterman, married, nine children, jumped into the river on the occasion of a [illegible] at imminent peril of life and limb, and rescued a [illegible] from destruction.' Another should be here: 'Alice Ash, seamstress, unmarried, unfortunate, supported by her toil a paralyzed child, not kith and kin, a neighbor's dying bequest, for eight years.' A third is not far off: 'Thomas Beamish, no occupation in particular but brought up a porter, married, seven children, nursed one neighbor after another when an epidemic raged in the court, and although up night after night, refused a halfpenny.' Yet one more: 'Ralph Chalmers, tailor, fathered the starved, ill-used child of bad neighbors, although he had four of his own.' And yet a last: 'Peter Clarke, a shoe-black, fought another lad for ill-using a stray dog, and took charge of it, although half starving himself.'"

Stephana smiled, although tears were in her eyes.

"You have got together a band of heroes," she said.

"Alas! no. But what other heroism can one expect? These poor people, then, when they discovered that none would be sent to the New World at your expense, there to found a family, without some kind of claim to such exceptional good fortune, became converts to the notion at once. It was no longer an affair of government emigration and pauperism. The good deed, the chivalrous act, the sober career, and the—note well!—the intellectual supremacy were to be rewarded. A certain Job Fraser you will find somewhere chosen for having invented a new button—a button to be the savior of human temper henceforth and forever; once on, this immortal button can never come off, be it from shirt, sack, or simarre. Well, the chosen were now envied, the rest moved to emulation. I could have found you twenty thousand candidates instead of one."

"Has every name its blazonry?" asked Stephana; "each man, woman, and child such title of honor?"

"Yes; there must be praise for every one in our school. To create no jealousies, I have had the qualifications of every head of a family printed in gold and colors, although I was obliged to make certain negations stand for virtues; for instance, the fact of never having been in prison, never having begged in the public streets, and many others. But some day you must go over the list."

"And are they happy?" asked Stephana. "Does the prospect of well-being warm their hearts?"

"Ah! easier is it to make the wilderness to blossom as the rose than to make hope grow suddenly in the place of despair! But have no fear. All will go well if we do not run into extremes, and materialize instead of elevate."

Stephana was silent for a minute or two. Then she asked, still speaking in the same elate tone—her voice seemed almost strange to him in its joyousness: "Your heart is in this work, is it not? You will soon visit your little colony?"

He grew on a sudden gloomy almost to moroseness. "After so many months' absence, may I not at least enjoy your company for a little while? Have others so absorbed you that you have no room in your heart even for a faithful friend?"

The implied reference to Valerian was not to be misunderstood, but Stephana felt just now too happy to be even so disturbed.

"Let us think of nothing, talk of nothing, but this most joyful event," she said, in her sweetest manner. "You will come every day till it is over. You will help me as you are doing now."

"I own the unwinding of ribbon is an occupation I delight in," answered Markham, not without a touch of good-natured irony. "But there are other things I have learned without eyes."

"Your accomplishments shall all be called into requisition by turns. But there is the luncheon bell. We will lunch without loss of time, and then, if you will preside in my place at the rehearsal, you will render a service indeed."

She freed herself from her silver and rainbow-colored wings, and taking his hand, led him into the dining room, fragrant with freshly cut roses.

The repast was gay and charming. Markham's composure was fortunately not disturbed by the sight of a third cover. It had been laid for Valerian, whose arrival might now be momentarily expected.

Like Markham he had accomplished his mission, but, unlike Markham, he was looking for reward.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

GENERAL CROOK'S INDIAN CAMPAIGN.

The terrible nature of the country traversed by General Crook's recent expedition into Northern Mexico against the hostile Chiricahua Indians is indicated by one of the illustrations on page 484. This, together with those of the ancient ruins on the Bavispe, and various incidents of the campaign, are made from sketches furnished by the only artist who accompanied the troops, and are faithful portrayals of those wild scenes. The roughness of the mountain trails was such that in several instances even the experienced pack-mules failed to retain their footing, and eight of these animals were lost to the command by falling over the tremendous precipices, and being dashed in pieces on the abysses hundreds of feet below.

When after its two months' raid into the heart of the Sierra Madre range, the expedition returned to San Carlos, victorious and without having lost a man, it was nearly barefooted, and as ragged as Falstaff's tatterdemalions; but its object was accomplished, for it secured as captives the fierce band of marauders who, almost unchecked, had for years been the terror of the border in Arizona and Mexico.

By his success in this undertaking General Crook has demonstrated the truth of two propositions that he has always maintained. One is that in savage warfare savage tactics must be employed, and the other that an adherence to absolute integrity in treating with Indians will be rewarded by the faithful observance of all promises made by them. In pursuance of this policy he so organized the expedition with which he penetrated the Chiricahua stronghold that it was composed of but one company of troops and an Indian contingent of some two hundred Apache scouts, and it was guided by a deserter from the very band of which he was in pursuit. The whites, thus placed completely within the power of their Indian allies, found no reason to regret their position; for they were guided with unerring certainty through and over a trackless mountain wilderness, by ways which they would never have discovered by themselves, into the very heart of the enemy's country, and they found the Indians always ready to assume the posts of danger, and eager to be led to battle.

Before striking into the mountains the expedition passed through a number of small Mexican towns, the inhabitants of which thronged the streets to gaze upon the Americans. They were amazed at the appearance of the Indian scouts, and could not understand how the whites dared to trust these terrible Apaches with guns and ammunition. They expressed a general desire to see General Crook; and when he was pointed out to them, mounted on a little sorrel mule, and wearing a plain cork helmet and white duck suit, instead of the glittering uniform they were accustomed to associate with his rank, they could hardly be persuaded that he was indeed the famous Indian fighter of whom they had heard such wonderful stories, and of whose wisdom the Indians had shown their appreciation by naming him the "Gray Fox."

When at last, after incredible toil, the mountain fastness in which the Chiricahua camp was located was reached, it was found to contain only women and children. The Indians had deemed it so inaccessible and impregnable that they had gone off on a marauding expedition against the Mexicans of Chihuahua, leaving but five men in the camp. A body of the Indian scouts, who were in advance, surrounded and fired into this camp, killing nine of its occupants and dispersing the rest. Five prisoners were taken, of whom the oldest was a squaw eighteen years old, and the youngest a girl baby less than a year of age, who was immediately adopted by the troops as a camp pet. An immense amount of plunder, amongst which were eight thousand dollars in American and Mexican money, many gold and silver watches, guns of all descriptions, saddles, wearing apparel, and household utensils, was recaptured, and that night the camp of the victors presented a wild scene of savage rejoicing.

On the following day the eldest of the captives was sent out to find those who had escaped from the camp, and convey to them General Crook's assurance that if they would come in and surrender, their lives should be spared, and they should be conveyed in safety across the Arizona line to the Apache reservation. In this mission the Indian girl was easily successful, because her people knew that the promise of the "Gray Fox" was never broken, and upon her return she brought many of them, including the sub-chief [illegible], with her. Within three days a hundred men, women, and children had surrendered, and soon afterward the warriors who had been off on a raid returned, and also surrendered upon receiving General Crook's promise that their lives should be spared. Then the expedition, having accomplished its mission, and accompanied by three hundred and seventy-five captives, retraced its steps toward the Arizona line.

It was certainly a signal triumph of moral over brute force, and the sight of the little band of white men marching in perfect safety amid nearly six hundred Indians, some of whom were, but a short time before, their fiercest foes, so amazed the inhabitants of the Mexican towns along the route that they were unbounded in their praise of General Crook, whom they greeted with most enthusiastic cheers wherever he appeared.

With the Indians were found five Mexican women and a little girl, who had been captured by the Indians on their recent raid. They were at first stupefied with joy at their unexpected rescue, which they regarded as a miracle, and for which they will never cease to return thanks.

General Crook was obliged to exercise the utmost caution on his return trip to avoid a meeting with Mexican troops, who would have certainly demanded the prisoners captured on Mexican soil, and who would have as certainly killed them all without mercy.

Viewed from any stand-point, this latest expedition must rank among the most notable and successful ever undertaken against the Indians, and by his manly straightforward, and honest dealings with them General Crook has not only won their confidence and respect, but has done much toward removing the foul stains with which our Indian policy has dyed American honor.

GENERAL E. O. C. ORD.

General Edward O. C. Ord died of yellow fever at Havana on the 22d of July, in his sixty-sixth year. He had taken passage from Vera Cruz for New York on board the steamer City of Washington, but when the vessel arrived at Havana, was removed to a private hospital in company with one other passengers, all suffering from the same disease. He served his country with distinction in the Seminole war in Florida, and during the war for the Union. The battle of Dranesville in 1861 was won under his leadership, and he was severely wounded at the battle of Hatchie, and at the assault on Fort Harrison. Having been several times promoted for gallant and meritorious service, he became commander of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina in 1865, and led the Army of the James in the victorious engagements that ended with the overthrow of the rebellion. For several years his name has been on the retired list.

"I had the honor to serve with him," writes his former aide-de-camp, the Rev. [illegible], "nearly four years, and I can truly say that I never saw him under any circumstances lose his self-control or forget for an instant his character as a courteous gentleman. Even his rebukes never gave offense, while his consideration for others never failed him even in the face of the enemy. He was as brave as a lion and as gentle as a woman. In the camp and on the march he was [illegible] of his soldiers, providing for their comfort, their clothing, [illegible] their medical [illegible] care, and he [illegible] the sick and wounded. My respect and affection for him have grown as my appreciation of [illegible] manly worth has increased with years [illegible] and I desire to testify to it as publicly as possible. But I would not [illegible] myself to do even this if I did not [illegible] would find a warm response in the heart of every officer and soldier who [illegible] der him, and enjoyed a reasonable [illegible] knowledge and understanding his [illegible]"

General Ord [illegible] a native of [illegible] graduate of West [illegible]

Digitized by Google

SEABRIGHT AND LONG BRANCH.—Drawn by Schell and Hoban.—[See Page 491.]

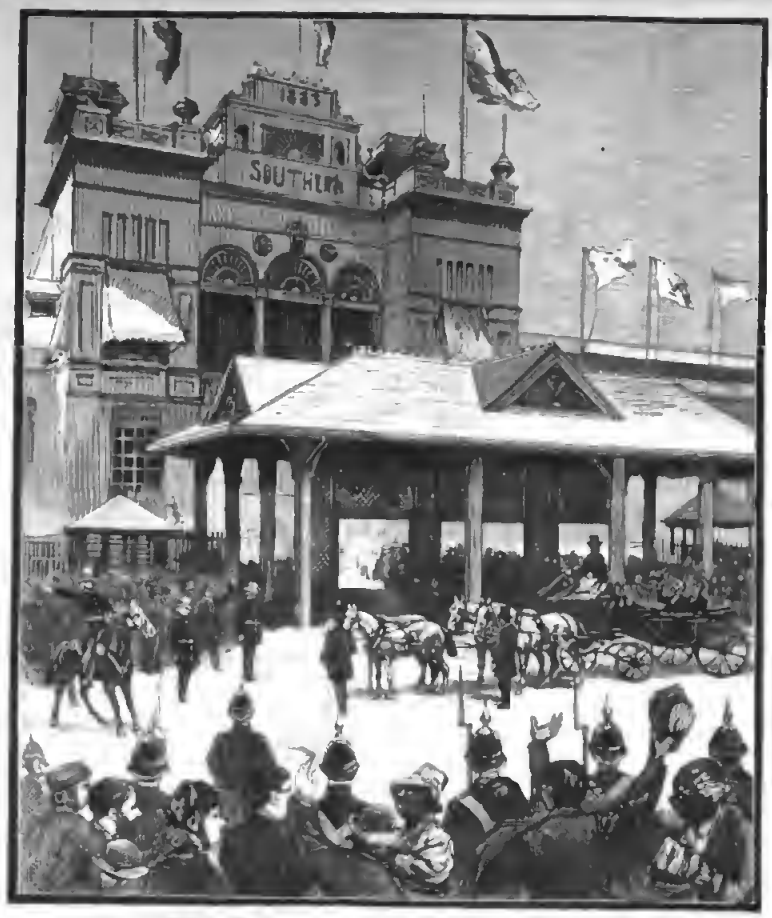
THE SOUTHERN EXPOSITION.

The great Southern Exposition, which was formally opened with appropriate ceremonies on the 1st of August, at Louisville, Kentucky, is an undertaking of the utmost importance, not only to the South, but to the entire Union, and the promoters of it are entitled to the highest credit. It is one of the most significant and most hopeful of all enterprises that have been undertaken in the new South. Unlike the Atlanta Cotton Exposition, which was in some degree the parent of this, and which was one of singular boldness and originality, the Louisville Exposition will not be confined to a single industry, or, indeed, to the industries of one section only. But while it will be general in its scope, it will nevertheless be a peculiarly valuable demonstration of the progress which the South has made and is making in all the activities of a free, prosperous community. The Exposition is essentially Southern in origin and purpose. As Senator Beck—himself one of the most substantial gifts the South has presented to the nation—said in substance at the June banquet in this city, "We want your co-operation; we want your sympathy and respect, but we are not begging for your money." The arrangements for the Exposition, which are on a liberal and even splendid scale, have been perfected in Louisville, and all the money required has been obtained from those immediately interested. This fact, of itself, speaks volumes for the energy and public respect of the community, for the Exposition is the most ambitious that has been undertaken in this country, with the exception of the Centennial. The main hall is to be of like size and similar plan with that of the Centennial. The great engine at Bermuda Cañon, which is to furnish the motive power for the machinery, exhibits clearly the great engine at Philadelphia. The art exhibition is to be shown in a handsome building in the form of a Maltese cross, the centre surmounted by a dome, beneath which, in a grove of palms and ferns, will be placed many fine statues. The collections of loans of art in every part of the Union have been freely opened to the committee of the Exposition, and probably an such array of works of real excellence owned in this country has been seen since 1876.

In some respects the later exhibition will surpass its older brother, for the Centennial gave to the love of art and to an intelligent patronage in the United States a strong impulse, of which the Louisville Exposition will have the benefit. Some idea of the extent of the buildings may be formed from the fact that 4000 electric lights will be used. There will also be an electric railway, which will connect the various points of interest in the grounds.

The Louisville Exposition will be, in a striking sense, an event of national importance. General Grant tells a story of meeting a New Orleans editor at Saratoga, who visited the North for the first time, and was so amazed by what he saw that he declared that it was the duty of Congress to appropriate money every year to take men from one section to the other. This is what the Exposition will do, and in a way which the power of Congress could scarcely emulate with the national revenue at its disposal. The men of the South and the North will meet with the eager desire on both sides to make the most of the intercourse, and it is the "pocket nerve," after all, in great commercial nations, which tells to the most effect. Men do not easily quarrel who are engaged in prosperous business with one another, and for the establishment of these relations this will be ample opportunity.

Of course it is easy to be sentimental over such an affair, but the basis of sentiment at the Louisville Exposition is not sentimental, but practical. It is the South saying to the North, "Come and see what we have done, and what we are doing, and let us show you how we do it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your money, and we will show you how we will use it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your labor, and we will show you how we will reward it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your capital, and we will show you how we will invest it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your skill, and we will show you how we will employ it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your energy, and we will show you how we will direct it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your enterprise, and we will show you how we will guide it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your confidence, and we will show you how we will deserve it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your friendship, and we will show you how we will return it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your love, and we will show you how we will cherish it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your peace, and we will show you how we will preserve it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your union, and we will show you how we will maintain it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your country, and we will show you how we will defend it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your flag, and we will show you how we will honor it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your constitution, and we will show you how we will obey it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your laws, and we will show you how we will enforce them." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your liberty, and we will show you how we will enjoy it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your life, and we will show you how we will live it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your soul, and we will show you how we will save it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your heart, and we will show you how we will love it." It is the South saying to the North, "Let us have your all, and we will show you how we will give it back to you a thousandfold."



THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION—RECEPTION OF OFFICIAL VISITORS.—[illegible]

THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION—THE OPENING CEREMONIES.—DRAWN BY H. F. FARNY.

ment in this case is very substantial. An exposition, though it draw on the whole world for its exhibits, is necessarily at bottom a more or less vast and ingenious arrangement for advertising. But advertising in this way, where thorough examination and comparison are possible, is the most satisfactory mode known to modern business; and it is advertising of its resources, its products, its attainments and possibilities, that the South needs, and knows that it needs. This it will get at Louisville, and the advantage will be decided for all sections. In some regards the South is an unknown region to the ordinary business men of the rest of the country. It has been separated by unfortunate political and social differences. It has been condemned by slavery to monotony in its industry and its commerce. Since the war it is beginning, but only beginning, to know the variety and value of its own resources. Within the past year the completion of less than three hundred miles of railway in one of the oldest and most prosperous Southern States opened up to an accessible market a wheat and corn-growing region capable of supplying several millions of bushels of grain, of greater annual cash value than the conquests of Cortez in Spain. If there can be such a discovery—for it was nothing less—in the heart of a long-settled State, what must await the restless enterprise, the untiring energy, the searching sagacity, of the people that have made the United States already the marvel of the world? It is the priceless advantage of such expositions as that of Louisville to point the way to an almost minute number and variety of such enterprises. The South is in sober truth to-day what the great West was a half-century since, with these important differences, that in the South the most difficult pioneer work has been done; distances are conquered by steam; social organization, constantly improving in its efficiency, exists; commerce and industry are deeply rooted, and only await the advent of capital and labor to spread wide their branches and present the golden fruit. And with the development of commerce and industry the blessings of union and freedom are rendered constantly more secure.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of "A Laodicean," "Two Recruits of the Nation," "Far from the Madding Crowd," etc.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going a-milking, sir," she said.

CHAPTER XV.—(Continued)

By the moon-time Jim and Mrs. Peach had walked slowly along the road together, Jim leading the horse, and Mrs. Peach informing him that her father, the gardener, was at Stickleford, and that she had come this way to meet him. Jim, for reasons of his own, was going to sleep at his partner's that night, and then their route was the same. The shades of eve closed in upon them as they walked, and to the time they reached the lime-kiln, which it was necessary to pass to get to the village, it was quite dark. Jim stopped at the kiln, to see if matters had progressed rightly in his seven days' absence, and Mrs. Peach, who stuck to him like a treacle, stopped also, saying she would wait for her father there.

She held the horse, while he ascended to the top of the kiln. Then rejoining her, and not quite knowing what to do, he stood beside her looking at the flames, which to-night burned up brightly, shining a long way into the dark air, even up to the muzzards of the earth-work above them, and away behind into the bosoms of the clouds.

It was during this proceeding that a carriage, drawn by a pair of coal-black horses, came along the turnpike-road. The light of the kiln caused the horses to swerve a little, and the occupant of the carriage looked out. He saw the blaze lightning like flames from the limestone rising from the top of the furnace, and hard by the figures of Jan Hayward, the widow, and the horse, standing out with spectral distinctness against the mass of night behind. The scene bore the aspect of some unholy assignation to Pandemonium, and it was all the more impressive from the fact that both Jim and the woman were quite unconscious of the striking spectacle they presented. The gentleman in the carriage watched them till he was borne out of sight.

Having seen to the kiln, Jim and the widow walked on again, and soon Mrs. Peach's father met them, and relieved Jim of the lady. When they had parted, Jim, with an equanimity not unlike a breath of relief, went on to Mr Vine's, and having put the horse into the stable, entered the house. His partner was seated at the table, solacing himself after the labors of the day by luxurious alternations between a long clay pipe and a mug of ale.

"Well," said Jim, eagerly, "what's the news? How do she take it?"

"Sit down, sit down," said Vine. "'Tis working well; not but that I deserve something o' three for the trouble I've had in watching her. The soldiering was a fine move; but the woman is better. Who invented it?"

"I myself," said Jim, modestly.

"Well, jealouser is making her rise like a thunder storm, and in a day or two can't have her for the asking, my sonny. What's the next step?"

"The widow is getting rather a weight upon a feller, worse luck," said Jim. "But I must keep it up still to-morrow, at any rate. I have promised to see her as the crow flies, and now the great thing is that Margery should see us a-smiling together—I in my full-dress uniform and clinking arms o' war. Will be a good strong wing, and will suit the business, I hope. Couldn't you manage to put the hoss in and drive her there? She'd go if you were to ask her."

"With all my heart," said Mr Vine, moistening the end of a new pipe in his ale. "I can call at her grammer's fra her; 'twill be all in my way."

CHAPTER XVI.

Margery duly followed up her intention by arraying herself the next morning in her loveliest guise, and keeping watch for Mr. Vine's appearance upon the high-road, feeling certain that his would form one in the procession of carts and carriages which set in toward Casterbridge that day. Jim had gone by at a very early hour, and she did not see him pass. Her anticipation was verified by the advent of Mr Vine about eleven o'clock, dressed to his highest effect; but Margery was surprised to find that, instead of her having to stop him, he pulled in toward the gate of his own accord. The invitation planned between Jim and the old man on the previous night was now promptly given, and, as now he supposed, as promptly accepted. Such a strange coincidence she had never before known. She was quite ready, and they drove onward at once.

The review was held on some high ground a little way out of the town, and her conductor suggested that they should put up the horse at the inn and walk to the field—a plan which pleased her well, for it was more easy to take preliminary observations on foot without being seen herself than when sitting elevated in a vehicle.

They were just in time to secure a good place near the front, and in a few minutes after their arrival the reviewing officer came on the ground. Margery's eye had rapidly run over the troop in which Jim was enrolled, and she discerned him in one of the ranks, looking remarkably new and bright, both as to uniform and countenance. Indeed, if she had not worked herself into such a desperate state of mind she would have felt proud of him then and there. His shapely upright figure was quite noteworthy in the rounded selection of farmers on his right and left, while his charger Tony rapresented by his hearing, even more than Jim, that he knew anything about bone carts whatever, and overything about trumpets and glory. How Jim could have scrubbed Tony to such shining blackness she could not tell, for the horse in his natural state was ingrained with flour dust, that burned the color out of his coat as it did out of Jim's hair. Now he pranced manfully, and was a war-horse every inch of him.

Having discovered Jim, her next search was for Mrs Peach, and he dint of some oblique glancing Margery indignantly discovered the widow in the most favored place of all, her head and bright face conspicuously advanced, and, what was more shocking, she had abandoned her amusing leg for a violet-drawn bonnet and a gay spencer, together with a parasol luxuriously fringed in a way Margery had never before seen. "Where did she get the money?" said Margery, under her breath. "And to forget that poor sailor so soon!"

These general reflections were precipitately postponed by her discovering that Jim and the widow were perfectly alive to each other's whereabouts, and in the active interchange of telegraphic signs of affection, which on the latter's part took the form of a playful flourishing of her handkerchief or waving of her parasol. Richard Vine had placed Margery in front of him, to protect her from the crowd, as he said, he himself surveying the scene over her bonnet. Margery would have been even more surprised than she was if she had known that Jim was not only aware of Mrs. Peach's presence, but also of her own, the treacherous Mr Vine having drawn out his flame-colored handkerchief and waved it to Jim over the young woman's head as soon as they had taken up their position.

"My partner makes a tidy soldier, eh, Miss Tucker?" said the senior lime-burner. "It is my belief as a Christian that he's got a pretty bore that he's making signs to—that handsome figger o' fun straight overright him."

"Perhaps so," she said, with the utmost indifference on the surface of her face.

"And it's growing warm between 'em, if I don't mistake," continued the merciless Vine.

Margery was silent, biting her lip; and the troops being now set in motion, all signalling ceased for the present between sublior Hayward and his pretended sweetheart.

"Have you a piece of paper that I could make a memorandum on, Mr Vine?" asked Margery.

Vine took out his pocket-book and tore a leaf from it, which he handed her, with a pencil.

"Don't move from here—I'll return in a minute," she continued, with the innocence of a woman who means mischief. And, withdrawing herself to the back, where the grass was clear, she pencilled down the words

"Jim's Married."

Armed with this document she crept into the throng behind the mast-peering Mrs Peach, slipped the paper into her pocket on the top of her handkerchief, and withdrew unobserved, rejoining Mr Vine with a bearing of nonchalance.

By-and-by the troops were in different order, Jim taking a left-hand position almost close to Mrs Peach. He bent down and said a few words to her. From her manner of nodding assent it was surely some arrangement about a meeting by-and-by when Jim's drill was over, and Margery was the more certain of the fact when the review being ended, and the people having strolled off to another part of the field where sports were to take place, Mrs. Peach stopped away in the direction of the town.

"I'll just say a word to my partner afore he goes off the ground, if you'll spare me a minute," said the old lime-burner. "Please stay here till I'm back again." He edged along the front till he reached Jim.

"How is she?" said the latter.

"In a trimming sweat," said Mr Vine. "And my counsel to ye is to carry this larry no further. 'Twill do no good. She's as ready to make friends wi' ye as any wife can be, and more showing off can only do harm."

"But I must finish off with a spart," said Jim. "And this is how I am going to do it. I have arranged with Mrs. Peach that as soon as we soldiers have entered the town and been dismissed, I'll meet her there. It is really to say goodbe, but she don't know that; and I wanted it to look like a 'tapernent to Margery's eyes. When I'm clear of Mrs Peach, I'll come back here and make it up with Margery on the spot. But don't say I'm coming, or she may be inclined to throw off again. Just hint to her that I may be meaning to be off to London with the widow."

The old man still insisted that this was carrying the ruse too far.

"No, no, it isn't," said Jim. "I know how to manage her. 'Twill just mellow her heart nicely by the time I come back. I must bring her down real tender, or 'twill all fail."

His senior reluctantly gave in and returned to Margery. A short time afterward the Yeomanry band struck up, and Jim, with the regiment, followed toward the town.

"Yes, yes; they are going to meet," said Margery to herself, perceiving that Mrs. Peach had no timed her departure as to be in the town at Jim's dismounting.

"Now we will go and see the games," said Mr Vine; "they be really worth seeing. There's greasy poles, and jumping in sacks, and other trials of the intellect, that nobody ought to miss who wants to be abreast of his generation."

Margery felt as miserable at the apparent assignation, which seemed about to take place despite her anonymous writing, that she helplessly assented to go anywhere, dropping behind Vine, that he might not see she was crying.

Jim followed out his programme with literal exactness. No sooner was the troop dismissed in the town than he sent Tony to stable and joined Mrs Peach, who stood on the edge of the pavement expecting him. But this acquaintance was to end: he meant to part from her forever and in the quickest time, though civilly; for it was important to be with Margery as soon as possible. He had nearly completed the manœuvre to his satisfaction when, in drawing her handkerchief from her pocket to wipe the tears from her eyes, Mrs. Peach's hand grasped the paper, which she read at once.

"What! is that true?" she said, holding it out to Jim.

Jim started, and admitted that it was, beginning an elaborate explanation and apologies. But Mrs Peach was thoroughly roused, and then overcome. "He's married, he's married!" she said, and swooned, or feigned to swoon, so that Jim was obliged to support her.

"He's married, he's married?" said a boy hard by, who watched the scene with interest.

"He's married, he's married!" said a hilarious group of other boys near, with smiles several inches broad, and shining teeth; and so the exclamation echoed down the street.

Jim cursed his ill luck; the loss of time that this dilemma entailed grew serious. But Mrs. Peach was now in such a hysterical state that he could not leave her with any good grace or feeling. It was necessary to take her to a refreshment-room, invoke restoratives upon her, and altogether to waste nearly half an hour. When she had kept him as long as she chose, she forgave him; and then at last he got away, his heart swelling with tenderness toward Margery. He at once hurried up the street to effect the reconciliation with her.

"How shall I do it?" he said to himself. "Why, I'll step round to her side, fish for her hand, draw it through my arm as if I wasn't aware of it. Then she'll look in my face, I shall look in hers, and we shall march off the field triumphant, and the thing will be done without tokings or tears."

He entered the field and went straight as an arrow to the place appointed for the meeting. It was at the back of a refreshment tent outside the mass of spectators, and divided from their view by the tent itself. He turned the corner of the canvas, and there beheld Vine at the indicated spot. But Margery was not with him.

Vine's hat was thrust back into his poll. His face was pale, and he manner bewildered. "Hollo! what's the matter?" said Jim. "Where's my Margery?"

"You've carried this game too far, my man!" exclaimed Vine, with the air of a friend who has "always told you so." "You ought to have dropped it several days ago, when she would have come to ye like a cooing dove. Now that is the end o't!"

"Her! what, my Margery? Has anything happened, for God's sake?"

"She's gone."

"Where to?"

"That's more than earthly man can tell! I never see such a thing! 'Twas a stroke o' the black sort—as if she were spirited away. When we got to the games I said—mind, you told me to—I said, 'Jan Heyward thinks o' going off to London with that widow woman'—mind, you told me to? She showed no wonderment, though a' seemed very low. Then she said to me, 'I don't like standing here in this mean crowd. I shall feel more at home among the gentle people.' And then she went to where the carriages were drawn up, and near her there was a grand coach, a-blazing with lions and unicorns, and hauled by two coal-black horses. I hardly thought much of it then, and by degrees lost sight of her behind it. Presently the other carriages towed off, and I thought still to see her standing there. But no, she had vanished; and then I saw the grand coach rolling away, and glimpsed Margery in it, beside a fine dark gentleman with black moustaches, and a very pale, prince-like face. As soon as the horses got into the hard road they raised on like h—l-and-thunder, and went out of sight in the dust, and—that's all. If you'd come but a little sooner you'd ha' caught her."

Jim had turned whiter than his pipeclay. "Oh, this is too bad—too bad!" he cried in anguish, striking his brow. "That paper and the fainting woman kept me so long. Who could have done it? But 'tis my fault. I've stayed far too much. I shouldn't have carried it so far."

"You shouldn't—just what I said," replied his senior.

"She thinks I've gone off with that cast-off one, and to spite me she's gone off with the man! Do you know who that stranger is? the boss of answers is? Why, 'tis that foreigner who calls himself a Baron, and took Mount Lodge for six months last year to make mischief—a rake! Oh, my Margery, that it should come to this! She's lost, she's ruined! Which way did they go?"

Jim turned to follow in the direction indicated, when, behold, there stood at his back he father Dairyman Tucker.

"Now look here, young man," said Dairyman Tucker. "I've just heard all that owing, and straightway will ask ye to stop it sharp. To like your brazen impudence to leave and go, when you be another woman's husband, forsooth, I see'd her a-fainting in yer arms when you wanted to get away from her, and heard folk a-standing round who knew you'd married her, and said so. I heard it, though you didn't see me. 'He's married!' says they. 'Some irregular'ar'sedlice business, no doubt; but sit dings all out. As for Margery—who's to be called higher titles as these parts be entire not—I'm her father, and I say it's all right what she's done. Don't I know private news, hey? How I just learned that secret weddings of high people can happen at expected death-beds by special license, as well as low people at registrars of fives? And can't husbands come back and claim their own when they choose? Bygone, young man, and leave noblemen's wives alone, and thank God I shall be rid of a nuisance!"

Swift words of explanation rose to Jim's lips, but they paused there and died. At that last moment he could not, as Margery's husband, announce Margery's shame and his own, and transform her father's triumph to wretchedness at a blow.

"I—I—must leave here," he stammered. Going from the place in an opposite course to that of the fugitives, he doubled when out of sight, and in an incredibly short space had entered the town. Here he made inquiries for the aforenamed carriage, and gained from one or two persons a general idea of its route. It had taken the highway to London. Saddling poor Tony before he had half eaten his corn, Jim galloped along the same road.

CHAPTER XVII.

Now Jim was quite mistaken in supposing that by leaving the field in a roundabout manner he had deceived Dairyman Tucker as to his object. That acute old man immediately divined that Jim was meaning to track the fugitives, in ignorance (as the dairyman supposed) of their lawful intention. He was soon assured of the fact, for, creeping to a remote angle of the field, he saw Jim hastening into the town. Young vengeance on the young lime-burner for his mischievous interference between a nobleman and his secretly wedded wife, the dairyman determined to help him.

Tucker had ridden on to the review ground, in that thing was so necessary for him, as there had been for poor Jim, to re-enter the town before starving. The dairyman hastily entered his mare from the row of other horses, mounted, and descended to a bridle-path which would take the obliquely into the London road at Winford Hill. The old man's route being along one side of an equilateral triangle, while Jim's was along two sides of the same, the former was at the point of intersection long before Hayward.

Arrived here, the dairyman pulled up and looked around. Winford Hill was a spot at which the highway forked; the left arm, the more important, led on through Melchester to London, the right to Stickleford, Anglebury, and the coast. Nothing was visible on the white track to London; but on the other there appeared the back of a carriage, which rapidly ascended a distant hill and vanished under the trees. It was the Baron's, who, according to the sworn information of the gardener at Mount Lodge, had made Margery his wife.

The carriage having vanished, the dairyman gazed in the opposite direction toward Casterbridge. Here he beheld Jim, in his regimentals, laboriously ascending the hill on Tony's back.

Soon he reached the summit, and saw the dairyman by the way-side. But Jim did not halt. Then the dairyman committed the greatest error of his life.

"Right along the London road, if you want to catch 'em!" he said.

"Thank ye, dairyman, thank ye!" cried Jim, his pale face lighting up with gratitude, for he believed that Tucker had learned his mistake from Vine, and had come to his assistance. Without drawing rein he diminished down the hill, along the road not taken by the flying pair. The dairyman rubbed his hands with delight, and returned to the town.

Jim pursued his way through the dust, up hill and down hill, but never saw ahead of him the cabriolet of his search. That vehicle was passing along a diverging lane at a distance of many miles from where he rode. Still he sped onward, till Tony showed signs of breaking down; and then Jim gathered from inquiries he made that he had come the wrong way. Suddenly a burst upon his mind that the dairyman, still ignorant of the truth, had misinformed him. Heavier in his heart than words can describe, he turned Tony's drooping head, and resolved to drag his way home.

But the horse was now so jaded that it was impossible to proceed far. Having gone about half a mile back he came again to a small roadside hamlet and inn, where he put up Tony for a rest and food. As for himself, there was no quiet in him. He tried to sit and eat in the inn kitchen; but he could not stay there. He must out, and paced up and down the road.

This hamlet had once been a populous village. It bore the name of Letecombe Crom. In the middle, where most of the houses had formerly stood, a road from the hills traversed the highway at right angles down to the water meads, and at the intersection rose the remains of the old mediæval cross, which shared its name with the hamlet. The interesting relic of anti-Reformation times was sadly nibbled by years and weather, but it still retained some of its old ornament, and was often copied into the pocket-book of the vagrant artist. Jim Hayward was standing in sight of this object when he beheld, advancing toward it from the opposite direction, the black horses and carriage he sought, now gilded and glorious with the dying fires of the western sun.

The sky and whereabouts of this sudden appearance he did not pause to consider. His resolve to intercept the carriage was instantaneous. He ran forward to the cross-roads, and there, doggedly waiting, barred the way to the advancing equipage.

The Baron's coachman shouted, but Jim stood firm as a rock, and on the former attempting to push past him, Jim drew his sword, resolving to cut the horses down rather than be displaced. The animals were thrown nearly back upon their haunches, and as the postures a gentleman looked out of the window. It was the Baron himself.

"Who's there?" he inquired.

"James Hayward," replied the young man, fiercely. "And he demands his wife."

The Baron heaped out, and told the coachman to drive back out of sight and wait for him.

"I was hastening to find you," he said to Jim, in a stern tone. "Your wife is where she ought to be, and where you ought to be also—by your own fireside. Where's the other woman?"

Jim, without replying, looked inscrutinously into the carriage as it turned. Margery was certainly not there. "The other woman is nothing to me," he said, bitterly. "I used her to warm up Margery. I have now done with her. The question I ask, my lord, is, what business had you with Margery to-day?"

"My business was to help her to regain the husband she had wrongly lost. I saw her, she told me you had eloped by the Anglebury road with another. I, who have—mostly—had her happiness at heart, told her I would help her to follow you if she wished. She gladly agreed; no device after, but could hear on tidings of you in from all of us. Then I took her—to your house—and there she told you. I promised to send you to her if human effort could do it, and was tracking you for that purpose."

"Then you've been a-pursuing after me?"

"You and the widow."

"And I've been pursuing after you and Margery! . . . My noble lord, your actions seem to show that I ought to believe you in this; and when you saw you've her happiness as heart, I don't forget that you've formerly proved it to be so. Well, Heaven forbid that I should think wrongfully of you if you don't deserve it! A mystery to me you have always been, my noble lord, and in this business more than in any."

"I am glad to hear you say on worse. In one hour you'll have proof of my conduct—good and bad. Then I do anything more? Say the word, and I'll try."

Jim reflected. "Baron," he said, "I was a plain man, and wish only to lead a quiet life with my wife, as a man should. You have great power over her—power to our extent, for good or otherwise. If you command her anything on earth, righteous or questionable, that she'll do so that, since you ask me if you can do more for me, I'll answer this, you can promise never to see her again. I mean on harm, my lord; but your presence can do on good; you will trouble us. If I return to her, will you forever stay away?"

They had met, as has been observed, by the cross. Nobody was within sight; and taking Jim by the arm, the Baron mounted the four octagonal steps, and laid his hand upon the body of the structure.

"Hayward," said the Baron, "I swear to you by this holy shrine that I will disturb you and your wife by my presence no more."

In relating this curious incident to the present chronicler Jim used to declare that, to his fancy, the ruddy light of the setting sun burned with more than earthly fire on the Baron's face and on the cross as the solemn words were spoken, and that the ruby flash of his eye in the same light was what he never witnessed before nor since to the eye of mortal man. After this there was nothing more to do or say in that place. Jim accompanied his never-to-be-forgotten acquaintance as the carriage, closed the door after him, waved his hat as him, and from that hour he and the Baron met not again on earth.

A few words will suffice to explain the fortunes of Margery while the foregoing events were in action elsewhere. On leaving her companion Vine she had gone distractedly among the carriages, the rather to escape his observation than of any purpose. Standing here she thought she heard her name pronounced, and turning, saw her foreign friend, whom she had supposed to be, if not dead, a thousand miles off. He approached, and she went close. "You are ill—you are wretched," he said, looking keenly in her face. "Where's your husband?"

She briefly told him her sad suspicion that Jim had run away from her. The Baron reflected, and inquired a few other particulars of her late life. Then he said: "You and I must find him. Come with me." At this word of command from the Baron she had entered the carriage as docilely as a child, and there she was beside him till he chose to speak, which was not till they were some way out of the town, and the Baron had discovered this Jim was certainly not, as they had supposed, making off from Margery along the London road.

"To pursue him in this way is useless, I perceive," he said. "And the proper course now is that I should take you to his house. That done I will return, and bring him to you if mortal persuasion can do it."

"I didn't want to go to his house without him, sir," said she, tremblingly.

"Didn't want to!" he answered, peremptorily. "Let me remind you, Margery Hayward, that your place is in your husband's house. Till you are there you have no right to criticise his conduct, however odd it may be. Why have you not been there before?"

"I don't know, sir," she murmured, her tears falling silently upon her hand.

"Don't you think you ought to be there?"

"Yes, sir"

"Of course you ought."

The Baron sank into silence, and allowed his eye to rest on her. What thoughts were all at once engaging his mind other those moments of reproof? Margery had given herself into his hands without a remonstrance. Her husband had apparently deserted her. She was absolutely in his power, and they were as the high road.

That his first impulse in inviting her to accompany him had been the legitimate one denoted by his words can not reasonably be doubted. That his second was quite otherwise soon became revealed, though not at first to her, for she was too bewildered to notice where they were going. Instead of pulling up to Jim's house, the Baron, as if influenced suddenly by her reluctance to return thither if Jim was playing truant, kept straight along the road till, at a signal from him, the coachman turned sharply to the right.

They soon approached the coast. The carriage stopped. Margery awoke from her reverie.

"Where are we?" she said, looking out of the window, with a start. Before her was a semicircular cove between rocks, and in the middle of the cove rode a yacht, its masts repeating on if from memory the rocking they had practised in their native forest.

"At a little sea-side nook, where my yacht lies at anchor," he said, tentatively. "Now, Margery, in five minutes or can be aboard, and in half an hour we can be steaming away all the world over. Will you come?"

"I can not," she said, simply.

"Why not?"

"Because Jim is not with me, and perhaps would offered him very much if he were to hear of it."

Then, on a sudden, Margery seemed to see all: she became white as a fleece, and an agonized look came into her eyes. With clasped hands she knelt at the Baron. "Oh, sir!" she gasped, "I once saved your life; save me now, for pity's sake!"

Baron Xanten averted his face, opened the carriage door, quickly mounted outside, and in a second or two the carriage left the cove behind, and ascended the road by which it had come.

In half an hour they reached Sickleford, and Jim Hayward's home. The Baron alighted, and spoke to her through the window. "Margery, can you forgive a bad impulse, which I swear was unpremeditated?" he asked. "If you can, shake my hand."

She did not do it, but eventually allowed him to help her out of the carriage. He seemed to feel his error keenly; and seeing it, she said, "I forgive you, sir, on one condition: that you send my husband to me"

"I will, if any man can," said he. "Such penance is milder than I deserve! God bless you and give you happiness! I shall never see you again!" He turned, entered the carriage, and was gone, and having found out Jim's course, came up with him upon the road.

In due time the latter reached his lodging at his partner's. The woman who took care of the house in Vine's absence at once told Jim that a lady who had come in a carriage was waiting for him in his sitting room. Jim proceeded thither with agitation, and beheld, shrinkingly ensconced in the large slippery chair, and surrounded by the brilliant articles that had on long awaited her, his long-estranged wife.

Margery's eyes were round and four-stricken. She essayed to speak, but Jim, strangely enough, found the reather tongue tied. "Why did I do it, you would ask," he said. "I can not tell. Do you forgive my deception? Oh, Margery—you are my Margery still! But how could you beset yourself in the Baron's hands this afternoon, without knowing him better?"

"He said I was to come, and I went," she said, as well as she could for tearfulness.

"You obeyed him blindly"

"I did. But perhaps I was not justified in doing it."

"I don't know," said Jim, musingly. "I think he's a good man." Margery did not explain. And then a sudden moral unsounded her tremblings and tears, till old Mr. Vine came into the house below, and Jim went down to declare that all was well, and sent off his partner to break the news to Margery's father, who as yet remained unenlightened.

The dairyman bore the intelligence of his daughter's enriched state as best he could, and pondered her by nor coming near her for several weeks, though to last he grumbled his forgiveness, and made up matters with Jim. The handsome Mrs. Peach vanished to Bodmouth, and found another sailor, not without a reasonable complaint against Jim and Margery both that she had been unfairly used.

As for the mysterious gentleman who had exercised such an influence over their lives, he kept his word, and was a stranger to Sickleford thenceforward. Baron or no Baron, Englishman or foreigner, he had shown a genuine interest in Jim, and real sorrow for a certain cloudy phase of his acquaintance with Margery. That he had a more tender feeling toward the young girl than he wished her or any one else to perceive, there could be no doubt. That he was strongly tempted at times to adopt other than straightforward courses with regard to her is also clear, particularly at that critical hour when the rolled along the high road with him to the carriage, in obedience to his suggestion that they should pursue Jim. But on other times he schooled doubtful sentiments into fair conduct, which even erred on the side of harshness. In after-years there was a report that another attempt on his life, during one of those fits of sick moodiness to which he seemed constitutionally liable, had been effectual; but nobody in Sickleford now in a position to ascertain the truth.

There he is still regarded as one who had something about him magical and uncanny. In his mystery lot him remain; for a man, no less than a landscape, who awakens an interest under uncertain lights and touches of unfathomable shade, may not let a poor figure in a garish moonlight shine.

Most has heard of his possible death Margery sat in her nursing-chair, gravely thanking for nearly ten minutes, to the total neglect of her infant in the cradle. Jim, from the other side of the fire-place, said: "You are sorry enough for him, Margery. I am sure of that."

"Yes, yes," she murmured, "I am sorry."

"Suppose he were to suddenly appear and say in a voice of command, 'Margery, come with me.'"

"I believe I should have no power to disobey," she returned, with a ruminative look. "He was like a magician to me. I think he was one. He could move me as a handsome moves a speck of steel. . . . Yet no," she added, hearing the baby cry, "he would not move me now."

"Well," said Jim, with on great concern (for "la jalousie rétrospective," as George Sand terms it, had nearly died out of him), "he were he might move ye, say love, he'll never come. He swore it to me, and he was a man of his word."

THE END.

BELOW SANDY HOOK.

THE narrow stretch of ocean beach bing between Sandy Hook and Long Branch, where not many years ago were to be found only scattered settlements of fishermen, one presents a series of attractive summer resorts. The rude shanties have mostly disappeared, giving place to elegant cottages, handsome villas, and commodious hotels. The Highlands, Bellevue, Seabright, Monmouth Beach, and other stations on the line of the railroad, are all places of popular retreat from the overpowering heat of our New York summers. At Seabright, as may be seen in our sketch on page 490, may still be found vestiges of the fishery settlements, and quite a large number of people are still engaged there, as well as at other places along the coast, in their old occupations.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A Missouri judge calls his package of railway passes "unsolicited compliments as he called them.

A Sioux chief of the exclamatory name of Humph recently visited the Department of the Interior. He told Secretary Teller that he was travelling at his own expense, and had not come to beg money.

According to a Western school-teacher, the habit of chewing gum is productive of myopia among pupils. Being forbidden to chew gum during school hours, they seek to avoid detection in the illicit enjoyment of the enduring morsel by holding their books close to their faces, thus bringing on short-sightedness.

The non-appearance of the sea-serpent at the centering places is giving rise to much discussion of the question whether landlords are becoming less enterprising.

Oscar Wilde writes of the Michael-Angelesque appearance of a London policeman. The appearance of the New York policeman is merely Michaelesque.

"Telephone receptions" are popular in the West. There will never be such a thing on a telephone tea-party as long as telephones continue to be so made that only one person can talk at a time

A French experimentor with decapitated insects has discovered that many varieties live for a considerable time without their heads, and go running about as though they were hardly aware that anything is missing. Connundrum. Why is the Democratic party like an insect?

A rural justice of the peace sentenced a prisoner to pay a fine for fighting, whereupon the prisoner accused his Honor of stealing chickens with him, and taking them to a barber's shop to be cashed. The justice indignantly recalled the case, and imposed an additional penalty of a line of thirty dollars or ninety days in jail. It is never safe to accuse the Court of stealing chickens, but Honor may have reformed.

It is set forth in behalf of Lake George that the lake never has been mentioned in any River and Harbor bill.

The first day's shooting in the international rifle match at Wimbledon was on the short ranges. The Americans led their English opponents by eighteen points on the 200 and 500 yards ranges, and were only ten points behind on the 600 yards range. They made sixteen more points than the English team shooting at the 800 yards range. On the 900 and 1000 yards ranges the Englishmen made up the twenty lost points they needed to make them even with the Americans and scored forty-five points additional. With the exception of the 600 yards range, the English riflemen got their advantage on the long ranges At 900 yards and 1000 yards the Englishmen defeated the Americans by thirty-four and thirty-five points respectively. These figures seem to indicate that the rifles with which the American team shot were inferior in carrying power to those used by the English marksmen.

It has been decided that the negro who permitted blood to be taken from his arm for the purpose of transfusion into the veins of a man who was suffering from asphyxiation by illuminating gas shall be paid for the blood taken at the rate of about twenty-four dollars an ounce. He will amounts to nearly two hundred dollars. The man who has the blood paid him five dollars for it and his services for several days as a nurse, and believed that he had settled in full.

The Boston Advertiser speaks a good word for the modern ruins. The word, it says, no longer suggests the little dance-house of olden times, but a play ground of those who seek healthful exercises in common. The enjoyment of the benefits which a ruins affords is "a form of refined communism worthy of general adoption."

The strife to market the first bale of new cotton has resulted this season in the charge that the alleged first bale was not new cotton, but was of last season's crop. The bale was displayed in front of the Cotton Exchange, in Savannah, when a veteran expert came along and began to examine it. "It don't look like new cotton," he murmured; "it don't feel like new cotton; it don't smell like new cotton; and—it ain't new cotton; for here's an old dried-up cockroach in it." The charge of fraud was indignantly hurled back by the producer of the bale, and the end to not yet.

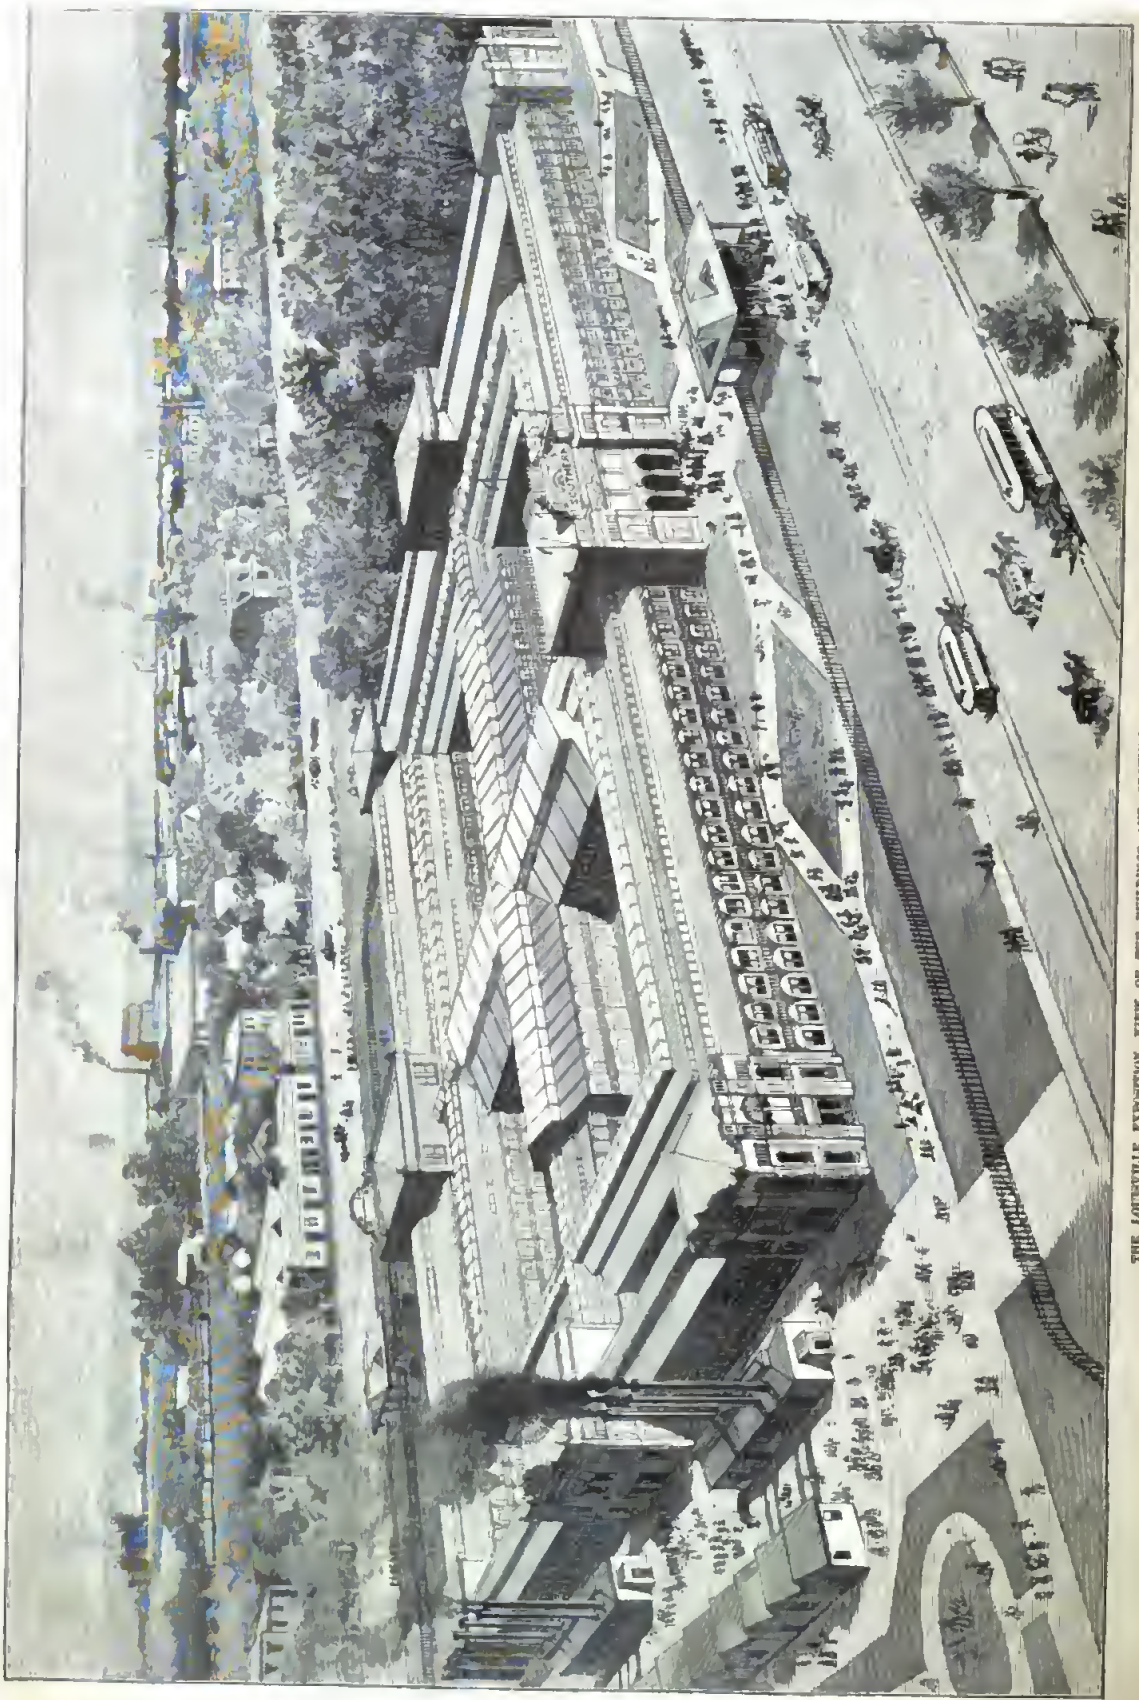
English purchasers of Confederate bonds will be interested in the information that the United States government is a large holder of those securities, which are now stored in the building of the War Department with other things that were captured when the rebellion collapsed. It has been suggested that the government you realize handsomely on the several bales of that sort of paper in its possession if English speculators are still in a purchasing mood.

A tenor of some repute named Monroe has gone mad over his pet hobby—whistling—and is confined in an asylum in France. This is the first authenticated instance of a confirmed whistler coming to grief. They usually whistle on serenely to the close of their untroubled days, while those around them take to the woods and become hermits, or stay as he not open by commissions de lunatico inquirendo.

Chief Moses, the unmitered Indian, is not wholly untortorable if, acting upon his own observations, he can always come off as well as he did on the occasion of his latest visit to Washington. Having learned the uses of money, he asked the White Father for $150,000, offering to take trade dollars. The magnificence of his request had its effect, and he was able to enter into an agreement by which he is to have $1000 a year, and an cabin $1000 with a herb to build him a house. Commissioner Price remarked that the worse an Indian behaves the more he gets, and it is feared that if Moses hears of this remark he will want to back out of his bargain and try again.

Yankee enterprise is again illustrated by a story which comes from New England. The State of New Hampshire pays a bounty of ten cents apiece for crows' heads, and a bright boy across the Massachusetts line has been making money by shooting crows and selling the heads for seven cents apiece to a New Hampshire jobber in the same article.

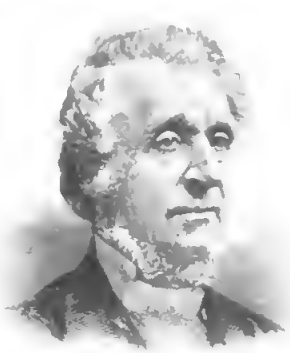
An association for the manufacture and sale of ballot-boxes "designed for the prevention of fraud at elections" has been incorporated in Massachusetts. Among the incorporators are ex-Governors, ex-Congressmen, "and other prominent men of both political parties." Optimists will be pleased to learn that this mechanical movement in the direction of political reform is not one upon which parties divide. Perhaps the time will come when, in lieu of other credentials, the Congressman-elect will take with him to Washington a paper signed by the president of this Massachusetts association setting forth that he was duly elected by the use of the patent fraud-proof ballot-box, and that, in the event of any preposterous person attempting to contest his seat, it will not be necessary to go back of the returns.



THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION.—VIEW OF THE BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.—DRAWN BY H. P. PARK.—[SEE PAGE 490.]

GENERAL ORD.—[See Page 497.]

GENERAL CROOK.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY RANDALL.—[See Page 497.]



WALTER C. PALMER, M.D.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY RICHARDSON.

THE HON. MONTGOMERY BLAIR.

THE Hon. MONTGOMERY BLAIR, who died on the 27th ult. at his country residence, Silver Springs, Maryland, was the eldest son of FRANCIS PRESTON BLAIR, and was born in Franklin County, Kentucky, on the 10th of May, 1813. His first ambition was to be a soldier, and he was accordingly sent to West Point, where he graduated in 1835. A few months' service in the Seminole war appears to have quenched his thirst for military glory, for he resigned his commission in 1836, and began the practice of law in St. Louis, Missouri.

His ability as a lawyer was very marked, and in 1839 he was appointed United States District Attorney for Missouri, and from 1843 to 1849 he was a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In 1852 Judge BLAIR removed to Maryland, and three years later he was appointed Solicitor of the United States in the Court of Claims. He acted as counsel for the plaintiff in the celebrated DRED SCOTT case; but having joined the Republican party after the repeal of the Missouri compromise, he was removed from office in 1858 by President BUCHANAN, who resented his change in political opinion.

Judge BLAIR presided over the Republican Convention of Maryland in 1860, and in 1861 President LINCOLN made him Postmaster-General. While holding this office he instituted several salutary changes and reforms, and at one time created great excitement by an order excluding from the mails certain newspapers which had been presented by the Grand Jury of New York as disloyal sheets. The matter was brought before Congress, and the action of the Postmaster-General was approved.

The year 1864 marked another turning-point in Judge BLAIR's political career. His views becoming too conservative to suit the demands of the Republican party, his resignation from the cabinet was requested and accepted, and thereafter he acted with the Democrats. His brother, FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JUN., was candidate for Vice President on the ticket headed by Governor SEYMOUR. After leaving the cabinet Judge BLAIR held no public office, but was prominent in party movements, and was especially active in the attempt to have the decision of the Electoral Commission reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is worthy of note that the BLAIR family, though slave-holders, were strong anti-slavery men, and ardently devoted to the cause of the Union. FRANCIS P. BLAIR, SEN., was one of the founders of the Republican party, and the second son served with distinction in the Union armies. Personally Judge BLAIR was a very genial man, of simple habits and tastes and unaffected manner. It was one of his ambitions to write the life of General JACKSON, who had left the material for this purpose in the elder BLAIR, by whom it had been turned over to the Judge. Public duties, however, prevented him from carrying out the design.

Judge BLAIR owned a fine house in Washington, besides his country seat at Silver Springs. There he owned a farm of six hundred acres, and was noted for his fondness for country life and pursuits.

CAPTAIN WEBB.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY CONLY.

THE HON. MONTGOMERY BLAIR.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

WALTER C. PALMER, M.D.

DR. WALTER C. PALMER, well known both as a physician and as an evangelist, died at Ocean Grove on Friday, July 20. He had reached the advanced age of seventy-nine years, having been born in New Jersey, February, 1804. Nearly the whole of his life, however, was spent in this city.

After graduating at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, he engaged in the practice of medicine with very considerable success. More than forty years ago he began the work of an evangelist, and for this purpose opened his parlors for a Tuesday afternoon religious meeting, which was attended by Christians of every sect and name. The meeting, which was conducted jointly by himself and his wife, Mrs. PHOEBE PALMER, became one of the features of the religious life of New York city. Up to the time of Dr. PALMER's death the attendance upon it of Christians from all parts of the world never diminished. The example of Dr. PALMER has been widely imitated, and weekly meetings of a similar kind are now held in all our principal cities.

Dr. PALMER's labors as an evangelist were not confined to New York. Accompanied by his wife he made extensive tours through the United States and Canada, holding religious assemblies, in which it was his aim to increase the faith and devotion of Christians, and to arouse attention to personal piety throughout the community at large. One of his most extensive tours, that through Great Britain and Ireland, lasted four years, and awakened great interest.

Dr. PALMER was never ordained; he was a plain layman who occupied himself in doing good to his fellow-men. For thirty-seven years he edited and published the Guide to Holiness, a periodical devoted to the advocacy of the view of Christian perfection cherished by himself and many other Methodists. He was a man of much catholicity of feeling, of a sunny temper, and was always disposed to look at life on its cheerful side. Up to the end of his career he enjoyed an unusual degree of bodily and mental vigor. He was in the midst of his beloved work of holding religious meetings at the time of his death.

CETEWAYO.

WHEN the King of Zululand returned to his dominions last September, on his release from captivity, he found several powerful chieftains opposed to his restoration. Defeat and imprisonment had destroyed his old prestige. His military system had been broken up, and all the conditions of his country were unfavorable to a peaceful resumption of power. Almost from the date of his restoration he has been engaged in warfare with border chieftains, principally with ZIBEBE and HAMU, the latter his half brother. The English had continued ZIBEBE in his position as an independent chief, and a large district in Northern Zululand was placed under his authority. HAMU, on the other hand, was under the jurisdiction of CETEWAYO, and in uniting with ZIBEBE was guilty of rebellion. It was at first reported that CETEWAYO had defeated the allied chieftains, but the latest news is that he has been killed.

CETEWAYO was a savage of marked characteristics. In person he was large and powerful, yet black, with large and brilliant eyes, a beard, and small mustache. The lower part of his face denoted brute power and determination.

CAPTAIN MATTHEW WEBB.

THE brave English sailor who in 1875 became famous because he had performed the unparalleled feat of swimming across the English Channel from Dover to Calais without the help of artificial means, and also on several subsequent occasions in both hemispheres showed that his fame had been both easily and honestly won, was lost on the afternoon of the 24th of July while attempting to swim through the Whirlpool Rapids of the Niagara River, two miles below the Falls. Besides being the greatest swimmer ever known, Captain WEBB had received three medals for gallantry in trying to save the life of a fellow-sailor who in 1873 fell overboard from the yard-arm of the Cunard steamship Russia.

Forty years ago a party of New York boat-builders, who had gone to Niagara Falls to build the celebrated Illic excursion steamer, Maid of the Mist, were sitting on the precipitous shore that overlooked the whirlpool. The waters of the river (at that point about a quarter of a mile wide) were whirling around as if in a huge bowl out of whose bottom the plug had been drawn, and presently from the centre of the circuit there spurted an angry stream about twenty-five feet high. The suction power of that vast whirlpool excited the curiosity of the spectators, and having felled half a score of trees, they made a stout raft, and floated it to the outer edge of the revolving torrent. The mass of wood was soon in rapid motion along the circumference, and a few minutes later was drawn into the vortex. Though diligently searched for, it was never seen again by those who had launched it. The next spring, when the tremendous ice-bridge of the Niagara River had broken to pieces, the same barn saw a block of ice "as large as a brick house" float on the current until it reached the mouth of the whirlpool, where it seemed to be devoured as easily as a shark would swallow a child! Four of these boat-builders—Messrs. John F. Harrison and William Hackman, of this city, and Thomas Cornstone and John Young, of Geneva, New York—still live to astonish their friends with the marvellous story of the whirlpool, and one of them, after recounting it afresh to the present writer, added: "I would rather take my chances in shooting the falls than in trying to cross the whirlpool. If I had met Webb before he went into the water, I should have said to him: 'For Heaven's sake, my friend, don't do it! If a raft of logs get sucked in, how can you hope to come out alive?'"

CETEWAYO.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY [illegible]

The last seen of Webb he was holding up his right arm while disappearing in the fatal vortex. His body has not been recovered.

ROWDY EXCURSIONS.

We are sometimes inclined to revile the police force, and we learn with frequency from the daily press that it is at once brutal and inefficient. But in understanding how vitally necessary it is to the maintenance of order it is only necessary to remark the behavior of the criminal classes when they are temporarily relieved from all apprehension of arrest or official clutching. The picnics which still take place on Manhattan Island give scope for a comparative freedom of manners. One after another of the old resorts has disappeared, its site having come into use for building, and the places that once knew the rough and the female operative in their hours of ease know them now no more. Jones's Wood and one or two less famous urban curiosities still withstand the progress of improvement; and the belated passenger upon the Third Avenue horse-cars, bound down at one or two o'clock in the morning, still has occasion for wonder at the freedom of moral custom as exemplified in flirtations of extreme desperation and in personal comforts which are carried on with an equal candor and disdain of concealment. Since the elevated roads, however, the returning picnickers are seldom subjected to the austere and unsympathetic criticism of fellow-passengers less intoxicated and more sophisticated than themselves, since they still cling to the horse-cars, which they here almost altogether to themselves. The prudent conductor of the vehicle, who apparently shares the social standard of his passengers, does not interfere with the fighting, unless it be carried on with deadly weapons, and commonly regards the proceedings with an indulgent smile, unless his own passages are aroused by the refusal or delay of one of the performers to pay his fare.

These disorders, however, seldom reach a fatal termination, or anything more serious than a black eye and rent raiment. They only serve to show what might happen if these pleasing persons were altogether removed from any terror of the law. And this is precisely what does happen when those pleasing persons indulge themselves in a steamboat excursion to some suburban shore. The ordinary summer excursion, with a barge and a tug, is entirely democratic in its composition. There is no prerequisite to a participation of its joys except the payment of fifty cents. Establish a bar on a barge crowded with passengers of the humble but hardy variety which such an excursion would be likely to attract, remove from them for the day all terror of the police, and furnish no guarantee of order except the presence of a few deck hands, who, even if they be not naturally sympathetic with the rough, are inured to his ways by long experience, and whom he could readily overcome by power of numbers, and you have already a tolerably good assurance of pandemonium. Even when the roughs are on a numerical minority they can control the proceedings. As Burke remarked of the Jacobins, "strong passions awaken the faculties, and suffer not a particle of the man to be lost." A very small sprinkling of this active element can keep a whole boatload of passive passengers in terror, the passive passengers being in the habit of trusting to law and order. They can not suppress the roughs without organizing for that purpose, and giving their whole minds to it, as the roughs give their whole minds to the business of destroying the pleasure and acquiring the portable property of their respectable fellow-passengers. This is not in most cases practicable, and even if it were, to spend the day sitting on a rough's head, and threatening to blow his brains out if he moves, does not fully answer the peaceable citizen's idea of a pleasure excursion, although the reverse of the process would give the rough himself a high degree of satisfaction.

Our artist has given the peaceable picnicker who takes his pleasure in promiscuous excursions a valuable suggestion in the way of making himself impervious to the assaults of his companions. The adoption of his suggestion would relieve him of much unnecessary embarrassment. It is open, however, to the objection that the roughs might throw the heavily armed citizen about the deck for the Homeric pleasure of hearing how "his arms resounded as he fell." They might even go the length of throwing him overboard for the fun of seeing him sink. His condition would be like that of Horatius when > "fast his blood was flowing,

> And he was sore in pain,
> And heavy with his armor,
> And spent with changing blows."

The roughs, however, would be deeply pained to see him fulfill the next lines

> "And oft they thought him sinking,
> But still again he rose."

But there would be little chance that he would defeat their just expectations by footing.

Instead of intrenching himself in this manner, the peaceable citizen has another refuge open to him, and that is, not to go upon promiscuous excursions without any police. The terror of the rough is of old date. It must be twenty years since Mr. Lelland, in one of his Bentzonian ballads, set forth the perils of roughs that encompassed the skiff "Yarman" when he went to Coney Island on a steamboat. But the time when Coney Island was an Alsatia has already receded into a remote antiquity, and the citizen who longs for fresh air can no longer complain that it is necessary to take it in bad company or not at all. The boats of the Iron Steamboat Company and Mr. Starin's boats for Glen Island, as well as the ferry-boats to Staten Island and other regular suburban lines, offer the excursionist a guarantee of safety and decency. It is at his proper peril that he rejects this guarantee and takes his chances on a promiscuous fifty-cent excursion.

The most outrageous excesses and disorders are committed upon excursions which are intended for the exclusive and almost avowed benefit of the criminal classes. No decent person has any excuse for joining in the aquatic pleasures of those bodies which are known to their own members as clubs and associations and target companies, but to the police more compendiously and accurately as "gangs." There are, no doubt, exceptions to their general disrepute, and whoever is quite sure that he has discovered an exception may violate the rule of not going. But the rule in regard to them was laid down by the patriarch: "O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united." In these excursions the respectable element is not appreciable. They carry the fighting on board by descents upon unprotected coasts, which they ravage of all property easily portable or easily destructible. This season they have made descents upon the shore of Long Island, upon the neighborhood of New Haven, and upon the suburbs of the bay. A recent excursion of the something "Guards" to Staten Island was a riot from the departure of the steamer to the coming back of the same, and it was supposed for a time that the vivacity of the rioters had tempted them into murder, but this proved to be an error. We were about to write, unfortunately this proved to be an error. And these really in no particular reason why anybody should concern himself about these openly criminal excursions, except to secure decent neighborhoods from invasion. If the excursionists would only stay out upon the water and devote themselves to mutual extermination, there would be on occasion for regret on public grounds. Indeed, on unscrupulous philanthropist who held that the end justified the means could have a very plausible defense on moral grounds if he should scuttle a steamer crowded with excursionists of this variety many miles from shore.

SOMETHING ABOUT BREAD-MAKING.

Be the process of bread making it is intended to convert the flour of certain grains into a cellular structure, in which it is most easily chewed, saturated with the fluids of the mouth, and digested. In order to arrive at this end, alcoholic fermentation is resorted to from olden times, by introducing the agent in the dough by means of brewers' yeast. Thus a small part of the flour is converted into glucose, which again is transformed into alcohol and carbonic acid. The former is recognized by its peculiar vinous odor, exhaled by the loaves, when sufficiently raised. Both gases produce the raising of the dough—i. e., the porous and spongy appearance.

Be that fermentation the flour not only loses weight, but the bread also attains qualities which may injure the process of digestion.

In order to evade these inconveniences chemists have long ago searched to be part the spongy structure of the dough by other means than yeast, respectively by substances evolving gaseous bodies, which in the oven are transformed into gases themselves. To the best known belong the bicarbonate of soda and cream of tartar, certainly still known to all housewives. And with regard to most of the baking powders of the trade, they are mainly preparations containing these substances. However, it cannot be said of any of them that they exert a beneficial influence on the system, not to speak of the adulterations to which most of them here lately been subjected.

We are glad to learn that Prof. E. N. Horsford, of Cambridge, Mass., who held the chair of chemistry in Harvard University, invented some time since a baking preparation forming an exception to those spoken of, which has already attained universal reputation.

The idea by which Prof. Horsford was guided was not only to furnish a substitute for brewers' yeast, but also to provide those nutritious constituents of the flour lost in the bran in the process of bolting. These are the so-called phosphates, which are also the nutritive salts of meat, and of the utmost importance for the building up of the organism. If we take into consideration that the nutritive value of wheaten flour is from twelve to fifteen per cent. less than that of the wheat grain, and that this loss is now restored by Prof. Horsford's invention, then we must look upon it as of the greatest national economic importance. As Justus von Liebig said: "The result is the same as if the fertility of our wheat fields had been increased by one seventh or one eighth."—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE
Softens the hair when harsh and dry.
Soothes the irritated scalp.
Affords the richest lustre.
Prevents the hair from falling off.
Promotes its healthy, vigorous growth.—[Adv.]

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
A GOOD THING.
Dr. Asa Miles, Chicago, Ill., says: "I have recommended Horsford's Acid Phosphate to my patients, and have received very favorable reports. It is one of the very few really valuable preparations that have come to the afflicted. In a practice of thirty-five years I have found a few good things, and this is one of them."—[Adv.]

DIRECTIONS HOW TO KILL.
And clear out Roaches, Water-bugs, Beetles, Ants, Flies, Moths, Red-bugs, etc., with "Rough on Rats." The dry powder, as named, should be sprinkled down the waste-pipe leading from sinks, cesspools, etc., and elsewhere about and upon sinks—when can be safely used. Repeat every night till all disappear. Mix it freely with occasional water, also with brown sugar, and spread on dishes; and mix with cheese and smear about the cracks and crevices of sinks, waste-pipes, etc. Put a pint of Benzine in a bottle, add a 25 ct. box "Rough on Rats," put a quill through the cork, and then in the mixture when bugs most abound—in mortises, nail-holes, cracks in walls, etc. When far back out of reach use a metal syringe. The "Rough on Rats" will remain as a permanent ferment, and Bugs will soon vacate.
For Flies and Mosquitoes: Put in a common tin pail of "Rough on Rats" in a plate of water slightly sweetened with molasses or sugar, to attract the Flies; stir it well several times, and stir it every day; set it up an inch in the room, out of reach of children. A plate in each room, kept well stirred up each day, will keep the place free from Flies and Mosquitoes the entire season.
For Red-bugs: Mix with cheese or grease and smear about their habitations, and with Benzine as above mentioned.
For Moths: Sprinkle under and upon edges of carpets, and in bottom of trunks and drawers.
A mixture of Raw Eggs and Corn Meal, and "Rough on Rats," is sure to be eaten by Rats and Mice.
Get the genuine Ric. and Ber. Smith, made only by E. S. Wells, Jersey City, N. J.—[Adv.]

A GREAT BOON.
Mosquitoes no Nuisance.
Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment stops the irritation immediately. Boarding-house Keepers, where mosquitoes abound, buy it by the barrel and free boarders flock in numbers so as to be bitten and have the pleasure of being cured free of charge. Everybody is thanking Dr. Tobias for inventing the Venetian Liniment. All druggists keep it.—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.
The Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel-list, and routes covering the White Mountains, the State of Maine, the Maritime Provinces, and all the Shore, Mountain, and Lake resorts east of Boston will be mailed free to any address on application to Lucius Tuttle, Gen. Pass. Agt., Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.
"It is as near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.
"The color of new-mown hay, the perfume of countless roses, the soft breeze, the trim lawns, and the wide Kept public appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune Steamers leave Pier 14, North River, foot of 23d St., East River, and Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

C. C. Shayne, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N. Y., sends Fur Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

Dr. Pansier's St. Vitus Dance Specific—One bottle always cures. Circular, Free. Cin., N. Y.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of plain chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or cream as confectionery is a delicious article highly recommended by cooks.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a food for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a finer or cheaper article for families.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

LUNDBORG'S
RHENISH COLOGNE.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH
MARTIN'S PATENT, U.S.A., 1878.
A self-feeding reservoir pen, used continuously with any ink and by persons of a few-while ordinary use.

PENS TO REFILL.
(Pins, Needles, or Steel Pencil, &c. THE SAME.
MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET WITHOUT LEAKING AND IS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE
THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS OF HAND-WRITING ARE CERTAINLY PRESERVED
$1.00 REQUIRES NO ADJUSTMENT
$1.50 PER DOZEN AT PLEASURE
FITTED WITH A NON-CORRODIBLE PEN.
POCKET SIZE $2.50 PALLADIUM PEN $3.00 SIZE FOR USE
Flexible as Steel, durable as Gold.
SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.
THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic to all cases of weak digestion and debility. "It is a concrete and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Pemberton Avenue, London, England.
Sold Wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBERG, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. S. A. P. S. TRUBNER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

HAMMERLESS GUN
AUTOMATIC
Ejects Shells and Loads Itself as fast as you can work the trigger. Tell your friends where to get them. Made by Hollenbeck & Richardson, Manufacturers of Automatic Double Guns, Arcade.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.
TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hæmorrhoids, nervous congestion, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor
Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris.
17, rue Rambuteau, Paris.
Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, quelque pris qu'il soit, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

HARPER'S BAZAR
CUT PAPER PATTERNS.
We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, No. 149 to 155 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.
We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., agents for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.
Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.
"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.
What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What cures their fevers, makes them sleep;
'Tis Castoria.
When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.
What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.
Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston belle.

DISFIGURING Humors, Mortifying Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Diseases cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES. CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair. CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Scurf, and Dandruff. CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers. Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1. POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., BOSTON, MASS.

WAR VOLUMES
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $18.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
115 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

PHOTO. COPYING AGENTS!

Splendid portraits of any size or kind finished in the most artistic manner, from any kind of small pictures. Reliable agents wanted in every county in the U. S. Profits Large. Address THE AMERICAN COPYING CO., 28 Tremont St., Auburn, N. Y.

EDUCATIONAL.

1883. The NEW CALENDAR of the NEW ENGLAND
CONSERVATORY of MUSIC
Beautifully Illustrated 64 pages. SENT FREE to yourself and name of friends. Send names and addresses to-day. A YOUNG MAN in Boston says: The largest and best appointed Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR..... 4 00
The THREE above publications..... 10 00
Any TWO above named..... 7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE..... 1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE } 5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)..... 10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first number for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 20 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

PSEUDO-SWELLS.

First P. S. "Going out of town this summer?"
Second P. S. "Take an occasional run into the country." (Central Park.) "Going yourself?"
First P. S. "Yes. Go off Boating a little later." (Fishing Banks Excursion.)

An Important Contribution to American History.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN,

Fifteenth President of the United States.

BY GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

WITH TWO STEEL-PLATE PORTRAITS.

2 Volumes, 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops and Uncut Edges, $6 00.

The true history of Mr Buchanan's administration has, up to the present time, been a professed secret; for, while an immense deal has been written about it, no writer has had any documentary authority for his estimate of the motives, intentions, and prevailing counsels of the President and cabinet in the trying times which preceded the war. From the best history of such men as Cass, Dix, Stanton, Holt, and others, it has been generally regarded as settled that Mr Buchanan was alone responsible for the course of his administration. But the history of that administration hitherto published has been in large part confidential and imaginary. It is of the highest importance that that history should be known. The time has long passed when from political feeling any one could desire to suppress the truth, and now all men will be glad to take a dispassionate view of the facts and the events of twenty-three years ago at Washington. Mr Buchanan was in the habit of making brief and clear memoranda of daily conversations, interviews, and occurrences. He preserved all important correspondence. The material for his biography in these ample, and the character of the book cannot be of the most absorbing interest. Its revelations will undoubtedly surprise all who have accepted as true the supposed histories which have been written in the excitement of strong partisan feeling; and perhaps not the least startling portions will be in the letters of eminent men who have been credited with dissent from the policy of an administration, which policy they in fact guided and approved. In any event, the biography of James Buchanan covers the most important period of our history since the Revolution; and knowing, as we do, the material which he left to be used at the proper time, we have confidence that Mr Curtis has made such use of it that the publication will throw clearer light on history than any or all of the books which have attempted to show how the United States was led into the year 1861.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

George Ticknor Curtis commences that his long-promised life of the late President Buchanan is finished. In it he promises to make plain many things concerning the early days of the war, and to correct much badly-written history. The revelations made by Judge Black from time to time since the close of the war have done much to correct false impressions, and the sentiment toward the ex-president who occupied a position so difficult has been much modified. Entirely apart, however, from the interest surrounding the closing days of his administration, there was much in the life of James Buchanan to demand an strong historical and biographical treatment, and Mr Curtis's book will be awaited with interest.—The Philadelphia Times.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of Six Dollars.

NOTICE TO CLERGYMEN.

"M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE" (now complete in ten volumes), is meeting with the heartiest popular endorsement. The N. Y. Tribune says, "It is by far the best work of its kind existing in any language."

This work is sold by SUBSCRIPTION ONLY, and not to the BOOK TRADE.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

BRUSHES of every description at 215 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN L. HOPPEL, Manufacturer and Importer.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

BOSTON SCHOOL OF ORATORY.

Fall course, 4 weeks, $20. Shorter course, one week, $10. Special and Delsarte systems of gesture, light gymnastics. Term begins Oct. 4th. Apply at 1 Somerset St., Boston, Mass., after Oct. 1st, from 10 to 12 A. M., or for catalogues address at any time E. S. RAYMOND, Pres.

CARDS New Styles: Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Floating Cards, finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 5th edition now ready. 100 styles, 40 pencil case, name on, 10c., & present with each order. CLINTON BROS & Co., Clintonville, Conn.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. J. F. MILLER & Co., Cleveland, O.

NEW TELEPHONE
Pin Finger Lights Fit 3 Lamps (interchangeable) Best Work: ing: ation, Rapid Wire, Less Improvement on Chromiers Ever Amplifying Tel. Co., Cleveland, O.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

TAKE NOTICE,
That Mr. (in stamps) Mrs Edward Scrap Pictures No two alike. F. S. MITTELL, 60 Mercer St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN, Fifteenth President of the United States. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. With Two Steel-Plate Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops and Uncut Edges, $6 00.

II.

MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, MORGAN DIX. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $6 00.

III.

TWELVE AMERICANS. Their Lives and Times. By HOWARD CARROLL. Containing Sketches of Bernard Reymont, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Hannibal Hamlin, John Gilbert, Robert C. Schenck, Frederick Douglass, William Astor, Allen G. Thurman, Joseph Jefferson, Rufus B. Woodward, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

SPANISH VISTAS. By GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP. Illustrated by CHARLES H. STEPHENS. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $0 50.

V.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record, with Illustrative Poetic and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By MARGARET WILLSON and ROBERT PRESCOTT WILLSON. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

VI.

THE GREEK AND LATIN INSCRIPTIONS ON THE OBELISK-CENO in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. A Monograph. By ARTHUR C. MERRIAM, Ph.D., Adjunct Professor of Greek in Columbian College. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VII.

COMPARATIVE NEOLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By JAMES ORTON, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

VIII.

NAMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Compared by WILLIAM WELLS NEWELL. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $1 00.

IX.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. 4to, Paper, 50 cents. Also, Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

X.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. Edited, with Notes, by WILLIAM J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

XI.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS. Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, and other Poems. Edited, with Notes, by WILLIAM J. ROLFE, A.M. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XII.

NAN. By LOUISA C. LESLIE, Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Prudence," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XIII.

FREDERICK II AND MARIA THERESA. From Hitherto Unpublished Documents, 1740–1742. By THEODORE BUNSEN. From the French, by Mrs. CAMPBELL BUSK and Mr. JOHN LILLIE. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XIV.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE. A History of the Brooklyn Bridge. By W. C. CONANT. (Reprinted from HARPER'S MAGAZINE for May, 1883.) The Bridge as a Monument. By MONTGOMERY SCHUYLER. (Reprinted from HARPER'S WEEKLY, May 27, 1883.) Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Two Portraits and Twenty-eight Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XV.

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by HENRY GEORGE LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and ROBERT SCOTT, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. DRISLER, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $10 00.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

What Hast Thou Done? By J. FITZGERALD MOLLOY. 20 cents.

A Foolish Virgin. By ELLA WEBB. 20 cents.

The Senior Sergeant. By the Author of "D. Olivier," "Mesmo Pasha," &c. 20 cents.

Ant Cumz Ant Nihil. By the Countess M. VON BOTHMER. 20 cents.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid. By THOMAS HARDY. Illustrated. 10 cents.

Yolanda. By WILLIAM BLACK. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 00; Paper, 50 cents.

For the Major. By CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON. Cloth, $1 00.

Ardath. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON. 20 cents.

Mr Scarborough's Family. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By FRANK BARRETT. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. 8vo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By MRS. OLIPHANT. 12mo, Half Bound, $1 00. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE. 20 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. NORRIS. 20 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

NO WONDER HE BALKED

This has become one of the most popular and best appreciated articles of diet for children to take the household. They thrive on it, get fat, make muscle and have plenty of lung capacity, though they generally smile rather than bark, especially when Imperial Granum is placed in their sight. It is really a capital food, one that can be commended as furnishing the best principles for infant diet.—N. Y. Pharmaceutical Record

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS IN THE PRINCIPAL CITIES IN THE UNITED STATES
JOHN CARLE & SONS, NEW YORK

NEW PRICE.
Dr. Scott's Electric HAIR BRUSH.
Only ONE DOLLAR. $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50 & $3.

Owing to the UNPRECEDENTED SUCCESS of our 60,000 beautiful pure Bristle Electric Hair Brush and a very large demand for others of equal merit and beauty, but smaller in construction, we now introduce a full line of these invaluable household remedies retailing at $1.00, $1.50, $2.00 & $3.00

If you wish to test one of these beautiful Brushes, I will on receipt of price, with 20c added for packing, postage, etc., send a perfect satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded, or by your druggist. Beware of wire brushes which injure the skin and produce baldness. Dr. Scott's Pure Bristle only Electric Brushes will positively cure headaches and neuralgia, prevent dandruff and falling hair.

AGENTS—WANTED. C. A. SCOTT, 842 BROADWAY, N. Y.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS

Call on any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM ENGLAND

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

723 & 741 BROADWAY.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price list. Name county and state. Please mention this paper.

Commercial travellers, business and professional men generally, front all parts of the United States, are now rapidly enrolling themselves as members of The United States Mutual Accident Association, 320 and 322 Broadway, New York.

Five and ten thousand dollar benefits paid promptly and in full to a good many members of A. U. for $15.00 policy, with $25 weekly indemnity, which may be continued at the rate of $12 per month.

LIBERTY TO TRAVEL WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE

CHAS. B. PRAT (of Rogers, Peet, & Co.) Pres't.
JAS. R. PITCHER, Sec'y.
320 & 322 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

A WORD TO THE WISE.

DON'T BE SKEPTICAL. REASON TEACHES AND EXPERIENCE INSPIRES THAT TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT IS AN INVALUABLE REMEDY FOR ANY AND ALL DISORDERS OF THE STOMACH, LIVER, AND BOWELS. A TEASPOONFUL IN A GLASS OF WATER EVERY MORNING BEFORE EATING, IS NOT ONLY EXTREMELY BENEFICIAL, BUT A PROTECTION AGAINST DISEASE WHICH NO ONE CAN AFFORD TO DISREGARD. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS

DELICATE MILD & FRAGRANT

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A QUILL PEN AND PEN HOLDER combining ink for a short time, writing from the pocket. Also a ready pen for [illegible] who can't [illegible] writing.

MARIE, TODD, & HAND,
Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.

Sold by RECORDS and STATIONERS, FIRST CLASS DEALERS.

RAWSON'S (SELF-ADJUSTING) U.S. ARMY SUSPENSORY BANDAGES.

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed. Support, Relief, Comfort.

AUTOMATICALLY ADJUSTABLE.

DISPLACEMENT IMPOSSIBLE

The best shoulder brace in self and for sale by druggists or by mail on receipt of price.

Lecture on Nervous Troubles and Circular mailed free.

Sold by Druggists, S. E. G. RAWSON, Patentee, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

PECK & SNYDER'S Celebrated Tennis

Our Name Stamped on Genuine Balls and not sold to Jobbers. All Balls Each $1.50.

☞ CATALOGUE FREE.

PECK & SNYDER, Manufacturers,
126, 128 & 130 Nassau Street, New York.

How to Build

Plans, Specifications, Price Estimates, Co-operative Journal. Plan Book, 50 Blackboard Sketches, 50c. Each. Send 2c. stamp for Circulars. Co-operative Building Plan Association, 26 Beekman St., New York. Mention this paper.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by first-class jewelers the world over. Send 3 cents for circular. H. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS.

Sailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

FOR SALE.

FOREIGN PATENT

On Agricultural Implement.

CANADA, GREAT BRITAIN, GERMANY, FRANCE etc.

The greatest advance in many years. Crops the ground and labor saved. An immense opening and fortune for the right man. Patents will be sold outright, or interest taken by Co. paid cash, part stock. Address H. L. WILSON,
Box 100, Equitable Building, New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure has cured my Eczema of the scalp."—Jno. A. Andrews, Attorney, Athens, Ill.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $30. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c. to the factory KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

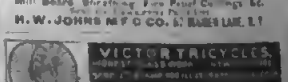
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Descriptive Price List Free.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION



STANDS AT THE HEAD.

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL.

UNEQUALLED FOR SIMPLICITY

THE LIGHT RUNNING DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

CONGRESS WATER.

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID of superior quality, claiming special excellence in the essentials of Fluidity, Color, and Durability.

HISCOX, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 711 and 713 Broadway, N. Y.

AMERICAN STAR BOOT CAPOLL

"Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills cured me of Neuralgia."—Rev. Dean Allen, M

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1390

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1883.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

ON CONEY ISLAND—VIEW FROM THE OBSERVATORY, LOOKING EAST.—Drawn by Charles Graham.—[See Text, page 500.]

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1883.

"The best weekly for children in America"—SOUTHWESTERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

A NEW SERIAL.

"DICK AND D."

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of "Hildreth's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

The publishers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE take pleasure in announcing that in the issue of August 21 they will publish the first chapters of a new serial story by Mrs. Lillie. In "Dick and D." the little folk will have a story replete with incident, full of interest, and written with that rare sympathy with child life which is so especially characteristic of Mrs. Lillie's work.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.50 PER YEAR.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

"THE OLD TICKET."

IN the purely speculative season of politics, like the present, when the chief object seems to be the avoidance of discussion of real questions of policy, surmises about probable candidates are natural. It is to this situation that we owe the talk about the "old Democratic ticket." There are papers which insist that Mr. TILDEN is craftily scheming to secure the nomination, and others which declare that he would be the strongest candidate. There are still others which impotently assert that under no circumstances would Mr. TILDEN accept the nomination, although they hold him to be by far the fittest man in the country for the Presidency. These asseverations accompany the tales of his extraordinary physical vigor and marvellous health, and supply amusing reading in the dull season. But that Mr. TILDEN would be the strongest candidate for his party is improbable. The theory of his strength springs from the conviction that he is supposed to have been elected in 1876, that he was unjustly deprived of the office, and that the country will prove that it thinks him to have been elected in 1876 by electing him in 1884.

This is not only altogether too sentimental a view, even if its premises were correct, but it is based upon a misapprehension. It is undoubtedly the Democratic opinion that Mr. TILDEN was elected. But the better and more general opinion is that it can not be proved, and that the dangerous question was very happily settled by the Commission. What is called the popular majority is of no importance. The President is not elected by a popular but by an electoral majority, and the undoubted Democratic intimidation and false count in many States threw a fatal doubt upon the result, and the persistent assertion of the unquestionable and honest election of Mr. TILDEN does not make a general conviction. It would be unfortunate for the Democratic party to suppose that the American people would elect a President to "condone" such a very problematical "wrong" as this. There is really no feeling of this kind which could aid the candidacy of Mr TILDEN in 1884. That would depend for success upon a situation much more unfavorable to him than that of 1876. There was then very great impatience and dissatisfaction with the Republican administration. The Whiskey Ring prosecutions, the BELKNAP trouble, the ascendency of certain distrusted leaders, were some of the causes which had produced great discontent within the Republican party and among independent voters. In such a situation the nomination of Mr. TILDEN was a fortunate stroke for the Democratic party. He was wholly unknown to the country until he was elected Governor of New York, and began his movement against the Canal Ring. This stamped him as a reformer at the very time that reform was especially desired, and made him seem to be the man for the hour.

Mr TILDEN is an experienced politician, and he shrewdly held the campaign strictly to the line of reform. The acceptance by Mr. ADAMS of the Democratic nomination in Massachusetts swelled the cry, and favored the assertion that Democratic success really meant a kind of independent political regeneration. The circumstances were turned skilfully to account. It was a clever game, but it failed; and it can not be played again under changed circumstances. The campaign of 1876 placed Mr TILDEN in some other lights before the country than that of a reformer. His strong Copperhead sympathies during the war; his silence under the TWEED ascendency in his party; the general impression of a want of patriotism in regard to his income tax; his personal management of the campaign, and the disclosure of the character of his agents in the business of the cipher dispatches—all these things are much more familiar to the public mind than any claim of reform that could be made for him; and in the absence of any personal enthusiasm for him, and with the changed public sentiment in regard to the Republican party, and the absolute public incredulity of Democratic reform, these would be most serious obstructions in his canvass. No close observer can doubt that as a Presidential candidate in 1884 Mr. TILDEN was very seriously damaged by the campaign of 1876. If he could be presented to the country next year with the same freshness and with the same ignorance of him in the public mind as in '56, his chances would be more promising. But those friends who really think him to be a great man and a wise statesman, and who are personally attached to him, prove their friendship by repelling the proposition of his candidacy next year.

HARMONIOUS PARTIES.

IF the two great political parties of the country can not agree among themselves, they agree with each other upon a very important question. The Virginia and Pennsylvania Democratic Conventions show distinctly the probable attitude of the party upon the tariff next year. There can be no issue without a positive and plain difference of opinion, and upon a comparison of the declarations of the two parties as thus far made it is evident that the Democrats do not really challenge the Republican position. The Kentucky Democrats opened the campaign with a deliberate refusal to take positive free-trade ground, and made a wholly unmeaning declamation which showed either cowardice or want of conviction. This was followed by the Iowa Democratic platform, which is the only unequivocal statement thus far made by the party. It favors "a tariff for revenue only, by a gradual but persistent reduction of protective duties." The Iowa Republicans in reply insisted "upon such revenue laws as will encourage American industries and protect American labor."

The Republicans of Ohio followed by demanding a tariff "which will provide a revenue for the government, and at the same time will protect American producers and American labor." The Ohio Democrats resolved that "we favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the government economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive interests at home, and afford compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies." The Minnesota Republicans declared for "a system of duties upon imports so applied as to provide revenue for the necessary expenses of the government, and so adjusted as to encourage the development of the manufacturing and labor interests of the whole country." The Pennsylvania Republicans "unqualifiedly approve and demand that system of protection to home industry which has proved itself to be the basis of national independence, the incentive to industrial skill and development, and the guarantee of a just and adequate scale of wages for labor," etc., and the Virginia Democrats, echoing Ohio, "favor a tariff for revenue so adjusted as to encourage productive interests at home."

The impression produced upon any fair mind by the declarations of the party Conventions thus far is that the Republicans favor raising a revenue in a way that will encourage domestic labor, and that the Democrats favor the same thing. It is true that the Republicans use the word "protection," and that the Democrats avoid it. But it is no less true that the Democrats take great care to emphasize the encouragement of domestic industry, and that Iowa alone, in which the Democrats have no chance of success, declares for a persistent reduction of productive duties, while Democratic Kentucky, Ohio, and Virginia are silent. Certainly this situation does not forecast a contest between protection and free trade, nor even between a protective and a revenue tariff. It shows a deep conviction upon both sides that public sentiment demands that the customs revenue shall be raised in a manner that will encourage domestic industry; and encouragement and protection in a tariff are much the same thing. The Democratic platforms thus far merely re affirm the remark of the Republican President in his last Message, that "only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the government." No Convention has yet announced a sounder doctrine, or one more satisfactory to revenue reformers.

THE STATE AND THE CITIZEN.

THE telegraph strike was altogether too important not to have excited a great deal of discussion upon the old and constantly more pressing question of capital and labor, as well as of the other grave question of the power of the state to regulate such troubles. The charge of Communism in reply to every suggestion of state control is an easy and compendious resource. But there is in the nature of government a power which, although essential to the just objects of government, may be readily defined as Communistic. Whatever is essential to the safety of the state the state may rightfully do. This is implied in any constitution, however free and however carefully guarded. But practically in a free country it is the majority of voters which decides what the safety of the state requires, and it is the function of intelligent and wise citizens to impress upon the majority the principles which should determine their action. But even such citizens will not deny that the state may properly subordinate the individual to the community.

What is called the right of eminent domain, the regulation of the sale of gunpowder and of intoxicating liquor, the support of common schools, the whole system of taxation, is an infringement of individual liberty by the power of the majority. The theory is that such exercise of authority is indispensable to the existence of organized society. The illustrations are innumerable, and the question always is: How far and under what inflexible restrictions shall this power be used? When the government is itself an employer as in the case of an army and a navy, if a strike occurs—that is, if the employés refuse to do the duty that they are hired to do, except upon conditions proposed by themselves—the employer at once resorts to force. How far may the government interfere in the case of the employés of a corporation which the government itself chartered and regulates?

It is agreed that free and honest bargains between man and man can be touched by government only when an attempt is made by one man to deprive the other of the stipulated service. But when the bargain is one seriously involving the public welfare, and is made by such large bodies of individuals that a combined and concerted interruption of the service is a public injury, may the state invade the perfect individual freedom to conclude such bargains by prescribing terms upon which the stipulated service, to which all private and public interests have adapted themselves, shall continue? Or shall the state prohibit such vast corporate aggregations of interest, and so baffle the possibility of general disaster by the interruption of such service? Or shall the consequences of such interruption, as, for instance, the sudden and universal suspension of railroad transport or of telegraphic communication, be accounted as smaller misfortunes than their prevention by law? Or, again, inasmuch as such vast interruptions, in the very nature of the case, involve the immediate probability of general disturbance and bloodshed, shall the community, or the state, or the government—whatever collective name may be preferred—wait until the violence begins? However such questions may be answered, and whatever the community may finally decide to do, there is no doubt, as we said last week, that the organized aggregation of capital will necessarily produce a similar organization of labor, and that the conflicting interests of the two will perpetually threaten the peace and welfare of the state, which it is agreed may properly provide for its own safety.

PROMOTION IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

THE duties of the National Civil Service Commission in carrying the law into effect have been of course immense and laborious. The Commissioners were compelled to deal at once with an enormous mass of details, and to provide for every situation and for all the questions which were sure to present themselves at the initiation of such a reform. The diligence of the Commission has been unremitting, and its work so faithfully performed that we are not surprised, but exceedingly sorry, to learn that Mr EATON has been quite overworked, and is now seeking rest. Mr. EATON'S great familiarity with the principles and details of the reformed system makes his services of such peculiar value that we trust a little repose will soon restore him to his wonted vigor. His enforced inaction at this moment is the more to be regretted as the question of promotions has been brought to the attention of the Commission by an inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury whether in the judgment of the Commission he can promote, at pleasure and without competition, from the nine-hundred-dollar clerkships, which are held largely if not chiefly by women, to the twelve-hundred-dollar clerkships. This is a very serious inquiry, which the Commission is reported to have answered in the affirmative.

Promotion is obviously a question different from that of original appointment. The rules approved by the President provide that there shall be "competitive examinations" of a "suitable character" for promotions. These words we suppose to have been intentionally used with the knowledge that as such competition securely and efficiency and adaptability—that is, fitness proved by experience—should have a great, if not decisive, weight. The fundamental requirement in promotion, as in original appointment, however, is that all candidates shall stand upon the same footing, and that none shall have any illegitimate advantage. The spirit of the law, as of the reform, is fair play. It is in that spirit that the rule must be interpreted which provides that, until rules upon the general subject are promulgated, promotions may be made at pleasure in offices where examinations are not now held. This seems to us to dispose of the particular question asked by the Secretary, and adversely to the reported decision of the Commission. As examinations are now held in offices where clerks are employed at twelve hundred dollars salary, we do not see how promotions can be made into such offices at pleasure. In other words, the transfer of a nine-hundred-dollar clerk to a twelve-hundred-dollar desk, in an office where competition is already established, does not fall under the provisional exemption.

As the rules are not retroactive, promotions must be made from all employés in the lower grades of the service, however they may have been appointed. But equality of opportunity must be steadily observed. Promotions ought not to be made at pleasure from a non-competitive to a competitive grade. The practical operation of the reported decision will be that the Secretary in the case proposed will select for promotion from two classes—clerks already appointed by favor and with strong political support, and outside applicants who have succeeded in the competition. This is not equality, and it is an plain contravention of the spirit and intent of the reform bill. The Commission will undoubtedly soon reach a conclusion upon the whole subject, and it will undoubtedly see that promotion must be made in one of three ways—by selection at pleasure exclusively from those in the service, however appointed; by equal competition among employés; or by equal competition between employés and outside applicants.

THE CATASTROPHE ON THE ISLAND OF ISCHIA.

THE catastrophe at Casamicciola, on the island of Ischia, near Naples, appeals to universal sympathy, and it will be recorded as among the shocking events of history. The details of the sudden blow are terrible, and the event is the more appalling because it is of a kind against which no foresight could provide, and which gives no premonition of its approach. Italy is not one of the "earthquake countries," but this tragical disaster will invest it all with a vague apprehension. Ischia will be, of course, avoided by travellers, and the destruction of Casamicciola will practically ruin the island. It is noted mainly for its mineral springs and for the cultivation of grapes, and its lovely and beautiful outline will be remembered by every traveller who recalls the bay of Naples. The explanation offered that the cause of the destruction was not an earthquake, but the subsidence of the earth, will not alleviate the feeling of horror and pain with which the story is read. The causes of such a subsidence are as occult as those of an earthquake, and its approach must be as impossible to foretell.

It is evident that Italy is deeply stirred by the catastrophe, and that its generosity in relief will be taxed to the utmost. All civilized countries will share the feeling, as at the time of the terrible earthquake at Lisbon, and this general sympathy will doubtless take a tangible form. It is at such times that man's humanity to man makes countless thousands prouder of their common human nature.

THE CHOLERA

THE London Spectator wonders at the calm way in which civilized England read the first accounts of the cholera from Egypt, and of the cordons drawn around the doomed cities. It describes the condition of those cities, before the plague appeared, as loathsome beyond belief, mere heaps of filth and putrefaction, which necessarily bred the most deadly forms of pestilence; and, when the pestilence appeared, the cities were shut up to themselves, without food, medicine, doctors, pure water or air, or help of any kind, and left to fester in their own corruption—a situation to "drive English philanthropists frantic with indignation."

The Spectator says that the pestilence may be cholera, which was originally born in Lord Hastings's camps under precisely such conditions, but that it is more probable that certain fever, a frightful disease, as deadly as the plague, but which requires conditions, and does and moves universally around the globe, defying analysis and explanation. The writer ascribes much of its present ravage to the clashing of two civilizations, the Oriental and the Western. If either were supreme in Egypt the fate of the victims would be more tolerable. The Oriental, if left entirely alone, would bow his head to fate and die, but not unattended nor unreasoned, as in a cholera city. If he were taken care of exclusively by Western civilization he would have all the succor that hygienic science can afford. But when the two conflict, science isolates him, indeed, but only to perish more miserably.

It is agreeable to see that our own authorities are promptly moving to take proper precautions. The Secretary of the Treasury has issued orders to prevent the entry from any suspected port of rags, which so often transmit deadly disease. There is no occasion whatever for any panic or over-anxiousness, and the temperance and care which the fact of the frightful pest in Egypt will naturally produce will be among the most excellent preventives.

HONEST ALLAN CAMPBELL.

THE resignation of Mr. ALLAN CAMPBELL, Comptroller of the city of New York, did not surprise the community, although it was sincerely regretted. Complete physical prostration at a time when the duties of his office were greatly increased, and the situation demanded the utmost vigor and complete command of all his resources, was an adequate reason for his decision. One of the most incorruptible and independent of public officers, he found himself confronted with revelations of dishonesty in his office, which, of course, somewhat involved his official responsibility, but which, equally of course, were universally felt not to affect his personal character. He had performed his own peculiar duties with such consummate care for the taxpayers and with such rigid fidelity that he may well be remembered as honest ALLAN CAMPBELL.

Among the important duties which recent legislation had devolved upon his office was that of membership of the Assessors' Commission. The contest over the appointment of that body turned upon its patronage. A great sum of money was to be expended for a great public work. The professional and trading politicians naturally wanted to make it a huge job. The tax-payers and decent citizens desired that it should be accomplished economically and effectively. The result was the appointment of a board apparently divided between the two interests. Comptroller CAMPBELL, who was made officially a member, was a sure reliance of the friends of honest dealing. His resignation, although depriving the city of his vigilant and honorable service, left the Mayor free to appoint his successor without the jobbing interference of the Aldermen. The gentleman whom he has selected for the place has borne a high character for ability and integrity in the responsible positions he has filled.

The nomination of Mr. CAMPBELL as Mayor last year by citizens of all parties who felt that municipal government is not properly political, was a signal tribute to his independence and public spirit as well as administrative ability. The combination of political factions against him was, however, too strong, and Mr. CAMPBELL was defeated. But the result did not impair the value or weight of the honor of selection. He was the fitting candidate of an honest movement for better local government, and Mr. CAMPBELL retires from public life with the hearty regard and sympathy of the community which he has served so long and so faithfully.

PERSONAL.

A NEW YORK physician is fond of speaking to his friends of what he calls "the beneficence of ill health." Invalids, he says, do more brain work than well persons. To the latter the mere pleasure of existence is a diversion, but the former find it easy to concentrate their attention upon the task in hand, and not being able to find pleasure anywhere else, look for it there.

—There is at least one dramatic critic connected with the daily press of New York city who preserves his independence by declining to accept free tickets to the theatres. He buys tickets when desiring to see a play. Moreover, he has no social relations with actors, actresses, or managers, neither seeking acquaintance with them personally nor allowing himself to be brought into their society. When he writes criticisms in a public journal he wishes to feel absolutely free to say what he believes to be the truth.

—Miss MARY ALICE PERRY, who died a short time ago, in her twenty ninth year, was a bright young writer, whose first novel, Esther Pennefather, was published by the HARPERS. Some poems of hers, submitted by a friend to the late WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT —and nobody ignorant of Mr. BRYANT'S daily walk and conversation knows how many were the poems submitted to his critical attention—elicited the response, "Tell her he all means to cultivate her talent for poetry, but tell her also there is no money in poetry; she must do other literary work too." Miss PERRY was a student of political science, of botany, and of painting. Her early death was most deplored by those who best surmised the fine possibilities of her genius.

—An artist who saw FARRAGUT daily while Mr. PARK was painting his portrait says that the great Admiral, though smaller than the average of his countrymen, appeared neither short nor tall, for the reason that he was proportioned ideally in the Greek sense, the head being one-eighth that of the whole body. "FARRAGUT'S manner," he observes, "was that of a simple sailor, and his recital of his greatest exploits so easy, natural, and unconcerned as if concerned with matters the most mercantile."

—A New York sculptor has received a commission to execute a forty thousand-dollar statue. "How much money ought he to make out of the job?" was asked of a brother sculptor. "If he possesses the slightest amount of business sagacity," was the reply, "he ought to clear twenty thousand dollars above all expenses."

—The London correspondent of a leading New York journal writes that the critical verdict on Miss LILLIAN RUSSELL'S first appearance in that city was, "One not sing—not remarkable either in respect of voice or training." Referring to our London files, we find something different. The Hall Mall Gazette says: "Miss LILLIAN RUSSELL is the possessor of a voice excellent in quality and fair in power. Her acting was the chief attraction, and she enjoyed something like a monopoly of encores." The Daily News says: "Her voice is of excellent quality and of considerable natural power, though [illegible] not whilst limited in compass. She never sings out of tune, and is free of those faults of [illegible] and [illegible] with which some of her countrywomen [illegible] is charged. It is certain that it is long since a more promising [illegible] has been entrusted to our stage." The Times says: "She has a good voice." The Standard says: "Miss LILLIAN RUSSELL is a most highly pleasing young singer, very pretty. The young lady acts occasionally." It would be impossible to quote that authorities that represent better the critical opinion of London.

—The story, extensively circulated in the newspapers, that M. ALEXANDRE DUMAS, who prides himself on his knowledge of pictures, has been deceived about the paternity of a "superb Corot" which he had bought of an art dealer, but which turns out to be the work of an obscure Parisian, reminds us that Mr. WINSLOW HOMER once painted a very respectable "Corot," and kept it in his studio the easily to be submitted to the admiring gaze—as he expected—of a well-known art critic who sometimes favored him with a call, and who was notorious for "hating" the Corot market.

—To hear the lessons in the Book of Common Prayer read in the solemn voice of the Prince Minister of England has long been an attraction at Hawarden church, and when Mr. GLADSTONE is to be present the building is full of "occasional worshippers." The Premier's son, also a rector of the church, must feel sad, says an English editor, when he reflects upon the difference in the size of the congregation when his father is there and when he is not. "In short, the mobbing of the Premier at church is palpably disgraceful, and this is seen most clearly by people who do not live within measurable distance of Hawarden."

—A few months before his death Lord BRACEBRIDGE said to Lord ROWLAND GOWER: "Life is no easy, or no anxiety. For the well-made man life is full of troubles and anxieties from fear of losing the position or wealth he has obtained; for those born with these advantages there is nothing to strive for, and life then becomes a mere bore, no easel, and a burden." The loss of his own position as Premier was too much to be borne with equanimity "I have failed," he said; "and even BISMARCK [whom he admired] to come to England, I should not ask to see him, and he would not seem care to see me."

—The late DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI expressed peculiar views concerning some modern novelists. THACKERAY he could hardly bear the name of, George Eliot was vulgarity personified, BALZAC was melodramatic in plot, conceited, washy and dull. The one great and supreme man, the sole descendant of SHAKESPEARE, was ALEXANDRE DUMAS.

—"Every actor" (says Mr HENRY IRVING) "has his secret. He might write volumes of explanation, and the matter would still remain a paradox to many. It is often said that actors should not shed tears, that tears are bad art. This is not so. If tears be produced at the actor's will and under his control, they are true art, and happy is the actor who numbers them among his gifts." Mr IRVING disputes DIDEROT'S principle that the actor must not feel the part he is acting, "sensibility" being a disturbing influence.

—HENRY GOODWIN is the name of a parish beadle in London who was arrested for abusing EMMA MILLS, a pea-opener, while she was getting ready for service. He called her bad names, struck her, and said, "I will do for you; I have bought a six-chambered revolver, and I mean to do for you." "In fact," said EMMA to the judge, "he is a brute, sir." When asked if she had complained to the persons she employed her in the church," she replied in the negative: "It would be no use doing that, as he was the beadle." In the court of justice, however, his beadleship was less imposing. The judge, after informing him that it was "disgraceful in the extreme to find a person holding the position of a church beadle quarrelling in the sacred edifice," sentenced him to imprisonment for two months with hard labor. CHARLES DICKENS could have been interested in this case.

—To drinkers of claret Mr SANDWITH, British Consul in Crete, reports that though the wine produced in that island last year was very much less than usual, the quantity exported to France, "ostensibly for the purpose of being manufactured and shipped under the name of claret," is considerably in excess of that in the previous year. The price received for this wine of Crete was only seventeen and a half cents a gallon.

—The London Academy on Mrs. CRISTABEL FERRIER WOOLSON'S Anne: "We venture to say that Anne is one of the most remarkable works of fiction that have appeared for many years. It is remarkable for its own sake—for animation of plot and variety of character; and it is remarkable on holding a place midway between the old American novel of incident and the modern American novel of analysis . . . If the author can keep up to the high standard reached in this work, a great future is before her."

—A lady's-maid, on a voyage from Copenhagen to London, died of seasickness. She began to suffer greatly the day after the vessel sailed, and as found dead as the shore came in sight.

—Mr GORDON MACREADY, the novelist, his wife, and seven of their children gave a representation of the "Christmas Carol" of Polycarpus the Martyr in Stevanes Hall, London, on the 7th of July. The performance seems to have been rather slow, although the five acts had been verbatim "translated and adapted from CRANFIELD," and the hall was filled with an audience consisting mostly of ladies. The local critics suggest that "a little more vigor and variety" on the part of some of the performers might have neutralized some of the effects wrought by the hot weather; that many passages, doubtless intended to be impressive, would have been more striking if not spoken in a changeless monotone —"frequently whole speeches were delivered without a change of attitude, without a change of voice, without even a gesture"; and that perhaps, after all, the piece was intended to be a moral lesson rather than a dramatic entertainment. Mr. MACREADY and his family are announced to do Macbeth, also, in similar style.

—The granting of a pension of $1250 a year to Prince LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE, who has recently been studying the local dialects of Cumberland, Yorkshire, and the Scottish Lowlands, does not give general satisfaction. "With all respect to the fallen fortunes of his dynasty," says the leading organ of the Liberal party, "we are unable to recognise that either his services, his talents, or his misfortunes designate him as proper to" receive a larger pension than was granted either to LEIGH HUNT or Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON. "If for purely personal reasons, into which it is not our duty to inquire, Prince LUCIEN BONAPARTE was regarded as a fitting object of royal bounty or beneficence, the Victoria List, which is wholly under the control of the reigning sovereign, would have been the proper place for his Highness's name to appear."

—A New York woman declares that she never wishes to be so much to be a man as when she is standing on the pavement trying to stop a horse-car.

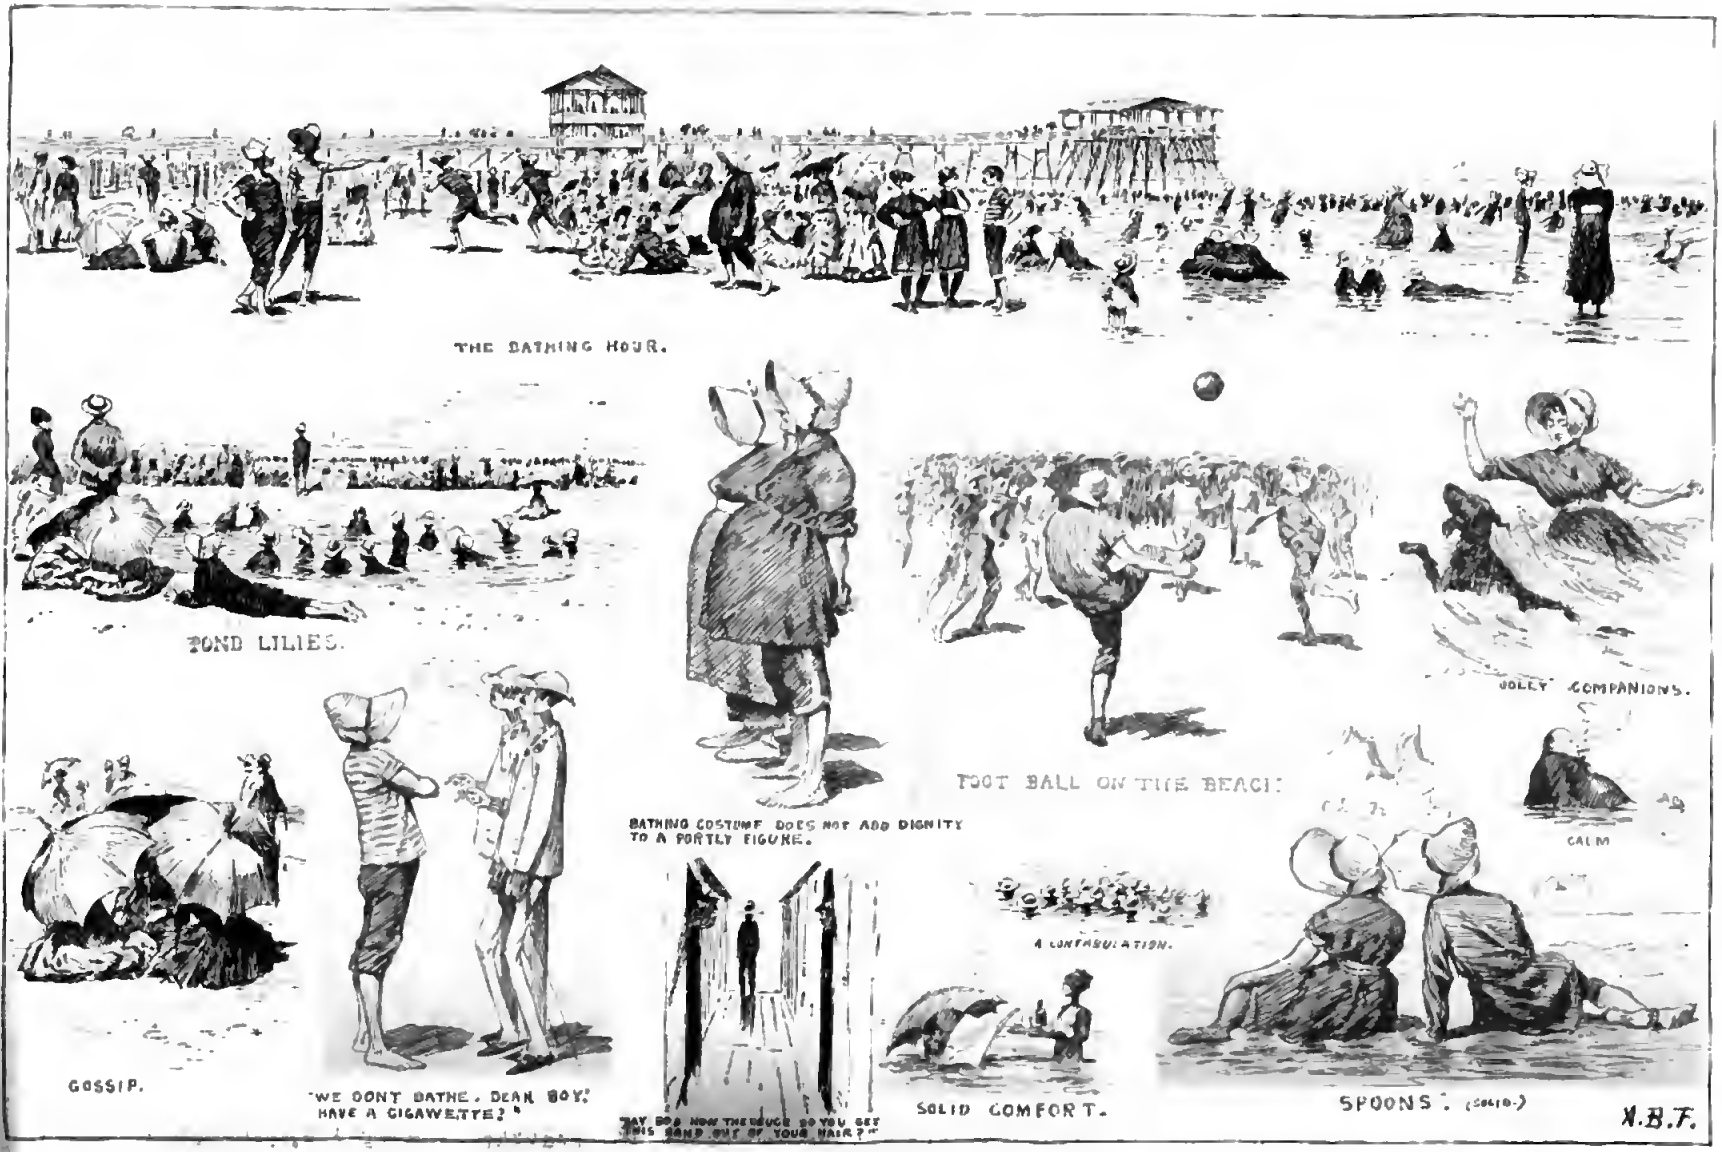
—A distinguished New York artist was speaking of an acquaintance who has won some reputation in the world of letters. "It is strange," he observed to a companion, "how smart that fellow is; why, I have known his father for forty years, and he is as stupid as they make them." "Well," mused the other, "it's not so very odd, after all: there's your son, now, he is bright."

—The German Postmaster-General, Dr STEPHAN, is said to be a great humorist, and a foreign paper prints the following anecdote in which he plays a prominent part. His Excellency, who is an ardent Nimrod, had taken train for Konigsberg to enjoy a few days' deer-stalking. On arriving at Dirschau, a town near his destination, he stepped into the station telegraph office to write his orders to his valet at Berlin. The official recognised his chief at once, and with all obsequiousness began to write down his message, [illegible] the Morse instrument, used for service telegrams only, began to work, and very shortly his Excellency pricked up his ears, for he distinguished the particular clicks that represent his own name. A glance at the clerk's face, now deadly pale, induced him to inquire further into the purport of this state telegram, and when the clicking had ceased, he took up the paper ribbon, and read as follows: "Look out for squalls. STEPHAN is somewhere on the line. He will be poking his nose everywhere." The Postmaster-General smiled sardonically, and then went to the instrument and flashed back this reply: "Too late. He has already poked his nose in here. STEPHAN."

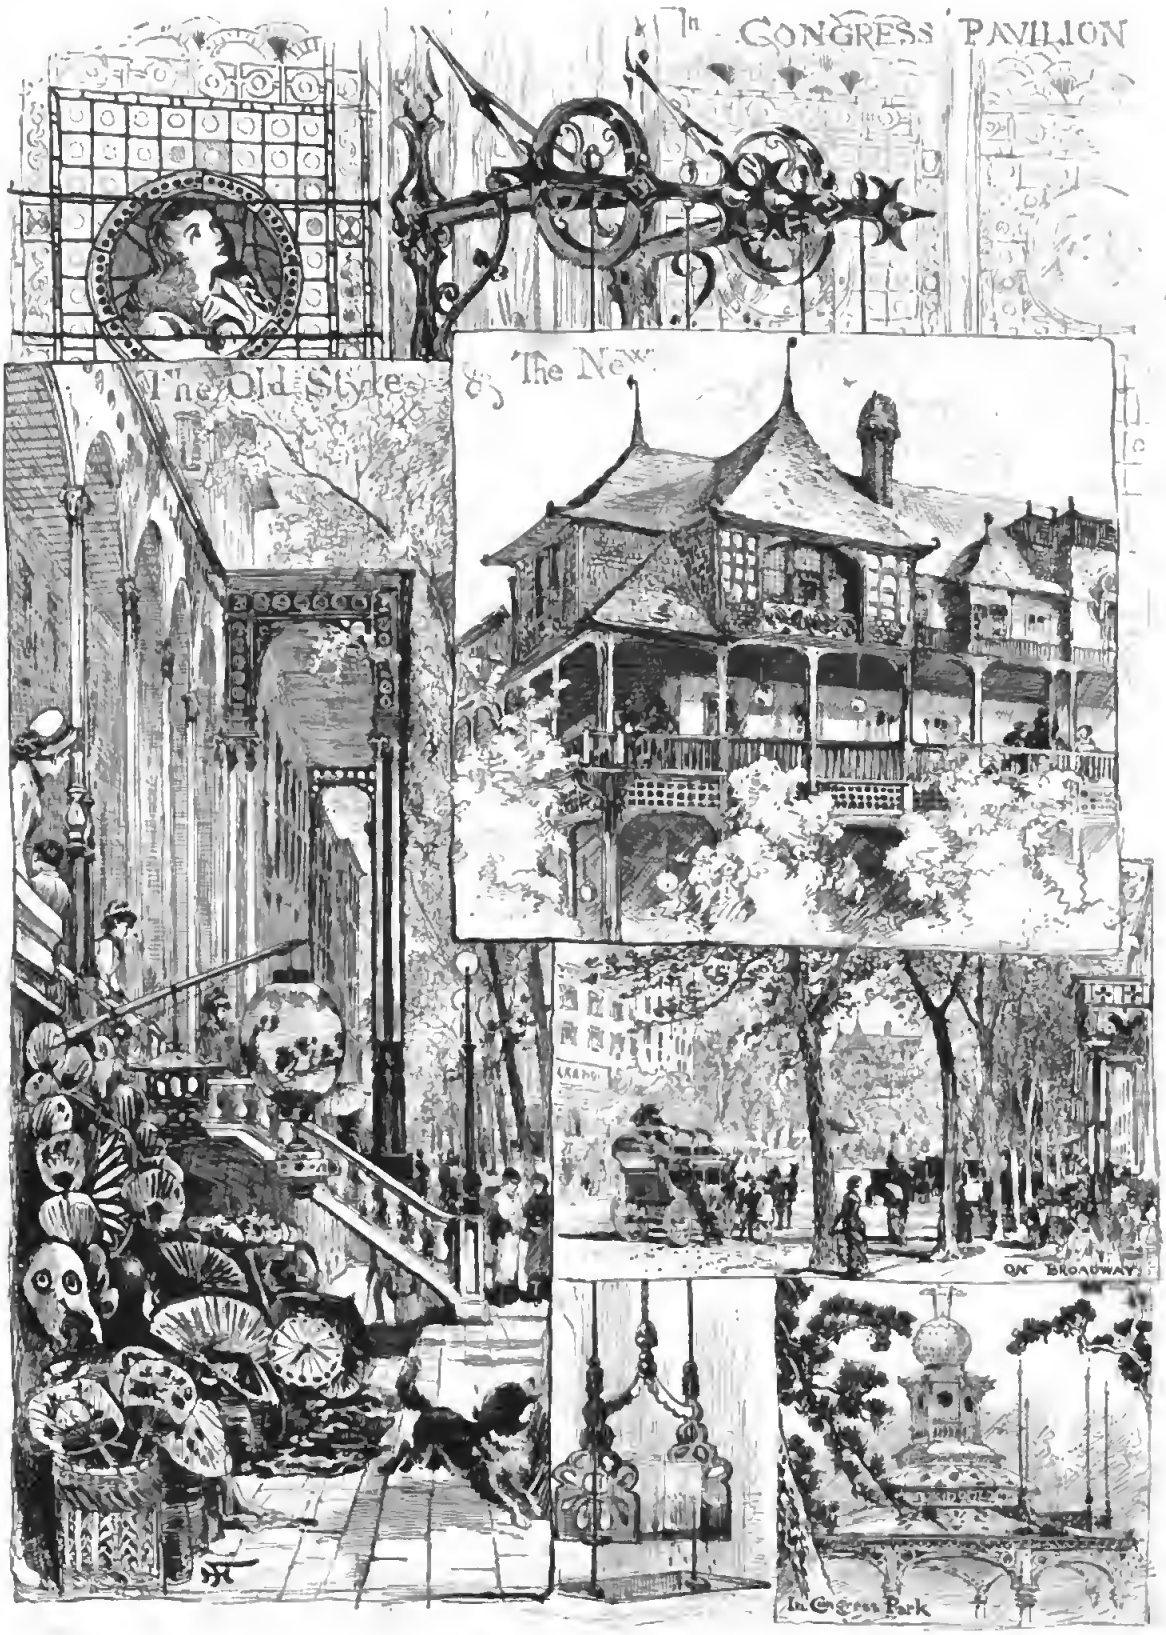
—A writer in London Life says: "I vouch for the truth of the following story, which shows us the ingenuity with which the Parisian cabman tries to extract coin of the realm from the guileless foreigner in his clutches. A young and lovely American girl hired one of those Gallic Jehus to drive her from her hotel to the Grande Magazins du Louvre. Arrived, she tendered him his fare—one franc fifty centimes, upon which the cabman demanded three francs. The young lady, qui connaissait ses Paris, refused to pay the larger amount, and told her driver that it was his legal fare. "Ah, but if you has the responsibility of driving a young lady alone, the fare is double!"

—Mr BOUWMEESTER is the hero of a pretty story which is far more interesting to read than any of the transactions of the Browning Society. The other day, at a garden party at which the poet was present, a young lady, who did not know the author of The Ring and the Book by sight, mistook Mr Bouwmeester for a friend of her family with whom she was slightly acquainted, and under that impression went up and spoke to him. Mr Bouwmeester, who did not know the young lady, saw that she was acting under a mistake, and good naturedly suggested that she mistook him for some one else. "Oh, no!" said the lady. "You are Mr ——, you see!" Mr Bouwmeester pleasantly denied being the gentleman in question, and the young lady, with many apologies, was on the point of retiring, when Mr Bouwmeester, fearing that he would pain her if he did not [illegible] assured her that he would not be alarmed, the poet, with great gravity, said, "I am Mr BROWNING." The young lady smiled and shook her head. "I have seen portraits of Mr BROWNING," she said, "and I am sure you are not he." The poet then produced a card, wrote a few lines of verse on it, and gave it to the young lady on condition that she was not to look at it until she got home. Judge of her delight on finding that the genial unknown was the distinguished poet, and that he had inscribed his visiting-card with a pleasant little [illegible] poem and made it rhyme with the word [illegible] lovely introduced.

Digitized by Google



LIFE AND CHARACTER ON THE SANDS AT CAPE MAY.—Drawn by A. B. Frost.



SARATOGA SKETCHES.—Drawn by Harry Fenn.—[See Page 502.]

SARATOGA SURROUNDINGS.

OUTSIDE of the invalids who go to Saratoga for the express purpose of drinking its mineral waters, and the sporting men and women to whom its race track is its sole attraction, the majority of visitors become enough after a very short stay. They have tasted of its several springs, exhibited themselves on the hotel piazzas, listened to the bands morning and evening until they are tired of them, attended several races in which they have taken but a languid interest, and joined the throngs of sitters and gazers who criticise the handful of dancers as the hotel hops. "Now what is left to be done?" and, "How are we to amuse ourselves during the remainder of the summer?" are questions heard with astonishing frequency.

He to whom the many pleasant hours of Saratoga are open, whose circle of acquaintances extends beyond the hotels, and who is invited to join the merry parties that are constantly being formed to visit one or another of the numberless charming resorts with which the Springs are surrounded, fails to comprehend how time spent here can hang heavily, or the place be voted dull. He knows that the peculiar attractions of its hotel life are apt to pall upon one when taken in overdoses, but they are very pleasant to return to after a brief absence amid other scenes. And these "other scenes" are so infinite in their variety and numbers, and so easy of access from Saratoga, that its central position amid them constitutes one of its choicest charms. The St. Lawrence, Quebec, Montreal, and all Canada are almost within landing distance on the north. Lake George is so near that its entire circuit may be made from Saratoga between breakfast and tea time, and Lake Champlain is equally accessible. The breezy heights of Mount McGregor and its many attractions are but ten miles away, and Bangoyne's battle-field, with the Green Mountains rising beyond, is within easy riding distance. On the west, with a railway from Saratoga into its very heart, lies the Adirondack wilderness, and Luzerne is but an hour's run by train. Nearer than any of these, and almost equally unknown to the habitué of the hotel piazzas, is Saratoga Lake, which most visitors only know from the glimpses they have obtained of it from the bank in front of Moore's. It may be easily reached by carriage or rail, and a certain knowledge of its beauties may be acquired from the deck of one of the little steam cars that ply at frequent intervals between its several landings. But none of them can skirt closely its wooded shores, explore the innumerable little indentations of its coast, nor access the Kayderosseras, and follow its four miles of tortuous windings into Little Saratoga Lake, or Lake Lonelyt, as it is sometimes called. It is only by engaging a small boat and furnishing his own motive power that he who desires this more intimate acquaintance with those pleasant waterways can reach them.

Skirting the shore south from Moore's he will pass a number of picturesque cottages in and about which life is made a summer idyl. Of these the most notable is also the smallest and least pretentious. It is a little weather beaten, unpainted structure, situated a few rods back from the lake, nestled amid towering elms, and containing but three rooms. It is surrounded by a rustic platform, or open piazza, and is nearly covered by masses of luxuriant vines. Of its three rooms the largest, opening directly from the piazza, is the main saloon and dining-room, in the back of which, opposite the entrance, stands an old-fashioned dresser displaying a brave array of china in many quaint designs. One of the rooms opening from this saloon is about the size of a ship's state room, and, like it, is fitted with two berths, one above the other, and the other is the galley or kitchen. The interior arrangements of this tiny establishment closely resemble those of a yacht, its surrounding platform is called the deck, and its register for the names of visitors is the log. The owner and captain, a well known Saratoga lawyer, boards his craft every Saturday evening, and cruises beneath his clam trees until Monday morning. Each Sunday he entertains at a dinner prepared by his own hands a small number of guests, who are greatly honored by his invitations, which are much sought after by those who have heard of these novel dinner parties.

A mile further down the coast the Kayderosseras joins the lake. Above its crooked waters arching trees form an almost continuous shade, and its borders are fringed with beds of spotless water lilies, behind which rise clusters of glowing cardinal-flowers and clumps of brown spent-like cat-tails. From its sedges long legged blue herons, fluffy night herons, and occasionally a great snowy heron, startled by the advancing boat, wing their heavy flight. The wild-duck breeds here, and in hidden bays, among the dark green lily pads, the imparts to her downy ducklings the rudiments of their education.

The old red bridge by which an unfrequented country road crosses the quiet stream has long been a familiar and picturesque feature of the landscape, and in a preceding number of the WEEKLY our artist made it the subject of one of his illustrations.

Lake Lonelyt, which is four miles by way of the Kayderosseras from Saratoga Lake, though only about half a mile by land, is almost unknown to summer visitors to the Springs, though it is so near to them, so hidden from view is it by its environments of forest. It is, however, but a short walk from it to the main road leading from the village to the larger lake, and even this transportation back to the hotels may be easily obtained in one of the many public conveyances constantly passing to and from Moore's.

From these quiet waters and woodland haunts of shy aquatic birds the quick transition to the hotels, with their gay crowded life, is indeed startling, and the contrast offered is as vivid as can well be imagined. There nature's solitude almost unbroken; here the crash of orchestral music, the rush of wheels, the throngs of promenaders, and the glare of electricity.

With the opening of the races, several weeks ago, the season at Saratoga was fully inaugurated, and now its world famed hotels and innumerable boarding-houses are the centres of that vast migratory population that annually transforms the quiet winter village into a bustling summer city, well meriting the often applied title of "queen of American watering-places."

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

AUTHOR OF "KITTY," "EXCHANGE NO REMEDY," "BOTHERED IN EASTERN FARMS," "DR. JACOB," "THE HALF-BROTHER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

THE expected arrivals, however, did not take place that day, nor yet the next. When the morning of Stephana's fête dawned neither Christina nor Valerian had appeared. No wonder that a smile of dismay rose to Stephana's lips as she renewed all she must do in one short day: receive a long-absent lover, bring about a difficult reconciliation between the mother and son, entertain a thousand and odd guests, preside at a long and ceremonious banquet, deliver a farewell discourse, and how many more duties far to hand! But the was too happy to do more than smile at such a prospect. She had, indeed, never in her whole life felt so buoyed up with hope and joy. Looking back on the occurrences of the last few months, it seemed to her as if Heaven had been almost too kind, and some cloud must soon obscure this dazzling sky, or else the poets had not fabled who sang so movingly of man's allotted bliss on earth. What had she willed or even desired but was about to come to pass? One of the many darling schemes of years was already in part realized; for, happen what might, now at least she had rescued a thousand souls from a life, if not of despair, without looking forward. The fast would soon be about to smile upon a thousand more of her brothers and sisters, and one other spot in it transformed into a sphere of free manly struggle and endeavor. This achieved, how many other tasks she had to do!

Not did it please Stephana less to contemplate the deed as part of Christina's doing, and the effect to-day's events might have upon her cousin's mind. Christina was to be brought face to face for the first time with the philanthropy that wears the shape of a conviction and a brotherhood. She had given alms all her life time; to-day she was to learn the meaning of poverty, and also of brotherly love. Would her mind be impressed? Stephana hardly knew.

There was, of course, summer person uppermost in Stephana's mind that morning as she so beautifully arrayed herself for the noon-tide celebration. Valerian—how was it with him? How she could but indulge in the brightest hopes also, for Valerian's service had of late not been of the lips only. He had shown her by the devotion of the past few months that he was willing to share her aspirations as well as her fortunes, and that to the best of his ability, if not as yet from the heart, he would further every one of her schemes for the amelioration of their fellows.

But devotion of another kind—how was Stephana's mind affected at the notion that Valerian was come home a lapse lover, to claim the guerdon of his mistress's hand? She could here accord Valerian praise only. His letters, whilst breathing the most loyal devotion, were all that she could desire—reserved, dignified, respectful. The fact is, he had obeyed her injunctions to the letter, writing rather as a kinsman and a friend than a suitor.

Judging Valerian by his deeds and his written words only, therefore, Stephana felt some confident in him than she had ever been, and so kindher toward him too. Yes, he would make an admirable steward of her fortunes, and a tower of strength, by virtue of his worldly wisdom and sincerity, to a dreamer like herself. She should not regret the promise she had made him, although it must sever her from another friend dearer still. Every heart, indeed, was to be made happy that Markham's. This last thought was soon put away, for, after all, reasoned Stephana, my friendship shall be almost as much for him as love could do, had I love to give. With such thoughts as these, Stephana dressed herself almost like a bride, but for spiritual, not earthly bridals. The pure white robe, those white flowers on her bosom and in her hair, were worn for no love that claimed her as its own, no union of heart and heart, rather for the infinite love she bore all the world, and the marriage of hope and joy in a thousand hearts about to be celebrated that day. Most beautiful she looked a then at last she came out of her chamber, a spirit, and yet a woman too. Today, in spite of that joyousness beaming in her eyes and playing about her lips, the spirit predominated over the woman. Hardly Stephana's self seemed there, as there some starry apparition that wore her likeness, destined to vanish with the rare occasion calling it into being.

If Stephana's brain was busy whilst she thus lingered in her dining-chamber, what shall we say of the thousand and odd invited guests occupied at the same time in a similar manner? Christina, Valerian, Arthura, had their own thoughts, not to speak of the rest of Stephana's expected visitors. The day was to be an epoch in the lives of every one.

"Oh, Arthura," cried Steppie, as she went upstairs to dress first the children and then herself, "I feel so happy—I mean so miserable! I should be overjoyed to play the part of Hope in Stephana's allegory. But my heart is heavy as lead."

"You had better leave it at home, then, little mamma," Arthura said, her own heart now beating with wild hopes, now sinking within her. "We must be happy to-day, whether we will or no. It is our duty."

"I am sure I always try to do my duty," sighed poor Steppie. "And I certainly have felt less depressed since beginning to learn the part of Hope in the masque. I have even felt sometimes as if my low spirits were going altogether, and I was turning into a kind of Hope. Only to-day the old feeling came back. I could sit down and cry. What if I should break down?"

"People never do break down," Arthura said, authoritatively. "You could not break down if you tried. The words will come of their own accord, as they do to actors on the stage."

"Well, actors do not break down, certainly," Steppie said, drying her eyes, for a tear or two had come. "And I suppose some are as nervous as myself."

"Everybody is nervous, of course," again urged Arthura—"the Queen when she reads her speech, the speakers in the House of Commons, the judge—but they say what they have to say, so really nervousness is of no consequence."

"Then you do not think that my tongue will cleave to the roof of my mouth?" asked poor Steppie.

"I have provided against such an emergency," Arthura answered, gayly, and forthwith produced a little silver pouncet box full of pastilles. "We will all take one just before our speeches begin. Then our tongues can not cleave, you know."

Steppie looked somewhat consoled.

"But there is another dreadful thing that might happen," she said. "What if my wings fall off just at a critical moment, or my wreath gets awry? People would laugh and I should feel ready to sink into the earth!"

"We will make wings and wreaths secure enough, never fear," was Arthura's reply, "although when anything of the kind does occur, it is invariably looked upon as part of the performance. Nobody at a play ever laughs out of season."

"That is certainly balm in Gilead," Steppie made answer.

And then the wonderful business of dressing began—a business the children would never forget as long as they lived. To discard the gear of actual real life, and put on the semblance of cherubs! To wear golden coronals, and garments soft as aussie silvery white, to have some-tipped wings, and badges embroidered with stars—above all, to carry little lutes, on which they had been taught to thrum a joyous note or two—how superlative, how unforgetable, was all this! Arthura went into the minutest particulars of each dress, giving Baby's hair a more cherubic curl, Walter's sky-blue mantle freer folds, Benjamine's coronal of roses a more careless look. As to Steppie, when all was finished she declared that she did not know herself.

Arthura's own appearance scattered little, she said, since she was going to help Stephana generally, without taking any part in the pageant. In spite of remonstrance she put on no white gown, but something that suited her far better, that, indeed, transformed the mere handsome girl into a majestic woman. It was a black gown, yet a summer gown, being light as gossamer, whilst by way of adornment she wore magnificent roses of deepest, richest red. Of the same color was the fan in her hand and the silk cloak that as ever her shoulders.

"Dear Arthura," said Steppie, embracing her, when for a moment they found themselves alone, "you will to-day see Mr. Hermitage. Are you not very happy?"

"I should be, I suppose," Arthura replied. "But remember we are only friends in the eyes of the world."

"All will surely come right now?" asked Steppie, anxiously. "Mr. Hermitage is free. He will marry you soon?"

Arthura, by way of reply, merely kissed her stepmother, and gathering fan, gloves, and bouquet prepared to go.

"We must think of other things to-day," she said. "And now I had better make haste and see how Mr Constantine looks at Times. The carriage will be next back for you and the children, and I shall be at the entrance on the lookout."

"If you could only convey on!" My heart fails me at the last."

"Dear little mamma, could that foolish little heart. I promised to Mr Constantine to be at hand in case a finishing touch is necessary."

"Could we not wait for you in the carriage at the door?"

"That would never do. The household is invited, and none are to see the masqueraders till their appearance in public."

Then, waving her hand gayly to the little group on the stair-head, she entered Stephana's carriage and drove off to Mr Constantine's. She sorely needed the half hour's solitude, for fret brain was in a whirl. Valerian had come back again. Unless words stand for nothing, he loved her fondly as ever. Why, then, these misgivings, these vague forebodings? There had been an cessation of his letters, each and all breathing the same letter-like devotion. Again and again he had begged her to trust him and leave patience with him. Obstacles stood in the way of his dearest wishes, he wrote. He was bound to consider Christina and Stephana; he was far yet from being in an independent position. A few weeks after his return, and the future would be made clear.

What troubled Arthura was the thought that whilst she loved Valerian still, she could no longer put absolute trust in him. She could but feel that he was concealing something from her now, and that it was rather Valerian's would-be than real self depicted in his letters. But love and hope are strong at twenty-four, and the dream of seeing Valerian again was at least mixed with pleasure as well as pain. It was a radical fate and a gay voice that greeted Mr Constantine, elaborately dressed as Time. The old man was in his sparkliest mood.

"The drooping beard and staff, wings and other archal garments, are doubtless more becoming," he said, "but the skeleton and inverted torch were more in my way. So you are to be congratulated, a discreet, a feminine choice! Miss out in judgment upon me. Am I certainly Time indeed, the hoary sage, the awful monitor? Do I look too old ever to have had a beginning, and not human enough even to come to an end? No trace of flesh and blood, no sign of mortality?"

"You are admirable indeed, sir."

"Ah, my speech shall be more admirable still, for I would learn my part. I wanted to be with you for the last time on her own account. Tell me a brief utterance, but a pithy. I am rent you. Well, are we ready? I am so impatient as a child before the curtain is drawn up at a play."

CHAPTER XII.

IT was a world of roses, a world of sunshine, that awaited Stephana's guests that midsummer day, and much more. No sooner had they set foot within her precincts than a bewildering sense of novelty and splendor took possession of them. They were surely bidden to some regal pageant! This show could not be all for humble folks like themselves!

The avenue leading up to the somber old mansion glowed with crimson and gold banners, but it was the house itself that had been most transformed. Stephana had hired the isle of Italy. She knew how to dress up a place in gala fashion, and instead of glittering effects and glaring contrasts had attained a subdued richness of color and wealth of ornamentation really poetic. Gorgeous Oriental carpets, and embroideries garlanded with fresh flowers hung from every window, whilst the building itself seemed to rise from the midst of a vast flower bed, so profusely were stands of roses, lilies, and gladiolus placed round about.

If the house was all nobility and magnificence, the pavilion on the lawn was all lightness and airiness, a fairy palace raised for an hour, to-morrow to vanish without leaving a trace behind. This was also Stephana's handiwork and she had chosen the pale gauzy green hangings and silvery white decorations with a purpose. Nothing else could be in such keeping with the fresh foliage of summer. Her omnibounded banqueting-hall looked, indeed to belong in the world of blossoms and dew drops and greener arbors: it; some flowery tenement sprung up in the night for merry making of fays and elves, and no more real than they. Most surprising and enchanting was the dome of pale sea-green, sheer as with sunshine, as it met the eyes of Neptune's guests—one joyous surprise out of the thousand in store for them.

Among the first to arrive was Christina, who knew that Stephana would expect one counselor from her. She must see Valerian before the business of the day began, and get through that so dreaded meeting which was to mean reconcilement. To her great relief she found Arthura already come, and putting her hand within the girl's arm, determined not to let her go till the meeting with Valerian should be over. Not even Stephana should compel her to see him alone.

"My dear Arthura," she exclaimed, looking at her from head to foot admiringly, "I am very glad to see you. Now do tell me why did you get out of spirits when you were with us by the sea? I would have taken you to Italy, I would make whether here kept you. But moody people drive me mad."

"I am very sorry I was moody; but I cannot see my own people offended. That was one reason," Arthura said, with perfect candor.

"Well, you may live with me again some day—who knows?" Miss Christina replied, growing more and more nervous. She saw Valerian approaching. "Don't leave me, my dear," she added. "There is Valerian, he will like to see you again."

Arthura, knowing as much as she did of her companion's history, understood the reason of that uneasy voice and sudden grip of her arm, but she also wanted a defense against Valerian just then. Miss Hermitage little knew how fain she was to break from her hold and hide herself. Valerian coming toward them, and every step that brought him nearer lessened her self-confidence and collectedness. To see Steppie's expression, it seemed indeed as if her tongue would cleave to the roof of her mouth. But no escape was possible. She must see him, yet how little could any bystander have divined what was going on in the minds of that superb girl and the spare, pale, bright-eyed old woman leaning on her arm! Arthura's rich carnation came and went, her blushes may mean coquetry and pleasure only. Outwardly calm and unmoved she awaited her lover, just as Christina, whilst inwardly beating with feverish dread, showed no perceptible emotion at her son's approach. Alike to the outside and the mother this young man coming up to them with such airy poet meant destiny, life or blessing as long as life should last. To onlookers, it was a mere meeting of old friends. Bare-headed, and bowing with a charming grace, Valerian now stood before them. Christina, of course, had his first greeting. She moved a step forward, and for an instant disengaging her hand from Arthura's arm, held it forward, trying to smile, though ghastly pale. Words failed her utterly.

But Valerian's careless ease helped her. Without the slightest agitation, judging his feet in one hand, with the other he took her own, then very gracefully and gently he stooped and kissed her on either cheek. A perfect actor is a play could not have done it better. "I am very glad to see you back again, and well too—well as ever," was all he said.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1372.

Then came Artimes's turn. Here once more Valerian's presence of mind was proof against all assail. The lover-like look of intense admiration was followed by a commonplace smile, an ordinary greeting, and a hand clasp. Was she well? he asked; would Mr Constantine soon appear? and so on. Meantime he had given Christina his arm, and for that little action indicated clearly enough the line of conduct he had laid down for them both.

There was to be no painful explanation, no bitterness, no useless harrowing up of feelings. But their old relations were to be renewed. It was his part to take care of her and make things pleasant to her as of old, here to be suave and confidential. The pair, whilst thus exchanging kind little nothings, could not in the least tell what was going on in the other's mind. For some can measure his fellow, and here mother and son, though their characters were much alike, failed to guess even at the result brought about by this long and painful separation.

With Christina discontent for a rung doing could only take one shape. There was a penalty to be paid, material, actual, of the earth earthy. Valerian had been wronged by her; he should now receive compensation. This was what she had to say to him, no more. The colossal fortune he had so skillfully helped her to enjoy should be his. The mother's duty should be acquitted by her so far. More she could not do, but this was surely all Valerian wanted of her; he was not sentimental nor more than herself, and so long as they were pleasant and friendly toward each other, life might be smooth enough to look.

It seemed an easy thing to say, and here was the very opportunity Artimes had so well to embrace. Calette; no one was within hearing. Yet three little words, "Of course I will provide for you," how hard they were to get out!—impossible, she said to herself at last. Whilst this momentary conflict was going on in her own mind, Valerian was occupied in a similar way. He also wanted to get out a few words, the only expression of remorse that occurred to him, but otherwise did not come. To Valerian no to Christina one kind of compensation for a rung doing presented itself only. The bitter pain he had given her and the remorseless way in which he had carried out his purpose did not trouble him, it was the consequences that he felt in duty bound to atone for, the careless life of dissipation so suddenly put a stop to, the pleasant relations with himself disturbed, the wealth disenfranchised he had brought upon her. "You look ill," he began at last, and suddenly glanced at her bonnet of latest Paris fashion and dress of straw-colored satin fit for a queen. "Better than ever. This Italian journey has quite set you up, I hope." Miss Hermitage gave an answer little tough. "I am well enough," she said. Then—it seemed to her a last chance—she got out the words that would have had a cruel sound in the ears of any but Valerian.

"I don't think I shall die yet; but when I do, what is mine will be yours, of course. I wanted to tell you so."

Valerian did not look moved, although in reality he was more serious than herself.

"I want you to live and be happy. Never mind me," he stammered forth. "I am very sorry I disturbed your peace."

"Let us go to Stephana," Christina exclaimed, adding, in an under-tone, pleonastic: "You are sorry. We will never talk of these things; we will forget that they have happened. But here comes Stephana, and looking quite a picture," she cried, with a sense of relief. It was once more Valerian's turn to collect himself, and use extreme presence of mind. There was Stephana, his affianced bride; there was Artimes, his love, his secretly betrothed, and not a word must be breathed by way of explanation or excuse to either as yet. The threads must be unravelled to-morrow. The palmode belonged to another day. Stephana was his benefactress, and he had betrayed her only that he might the better serve her interests. As there was no love, and would forgive the temporary lapse when she learned all.

So, when Stephana had embraced Christina affectionately, he moved forward, paling as it must seem to outsiders hardly more human than was due from such a giant to a mere mortal. The beautiful hand held not so much as it was pressed to his lips, that was all. "Whose the most welcome home?" cried Stephana smiling sweetly. "What welcome can be good enough"—she turned gayly toward Christina—"since two have brought Italian sunshine, and you"—here she looked affectionately at Valerian—"you have brought tidings of a promised land?"

"If such a reception did not satisfy us, we must both be hard to please indeed," answered Valerian, already feeling as if the most difficult part of the interview were got through and beginning to breathe more freely. What if Stephana in her excess of gratitude had bent down her fair brow to be kissed? And Artimes trembling by! Oh that this day with its pitfalls and toils ready to ensnare him on every side were well over! this one day only, the rest he was ready to encounter.

Stephana, all composure and calm forgiveness, divined nothing of a hint at going on in his mind. With an unconscious look of unwillingness she now let one fair white hand rest for a moment on his arm. To Valerian that acquiescence seemed like a fiery grip, he felt himself growing sick with fear and apprehension. But Stephana merely said, with a charming smile, "Ask Artimes to show you our beautiful preparations whilst I set the carriage in motion."

She now gave her arm to Christina, Celeste had vanished. Valerian found himself with Artimes alone. He had—or seem her look on so harshly, as disagreeingly handsome, and although [illegible] before out of countenance and out of heart, he regained self-possession now. Artimes at least knew nothing of his imbroglio, and the mere fact of being able to whisper what he would in her ear seemed to make all things smooth. "May I come and see you to-morrow at your own home?"

"Will not Stephana want you?"

He turned round sharply and looked her full in the face, but nothing was there, he thought, to distrust him. The question was put out of girlish curiosity, perhaps not without a touch of natural jealousy, nothing more.

"And a last if half a dozen to-morrows?"

The sweet sense of recurring intimacy, and the conviction that nothing would be easier than to throw himself on Stephana's magnanimity, filled Valerian with growing self-confidence and ease. He was about to utter some lover-like rhapsody, when the blare of trumpets was heard at the gateway.

"That is the signal. Mr Markham and his thousand lions arrived," exclaimed Artimes. "We must not linger a moment."

[to be continued.]

"SHERWOOD BONNER."

The news of the death of "Sherwood Bonner" (Mrs. Katharine S. McDowell) will bring to hundreds of her friends and admirers in this country and in England a sense of personal bereavement. The accomplished author of Like unto Like and the Dashed Tales died at her home in Holly Springs, Mississippi, on Sunday night, the 22d of July. She was only thirty years old.

To American literature the loss can be best estimated by those who were acquainted with "Sherwood Bonner" herself. To them the promise of her life had only begun to be fulfilled. Those believe that she was capable of making her genius made in the presence of crowning genera those, as the fate of the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire [illegible] Thackeray's words] "smiles at us through tears." Judging her not alone by the little she has done, but by the possibilities that shone in her radiant personality, there expected for "Sherwood Bonner" a royal and dominguished place as the rarest of American letters. Other writers, she would say, have sketched for us the picturesque life of the South, but she has done it in a style unlike those of anybody's else, seeing things in a light all her own, and recording a hint she saw with a distinct consciousness of having something new to tell. Where the modern art is a simpler, fresher, franker, truer sketch of social manners than "The Gentlemen of Jarrat" with which her book of Dashed Tales opens" or than the amusing adventures of "Hemmenway Pap and the Baby," from the opening lines, "Now, Thomas Pap, said the mother of that gentle boy, 'you go take keer o' sis while I'm gone to de kangker,'" to the "conclusion, where Hermenway's father "reached down from the mantel shelf a long thin something, shaped like a snake, and quivered it in the air. Then he walked out to Hi, and taking him by the left ear, led him to a wood pile. And here—but I draw a veil." The humor of the story would have inspired the pencil of John Leech, nor have its best points missed the interpretative skill of Mr A B Frost. And when, in the "contlement of Sovas," the hero exclaims, "If company is needed, I am the son of my State—the state that does n't know how to surrender; so for tact, civilite, address, urbanity, and downright stubbornness, three desirable qualities are surely come by right of inheritance," no one who knows "Sherwood Bonner" would deny her claim to the possession of those very traits, or fail to see in that possession a part of the rich promise of her life.

For this clever woman had, to no extraordinary degree, the faculty of enlisting in her behalf the services of those who could help her, not only in concerns of business, but also in the fashioning of her literary work. She never made the acquaintance of a man of power, intellectual or social, without succeeding in making him feel that to oblige her would give him pleasure. To the charms of a ripe [illegible] of person she added the attractiveness of a keen appetite, bright conversational gifts and a truly feminine [illegible] as if to make "Sherwood Bonner's" conquests for conquest. Nature had given her a [illegible] and elementary to command. In the mind of herself as an interpretation, her friends noticed not perfectly the attitude and language of [illegible] a no a memorable occasion expressed. "Let [illegible] die for Maria Theresa, our King.' She [illegible] easily, and those whom she led were not inferiors, but equals.

And, most remarkable of all, the woman exhibited the admiration of women themselves. "She was like no other woman," writes an esteemed woman correspondent of this journal. "There was a tremendous vigor of mind and body about her, which, but for a beauty peculiarly fascinating to the shallow sex, would have made her appear masculine; but the golden hair, the fever-like complexion, the soft loveliness of her exquisite white hands, made one forget that she could in an sparkling to her wit as Mark Twain, and could in her appreciations as Robert Ingersoll. She did not deal in the petty things of life. She was no large in stature, large in mind, large in heart. Her physical health and vigor were simply superb, she laughed at fatigues and privations under a high mess people would have sunk exhausted. She had a wonderful power first of attracting friends, and then of attaching them to her. Longfellow, in the decline of his years, seemed to see in her the crowning of his youth, and he did not hesitate to declare that she would be the American artist of the future." We may add that in a letter introducing Mrs. McDowell to the Messrs. Harper and Brothers Mr Longfellow said of her first work, Like unto Like, that "it has marked and decided merit, is beautifully written, and full of interest to North and South."

To the same esteemed correspondent whose generous words of eulogy are quoted above, we are indebted for some pathetic details of "Sherwood Bonner's" illness and death. "When very young she married, and [illegible] years afterward [about twelve years ago], owing to some pecuniary misfortunes, she came to Boston alone to prepare herself for a literary career. She did this through one of those strange, inexplicable impulses by which strong natures will, in defiance of all rule and opposition, seek a vent for their capacities. Her friends at first opposed her in every way; but her success proved her wisdom. At Nahant Capen received her as one of his own family, and new friends among the noblest and the most gifted in the land sprang up for her on every side. It was only a little more than a year ago that her friends knew the grip of death was upon her, in one of those subtler forms against which human skill and human devotion are as nothing. Once more she came to Boston, and for eight months suffered the agonies of a daily death, her friends gathering round her and nursing her through the worst weeks and months of anguish. During the whole her will and gay spirits, her hopeful courage, never once failed. She believed she would recover, and she made those about her believe the same. But this could not serve her and in March she went home to die. Speaking of her last hours, an eye-witness writes: 'She died as she had hoped she might," with dignity and composure," almost but last words being, "It is not death I dread"' It was not the first time she had faced it. In 1878, when the yellow fever was raging in the Mississippi Valley, she deliberately left Boston and went to Holly Springs, where its ravages were most deadly, and nursed her father and brother, each of whom after a week's illness, died in her arms. She escaped the epidemic, but many believed that she then contracted the disease which afterward cost her her life. During her hours of suffering, her bravery, her patience, and her humor were extraordinary. One who watched by her dying bed said: 'I have seen her smile when it would have been a relief to see her cry. She uttered no complaint, and no one heard her repine.' One day she gayly asked her friends what would be a suitable inscription for her tombstone; and from several that had been suggested, she selected this, 'She was much loved.' Surely no words could furnish a more fitting epitaph for the young life that had done so much, enjoyed so much, suffered so much, in little more than thirty years."

Of "Sherwood Bonner's" literary genius it is easy to speak. Certainly its sympathies were not personalistic, and she could never have written, as did Turgenieff, "It is not our fault if the life of to-day contains so much prosaism and unreality." She was no censor of her times, like the author of Middlemarch, but had she any deep conception of the misery of the world, like the author of Consuelo. Nor did she hold Lord Houghton's theory that the literary instinct is akin to the military instinct, soldiers being among our best writers, or share Heine's ambition to be a brave soldier in the war of the liberation of humanity. A mere dreamer and a bookworm she could never have been, and she cared as little for fantastic writing, with its machinery of miracle, as for romantic writing, with its machinery of incident. A true child of her epoch, she was a simple naturalist in art, with a strong hand and a delicate touch. Life as she had seen it and lived it in the Southern States of the Union was the object of her attentions, and she sketched it in the spirit and the method of a master. Her work, slight though it is, is all live because it is true; and if any of our readers here not yet read Like unto Like, and the Dashed Tales, there is a pleasure in store for them.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

There is a natural bridge in Arizona which, it is said, far surpasses the natural bridge in Virginia. Little is known concerning it, however, for no Leander like Hemath has made it the scene of a thrilling story.

A life telegrapher has been making computations as to the labor required of him when he is at work. He says that the Morse alphabet averages six motions to the letter, and allowing that there is an average five letters to a word, this average word requires thirty motions. If the operator sends thirty words a minute he makes nine hundred motions, which is at the rate of fifty four thousand motions an hour. A day's work of seven hours' steady sending would necessitate some three hundred and seventy-eight thousand motions. Thus in less than three days he would make a million motions. "The expenditure of nervous energy, therefore," he says, "is something terrible—a fact which accounts for the 'short-livedness' of the telegrapher."

The plan in the theatre at Casamicciola, in the island of Ischia, on the night of the terrible earthquake, was to have been a burlesque which upon ordinary a scene representing an earthquake. The curtain had just risen when the comic calamity gave place to the real.

A New York merchant, who lost patience while waiting for an answer to a message which he entrusted to the wires, remarked that the company had had ample time to get him an answer by mail, and he could account for so long a delay only by assuming that the company was waiting to take advantage of the reduction in postage which goes into effect in October.

"GENERAL TOM THUMB."

One more great man is taken from us midst—
Great in his smallness. Fare thee well, Tom Thumb!
Though History was record no deed than didst
Worthy remembrance in the days to come,
Thou wert a mortal of no common mould,
And used heroic nature of high degree
Fame shall preserve one little niche to hold
A statue—nay, a statuette—of thee.
A small Napoleon, though no conqueror,
A "lectural," though not "made of eternal stuff,"
The glory was not won through tears and gore,
Thy sire—or want of it—was quite enough.
The welcome guest in every royal court,
The cynosure of each admiring throng,
Plaything of princes—well, man's plaything short;
And now e'en say that thou hast lived too long.
Honor and wealth and well deserved repose
In the last years; the only drop of gall
Was when some younger rival dwarfs arose
Greater than thee in being still more small.
Farewell, Tom Thumb, and ne'er thy tiny tomb
May tears as big and numerous be shed,
And votive flowers as plentifully blooms,
As it a giant, not a dwarf, were dead?
—London Life.

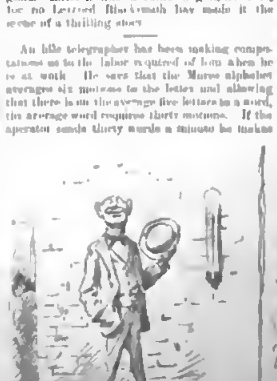
A telegrapher who is locked up in the Kansas penitentiary has satisfied that he is anxiously waiting for the signal to "go out."

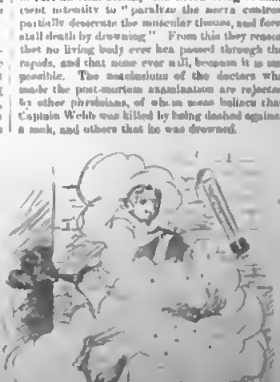
To Democratic Congressmen who insist upon reopening the tariff discussion next winter the Democratic Washington Post suggests that before going too far they "find out how many Democratic statesmen in each end of the Capitol will rise up, each with an 'infant industry' in his arms, and demand special protection for his special charge." This pen picture of a national legislature bounding asylum is worthy of serious contemplation.

An item from Dakota says that it costs eleven thousand dollars for a man to get a fair outfit for farming in Iowa, but all a woman needs to run a homestead in Dakota is an oil stove, three hens, and a rooster. This may be taken as an illustration of the advantages which the Territory has over the State, or as a tribute to the superiority of woman in controlling circumstances.

An examination by physicians of the body of Captain Webb failed to discover the characteristic evidences of death by drowning, and revealed no local injury sufficient to have caused death. The physicians came to the conclusion, therefore, that his death resulted from the shock produced by the water of the rapids coming in contact with the submerged body with such force as to instantly destroy the respiratory power, and to [illegible] all vital action," the shock being of sufficient intensity to "paralyze the nerve centres, partially decarnate the muscular tissues, and force still death by drowning." From this they reason that no living body ever has passed through the rapids, and that none ever will, because it is impossible. The conclusions of the doctors who made the post-mortem examination are rejected by other physicians, of who on some balance that Captain Webb was killed by being dashed against a rock, and others that he was drowned.



"Is this hot enough for you?"



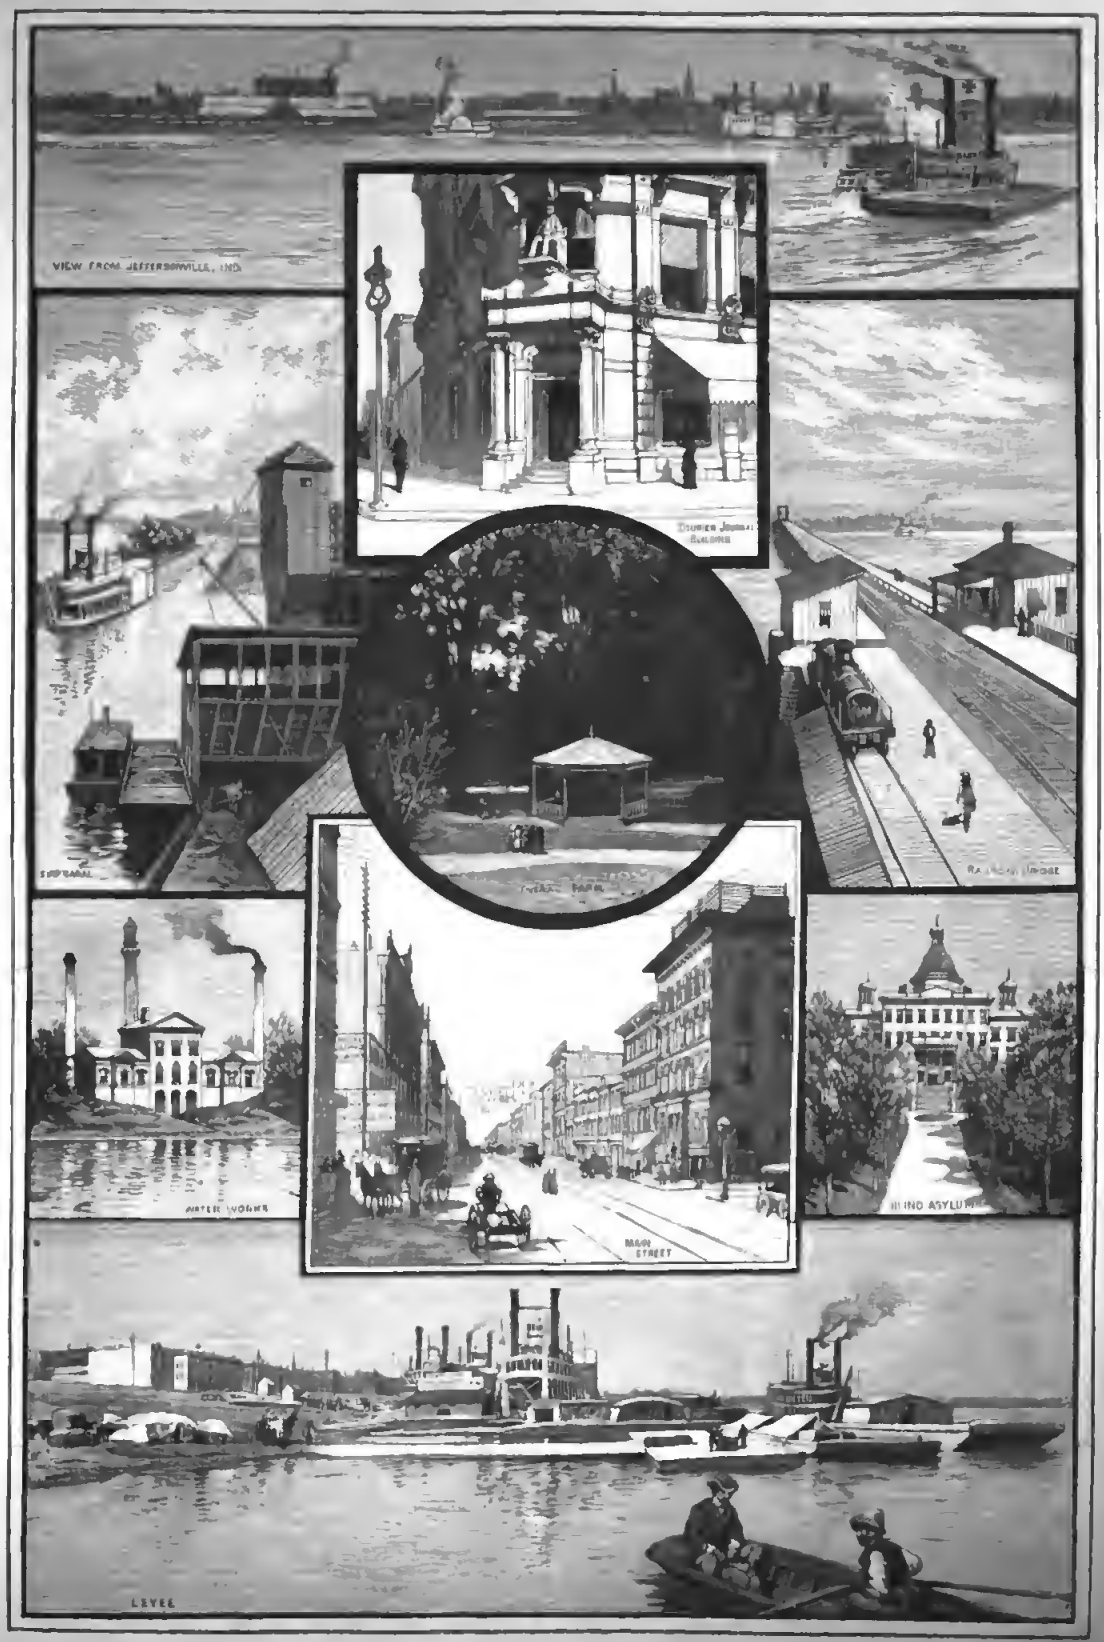
"Well not q[illegible]

THE BOSS FOOL AND HIS FATE.

[A little story that is for, for too good to be

THELLA.

Continued on page 505.



THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION—VIEWS IN AND AROUND THE CITY.—DRAWN BY H. P. FARNY.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THEKLA.

(Continued from page 504.)

"Has that confounded nuisance taken himself off at last?" he asked, irritably.

She smiled. She was in that stage of fatuity when she could smile at any insolence coming from the lips she loved, not disturbed that the insolence was insult to the brother who had cared for her from childhood. "He has gone off to the river, after a stroll in a boat. I couldn't stop him."

"Thank Heaven!" interpolated Carono.

His wife smiled again, radiantly this time, and, with a grace of toleration, said, "Well, Dick's a dear fellow; he is headstrong, and he makes dreadful mistakes sometimes, but—"

"Oh, don't apologize for him," said Carono, lazily, extracting a little more luxury from his lie a-z arrangement of his neck and shoulders. "He and I understand each other."

She forbore, and took to caressing her husband, until he grew restless, and raised himself on his hands and looked toward the river. "He seems to be an adept with the child. He has got into the boat and taken the paddles."

Under the influence of her brother's safe remonstrance Madame Carono had another visitation of grace. "Such a boy! Nobody can resist him. He has the sweetness of an angel."

"The effrontery of the devil," amended Carono, and his wife laughed outright.

The girl was now sitting in the boat. She had opened a large white umbrella, and as Shirlaw paddled gently, she gathered lilies.

"They land," said Carono, after a few minutes. "He fastens the boat, he helps her ashore. This is idyllic. He lifts his hat, they part. No; she makes a forward gesture. Do you see that she is costumed after Gretchen? This becomes exciting." He sat bolt-upright, and his wife shared his curiosity.

Shirlaw had taken the umbrella, and the two walked across the meadow, and halted beneath a conspicuous group of elms. Here, to the mystifications of Carono and his wife, the girl knelt down, and having poured her wealth of lilies on some object they could not see, crossed her hands on her breast and lifted her face to the sky. Shirlaw stood beside her, bare-headed.

"A daughter of the Sun God," said Madame Carono, "pausing to be taken up to her father's burning breast."

"Beautiful idea!" said Carono, mockingly. "If she would carry Dick Shirlaw with her, and plunge him in eternal fire, I should be happy. Confound it! they're coming here. Why can't they let us alone?"

They were coming, and when their easiness forced acknowledgment, Carono stood up. Madame Carono had already risen, her face mild with curious admiration. Even Carono's coarse handsomeness softened with an expression of homage to the girl approaching. She came straight up the bank, looking only at Madame Carono. Shirlaw fell back, his eyes dancing with amusement.

The girl stretched out her hand. "Madame," she said, "I am Thekla von Arnim; my home is on the hill beyond the river. This forest is mine, and the meadows and the marshes all are mine. Will you do me the honor to come with me now and rest through the heat of the day?"

Her fine face was gravity itself, and the composure of her manner quenched even Carono's perception of a deliberate absurdity in her introduction of herself, and gave her invitation the force of a command. She showed no consciousness of information and her brown eyes, lifted to Madame Carono, seemed to the three worldlings too pure and frank to look from mortal maiden's face.

"We thank you," Madame Carono answered, in a stately way summoned to meet the emergency, and almost nothing, "your Majesty." "We are only holiday strollers. Already we have trespassed on your estate, and we hardly dare intrude upon your hospitality."

"The pleasure will be all mine, madame. If you will come I will lead the way."

"My wife and I accept with great happiness your gracious invitation, Fraulein Von Arnim," Carono spoke, and his voice, the voice of a widely known operatic tenor, was pitched in sweetest key.

Thekla had not looked at him at all, and when she lifted her face, a look of surprise, a spasm of fear and pain, passed over it. She turned abruptly toward Shirlaw, saying, "Follow me."

Madame Carono put her hand on her husband's arm. "I am almost afraid. There will be a drawbridge, and seven-headed giants, and fiery-eyed dragons."

"Nonsense," said Carono, nettled by that unfortunate expression of Fraulein Von Arnim's. "There will be broiled chicken and Rhine wine. Probably Fraulein Thekla is a harmless lunatic, she is certainly a spoiled child. Come along."

Thekla and Shirlaw walked on silently. He was very young, and, besides, a natural and professional painter of a romantic school. He was quite satisfied to walk blindly, speechlessly into fairy land to the side of his water-sprite. Thekla broke the spell strangely

"Your sister is more beautiful than I."

Shirlaw experienced a severe shock, but he presently rose to the occasion, and dissented gallantly. His gallantry made an impression on Thekla. She went on, speculatively:

"She is much more beautiful. I saw the secret of her beauty, too. It was all in the look she gave to her husband. I wonder at that, and I am envy. He has the eyes of men who have witnessed their friends, and brought misery everywhere."

Shirlaw's amazement at this lurid statement of opinion was only less than his bitter sense of its justice. Still he felt himself bound to combat an instinctive repulsion against his brother-in-law.

"That isn't fair to Carono. He can't help his eyes. And what do you know of such men?"

She bent her head, and tears fell on her hands, clasped tightly before her. "I know them," she said at last, "through my father's pictures and books and from his teaching. I have seen such eyes, too, in the logs of the water-lilies. There are angel spirites and devil spirites. They come up in the moonlight, and play and dance among the lilies. When I am miserable and sad the imps come up in crowds, and glitter and scream and punch the angels and drive them away. When I am happy the angels float up and flap their shining wings, and drive the demons deep beneath the chime. You laugh."

Shirlaw had laughed unconsciously, but her reproachful glance silenced him

"So Carono is a devil sprite," he said, and thought the child spoke more wisely than she knew. "And what am I that you show me such favor?"

She answered slowly: "When I saw you, when you asked to come into my boat, I was not afraid. You know I stared at you silently."

"You did—you did. I thought you meant to turn me into stone for my impudence."

"No, I was saying: 'He has the look my father would have had me treat. He belongs to the angel sprites, to the world of good men and women.' And you do, and your sister too. Am I not right?"

"No," he answered, hastily. "All wrong—all wrong. It is you who belong to the angels and to your father's world, which, as I take it, is a world of noble ideas and lofty images of beauty and truth. We are of a world so different I can not tell you, and I wouldn't if I could."

She stood still. "I am sorry. I have been mistaken. If you can teach me nothing, you need not come."

Her literal acceptance of his speech was disconcerting, but Shirlaw was not to be thus summarily dismissed. His worldly wit came to his aid

"Don't send me away. I can teach you one thing which you do not know."

"What is it?"

"The secret of my sister's beauty."

"Can you? Will you?"

"It is not very hard to learn, and the teaching does not need much labor or much time."

"Then you are not to go away," she said, and held out her hand.

Shirlaw just touched the tips of her fingers, and though he somewhat scornfully likened himself to the wolf in sheep's clothing, he went on through the glorious wood until he came into the castle where the king's daughter slept.

Carono's supposition about Thekla was not so far wrong, she was not a harmless lunatic, but she was a spoiled child. She had substantial surroundings, indicative of great wealth. From her infancy she had lived in the exclusive companionship of a thoughtful, bookish father, and the influence of his years and sorrows on her sensitive organization had borne strange results. In her household her whim was law, no one daring to protest against her direct manner and the calm command of her voice. Even the stout housekeper, loud-voiced and important toward her staff of servants, drank into servile insignificance in the presence of the "grandgrex Fraulein."

When Thekla went to the village inn for the luggage of the strangers, and ordered the guest chambers thrown open, no comment was made, no questions were asked. The strangers themselves made only polite demur, since, as Carono said to his wife, "Windfalls are rare in the path of two opera singers and a landscape painter, and we can't afford to refuse such a chance."

And indeed Carono exerted himself to overcome Thekla's aversion, which he felt keenly

For an hour after lunch on the first day he sang magnificently. He knew that his singing partly won him, and wholly overcame the elderly person who acted as Prime Minister to her Majesty. He abandoned himself to sensual enjoyment of the luxury spread before him. But to his wife and to Shirlaw this pleasure in creature comforts provoked in us instead a war was impossible. To them day after day the spell of reluctantness more itself became closely about Thekla, about themselves, and their life with it, day after day the old life of falsehood and malignes of struggle and vanity, receded into dim perspective. Nearly a week had passed, and neither of them, excepting through the evidence of their eyes, knew more of Thekla than on the day when she rose as a ghost from the river. Carono, however, had many long and intimate conversations with the housekeeper, and one night, in a revulsion of talkativeness, he shared the results with his wife.

They were loitering about the hill-side, and not far off Thekla and Shirlaw floated on the river. The pleasurespeciness of the place under the mellowing radiance of the moon seemed a bid to all the elves and imps in fairy land to come forth for an old time revel. No flights of fancy disturbed Carono's practical and downrive vein.

"She is fabulously rich," he said. "Everything is hers, me, absolutely. And, do you know, that guileless old gentleman, her father, dead these three months, had such confidence in her that, in matter of marriage, he expressly gave her unircumscribed freedom of action. The saving clause to his folly was putting the money outside of the possible husband's control. By the conditions of his will Thekla is to remain here until she chooses to emerge under the protection of a noble lord and lady appointed her guardians. Said lord and lady have made several descents, and tried to carry her off. They have also tried to invite themselves here with friends for prolonged visits, but the young person, with her appalling candor, has successfully frustrated their intentions. If her goings on of the last week could reach their noble ears, we would soon have a crowd of patrician wasps stinging us out of those uncommonly comfortable quarters. The deceased father, by-the-way, was an Austrian. Why he expatriated himself, and shut himself up with his baby daughter, I have not been able to find out. But he did, and he has educated the child himself, literally fed her on his own mind and experience. He shaped her intellect as a poet shapes the creature of his dreams; he kept her ignorant of the manners of people of her own time and class; he clothed her as great painters clothe their ideal women, and at the turning-point of her life he left her just ready to become the dupe and slave of the first good looking fellow who makes love to her. The chance has fallen to that lucky dog my estimable brother-in-law."

His hard, mocking tone, so out of harmony with the surroundings and her own frame of mind, jarred on his wife, and the final sneer at her brother moved her to a show of mild resentment.

"Then the chance could not have come to a better or truer man," she said, and walked away from him to meet Thekla coming up from the river.

The girl's face was flushed and excited. "Listen, madame," she said, breathlessly. "I have here the home and all that was my father's. He lies there beneath the elms, and I have his memory in my heart. Your brother has told me that he loves me, and wants me for his wife. He says that in the autumn he will come for me and take me. He says that if I love him I will not care where I go, so long as he is beside me. Tell me what is right, what is best."

Madame Carono laid her hands on Thekla's face, child-like head: "All you have here," she said, "you can come back to, and your father's memory in your heart can not be disguised. What my brother says is true. If you love him, he can give you life."

Without a word, Thekla recrossed the meadow. Madame Carono, watching, saw her hold out her hand to Dick, and he bent his head and kissed it in the moonlight.

The loveliness of summer had waned, the glory of autumn had faded, and the sodden earth waited sullenly for its mantle of snow. The pleasant meadow and marsh-lands were sere, the silver threads on the hills had swollen into roaring torrents, and instead of the blue lazy river a black flood hurried along, burying deep the water lilies, and warning eagles and imps into winter hidingplaces.

The day was all that is gloomy and uncomfortable. Clouds banded together menaced the earth. A furious wind shrieked through the forest, whirling dead leaves down the valley before it, and stirring the base and heavy drapery of Thekla, who knelt before the cross where in the nonsensetime she had had her lilies. Her face, always sad and grave, told her story ghastly. Too soon she had left her ideal world to learn the bitterness of what Madame Carono had gloomily portrayed as "life." She bowed her head on the cross for a minute, then, rising, confronted her lover. She gave a cry of surprise and joy.

"At last! They told me you had deceived me. They said you would never come. They said I was mapping myself to death, and they tried to take me away. But I meant to stay. I meant to die here if must be." She burst into tears, and covered her face with her hands.

Shirlaw neither moved nor spoke.

She controlled her emotion, and stepped back from him. "You are changed," she said. "What have I done?" He had changed, and the change was not in his thinness or paleness, nor in the heavy mental wader his eyes, but in that the fire had gone from his face, and in that his tarnish commencer had given place to the nervous self-consciousness of a man pursued by care. When his voice came to him he spoke vehemently:

"You have done nothing. It is the fault of the world—that world to which I would have taken you. Thekla, I can not do it. Any manhood that is in me, every spark of virtue and honesty left to me, result at bringing you into contact with the world as I know it. If the knowledge of its sorrow and sin could be yours, I at least shall not have it on my soul that I led you to it. I have come to bid you good-by."

As Thekla listened to him the dignity of her truthfulness and simplicity clothed her as a visible garment. She spoke slowly: "What sorrow could come to me like that of parting from you? What is the sin of the world to me? You are my world. You can not unteach the secret you taught. I have given you what your sister gave to—"

"Don't! don't!" he exclaimed.

"Ah! I know," she cried. "The demon's face, the imp's eyes! For weeks I have seen no other. Cold and storm are nothing to him. He comes up and rides on the white-capped waves, and leers at me and mocks me hideously. What has he done? No matter; his wickedness does not concern me. You are not what he is."

"How do you know?" Shirlaw interrupted. "How do I know myself that I am not a liar, a coward, a brute? How do you know that I may not win you only to cast you aside and betray you, and send you broken-hearted to the grave? That is what he has done to my sister, Thekla. I hated him from the first. I told her, but she would not listen. She died, and I have no feeling but hatred of him, and scorn and distrust of all men, myself among them. I have come to tell you that I dare not take your life in my hands. You may go back to your books and pictures, and another than I shall take you from them."

He spoke with the fierce of passion, and she was awed, quietly, "You mean that you don't love me any more?"

"Great Heaven!" he exclaimed, as blank surprise, and added, inquiringly, "Yet how should you know what it costs me to leave you?"

"Well," she said. "I am no longer a child. I know that love may be given to a traitor, and that man may swear faith and truth, and ever falsely. If, in the face of this knowledge, I say I love you and trust you, and will go with you what will you say to me?"

He turned away. "Don't tempt me. I am better than let you think me a scoundrel. Let me go. You will cry a little, and your sleep a power will come back."

He was leaving her, and she sprang forward. "You killed the child's life, you shall not have mine. Neither can come back. Let me choose."

He looked at her, he lingered. "After all," he said, "he never loved her as I love you."

Then the summer sun shone through the clouds, the summer breeze rustled through the trees, and the sweet of the waterlilies was wafted from the sparkling river. The angel sprites festooned, danced, and sang, and the devils took themselves off better-skilled to more congenial spheres, and the pain of death and the weakness of the world ceased to be.

Perhaps it had much better not have happened but who can picture the dreariness of life if it never did happen?

ANNE ROBERTSON MACFARLANE.

ON CONEY ISLAND.

ONE artist went up to the top of the tall observatory on Coney Island a few days ago, and took a bird's-eye view of a portion of that popular resort, where thousands of people from New York, Brooklyn, and other cities find their relief from summer heat. No beach in the world has anywhere greater facilities for rest and refreshment. Easily reached by several lines of railroad and excursion steamers, with miles of safe bathing grounds, with hotels of every variety, from the cheapest to the most expensive and luxurious, Coney Island attracts visitors of every class. As a rule the beach is well policed, and in the daytime crowds of ladies and children resort there without fear of disturbance.

There is much complaint, however, of the presence of gamblers on the beach, who apparently play their tricks upon unsuspecting countrymen without hindrance from the police or from the proprietors of the hotels. They are a curse of great annoyance to decent people, and although they are careful to make no disturbance, that should be driven from the island without ceremony or delay.

THE NEW SENATOR.

THE long contest over the United States Senatorship of New Hampshire ended August 2 on the forty-second ballot, by the election of ALVAH F. PIKE. The decisive vote was as follow: Whole number, 315; necessary for a choice 158. EDWARD H. ROLLINS, 1; AARON F. STEVENS, 1; WILLIAM S. LADD, 1; GILMAN MARSTON, 19, the only Democrat, 112. ALVAH F. PIKE, 101. Mr. PIKE, having a majority, was declared elected United States senator for six years from March 4, 1883. The announcement of the result was greeted with tumultuous applause.

The newly elected Senator is known in New Hampshire as a lawyer of ability and a politician remarkable for his shrewdness. He was born on the 14th of October, 1812, and was admitted to the bar in 1845, practicing principally at Fosh ills. He was elected to the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1850, 1851, 1862, 1865, and 1866, serving as Speaker the last two years. In 1857 and 1858 he was a member of the New Hampshire Senate, and for some months he was President of that body. He was Chairman of the Republican State Committee in 1856 and 1859, and was a delegate to the Philadelphia Convention which nominated General FREMONT in 1856. In 1871 he was elected to Congress, and at the close of his term he sought reelection, but was defeated by the Democratic candidate, Mr. SAMUEL N. BELL.

THE GRAND ARMY.

MR. ROBERT B. BEATH, the new commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, was born in Philadelphia in 1839. He entered the service as a private in 1861, and remained in the field until the close of the war. He was First Lieutenant in the Eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, First Corps Army of the Potomac, and while serving in this capacity was wounded in the second battle of Bull Run. Being again promoted, he assumed command of a company of colored troops, and served with them in the Army of the James. In the charge at Newmarket Heights, Virginia, he was again wounded, losing his right leg, September 29, 1864. Being taken to the hospital, he stated there until 1865, when he was assigned to duty at Camp Wilkins Penn, Philadelphia, remaining there until able to join his regiment. He was mustered out on September 20th, with a lieutenant-colonel's commission. After the war he removed to Pottsville, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, where he entered into business as Secretary of the Anthracite Mining Exchange. In 1871 he was elected Secretary-General of the State of Pennsylvania, and after his term of service returned to Philadelphia to engage in the insurance business, being now Secretary of the United Firemen's Insurance Company of that city.

Upon the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic he became one of the first members in his native State, and served four years as Assistant-Adjutant-General of the department. He was subsequently elected Department Commander by a unanimous vote. Becoming a member of the National Encampment, he served as its two years as Inspector-General, thoroughly organizing this department. He was Adjutant-General under Commander-in-chief HARTRANFT, and one year under Commander-in-chief LOUIS WAGNER.

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. F. SOBRIE,

Author of "Mathurin," "Major De Morgan," "No New Thing," "Heads to Money," etc.

CHAPTER VIII.—(Continued.)

I AM INTRODUCED TO THE FAMILY SKELETON.

"Uncle Bernard," I began, hesitatingly, "would you mind my saying what I think?"

"I should like you to say what you think," he answered.

"Well, then," I resumed, "I know that Mrs. Farquhar's opinion isn't worth much, and the Rector, I dare say, is not overwise, and of course neither of them is fit to advise you. Still, it does seem to me that she was right at first, and that he is right now. One calls a fellow who cheats at cards a blackguard, and to lie, I suppose; but this happened a long time ago, and he must have been very young then, and—and—don't you think he might have another chance given him? I am not such an ass as to pretend to tell you what your duty is, only I fancy that you may have been a little too severe upon this poor chap just because he was your own son. I feel sure that, if it had been any one else, you would have been the first person in the world to forgive and forget."

I fully meant what I said, and I said what I meant from no other motive than that I did mean it; nevertheless, I must admit that I was conscious of acting a disinterested part; and I was altogether taken aback when my uncle, instead of looking pleased with me, started to his feet with an impatient gesture and a flash of genuine anger in his mild blue eyes.

"Forgive and forget!" he exclaimed. "Have you known me all your life, Charley, only to say such a foolish thing to that? Am I vindictive? Have you ever known me bear malice against any one who had offended or injured me?"

I shook my head, somewhat stunned.

"Or do you suppose," my uncle went on, "that I, of all people in the world, have the pretension to forgive another man's sins? I thought you would have understood—I thought it would not be necessary to point out to you in so many words that I am doubly disgraced by Harry's ruin. Disgraced not only because my name has been dragged down into the dirt by my son, but because I failed to make such a disaster impossible. Consider the tremendous risk involved in cheating at cards, and the very small gain, in proportion to it, that a successful cheat can hope to make. Surely you must see how terribly wrong must have been my management of a young man who, rather than ask me for a few hundreds, or even thousands, would pair to desperate a game as that! And if I could say to such a one, 'I forgive you from the bottom of my heart; the sin may have been yours, but the cause of the sin was mine; let us quits, and start afresh,' do you think I would not say it, and shake off a part, at least, of the load of remorse which I have been carrying about all these years, and which I must carry to my grave—and beyond it?"

He paused, drawing his breath quickly; then resumed his seat, and went on in a calmer tone. "I told you before that I don't know what on or any one else would have done in my place: I had to act as seemed to me right, and if it were to do over again, I could not act differently. It is easy to forgive an injury, but it is only in certain cases that one can blot out an offense. There are sins to hell to or worse than Harry's which it is perfectly possible to condone. A man may run away with his neighbor's wife, for instance, and resume his place in society when he chooses, if he will only show his penitence by deserting her. With regard to turf transactions, again, he may sail very near the wind indeed, and be pardoned, and there are many taboo slippery places through which he may walk with a tolerable certainty of being able to emerge from them in due season. But he must not be caught with a card up his sleeve and publicly thrashed. A man to whom such a thing as that has happened is a dead man, and nothing being raw resuscitate him. This, I know, is only conventional morality. I am not concerned to make an apology for it, though I think that, if you come to look into them, there is more to be said for the world's conventional rules of conduct than some people are willing to allow. What is certain is that, being in the world, we must submit to its standards. What was it in my power to do for Harry? Could I have kept him with me here, to the very hope that at last he might flee his disgrace down? Why, he would never have had the chance of living it down. There is not a man in the county who would have spoken to him—at all events, not a gentleman who would. To the very last day of his life he would have been pointed out to the man who, etc., etc. Neither he nor I could have borne it."

"Oh no," I agreed; "you couldn't have attempted that."

"Well?"

"Well, I should have thought a compromise might have been made. I should have thought that, after having been away for a great many years, he might have been allowed to come back. Scandals are forgotten, you know, and I suppose it is pretty certain that he would do nothing to remind people of the one that he caused."

My uncle did not answer just at once. "I have done my best to consider the whole question dispassionately," he said at length, "and I have never been able to think that it would be to all possible for Harry to recover his position. It is not likely that you and I shall ever talk again as we are doing now, and while we are about it, it is to well to say all. I have always felt that, if I had understood the lad better, I could have averted this terrible misfortune, and I don't deserve to lessen my share of the responsibility, but it would be absurd to think the fact that my errors of judgment will not account for everything. I have only too good reason to know that he is by nature cowardly, deceitful, and unprincipled. Theoretically one is bound to believe that it is never too late to mend, but all experience shows that there are certain natures—characters—whatever you like to call them—which never do mend, and I believe that his is one of them. When the crash came he was not ashamed, only frightened to death. He went away hastily concealing his satisfaction at having got off so cheaply. Since then he has made my sort of effort to retrieve himself. I know where he is now, and I know, more or less accurately, the kind of life that he is leading. I believe his case to be an absolutely hopeless one. Nevertheless, I will not say decidedly that he shall not be my heir. Of course I have made my will, and if I were to drop down dead to-morrow you would inherit everything, except a sum sufficient to produce the interest upon which Harry is now living, and which I have left in the hands of trustees for his use. But it is within the bounds of possibility that I may alter my will, and for that you must be prepared. There is just the shadow of a shade of hope that Harry might distinguish himself in some public manner, so as to wipe out in a measure his past disgrace. That is a very forlorn hope, still it must be taken into account. There is another hope, scarcely less forlorn, and that is that he might marry (though I can not imagine that any lady would marry him), and that he might have children. In such a case it would be a question whether I should be justified in shutting out my grandson from the estate. Now, Charley, you see how the matter stands; you see that, so far as you are concerned, you will have to shape your course so as to meet possible chances rather than probabilities, and you also see, I hope, that the less the miserable business is referred to between us in future the better."

I signified my assent, and a long interval of silence followed. "I can't help feeling sorry for the poor beggar," I said at last.

"It is not forbidden to you to be sorry for him," answered my uncle, a little coldly. I was almost angry with him for the moment, but when I looked at his poor old sad face, as he sat patiently there by the fireside, my irritation turned to pity, and I could not resist the impulse to get up and lay my hand on his shoulder.

"I'm awfully sorry for you too," I said.

He jumped up and began poking the fire. "Oh, well, thank you, Charley," he answered, briskly; "but you see I have grown accustomed to it; and there are plenty of enjoyments in life, after all. Life is not all tragedy, fortunately, and an couldn't make it so even if no would." He turned round, with that faint smile of his playing about the corners of his mouth and eyes. "Perhaps," he said, "you are not likely to fall into the error of taking too tragic a view of life." And then "By the way, the Rector tells me that Oxford is going to train out the weakest crew this year that ever disgraced the University. I trust that is a rahnour."

I replied that the Rector obviously did not know what he was talking about, and showed how impossible it was that he, or any one else, could be in a position to judge a crew which had not yet been formed; but although we discussed the subject with much gravity for the next five minutes I am unable to rouse myself to that degree of interest in it which it merited, and when my uncle observed that I was sleepy, and had better go to bed, I did not contradict him, unbeknownst to the assertion was.

He spoke a few last words to us bade me good-night. "Now, we have had our talk, and it is all over. We may have to refer to it again some day, but it is much more probable that we shall never be compelled to do so. You are startled and a little puzzled just now, but that will pass. You won't forget it, I hope; you will soon cease to think about it, I know. And that is just what I should wish."

CHAPTER IX.

MY UNCLE IS DISAPPOINTED IN ME.

I was not altogether pleased with my uncle's quiet conviction that I should soon cease to think about the skeleton in the family cupboard which had been so tardily dragged forth from its hiding-place for my inspection, but the event proved him to be right in this, as I am bound to say that he was in most things. I did not think then, and don't think now, that he was right in having kept me all those years in the dark. As to whether he had been right in his treatment of his son, that is a point upon which I have never yet been able to make up my mind, and at this time of day it is hardly likely that I ever shall.

One judge, whose summings up, if somewhat difficult to foresee, were always decisive, and who was seldom disposed to endorse my text or deed of Mr. Le Marchant's with the stamp of her approval, was upon this occasion openly, not to say triumphantly, on his side.

"I have been delighted to hear," said Mrs. Farquhar, accosting me the next morning with a good deal of affectionate warmth, "that your uncle Bernard has at last made up his mind to do the right thing. It is what we should all be thankful for, for he is overgiven to vacillation, poor man, and just a wee bit obstinate besides, between ourselves. But all's well that ends well. Better a finger off than any wagging, as we say in Scotland; he'll be easy in his mind now that he has chosen his heir, and his own who will come after him. And indeed I think he might have made a worse choice," the old lady added, nodding at me, and patting me on the back in an exceedingly flattering manner.

I shrunken her, but resisted out that the finger alluded to in her graceful figure of speech would hardly yet be considered as having ceased to wag. My uncle, I said, had done nothing more than take me into his confidence, he had formed on final decision as to the disposal of his property, and had expressly warned me that he did not contemplate forming any. But Mrs Farquhar listened to this disclaimer with a smile of reasonable derision.

"Oh, ay, he would say that," she answered; and it was evident that she was in no mood to grudge contemptuous concessions to a character livelier than her own. "It's just Bernard's way to make a mess of leaving things open, and to pretend he can step out through the window after the door is locked behind him. But I'm not afraid of his breaking his neck in any such foolish fashion. Depend upon it, he could never have spoken to you about the matter at all if he had not known very well that there was only one course open to him. I believe he has really made his will, too?" There was an interrogative inflection to these last words.

"He can make another to-morrow," I observed.

"But he won't," Mrs Farquhar replied, confidently. "He'll me do that, you may take my word for it. When duty and inclination pull the same way, it must be a very perverse man that would hold back." She added, presently, with a laugh, "I should know something of the way Bernard's inclinations pull him, haven't I been doing my best to get him to disinherit you for the last ten years and more? And all in vain!"

There was nothing surprising in Mrs Farquhar's inelligence and sense of duty (which always pulled harmoniously together) having drawn her in one direction for ten years, and then wholly round and hurried her in the opposite one at the end of them, but I was curious to know the cause of her inconsistency in the present case, so I put the question to her point-blank. She sighed and shook her head, saying this it was a long story, and that she would rather not go into it, now that it was all over, immediately after which she proceeded to relate it to me to all its length.

Mrs. Farquhar, it appeared, had from the first taken as much more lenient view of Harry's offense than his father had done. Cheating at cards was very wrong, of course, but it was evident that in her eyes this form of iniquity was not a great deal worse than many others into which young men are liable to fall, and that the punishment which had overtaken the culprit struck her to not of all proportion to his sin. She had therefore labored for many years to bring about the reconciliation which Christian duty, natural affection, and regard for the perpetuation of the family name had alike seemed to demand. She had remonstrated with Harry pretty regularly, she had even seen him once or twice, she had always exhorted him to keep a good heart and look his time, and if her efforts had been unsuccessful, it was because the lad had to contend not only against my uncle's inexorable severity, but against the active opposition of Mr Farquhar, who, she allowed me to infer, had been a man of limited intelligence and uncertain temper.

"But I would never have let that discourage me," she declared, and I quite believe her. No! it was neither difficulty nor weariness that had caused her to swerve from her purpose, but the conviction, slowly and unwillingly admitted, that Harry was not one who could be safely trusted to maintain the credit of the Le Marchants. "I'm afraid he's just a ne'er-do-weel," she sighed, speaking sadly, yet with an undercurrent of resignation, which was almost satisfaction, in her tone—"a ne'er-do-weel and—and a spendthrift. I should tell you that I have supplied him with funds from time to time, not knowing how large an allowance your uncle had been in the habit of making him, for he entirely deceived me as to that. And he has never done any work, or tried to do any. For some time past I have felt that I must give him up, and lately I have heard worse things of him. They say"—here Mrs Farquhar lowered her voice to an awe-struck whisper—"they say he is—oh! until—given to his bottle."

This announcement did not shock me so much as she apparently expected that it would do. That a proscribed man, with no occupation, should take to drinking, was not very strange, one could I see why one who had such to love to my luckless cousin had done should be abandoned to irreclaimable on account of one additional vice. But it was hardly likely that my lawyer of morals should accord with Mrs Farquhar's, and it did not seem worth while to interrupt her. She went on to say that, after seeing me, she had come to the conclusion that—whether by good luck to good judgment she would not take upon her to determine—Bernard had made a happy hit in adopting me, and that she believed it to be the will of Heaven that I should occupy the place which Harry had forfeited.

I saw no reason to doubt the sincerity of Mrs. Farquhar's conversion. Without vanity, I certainly did consider myself entitled to a rather larger share of respect than my uncle's natural heir could by claim to, and I also thought it highly probable that my personal fascinations had had their effect upon the appreciative old lady. What I did not quite understand at that time was her intense dread of ruinous living in a pecuniary sense. It was, I believe, by no means her partiality for me, but her recent discovery that the man whom she had supposed to be an out at eleven pauper was madly in receipt of a sufficient income, that had scared her, and led her to desert his cause. She was anything but an avaricious woman—indeed, she could be extremely generous upon occasion—but she loved order and economy, and would never have forgiven herself if she had been the means of handing over the Thirlby acres to a proprietor who would probably sell or mortgage them.

I did not get much more information about Harry out of her. She had ceased to answer his letters, she told me, she did not know where he was than, nor for that matter, where he was likely to be at any given time. She knew that he was sometimes in London, because she had more than once met him there by appointment, but his usual custom was to wander about in foreign countries, "living by his wits, I fear," she said, with another sigh.

For a day or two my mind was almost exclusively occupied with Harry's fortunes and misfortunes; but to he was not again spoken of by any of those about me, and to I presently returned to Oxford, where I found numerous matters of importance to attend to, my uncle's prophecy was one long fulfilled to the letter, and although I did not forget what I had been told, I ceased to think about it.

I can't look back on that period of my career exactly with pride; yet those were merry days, and, all things considered, I am not so much ashamed of the way in which I spent them as I perhaps ought to be. I was lazy and rather extravagant, but, except in those trifling particulars, I believe I did on great harm to myself or my neighbors. I was not selected to form one of the University eight, and at this distance of time I may say, what I could not have admitted then, that my exclusion was both a surprise and a disappointment to me. Being thus debarred from a safe outlet for superfluous energy, I fell back upon other forms of it, and devoted my time to playing the fool very noisily and enjoyably in company with sundry young gentlemen, who are now old gentlemen, and whom respect for gray hairs and honorable position forbids me to mention by name. I wonder whether Archdeacon Blank (so to call him) remembers that Easter vacation that we spent together, the incidents of which, as related on many subsequent occasions by one of us—I won't say which one—elated us greatly to our joint renown?

I say that the future Archdeacon—who was a sad dog in those days and liked to be told that he was so—persuaded me to pass that Easter vacation in his company, I having determined not to go home—for reasons. The truth was that I had promised to get Maud a dog, and, after due and anxious search, I bought that dog—to well bred a broken-haired terrier and as good a ratter as I ever saw in my life—and paid five pounds for him; and what better excuse for writing to her could I have than to tell her of the acquisition that I had made, and to dwell a little upon his noble qualities? Well, I got a most unpleasant snub for my pains. She did not even deign to answer my letter; but I received an illegible scrawl from the Rector, who informed me that he wrote in great haste (never did I know the Rector write otherwise than in great haste) to say that Maud was very much obliged for the trouble I had taken, but that really there had been many dogs about the place as it was, and that, upon the whole, she must ask me to do with many thanks, to keep my new purchase for my own amusement. The Rector added, on his own score, that he hoped I didn't encourage the little beggar to worry cats—a cruel practice, and one which he understood was running far too much into favor with young fellows. Not, mind you, that he had anything to say against a charge of shot upon occasion. Such a method of getting rid of a pouching hand of a cabby was merciful and necessary; but, etc., etc.

I hadn't the patience to finish his letter. I was very angry indeed, and my feelings were so deeply wounded that I resolved to punish Miss Dennison and myself by not showing my face in Thirlby before the summer. So Maud and I were off together in a high dog-cart, and we drove through several counties, and the games that we carried on and the scrapes that we got into and out of would fill become me to dwell upon, since it seems that my former companions within all memory of them to be buried in oblivion.

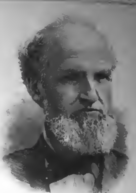
George Warren, who at this time was reading hard for his degree, and had little leisure for desultory conversation, must have been bored almost beyond endurance by the love-sick Jeremiads which I inflicted upon him occasionally when under the influence of an excess of low spirits. But he always listened to me patiently, and said what he could, in his quiet, sensible way, to console me. From all that he had observed he was inclined to think that Maud was favorably disposed toward me, and that the incident of her refusal of the carriage was one to which the much importance should not be attached. Nevertheless, it was his opinion—an opinion re-pressed with a good deal of proper diffidence—that Miss Dennison was not the girl to engage herself to any man until he had done something to prove himself worthy of her. To be a good judge of a dog was all very well, but it was not exactly the sort of gift which would be likely to earn for its possessor a distinguished career. "And you see, Charley, Miss Dennison—as far to I can judge—is just one of those ladies who would wish her husband to be a distinguished man."

I assured George that he knew nothing about women, and he at once admitted his ignorance, but I felt that there was something to be said for his view, and that at all events it would be desirable that Maud's future husband should be in a position to soon his bread, whether with or without distinction. George, who had a conviction, which I partly shared, that I could do anything that I really desired to do, suggested that I might make a beginning by reading for honors; but this method of achieving fame found little favor in my eyes. I was getting rather tired of Oxford, which I had never liked half to well as Eton, and I was eager to get out into the world and have done with preliminaries.

It was while I was in this disposition of mind that I received a letter from my uncle which excited and elated me considerably. "My boy,

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1301.

"WHEN WE HAD PASSED OUT OF THE STATION, THERE WAS MAUD HERSELF, SITTING IN THE PONY-CARRIAGE."



THE HON. AUSTIN F. PIKE.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. G. C. KIMBALL.—[SEE PAGE 606.]

SETH H. GRANT.—PHOTO. BY [illegible].—[SEE PAGE 606.]

ther Tom," he wrote, "[illegible] house [illegible] half, and I have just heard from him that he has succeeded in getting your name on [illegible] for the diplomatic service. He fancies—and I am disposed to agree with him—that the profession would suit you as well as another, possibly better than most. Write and tell me what you think of it. Diplomacy, as I dare say you know, [illegible] to the [illegible], but perhaps [illegible] all the [illegible] need not [illegible] that an insuperable objection. If you decide upon adopting it, you will have to set to work upon certain special subjects without delay, for Tom tells me that the list [illegible] about one. I am not sure whether it might not be better for you to leave the University without taking your degree; but this and other matters can stand over until we meet."

Nothing could have chimed in more harmoniously with my inclinations. In these days of [illegible] and telegrams and penny newspapers diplomacy has lost much of its prestige, and doubtless also something of its power; but thirty years or so ago it was more respectfully thought of. Echoes of the fame of some great proficients of that art still lingered in the air, a few were living, and enjoyed a European celebrity; and although among these was no Englishman—or, at best, only one—there seemed no reason at all why the credit of the nation should not be [illegible] by a young and brilliant addition to its staff of representatives abroad; while it was obvious that an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary would be a sufficiently distinguished personage to satisfy Miss Dennison's ambitious desires. Perhaps [illegible]

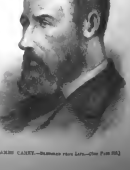
Rector's applause that I coveted; and what, after all, was a second?—a distinction of which it was more than likely that Maud did not understand the meaning. And that suspicion of mine received speedy confirmation; for, when we had passed out of the station to the road, there was Maud herself, sitting in the pony-carriage waiting for her father, and almost the first thing that she said to me was:

"What is it all about? I suppose George has done something wonderful, but an ignorant person would hardly guess it. If there are seconds, there must be firsts, and surely it is rather a poor compliment to a man to make such a fuss over him because he has finished behind a whole class of others. It is as much as to say, 'Who would have thought of your getting placed at all?' Now it would never have struck me, for instance, that I ought to congratulate you upon having nearly, but not quite, got into the University eight." And with that unkind and uncalled-for allusion she drove away.

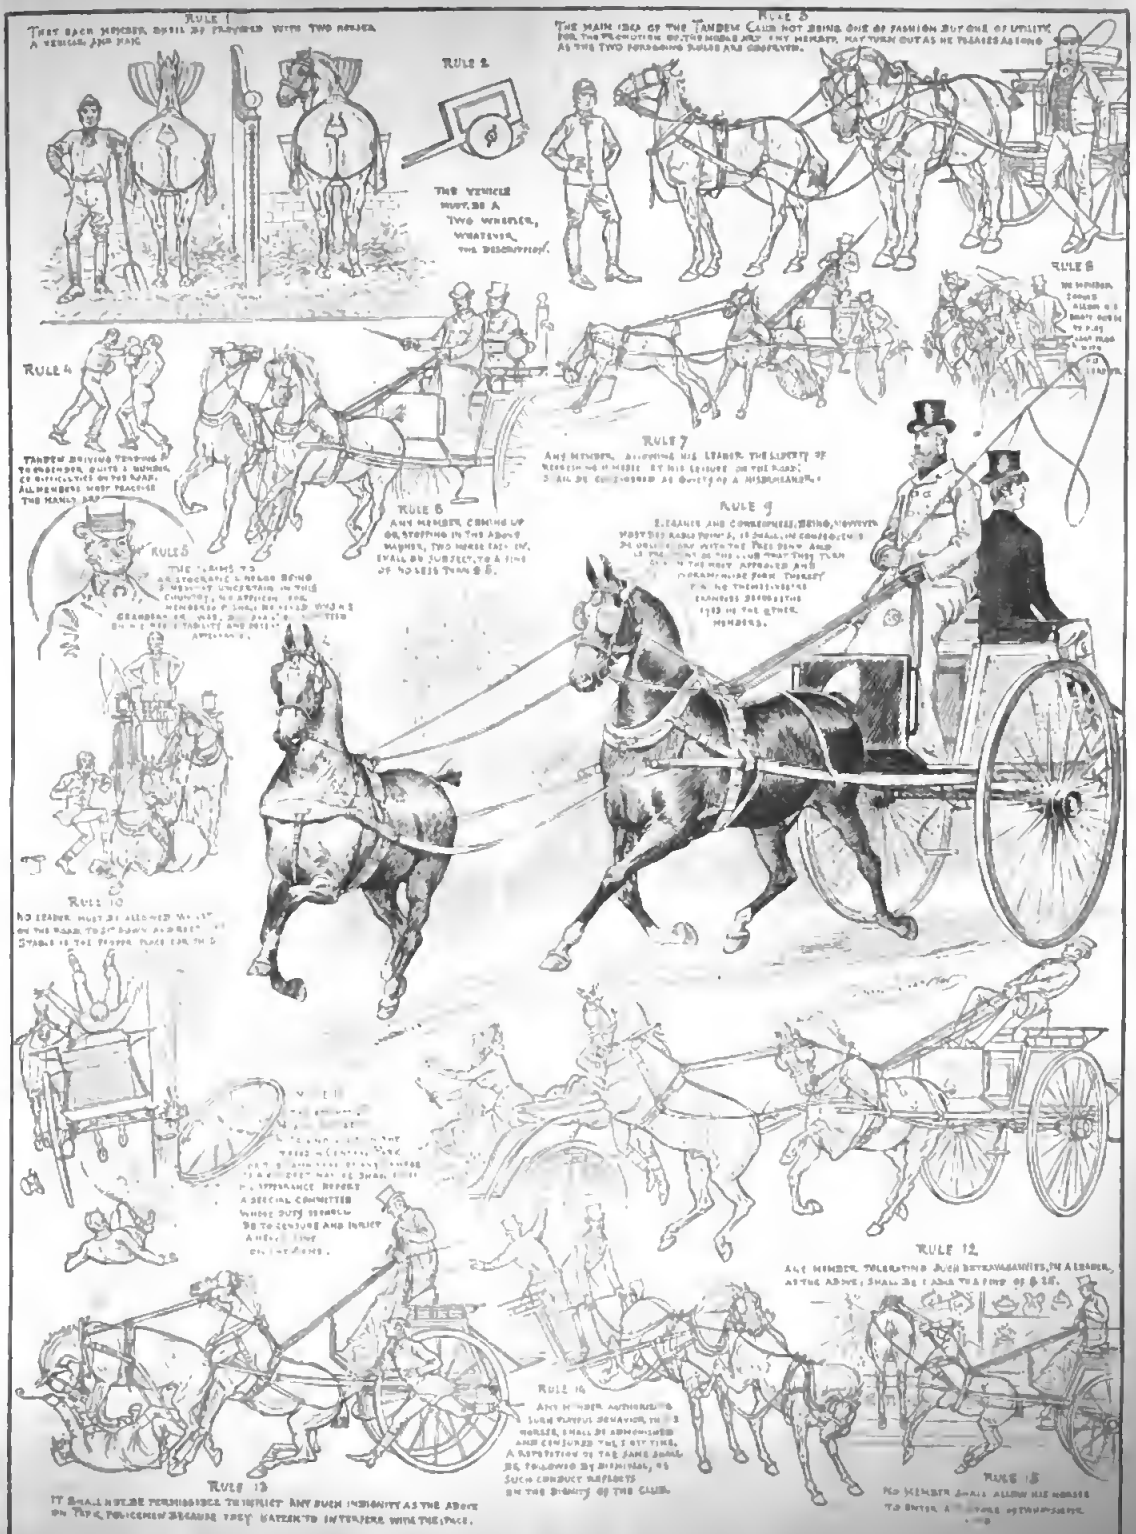
[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[illegible].—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE PAGE 606.]

ROBERT B. BEATH.—PHOTO. BY PALLAIS.—[SEE PAGE 606.]



JAMES CAREY.—SKETCHED FROM LIFE.—[SEE PAGE 606.]



THE NEW RULES OF THE TANDEM CLUB.—DRAWN BY GRAY PARKER

THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION.

On the 1st inst. the great Southern Exposition at Louisville was formally opened. The city was given up to gayety, and no business whatever was done. With the first streak of daylight crowds of people began pouring into the city, and by nine o'clock the main streets were so full that it was difficult to pass along the sidewalks.

At eleven o'clock President Arthur and his party left the hotel in carriages, accompanied by a body of police and local military organizations, and moved by the most direct route to the Exposition Building. They received a warm welcome the entire distance, the thousands of people shouting the manifest interest as the visitors passed them. The President was kept continuously bowing from side to side of his carriage. Frequently the cheering became so intense that he rose, hat in hand, and bowed his acknowledgments to the people, who seemed unable to see too much of him. His face bore a genial smile that indicated the pleasure he felt in the reception tendered to him, and his appreciation of the warmth of a genuine Southern welcome.

The great main building, capable of holding 20,000 people, was filled completely, and the crowd was too thick for comfort. President Dreyer of the Exposition welcomed the President in a fitting speech. The President responded, and concluded by starting the vast machinery and pronouncing the Exposition open. The crowd was wild with enthusiasm.

At the building every Southern State was represented, not alone by its citizens, but by displays in a more or less advanced state of completeness. When the President had made his speech he left the grand stand and took a tour through the building.

THE NEW COMPTROLLER.

Mr SETH BARTHOLOMEW GRANT, who was last week appointed to the office of Comptroller of New York, as successor to Mr ALVAN CARDOZO, was born near Utica, in this State, in 1828. He is the son of the late ASAHEL GRANT, M.D., who was for many years a missionary to the Nestorian tribes in Persia. Dr. GRANT went to Persia when his son was seven years old, and the lad was sent with a colony which founded the town of Galesburg, Illinois. A year later he went to study in an academy at Watterville, Oneida County, New York. Four years afterward the lad returned to Galesburg, and although only twelve years old, he was offered a place as teacher in the school there. The offer was declined.

When Dr. GRANT returned to America, in 1841, he placed his son in the Phillips Academy at Andover, Massachusetts, where he remained one year. Then he came to this city, and took up his home with the family of Professor JOHN TORREY. Dr. GRANT returned to Persia, and then young GRANT entered Princeton College. After three years' study his health broke down, and he had to leave college. He became a clerk for WILEY & PUTNAM, publishers, where he remained three years, and was then chosen Librarian of the Mercantile Library.

After holding this office seventeen years, Mr. GRANT resigned, and went into the real estate and brokerage business. He was engaged by Mr. FRANKLIN EDSON, who was Chairman of the Committee on Bylaws of the Produce Exchange, to codify the by-laws of the Exchange. The Exchange was reorganized under the by-laws prepared by Mr GRANT, and he was made its first Superintendent. This position he filled for nine years, leaving on January 1 last to become the Private Secretary of Mayor EDSON.

As Superintendent of the Exchange, Mr GRANT prepared the annual statistical reports of that institution. He also kept the deposits of all the dealers in "futures," amounting to over $30,000,000 a year. In these accounts, it is said, no error of any kind ever occurred. Mr GRANT is a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, and is Chairman of its Board of Deacons. He has been Recording Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, and Vice-President of the American Bible Society. In politics he is a Democrat, but he has never been prominently identified with any faction. His portrait is given on page 508.

MONSIGNOR CAPEL.

The celebrated English churchman, the brilliant and fascinating Cuticle of Lord BEACONSFIELD'S Lothair, has reached our shores again, after an absence of sixteen years. The Right Reverend Monsignor THOMAS JOHN CAPEL, D.D., was born in England, of Irish parents, October 28, 1836. After six years' study he was ordained by Cardinal WISEMAN in January, 1864, he was named Vice-Principal of St. Mary's Normal College at Hammersmith, of which he was virtually the founder. From this time forward he devoted his energies and talents to furthering the cause of education by establishing a Roman Catholic university. His labors were interrupted by ill health, which compelled a sojourn in the south of France, where he officiated for some time as English Chaplain at Pau. On his return to London his eloquent sermons, his consummate tact, and his success in effecting conversions made him a marked character; he became Private Chamberlain to the Pope, with the title of Monsignor, in 1866, and Domestic Prelate in 1873. In the following year he was unanimously appointed Rector of the College of Higher Studies, of Kensington. This institution had been erected by the sole energy of Monsignor CAPEL; the plan had been a favorite one of Cardinal WISEMAN, but had not found favor in the sight of his successor, the present Archbishop of Westminster. CAPEL, in his zeal and confidence, took on himself heavy financial obligations, which, when the evil day came, he could only get rid of by going into the Court of Bankruptcy. Monsignor CAPEL has not written much, his chief work being A Reply to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's Political Expostulation. Monsignor CAPEL is well known to this country, for during his ministry he has gained many American converts. His object in visiting us at present is to deliver a course of lectures on one of those ecclesiastical subjects of which he is a perfect master.

JAMES CAREY.

We give on page 508 the portrait of James CAREY, the Irish informer, who was shot by a fellow-countryman named O'DONNELL, on the steamer Melrose, near Algoa Bay, on the coast of Africa. The accounts of the murder are conflicting. On one hand it is surmised that O'DONNELL was sent out by the "Invincibles" to take CAREY'S life, and as every effort was made to keep the informer's destination from public knowledge, the surprise impresses the English people with an uncomfortable sense of the discipline and determination of the secret order existing in Ireland. On the other hand, O'DONNELL declares that although he sailed from England in the same steamer with CAREY and his family, he did not know him to be the informer until after reaching Cape Town.

It is impossible to feel sympathy for the fate of a cruel, merciless, and cowardly wretch like CAREY. He planned the Phœnix Park murders, and saw them executed by the miserable tools whom he afterward, to save his own worthless neck, gave up to justice. There was great rejoicing in Ireland over his death; but it is difficult to see how it can benefit the Irish cause. Informers will always be ready, when face to face with the gallows, to brave a peril which they may escape.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

FOR OVERWORKED PROFESSIONAL MEN.

DR. CHAS. T. MCCLINTOCK, Canandaigua, N. Y., says: "I think it a grand restorer of brain force or nervous energy."—[Adv.]

HOTEL KAATERSKILL,

CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.

Largest mountain house in the world. Open June 20th to October. Accessible by all-rail route within last mile of hotel, via the New Kaaterskill Railroad. Address, E. A. SHERWOOD, Kaaterskill P. O., N. Y.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Promotes a Luxuriant and Healthy Growth of the Hair. It has been used by thousands of cases where the hair was crumbling out, and has never failed to arrest its decay. For Beautifying and Preserving the Hair it stands the best.—[Adv.]

SUMMER TOURS.

The Eastern Railroad pamphlet, giving Time-tables, Maps, Hotel lists, and many points of interest in Maine, the State of Maine, the Maritime Provinces, and all the Shore, Mountain, and Lake resorts east of Boston, will be mailed free to any address on application to LUCIUS TUTTLE, Gen. Pass. Agt., Boston, Mass.—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.

"It is no new lake-land, probably no any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Tribune.

"The odor of sea-sweet hay, the perfume of cranberries, the smell of new-mown grass, and the wellkept public aspect of the environs."—N. Y. Times.

Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Pier at 26th St., East River, and Jerome's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

If your complaint is want of appetite, try half a wineglass of ANGOSTURA BITTERS an hour before dinner. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by DR. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS.—[Adv.]

C. C. SHAYNE, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N. Y., sends Fur Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

DR. PIERCE'S Sr. VITUS DANCE SPECIFIC.—One bottle always cures. Circular, Precious, N. Y.—[Adv.]

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which patients should feel grateful."—"Sun" Medical Press, "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), J. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, MCKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

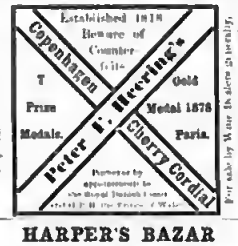
TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding ——— Vehicle made. Send for Catalogue. The springs are the only ones in the world in which the carry [illegible] in all positions alike, according to the weight they carry. Equally adjustable for [illegible] and [illegible]. Call on or address the Carriage Builder [illegible] for them.

HENRY TIMKEN,

Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Used exclusively by ABBOTT BUGGY CO



And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.

Purveyor by Royal Warrant to the Queen of Denmark.

Portable by Many Dealers generally. 8 Barclay St., New York.

HARPER'S BAZAR

CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have introduced our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. J. CROTTY, No. 149 to 161 Canal Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. J. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.

EDENIA AND MARÉCHAL NIEL ROSE.

THE BEST-EQUIPPED RAILROAD IN THE WORLD.

Keeping clear within the narrow limits of fact, it may be asserted without fear of truthful contradiction, that the

CHICAGO AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY

is the best and most perfectly equipped railroad in the world. Its luxuriously designed and furnished palace sleeping-cars, and its magnificent coaches, in quarters of beauty and comfort. In courtesy are of the most perfect system that have been adopted by any company. Its dining cars are famous, and the meals and service provided in them are equal to the best to be had in the country.

WHERE IS IT?

Starting from Chicago and having various main lines running west, north-west, and north, it needs almost all that is desirable in Northern Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, the upper Michigan peninsula, Minnesota, and Central and Southeastern Dakota, and Northeastern Nebraska.

If you are destined to or from Colorado, Nebraska, Utah, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, California, Oregon, Washington Territory, China, Japan, the business with Colorado, New Zealand, or Australia, you should, in making the trip between Chicago and [illegible] Kansas City, Omaha, in either direction, see that your tickets read over this great road.

The "St. Paul Line" is the shortest and best between Chicago and Madison, St. Paul and Minneapolis.

You can procure tickets over this route from nearly every coupon ticket agent in the country. When buying your tickets read them carefully and be sure that at least one coupon reads over the Chicago & North-Western Railway.

The Greek and Latin Inscriptions

ON THE

OBELISK-CRAB

IN THE

METROPOLITAN MUSEUM, NEW YORK.

A Monograph.

BY

AUGUSTUS C. MERRIAM, Ph.D.,

ADJUNCT PROFESSOR OF GREEK IN COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

The subject of this erudite monograph is neither a hand-shell nor a well-shell crustacean, and this is no romance of the sea. And yet a romance it is and even those who, like Professor JOWETT, have little respect for the study of inscriptions, cannot fail to rank from the perusal of this monograph something of the enthusiasm with which Professor MERRIAM sets out on the Egyptian exploration. " It is a piece of hard work faithfully performed.  Archæology and history klim each other, and Professor MERRIAM has a right to the proud of this feat of reconciliation.—N. Y. Evening Post.

In this handsome pamphlet Professor Augustus C. Merriam, of Columbia College, brings together a huge quantity of literary and antiquarian learning bearing on the vexed and difficult inscriptions which form the text.  His success has been such as to do credit to American scholarship, while it corrects some errors which, left to themselves, would in no day bring discredit upon our city.—N. Y. Tribune.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, Piles, Hemorrhoids, Dyspepsia, Torpidity of the Liver, Colds, Coughs, &c.

Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 21, rue Richelieu, Paris.

Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

40 New (1882) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M.D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphatic powders. Sold only in cans.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

NOW READY.—The Phonographic Dictionary. By ISAAC PITMAN and JAMES E. HOWARD. Price, $2 00. Send for specimen sheets. Sold by all booksellers, or address PHONOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE, Cin'ti, O.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Rumors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Loathsome Diseases cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA Resolvent, the new blood purifier, removes the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

CUTICURA Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is unlike anything in existence. Rashes, Blotches, Pimples, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Grease Skin.

CUTICURA Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

Cards, &c. From $3 to $50

Print Your Own

Large sizes for circulars &c., $8 to $30. For pleasure, printing, publishing, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 3 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type Cards, &c. to the factory.

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

"BOKER'S BITTERS," THE OLD-Established Best Stomach Bitters known—maintained for their exceptional properties, now for their increased excellence. To be had in Quarts and Pints. A. BOKER, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 75 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 4249.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the first of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Some one hundred pages of the Weekly, containing 100 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
113 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED for our new book, By ALLAN PINKERTON the great detective. The history of the Spy System; reveals secrets never before published. Beautifully illustrated. Until lately intensely exciting. Very Popular. Specimens free to Agents. Address A. G. NETTLETON & CO., Chicago, Ills.

EDUCATIONAL.

1866. The NEW CALENDAR of the 19th. NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY of MUSIC Beautifully illustrated 64 pages. SENT FREE to yourself and three of friends sending you addresses to E. TOURJEE, Boston, Mass. The Largest and best equipped Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the Young People with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the Magazine with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

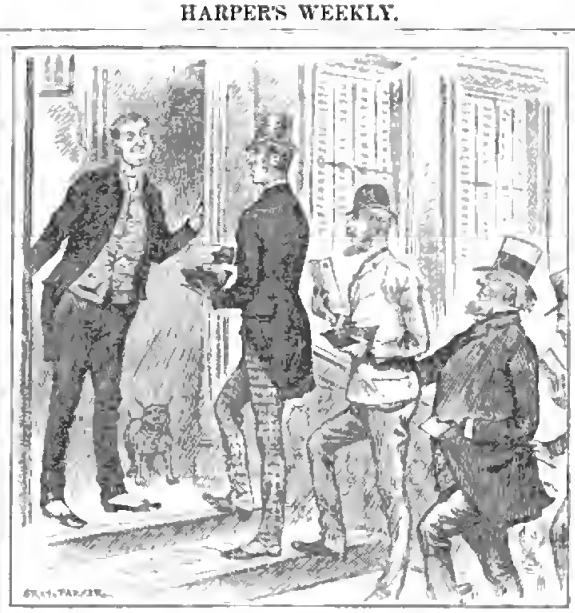
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY is weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Ten Cents in Postage Stamps.

$72 A WEEK. $5 outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.



THE OLD DODGE AGAIN

"Sorry, but master's gone to spend the summer in Europe. He left word that if any one called to beg that they should call again in about six months or so."

An Important Contribution to American History.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN,

Fifteenth President of the United States.

BY GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

WITH TWO STEEL-PLATE PORTRAITS.

2 Volumes, 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops and Uncut Edges, $6 00.

The true history of Mr Buchanan's administration has, up to the present time, been a profound secret; for, while an immense deal has been written about it, no writer has had any documentary authority for his estimate of the motives, intentions, and prevailing counsels of the President and cabinet in the trying times which preceded the war. From the false history of such men as Gen. Dix, Seaton, Bull, and others. It has been generally regarded as settled that Mr Buchanan was alone responsible for the course of his administration. But the history of that administration hitherto published has been in large part confessional and imaginary. It is of the highest importance that that history should be known. The time has long passed when form political feeling any one could desire to suppress the truth, and now all men will be glad to take a dispassionate view of the men and the events of twenty-three years ago at Washington. Mr Buchanan was in the habit of making brief and clear memoranda of daily conversation, interviews, and occurrences. He preserved all important correspondence. The material for his biography is thus ample, and the character of the book caused but be of the most absorbing interest. Its revelations will undoubtedly surprise all who have accepted as true the supposed histories which have been written in the excitement of strong partisan feeling; and perhaps not the least startling portions will be to the framers of eminent men who have been receiving with disdain from the policy of an administration, which policy they in fact guided and approved. In any event, the biography of James Buchanan covers the most important period of our history since the Revolution; and knowing, as we do, the material which he left to be used in the proper hand, we have no doubt that Mr Curtis has made each use of it that the publication will throw clearer light on history than any or all of the books which have attempted to show how the United States was led into the war of 1861.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

George Ticknor Curtis possesses that his long-promised life of the late President Buchanan is finished. To it he promises to make plain many things concerning the early days of the war, and to correct much hastily-written history. The revelations made by Judge Black from time to time since the close of the war have done much to correct false impressions, and the sentiment toward the ex-president is his occupied a position so difficult has been much modified. Entirely apart, however, from the interest surrounding the closing days of his administration, there was much in the life of James Buchanan demanding strong historical and biographical treatment, and Mr Curtis's book will be awaited with interest.—The Philadelphia Times.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of Six Dollars.

MAGIC LANTERNS with VIEWS $5

(Size 7 inches high, 10 square. Photos, and Lectures, 10c.

MAGIC LANTERNS & SLIDES Wanted. Second-hand Magic Lanterns Exchanged. FREE. T. H. McALLISTER, 49 Nassau St., New York.

THE KENNEBEC HILLS.—A New Colored Map, 22 x 28 in., showing mountains, lakes, rivers, valleys, hamlets, railroads, highways, and points of interest, free to any address. Apply to BENJAMIN LEE [illegible] Co., Printers), Boston, Mass., or the General Agent, 211 Broadway, New York City.

Lady Agents [illegible]

BRUSHES of every description at 215 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN K. HOUPT, Manufacturer and Importer.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

TAKE NOTICE.

For the manufacture of every description of Scrap Pictures. No two alike. F. WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE AMERICAN Double Action Revolver,

32, 38 and 44 Calibres, and sold at retail by all gun manufacturers, but by no one else in the world, at any dealer for them. Made by HARDING, IVIN & HOLBROOK, Worcester, Mass., sole manufacturers of the only tested Ambrosite Ammunition Guns.

BOSTON SCHOOL OF ORATORY.

For terms and circulars, address, until Sept. 1st, The English and Delsarte systems of gesture, voice culture, and elocution. Term begins Oct. 4th. Upper at Chickering Hall, Fourth floor, after that date, from 10 to 12 A. M., or on telegram addressed as above. E. H. RAYMOND, Principal.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

As pipes are continued directly to parts affected, thereby curing when other remedies fail. Continually carried in the vest pocket. Only one will last many years. Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.50. Liberal discount to the trade. Send for circulars. All dealers in smoking goods keep them. Sold by mail for 25 cents. Seeley's Trade Establishments, 1241 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 16 Tinsbury Street, London, England.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN, Fifteenth President of the United States. By George Ticknor Curtis. With Two Steel Plate Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops and Uncut Edges, $6 00.

II.

MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, Morgan Dix. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $6 00.

III.

TWELVE AMERICANS. Their Lives and Times. By Horatio Seymour, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Reverdy Johnson, John Bigelow, Robert C. Winthrop, Frederick Douglass, William Allen, Alexander H. Stephens, Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

SPANISH VISTAS. By Charles Fanshaw Lathrop. Illustrated by Charles A. Ramboer. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $2 00.

V.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record with Connecting Events and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By Malcolm Watkins and Rossiter Pinkney Wilson. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

VI.

THE GREEK AND LATIN INSCRIPTIONS ON THE OBELISK CRAB in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. A Monograph. By Augustus C. Merriam, Ph.D., Adjunct Professor of Greek in Columbia College. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VII.

COMPARATIVE ZOÖLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Revised Edition. Illustrated. 12mo, 384 pp., Cloth, $1 50.

VIII.

GAMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Compared by William Wells Newell. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $1 50.

IX.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by Thomas Carlyle. Edited by James Anthony Froude, M.A. Paper, 50 cents. Also, Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

X.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. Edited with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M., Lecturer, Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 35 cents; Paper, 25 cents.

XI.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS. Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, and other Poems. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 35 cents. 4to, Paper, 40 cents.

XII.

NAN. By Lucy C. Lillie, Author of "Middlemarch," "Prudence," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XIII.

FREDEGICK II. AND MARIA THERESA. From Hitherto Unpublished Documents, 1740-1762. By Thomas Pauldings. From the French, by Mrs. Campbell Hoey and Mr. John Lillie. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XIV

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE. A History of the Bridge in Stages. By W. C. Conant. [illegible] from Harper's Magazine for May, 1866. The Bridge as a Monument. By Montgomery Schuyler. [illegible] from Harper's Weekly, May 26, 1866. Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Two Portraits and [illegible] Illustrations. 4to, Paper, [illegible]

XV

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. Drisler, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $10 00.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sir Tom. By Mrs. Oliphant. 20 cents.

What Has Time Done? By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. 15 cents.

A Foolish Virgin. By Rita Wood. 20 cents.

The Senior Sophister. By the Author of "St. Olave's," "Mr Len Follis," &c. 20 cents.

And Never Any Child. By the Countess M. Von Bornstadt. 20 cents.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated. 20 cents.

Yolanda. By William Black. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 50; Paper, 20 cents.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Anice. By A. Mary F. Robinson. 15 cents.

Mr Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 20 cents.

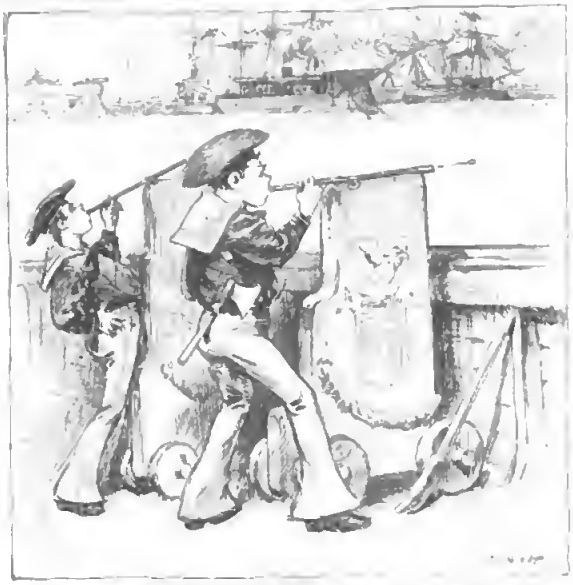
No New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 15 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Digitized by Google



AN AMERICAN MAN-OF-WAR FIRING A SALUTE TO A FOREIGN FLEET

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS

... any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 N. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

DELICATE MILD & FRAGRANT

Imperial Cigarettes

S. J. & Co.

OPERA GLASSES ... Illustrated Price Catalogue.

CONGRESS WATER. ... all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific ... of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, ... and all impurities of the blood. Avoid ... waters, native and foreign. Such waters ... positive irritants and impair the digestive ... and kidneys. None genuine on draught.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

HOPE FOR THE BALD

The Roots do not come out when the Hair leaves the Skin.

It has always been supposed that after the head becomes glazed and shiny it was hopeless to expect any hair. The following cut showing the growth of the hair, will illustrate better than words the failure of the old idea. This cut is a microscopic view of the follicle and papilla, from which the hair grows:

The Hair will fall out
The Scalp
The Hair Bulb
The Cuticle
The New Hair
The Papilla

It will be readily seen that though the hair is gone from the surface it is still alive healthy beneath the scalp, and is only prevented from growing by the contraction of the follicle in which it should grow

How The Hair Grows on the Bald Head!

We apply friction to bring the blood to the surface and supply the scalp with a perfect hair-food to nourish the weak roots. We do not promise to grow hair on every head. Some from the use of alcoholic and poisonous preparations have destroyed the follicle. These cases are hopeless, but so into that no one else should be discouraged from using our tonic of

Benton's Hair Grower,

as this will demonstrate whether the follicle and papilla are alive, and will restore STRENGTHEN the remaining hair, stop its FALLING OUT, and cure DANDRUFF and ITCHING

I HAVE USED BENTON'S HAIR GROWER!

John B. Taylor, ... of the heirs to the immense Taylor estate of Newport, Ky., says of the Benton Hair Grower: "I have used it and find it all that is claimed for it. I like it very much, it has grown hair on my head to some extent."

Benton Hair Grower Co. Dear Sirs.—About a year ago one half of my head was bald and shiny and so bare to the pain of my hand. I was told by physicians that it would be impossible for hair to grow on my head, as I had suffered so much from neuralgia. I saw your circulars of age and began to use your Hair Grower less than a year ago. I have now as good a head of hair. Your hair is rough, it is true, but it is all in its place. In fourth and in such a luxuriant condition that no one would think I had ever been bald. Mrs. C. N. Wise, 110 Clinton St., Cleveland, O.

PARTIAL BALDNESS!

Baldness generally commences on the crown of the head, sometimes on the front of the head, in either case it is usually the result of Fever. If Benton's Hair Grower is used at once, the falling hair will stop and new hair will start.

Interesting reading about the hair sent on application with thousands of testimonials.

For the use of LADIES who are troubled with Dandruff, Gray Hair, Falling Hair or Itching of the Scalp, it is invaluable

PRICE, $1.00 PER BOTTLE, BY MAIL. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Address BENTON HAIR GROWER CO., Brainard Block, Cleveland, O.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS. In 25 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial, by mail, prepaid, on receipt of 25c. in stamps. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

THE TRAVELERS

Life and Accident Insurance Co.,

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

Has Paid its Policy-Holders $8,500,000.

In Sums from 71 cents to $13,000!

LARGEST ACCIDENT COMPANY in the WORLD.

BEST OF SOUND LIFE COMPANIES.

Rates as Low as Safety will Admit.

LOWER RATES IMPLY DEFECTIVE SECURITY,

AS THE EMPTY TREASURIES OF THE HAT-PASSERS.

All Proven Claims Paid by us IN FULL,

NOT BY UNCERTAIN ASSESSMENTS AFTER DEATH.

OUR POLICY-HOLDERS ARE SECURED BY

$6,977,000 Solid Assets, $1,716,000 Cash Surplus.

Take Your Choice: Something for Something, or Nothing for Nothing.

JAMES G. BATTERSON, President. RODNEY DENNIS, Secretary.

JOHN E. MORRIS, Assistant Secretary.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL

THE LIGHT RUNNING DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

THE AGONIES OF BILIOUS COLIC?

THE INDESCRIBABLE PANGS OF CHRONIC INDIGESTION, THE DEBILITY AND MENTAL STUPOR RESULTING FROM A COSTIVE HABIT, MAY BE CERTAINLY AVOIDED BY REGULATING THE SYSTEM WITH THAT AGREEABLE AND REFRESHING STANDARD PREPARATION, TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. PROCURABLE AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by first-class dealers the world over. Send 2 cents for circular. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

PECK & SNYDER'S Celebrated Tennis

PECK & SNYDER, Manufacturers, 126, 128 & 130 Nassau Street, New York.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENMANSHIP

Retail for $1.50 by Stationers, or KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT SHORT BACK AND BEAD COLLARS

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS FOR PUBLIC, SUNDAY-SCHOOL & HOME EXHIBITIONS

C. T. MILLIGAN.

ASK FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OF THE NEW DISSOLVING STEREOPTICON.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c. Send for Descriptive Circuit and Sample. H. W. JOHNS MFG CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

VICTOR

AMERICAN STAR SHOT CAPSULES FOR THE SURE Aim, Star Empty Capsules. At Druggists.

"Dr Benson's Pills cured my daughter of severe headache."—Thos. S. Martin, Plainville, Ind.

Dr. Benson's Skin Cure makes the skin white, soft, and smooth. No poisonous drugs in it.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

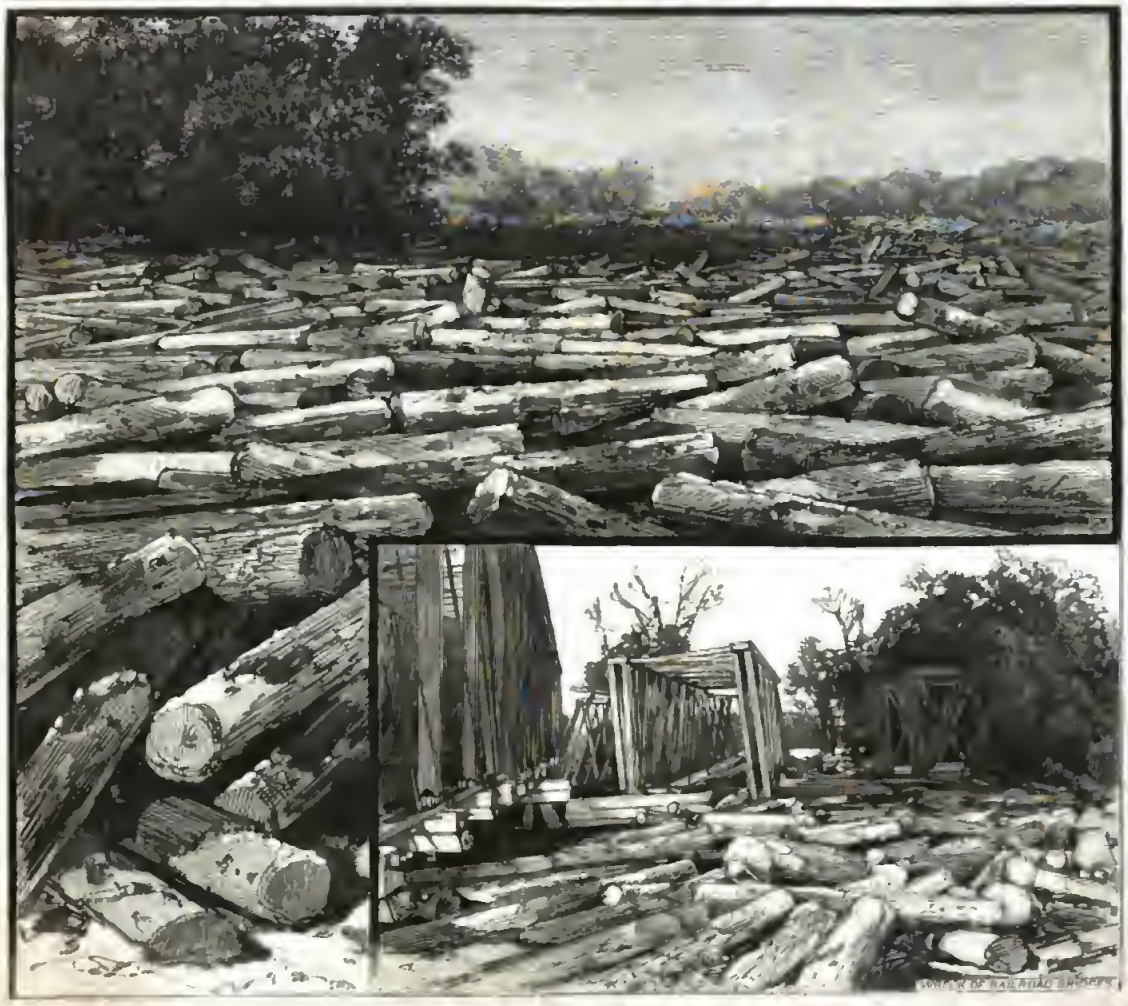
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1391.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.



JAM OF LOGS AT GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN.—Drawn by Charles Graham from Photographs.—[See Page 506.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK. SATURDAY. AUGUST 18, 1883.

"Its standard is higher than that of any weekly publication for the young, and the literary and art talent devoted to making it pleasing and instructive is the best in America."—BOSTON GLOBE.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

A NEW SERIAL.

"DICK AND D."

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

The publishers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE take pleasure in announcing that in the issue of August 21 they will publish the first chapters of a new serial story by Mrs. Lillie. In "Dick and D." the little folk will have a story replete with incident, full of interest, and written with that rare sympathy with child life which is so especially characteristic of Mrs. Lillie's work.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.50 PER YEAR.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp

POSTAL TELEGRAPHY.

THE telegraph strike has thus far commanded public respect by its firm and prayerful conduct. It has undoubtedly done more than any similar movement to concentrate general attention upon the power and the possibility of extensive organizations of intelligent and voting labor against similar organizations of capital. Factory labor is largely of foreign origin, and the associations known as trades-unions have been largely under the control of foreign traditions and leadership. But the telegraph operators, like the railway engineers, are chiefly American, and of characteristic American intelligence and feeling. This fact introduces entirely new elements into the situation, and suggests very different questions. The assured continuance of regular transport and communication throughout the country—that is, of the continuous undisturbed service of railroads and telegraphs—is absolutely indispensable to the great vital national interests. But that regular and proper continuance depends, not upon capital, considered as a separate force, but upon labor. That is to say, certain defined and organized bodies of intelligent American citizens, united by a common interest, hold the peace and prosperity of the country in their hands.

The word "labor" has hitherto described a huge ignorant mass of men and women, and "capital" the combination of intelligence and political power. But in America this distinction has largely disappeared; and as one of the two words covers an immense numerical superiority, the prospect is necessarily changed. Some method must be devised, independent of the will of one of the two interests, which shall secure the community against such a situation as that which has prevailed for three or four weeks. Fortunately the trouble began at the dullest moment of a dull season. But how if it had taken place at the most pressing hour of a busy season? How if it had been a strike of telegraphs and railroads in the midst of war? In that case the government would undoubtedly have taken both. But what does that mean? It means that the community, the people, the state, would have done what it held to be essential to the common safety, even if it involved taking private property, and conducting what is called business.

That is the whole principle involved in the question of postal telegraphy, which has been raised by the telegraph strike. The government conducts the Post-office, which is simply "business," and a telegraph supplement to the Post-office is only a question of expediency. Such interruptions as those arising from the strike produce not only incalculable inconvenience, but loss, and it is for the people to decide whether they shall be tolerated. They will be always possible and imminent under the existing conditions of vast counter organizations of labor and capital. They will become more probable as intelligent labor becomes more conscious of its power and capital more selfishly grasping. But the primary source of the situation is monopoly. To destroy the monopoly is of course to relieve the situation. The sneer that it is not the business of a government to go into business is only silly, because the government has gone into business. In the Post-office it has often deliberately gone into a losing business, because the convenience and prosperity of the people are more important than the cost of the service to the Treasury. A general strike of the telegraphs and railways would in a very short time cost the government and country very much more than the construction of a telegraph. The operation of such a work should of course be placed beyond the interference of trading politicians. But it is clear that the expediency of postal telegraphy has become a pressing and important question.

THE FALL OF THE CAUCUS.

THE election of a Republican Senator in New Hampshire has been very interesting as an illustration of the party independence of caucus control. The Republicans who refused to take part in the caucus or be governed by its decision have been very sharply rebuked by Secretary CHANDLER and the papers which agree with him. But a wiser course for him and for them to pursue would be an inquiry into the reasons why the caucus has ceased to command the respect and support of so many Republicans in so many States. The independent members in the New Hampshire Legislature, as in other States, are quite as good Republicans as Mr. CHANDLER, and they acknowledge the necessity of concession in order to maintain a party organization; nor are they less mindful than he that no better rule for the action of a party has been devised than that of the government of the majority.

But what Mr. CHANDLER and his friends ought to see, if they hope to remain managers, is that an unfair or a dishonest majority, a majority which is produced by bribery and trickery and intrigue, has no rights whatever. Nobody who agrees to leave a decision to chance is bound to abide by the throwing of loaded dice or of marked cards. Whoever consents to be governed by the majority contemplates only an honest majority, and he who in any way attempts to secure the greater number of voices by illicit means confesses by that conduct that he has not a fair majority. This is the key to the situation in the late Senatorial contests in New Hampshire and elsewhere. It was justly felt by many intelligent men that Mr. ROLLINS's position enabled him, under various forms of patronage, direct and indirect, to appeal to the cupidity or ambition of members of the Legislature, and in such ways virtually to buy votes. In a general and broad sense he was regarded as a representative of the leadership and control which rests upon bargaining, and which necessarily reduces politics to mere trading. And as one of the chief dependencies of this system is the practically packed caucus, there were a great many Republicans who would not consent to become accessory to an action which would aggravate the system, and certainly destroy the party.

It is useless to say that politics are not possible upon such principles. The fate of Mr. ROLLINS and of Mr. CHANDLER shows that it is the practices which they represent that are at fault. Their defeat in New Hampshire, like that of the New York Senators who sought a re-election two years ago, and the tremendous results of the election of last year, show an independence in the Republican party which is of the best possible augury for the future. The election of neither Mr. ROLLINS nor of Mr. CHANDLER would have been of advantage to the party, because it would have been the triumph of a kind of politics which has been the heaviest burden of the party, and which it is evident that vast numbers of Republicans do not mean longer to bear.

DEMOCRACY ACCORDING TO PENNSYLVANIA

THE Pennsylvania Democrats, to whose action we alluded last week, re-affirmed the demand of the Ohio Democracy for the encouragement of domestic industry, and demanded also the entire abolition of the present system of internal taxation. Such abolition would leave the revenue to be raised by a tariff tax, and it is therefore the plan of the protectionist interest. But as the internal tax is laid upon superfluities and luxuries, and the tariff tax is levied upon necessities and raw material, the former is evidently more just. But the declaration of the Pennsylvania Democrats is another illustration of the fact that the Democratic party declines to make the tariff an issue. Every successive State platform which it proclaims shows more clearly that the Democratic party is clad in Republican garments, and seeks power by assuming as little difference as possible from the Republican party. But the animal which strutted in the lion's skin was not taken for the lion.

The Pennsylvania Democrats begin by asserting their fidelity to their "fundamental faith," and declare that they "uphold the sanctity of personal liberty." Indeed! and since when? The Republican party arose because the Democratic party despised the sanctity of personal liberty. They continue, loftily: "The people should only be taxed so much as is absolutely indispensable for the frugal conduct of their affairs, not one cent for surplus, and no unnecessary taxation." But the Republican President had already said it. In his annual Message last December President ARTHUR said, "Only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the government; of late the public revenues have far exceeded the limit;" and he recommended that they be checked. The Republican Congress checked them accordingly. How is this an appeal for support of the Democratic party?

But the most amusing clause of the Pennsylvania Democratic creed is that which concerns faith in civil service reform. "They"—that is, the Democracy of Pennsylvania—"believe in that genuine and deep-reaching civil service reform which consists in the election to office of honest, intelligent, capable, and courageous public servants, who will faithfully administer their trust, and who will be held to strict accountability for such a discharge of it, and who will redeem and purge the departments of the general government from that corruption and fraud with which they have been permeated under Republican rule, and which that party has shown itself unable and unwilling to eradicate." This is the latest version of the Democratic demand for reform of the civil service, and it is simply turning out the Republicans. It is nothing whatever but a cry for the spoils, and there can be no doubt that a Democratic victory would be equivalent to a swift and clean sweep of the entire civil service, down to the laborers and scrub-women. The result would be so startling and disturbing that the country would vigorously protest. In the opinion of an earnest Democratic reformer nothing else will fully arouse the country. But we do not take so gloomy a view. The Republicans have matured a scheme of practical reform, and have begun to apply it. The Democrats, with whom the evil began, announce that the only reform necessary is to bring them into power. The very fact that they do not declare for the vigorous enforcement and rapid extension of the reformed system already established is the conclusive evidence of the Democratic abandonment of all reform except that which is accomplished by virtuous professions of the exceeding purity of the Democratic party.

THE CONTEST IN MASSACHUSETTS.

THE selection of Colonel CHARLES R. CODMAN as the president of the Massachusetts Republican Convention is an admirable sign of the spirit and purpose of the party in that State. Colonel CODMAN is a vigorous, sagacious, and independent Republican, whose independence does not make him impracticable or visionary, and who especially represents the spirit and perception which are indispensable to Republican success in Massachusetts this year. His speech at the Convention will undoubtedly strike the key-note of the contest, and show that there is really but one object to be sought at the election by honorable and self-respecting Massachusetts men, and that is the defeat of BUTLER. The Boston Herald well defines the sole issue as Butlerism. That word describes a spirit and methods and tendencies which are radically hostile to all that the word Massachusetts means in American history and in the hearts of Massachusetts citizens. The issue is perfectly distinct, and no one need misunderstand it.

Every voter who desires decent politics and the preservation of the good name of the State will gladly support any reputable Republican candidate who may be nominated against BUTLER. There has been some report of the unwillingness of certain Republicans to support this or that man because, although of undoubted honesty and ability, he may not be zealous enough in this or that movement of reform. It is incredible, however, that there should be many such, or that any man who is intelligently devoted to any wise reform should not see that all progress is impossible until the chief obstruction of any real reform is removed. A man may be a little too warm or a little too cool upon the temperance question or upon civil service reform; he may seem to be a little too strong or a little too weak upon the tariff or upon the repeal of the internal revenue, but these are not the issues in Massachusetts at this particular election, and a temperance or civil service reform Republican might as wisely have refused to vote for GARFIELD in 1880 because his views upon those subjects may not have been in every detail satisfactory as to reject a Republican candidate for the Governorship of Massachusetts for the same reasons.

Votes at an election where there is a plainly paramount issue can be wisely cast only with reference to that issue. In the national election of 1860, when the overshadowing question was that of the extension of slavery, a man would have been crazy who should have refused to support Mr. LINCOLN because he might not have been sound upon the tariff. In 1864, when the real question was the vigorous prosecution of the war, to have refused to vote for him because he was too slow about emancipation would have been idiotic. So in Massachusetts at this election the commanding question is, Shall BUTLER be Governor? and this question must determine every man's vote. Some Republican candidate, indeed, may be nominated whose views upon certain subjects may not be wholly satisfactory to certain Republicans. But this need not repel them. For instance, BUTLER professes to favor woman suffrage. A Republican candidate may be presented who does not favor it. A voter who is friendly to that cause must then ask himself whether BUTLER's profession of interest in the subject outweighs all the mischief which the official supremacy of such a man necessarily brings upon the State. So BUTLER, in an interview last winter, expressed the most excellent sentiments upon civil service reform. But in view of his actual course upon this subject, and of the whole conduct of his administration, can any honest civil service reformer really think that he serves the cause either by voting for BUTLER or by refusing to support an honorable and worthy opposing candidate who has made no such professions? We do not believe that there is a corporal's guard of such voters in Massachusetts who at this election would refuse their votes to a sound and honest Republican because he did not hold their precise views of civil service reform.

A WORD IN SEASON.

THE friends of the Niagara Falls reservation have thus far been singularly discreet in their conduct of the enterprise, and it would be unfortunate if the reservation should now be imperiled by extravagant demands. The report of the Commissioners will be presented to the next Legislature, and it will probably recommend the purchase by the State of the land essential to the design. There will probably be some opposition, as to every public project of the kind, and the conclusive argument for the adoption of the expected proposition of the Commission will be that the land to be taken is essential to the object contemplated.

This, it seems to us, should be borne constantly in mind by all friends of the reservation. An enlargement of the plan, however pleasant and desirable in itself, would probably defeat the main purpose. The population has proceeded from the first upon a definite line, according to the report of the Commissioners of the State Survey in 1880, which was transmitted to the Legislature by ex-Governor SEYMOUR, the president of the board.

The essential point is admirably stated in a letter to the Sun by Mr. J. B. MANSON, the corresponding secretary of the association:

"I was convinced that the intelligent people of the State would provide for the preservation of the scenery about the Falls of Niagara if the matter could be presented to them plainly and honestly. But I do not believe they will favor the extension of the proposed reservation several miles down the river, past the village of Suspension Bridge, so as to include the region around the Whirlpool. The scenery there is not threatened with destruction, so it is near the Falls, nor is the State ownership of the land so far down the river essential to the interest or value of the scenery of Niagara. The enormous enlargement of the proposed reservation, and of its cost, if seriously urged by friends of the movement, would, I think, insure the defeat of the original enterprise, and should rightly have that result."

This passage undoubtedly expresses the views of the association, and of those who have been most persistent in advocating the enterprise.

THE OBELISK CRABS.

PROFESSOR A. C. MERRIAM, of Columbia College, has written a monograph upon the Obelisk crab inscriptions, which the HARPERS have neatly published, as becomes one of the most thorough works of archæological scholarship ever accomplished in this country. The obelisk known as the GORRINGE obelisk, from the gallant officer who raised it successfully and transported it to this country, originally rested upon four bronze sea crabs. Two had been stolen, and the two that remained were seriously broken and defaced.

The inscriptions upon them had been deciphered in Alexandria, and the interpretation had been accepted by Egyptian scholars. It was repeated in this country by Mr. PETABODY, who has for some years assailed upon archæological grounds the honesty of the Director of the Metropolitan Art Museum. The Alexandrian interpretation was also accepted by Commander GORRINGE, who claims, however, to be neither an archæologist nor an Egyptologist. The Alexandrian interpretation, however, was a badly inaccurate. The original pair of crabs having been deposited in the Museum, the Trustees referred the question of the inscriptions to President BARNARD, of Columbia, and he to Dr MERRIAM, Adjunct Professor of Greek in the college.

Professor MERRIAM has shown the error of the Alexandrian rendering in a way perfectly satisfactory, testing his work at every point by contemporary facts already known, so that his essay is conclusive. He corrects dates and names, but with a modest courtesy and an appreciation of the peculiar difficulties which obstructed the previous examinations which are as honorable as his own scholarly spirit and skill are evident. The monograph is a credit to American scholarship of which we may well be proud. Professor MERRIAM has broken a lance with MOMMSEN, and come off victorious. For MOMMSEN, accepting the Alexandrian interpretation, had held that the temple before which the obelisks stood had not been erected to AUGUSTUS, but by AUGUSTUS to his father, JULIUS. To have corrected MOMMSEN is a bright laurel for an American scholar.

A SIDE LIGHT.

IT is amusing to see from a letter of the writer known as "Ouida" that the question of an international copyright is beginning to present itself to England in a new light. The competition of American fiction in the English market arouses at least the apprehension of Ouida. "What I want to know," she says, "is this: On what terms are American novels republished by London publishers? If in a question of vital interest to all English authors."

It is natural that she should think American novels to be overestimated in England, but she is not wrong in saying that the question is one of common interest to authors and publishers. It is very clear that if books were not written, publishers would not exist, and if authors were not rewarded, fewer books would be written. In two neighboring countries of the same language and traditions, but of different governments, as the literary supply becomes more equalized in any department, the question of copyright will inevitably arise from the side both of the writer and the publisher of books, and the attempt to separate their interests will be futile.

This is the precise situation for which the "arrangement" of which Ouida has evidently heard was proposed, and the opposition to which has come from some of the interested parties. If in a very sensible and practicable scheme, and by far the most promising that has ever been suggested. It is the English publishers that Ouida most persuade. English authors already agree with the great body of American authors and publishers.

OLD AND NEW.

WHEN Judge HOADLY returns from Alabama he will undoubtedly explain the statement of Mr. WOODWARD, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, that the Judge told him that "McLEAN had made his nomination cost him too much money." The fact that Judge HOADLY has been nominated as the Democratic candidate for the Governorship of Ohio can not have changed the man, and whatever may have been said of him hitherto, his personal veracity has never been impeached. He stated in the strongest manner to Governor FOSTER that the story of his buying the nomination was an unqualified lie, and he demanded the name of the liar. The author of the story has now repeated it in detail, and Judge HOADLY can not rest upon his previous general denial.

The incident forecasts the character of the purely personal campaign which menaces us next year. Whoever may be nominated upon either side will be assailed with accusations which will at least trouble, if they do not persuade, many voters, and under which all questions of policy or administration will disappear. The ludicrous personal tattle about Mr. TILDEN is another illustration of it. Both the HOADLY and the TILDEN stories show the awful harmony which prevails in Democratic circles, and which certainly is not surpassed by that of the Republicans.

Meanwhile Judge HOADLY'S "new Democracy" does not plainly appear. All that his nomination, which was hailed as the dawn of a brighter day, has yet accomplished is to show that the better spirit and hope of progress which he was supposed to represent are heartily hated by the old Democracy.

A LATE DISGRACE.

THE savage brutality of the mob in the draft riots, the frenzied delight in human suffering and the mad inhumanity which they revealed, were appalling to many persons who had not believed that in any American city in this year of civilization such barbarism was possible. It showed how absolutely cruel and fierce is a certain class of the population. But it was no stronger evidence of it than the spectacle of the late prize fight at the Madison Square Garden.

Nothing could be more disgusting than the reports of that fight in the papers of the next day, and it was the more striking that the scene was not some noted criminal and notorious quarter of the town, but the very centre of its most refined population. Two men stood up in the presence of a vast ignorant and debauched crowd, and, amid savage yells of excitement and fury, punched and pounded each other until one, half blind and senseless from the encounter, was taken away.

The most significant commentary upon the incident is the fact that if was treated by the papers as an event certain to be of profound and universal interest to the intelligent public that reads newspapers. Elaborate descriptions of every repulsive detail were printed to many of the papers. Of course it was not news. Two men engaged in "knocking each other out"—that is, in beating each other to a bloody jelly—can be of no conceivable interest to intelligent and civilized people except as a curious illustration of the persistence of the beasts in man, and of the most degraded forms of barbarism in the midst of civilization.

PERSONAL.

A TENSOR who calls himself a "phrenologist and physiognomist" is decorating the front windows of some New York stores with photographs of eminent Americans, to which he has affixed certain written descriptions of character. "The long, narrow face and head," he writes in one instance, "are inclined to work for the interest of others as well as for their own. PETER COOPER and HENRY BERGH are examples." Then follow photographs of those two philanthropists. Persons about to marry will please take notice.

—The strength of martial affection in the United States navy is the subject of complimentary notice on the part of Secretary CHANDLER. He is compelled, however, for the expected good of the service, to issue a general order forbidding naval officers on cruising war vessels to transfer their families to places of abode where the said officers may see them more frequently and conveniently. But suppose the feminine heads of those families take it into their minds to travel where they please. Has the Secretary power over them too? Or does he assume that husbands are always bosses?

—In the column of "Wants" in a New York morning journal appears this unusual advertisement: "Can any one give a deserving young gentleman a situation? Is capable of assuming any office work, or would accept a light porter's position. Will work for a moderate salary, as he is in very great need. Best references given. Address," etc. As ill luck would have it, the compositor made a mistake in the number of the post-office box given as a part of the address. He set it up 971, omitting the figure for the thousands, and the unfortunate advertiser, who is "in very great need," must be put to the delay, if not to the expense, of advertising again, even his advertisement having turned against him.

—Mr FRANK W SMITH, of Toledo, Ohio, a Union soldier of the late war, has collected funds for the purchase of about fourteen thousand United States flags, which he proposes to place on the graves of the Union soldiers who lie buried within the National Cemetery at Andersonville, Georgia. "It will take," he says, "thirteen thousand seven hundred and sixteen, allowing one flag for each grave. The remaining six hundred and eighty four will be used in decorating a wound in memory of the twenty-four thousand two hundred and eighty four other brothers who are buried in cemeteries near the Southern prisons." Mr SMITH was himself once a prisoner within the stockades of Andersonville.

—We are permitted to quote an interesting extract from a private letter just received by Colonel KEATING, of the Memphis Appeal, from Mr ALVIN C VOMAS, a lawyer of Akron, Ohio: "My attention was called to your attitude respecting the sectional feeling and differences of the different parts of our country, and especially between the North and South, by an item published in the Personals of HARPER'S WEEKLY of July 19. Permit me as a soldier of the late war, fighting against you and your people, to say that I regard such men as you as exhibiting the truest type of the American patriot. I am glad to know that you have the courage to openly and cordially urge upon your people the necessity of cultivating fraternal relations with the people of the North. Ever since the close of the war I have on all proper occasions advocated that policy, and in public at times and places when the contrary doctrine would have taken much better with the masses. But now our people are anxious to be friends with your people upon the broad plane of business—social and political reciprocity. I need not say to you I am a Republican, and about as black as they make them."

—As a companion piece to a description recently given in this column of Mr UPJOHN W CURTIS'S Queen Anne villa in the suburbs of Philadelphia, we quote the following from a new book. "The appointments of Mr TYSON'S city mansion in Walnut Street, Philadelphia, reflect a sumptuous motive, and money was not spared by the architect, who had received carte blanche. The trimmings of the doors are of Tennessee and black marble, and the wainscoting of Lake Champlain marble, with small panels faced with Siena. The ceiling of the marble vestibule is of Carrara stone, and the marble for the walls from Lake Champlain. Most of the woods are rich foreign specimens, satin-wood especially. The drawing-room and music-room, separated by an arch with highly decorated pillars, are an adaptation of the French Renaissance style about the time of Marie ANTOINETTE, and have wainscotings of amaranth wood, immense wall panels of crimson satin, and ceiling decorations of elaborate papier-maché and fresco work, and when lighted by the magnificent chandeliers, with their profusion of Florentine glass pendants, present an effect of the most brilliantly elegant description."

—One of Mr DE LESSEPS'S ten children has been very ill of typhoid fever, and his natural anxiety for the little fellow has been written about and telegraphed about as something strange. "While John Bull," says a Paris correspondent, "has imagined that M DE LESSEPS was straining his heart about the second canal in Egypt and the fiery uplift of public opinion in England, the venerable engineer was concentrating all his energies upon the means for a sick child's recovery, and was leaning his white hairs with loving earnestness over a trundle-bed." Why should he not have been, unless the business of canal-digging destroys parental affection, or Frenchmen do not love their children?

—Speaking of the refusal of England to buy the Ashburnham collections of pictures and manuscripts, the London Saturday Review says: "There is nothing surprising in this conduct, nothing unusual, nothing peculiar to one or other of the great parties in the state. Lord BEACONSFIELD'S government, before annexing Cyprus, let the Typhoite collection of General CESNOLA be sold to America for a song. The Americans are now depreciating the value of their purchase: no wish they could sell it back at cost price. It is a matter of taste; but one single gem—an emerald engraved with the story of Boreas and Orithyia—seemed to us a desirable as even the Ashburnham MS decorated by the pencil of Fra Angelico and his great contemporaries. However, it is idle to make these comparisons with accuracy, because the country has lost the treasures which it could have been a pleasure to compare. The finest works of the generation before Phineas and of the generation before RAPHAELLE. They are most probably going into the possession of people who do not yet seem quite capable of understanding the measure of their own good fortune."

—President GRANT compliments the Pope. "Leo XIII," he says, "is not, perhaps, what may be called a Liberal, but he comprehends Liberal ideas, if he does not there them"—which is true of most persons of education; "he is an honest, well-meaning man"—which shows that the President must have been admitted into the Pope's closest intimacy, as the French say, else how could he have become acquainted with the foundations of his moral nature?

—One of the most picturesque towns of the Southern Tyrol is Primiero, but the traveller's sleep there is disturbed. Every half-hour during the night a loud voice is heard somewhat as follows, "Ehre ce dieci ore, niente di nuovo"—that is to say, "Ten o'clock, and nothing new." It proceeds from the watchman, or matinal, who makes his way through the streets announcing the periodic flight of time and the safety of things in general.

—The hero of WILKIE COLLINS'S latest novel, Heart and Science, is a doctor who practises vivisection, and one of its exciting incidents is of a poor wretched dog which, after being operated upon in the interests of science, refuses to go away from the doctor's laboratory (although the doctor tries to drive him out), but lingers in spite of all rebuffs, and licks his torturer's hands.

—"A Confirmed Dine-out" writes to the Pall Mall Gazette against "the tyranny of champagne." At all London dinners, he says, the staple of the entertainment is that effervescent fluid, whether the meal is served at a private house or at a club, at a bachelor's rooms or at a hotel. "How well can knows the routine! First the glass of sherry after your soup, then the glass of hock (generally rather thin) after the fish, and then the inevitable. Every wine merchant will tell you that champagne is the wine most fatiguing to the palate to taste, and if in taste, how much more as an drink continuously! On the other hand, the least lukewarm wine to taste is claret. Now, since as a London dinner party one is obliged to be two hours in a space more or less confined and hot, why should not claret have a chance?"

—On the position of women in Tasmania, a British ex-consul, Mr HENRY RUTLEY, writes: "Woman is made to perform every kind of degrading labor. She prepares the fields for planting, she drives the oxen and holds the plough; and not unfrequently she takes the place of the ox before the plough. She sows the seed and fills the mill; she shovels, she hoes, she reaps, she gathers the harvest, she threshes the grain and carries it to the mill; she grinds it at the mill; she markets the produce of her small strip of land to buy bread for her children and liner for her lord and master; she does the work and the drudgery in the factories; she is the scavenger for cleaning the streets, and for gathering offal in the cities and highways for enriching the land. She does everything but play soldier and hang around beer shops and drink beer from early morn until late at night." But every adult American who has travelled in Spain, in France, in Italy, or in Austria has seen similar instances of the degradation of women; and on returning home, he has had to go on further than Harlem Flats to witness others like them.

—The city authorities of London have instituted a medal to be given to every member of the Fire Brigade who has served faithfully fifteen years. It would require a good many medals if all the watchmen of New York city, who served faithfully fifteen years in the old Volunteer Fire Department, were to be decorated.

—As an illustration of WILL CARLETON'S poem, "Over the Hills to the Poor-house," has occurred in Cleveland, Ohio. An old man named JONATHAN C. BOWERS died recently to the city infirmary, seventy-five years of age, childless, friendless, and alone. Years ago he was wealthy, and owned a large hotel in East Cleveland, on the spot where Adelbert College now stands, and later was an affluent merchant. He is said to have been twice worth $100,000, lost in real estate speculations, and to have always possessed a horror of going to the poor-house. Among the papers found in his meagre estate and satchel was discovered a well-marked copy of WILL CARLETON'S poem, "Over the Hills to the Poor-house." Other things in his possession were $7000 in worthless stock certificates of a Colorado silver mine, a letter certifying that he was a good Methodist, and six cents. These were what remained of two large fortunes. No relative or friend of the poor old man was found to give the body other than a charity burial, and it was interred in the cemetery connected with the poor-house.

SANDS POINT, LONG ISLAND.—Drawn by Charles Graham.—[See Page 519.]

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Matrimony," "Miss. De Mariana," "No New Things," "Heaps of Money," etc.

CHAPTER IX.—(Continued.)

MY UNCLE IS DISAPPOINTED IN ME.

It was some days before I saw her again. Not that I did not make many attempts and invent divers ingenious pretexts to secure a meeting; but, from one cause or another, none of these proved successful; and when I did meet her it always so chanced that there was a third person present. Far more than a week thus constant ill luck pursued me. If I lay in wait for Maud in the village, all I gained by it was the privilege of sharing her society with Mrs Bunce or some other intrusive old woman; if I walked over to the Rectory, there was no getting rid of the Rector; and although, upon those occasions, she was as friendly as ever, that was not what I desired. I wanted to see her alone, and I was not at all sure that I wanted her to be friendly. At least, I wished her to show some consciousness that there had been a coolness between us, and that it was owing to that coolness that I had absented myself at Easter, whereas she appeared determined to ignore both these circumstances. At the end of a fortnight it became evident that Maud was avoiding me purposely, and I was growing very indignant, not to say sulky, when the opportunity which always comes to those who wait came to me.

On the northeast shore of Thirlby Broad, in the part where the reeds and rushes are highest, and where the weeds meet the water, there is a little quiet creek, in which, long ago, a rotten old flat-bottomed punt used always to lie moored. It was seldom visited, save by sportsmen, the treacherous nature of the ground over which it must be approached making it somewhat difficult of access; and indeed the spot has no attractions powerful enough to tempt any one into risking a wetting in order to reach it, unless it be at the hour of sunset, when, looking down the vista of reeds, you get a curious narrowed view of what looks like a lake of fire. Seen thus, as through a tunnel, the distance is greatly exaggerated, so that to the eye of the imaginative spectator those dazzling ripples appear to stretch far away to the very edge of the world, and to lose themselves at last in the bosom of the great sinking sun himself. Some ragged rushes rise huge and black in the foreground, and in the middle distance is a tiny islet overgrown with bulrushes; but the opposite shore can not be seen, because of the mist which hangs over it, and which seems to form one with the red glory of the sky. Such as it is, that scrap of landscape has remained clearly stamped upon my memory, from which the outlines of many more notable ones have faded away, for it was at the spot and the hour which I have attempted to describe that I came unexpectedly upon Maud Dennison one still summer evening, and it was then and there that an interview of the highest importance and interest took place.

I had strolled down to the Broad to satisfy myself as to the well-being of some ducks which Bunce and I had left among the reeds as a decoy, and it is probable that if I had had the smallest suspicion that I was likely to encounter Maud in the course of my walk I should not have arrayed myself in my oldest clothes and a pair of high wading boots. There, however, she was, sitting in the punt, with her back turned toward me and her hands clasped round her knees, and I would not allow a mere question of costume to stand between me and the happiness of joining her. She started up from her contemplation of the sunset when the splash of advancing steps caught her ear, and, on recognizing me, made as though she would have disembarked and retired; but she did not act upon this impulse, because, for one thing, she could not have stepped upon firm land without some preliminary manœuvring with the punt pole, and, for another, I was out going to let her escape; and doubtless determination was written upon my brow.

"Why do you always treat me as if I had the plague?" I asked, reproachfully, after I had waded up to the side of the punt, and had been allowed the privilege of holding her slim fingers for a moment. "You would have bolted now if it hadn't happened to be physically impossible; you invariably do bolt as soon as I appear. I wish you would tell me why."

As she made no reply, I added, pathetically, "And I had such lots of things to say to you, too!"

She had resumed her seat and her former attitude, and was now once more devoting the winds of her attention to the sunset, instead of to me. "Say on," she returned, composedly.

"I will," said I, "as soon as you have answered my question."

She turned her head for a moment to inquire, "Did you ask me a question?"

"You know I did. I asked you why you always run away from me now."

"Oh, I not sure I never ran."

"You walked very fast, at all events. Honestly now, isn't it true that you have been trying to keep out of my way for the last fortnight?"

Maud hesitated for a short space, but no last made up her mind to say "Oh yes, it is quite true, since you will insist upon knowing. I have my reasons for wishing to deprive you of my company just at present."

"And might I inquire what those reasons are?"

"No, you might not. They are stupid reasons. Or rather they are good reasons enough of their kind, only they can't very well be talked about without some embarrassment—which is certainly stupid. Does that satisfy you?"

"Not a bit," I replied.

"Ah, then I am afraid you will have to remain in a state of dissatisfaction. That will help you to sympathize with me, for if ever any one had cause to be dissatisfied I have. My power in the parish is a thing of the past. Mrs. Farquhar meets me and beats me at every turn. I suppose you know that she has quarrelled with the Bloomer man, and is coming back to church, with a whole flock of parishioners at her heels. What makes it so humiliating is that I was bringing them round, one by one, and she knew it. She fights like Napoleon, by moving large masses, which is quite destructive of all the finer tactics of warfare. But I don't want to talk about my afflictions: he an hour one of the many things that you have to say to me."

I observed that, to begin with, I should very much like to know why she had scorned the dog which I had been at such pains to select for her.

"More questions!" she exclaimed, laughing. "I wish you would try to adopt some other style of conversation, Charley. I hate answering questions."

"And letters too, in course," I remarked.

"My father answered yours for me. I didn't scorn the little dog at all. I was very sorry to be obliged to refuse him. But—well, I had a reason for that also."

"And also a reason that can't be mentioned?"

"A reason that it would be embarrassing to mention, as I said before. And yet," she added, after a momentary silence, "I don't know why I should allow myself to be embarrassed by it, after all perhaps you may as well be told. It was only that Mrs Farquhar came to call one day, and said disagreeable things about our being so much together. What she says is of no great consequence, perhaps, but it made me rather angry at the time, and I was determined that she should have no excuse for doing it again."

Maud delivered herself of this explanation in a perfectly unembarrassed voice, but it seemed to me that a faint reflection of the pink sunset glow had found its way into her cheeks.

"So that's why you wouldn't have poor old Scamp!" I exclaimed. "Now I understand it all, and if you only knew what a weight you have lifted off my mind, you would wish you had spoken a little sooner. I left the poor little man up at Oxford, because I thought it would be unfair upon him to bring him into company where he was despised, but now I shall send for him at once, and I shall be very much astonished if you don't fall in love with him at first sight. I suppose you won't consent to accept him yet, but I consider that he is none property, and I shall bend him over to you as soon as we get rid of Mrs Farquhar. And that won't be a very long time to wait, because I shall slay her with my own hands if she goes on behaving in this outrageous way."

Maud, with her chin supported by her hand, was gazing at the misty distance, and made no rejoinder for some minutes. "You ought not to speak against Mrs. Farquhar," she remarked at length: "she is quite devoted to you."

"I don't want her devotion," I returned, ungratefully.

"You may want it some day—though it is very uncertain whether you will keep it, I should think." And then, after another interval of silence, "You have been let into the family secret, I hear."

"Yes. Did you know all it all along?"

"I guessed what it must be, and then Mrs Farquhar spoke about it quite openly. She thinks all will go smoothly now, her only fear is that you may be quixotic enough to hunt out the lost sheep and obliterate in his favor. She asked me whether I thought you were likely to be so irrational as to cut your own throat, but I told her I didn't know you sufficiently well to give an opinion. It was then that she began to make unpleasant speeches."

"I don't want to stand between father and son," I said, with a twinge of conscience as I remembered how my enthusiasm in this matter had cooled down. "I made up my mind from the first that I would bring them together again if I could. Don't you think yourself that I ought?"

She did not answer at first, but presently she said, slowly, "Yes, I think you ought."

"Then," said I, "you may be sure that I shall try."

"But I hope you won't succeed," she added.

"Why not?"

"Oh, one may wish one's friends to be heroic, but one is not bound to wish that they should be turned out into the cold."

"I shouldn't mind that a bit," I declared, "if you thought me heroic for doing it. Maud, there's nothing I wouldn't do to please you. I care a great deal more for one word from you than for all the houses and lands in Norfolk."

"Won't you catch cold if you stand up to your knees in water much longer?" she asked, altogether disregarding this hyperbolic compliment.

"What can I do?" said I. "I'm afraid I couldn't get into the punt without upsetting it."

"I beg you will not attempt any such thing. But I see no reason why you should not return to the bank."

"And about across the water as you." No, thank you, I prefer to stay where I am. Maud," I continued, resting my arms on the edge of the punt, and looking up into her face (for the mention of the circumstance that our noses had been coupled together by Mrs. Farquhar had greatly emboldened me)—"Maud, do you know why I kept away from Thirlby at Easter?"

"I can't imagine," she replied, with something disagreeably like a quiver of suppressed laughter in her voice. "What can have been your motive? Did you withdraw into a cave in order to carry on your studies without danger of [illegible]

"No," I returned, somewhat tartly, "I didn't. I went back about the country in a dog-cart with another fellow. After the way you had behaved about Scamp, I [illegible] you don't care for me, and I won't going to [illegible] house only to be made miserable. So I thought I would [illegible] myself and forget you; only of course I couldn't, and— But what is the use of my telling all this? I broke off. "I believe you know it all. I believe you know everything, really."

"Know everything?" she repeated, turning [illegible] eyebrows.

"I mean everything that there is to know a[illegible]

"SHE DID NOT ANSWER: BUT SHE DID NOT WITHDRAW HER HAND."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1809.

Digitized by Google

ther!"—I came to a full stop here, checked by the thumping of my heart, and by the sinking sensation which always precedes a leap or a plunge, however. I conquered it at once, and ended my sentence in a perfectly unequivocal manner—"you know that I love you."

She made no reply, but sat perfectly motionless, with her head still turned away from me; and so long did this silence continue that at last I was obliged to repeat, in a tone of entreaty, "You do know it, don't you?"

"Yes, I know you think so," she said, quietly.

"Think so?" I cried—"think so! You might as well say that I think I am alive. If I can be sure of anything in the world, I am sure of my love for you. It began the very first day that I saw you, it has always been the same ever since; and it always will be the same as long as I live."

"I suppose people always say that when they are in love," Maud remarked, bending over the side of the boat, and drawing her fingers absently through the water. And I doubt whether she heard much of the eager asseverations which I proceeded to pour forth; for she jumped up abruptly while I was in the midst of my harangue, and said it was time to go home. "Will you pull the paut to the beak, please, and let me get out?"

"Very well," I said; "but you will give me an answer before you go?"

"Let me land first." And presently she had her hand lightly on my shoulder, and sprang ashore, saying, calmly, "Good-night, Charley."

"And my answer?" said I.

She laughed as she looked down upon me from the bank. "You haven't asked me anything," she observed. "You have only been making statements, and they don't require an answer."

"Then," I returned, "I will ask you something now. Maud, whatever you may say, you know that I love you. Do you—can you—"

"That's enough," she interrupted; "I don't want you to ask any more. Supposing—only you are not to suppose anything of the kind, please—that I had an inclination to—to feel to the way you mean, I should consider it an imperative duty to stifle that inclination."

"An imperative duty?" I echoed, doubtfully, being unable to distinguish her features in the waning light, and having a painful suspicion that she was laughing at me.

"Oh yes: you as you feel in your duty to seek out young Mr. Le Marchant and put him in your place, you know. Duty so often compels us to turn away from brilliant prospects, unfortunately."

By this time I had scrambled up the bank to her side, and was able to convince myself of the mortifying fact that she was positively and literally laughing. "I must say that I did not expect you to make fun of me," I exclaimed, wrathfully.

"I me not making fun of you, Charley," she answered, "or at least only a very little. But don't you think it is better not to be too serious over it? In a few years' or perhaps a few months' time you won't look back upon it as having been a very serious matter yourself, and you mustn't be angry with me because I can see a little further into the future than you can. There is nothing wonderful in your thinking me perfection just now, because I happen to be the only girl of decent birth and education in the neighborhood; but it would be very wonderful indeed if you continued to think so after meeting numbers of better-looking, better-dressed, and cleverer women, as you certainly must do before you are much older."

"That wonder will take place," I declared, firmly.

"We shall see. In the mean time will you do me a small favor?"

"A thousand."

"You are too liberal; I only ask for one. It is that you will not refer to this subject again."

"That is absurd," I exclaimed. "I am willing to do anything in reason, but I can't perform impossibilities, and I don't think you ought to require them of me."

"Then you will drive me out of the county, that is all," she said, turning away. "The Saville's have asked me to go and stay with them, but I mean to decline, because I thought I should have a pleasant summer here, now that you and George Warren have come back, and very likely it will be the last that we shall spend together. Now, however, I shall be obliged to go, though it will be very inconvenient in many ways."

This threat brought me down on my knees, so to speak, at once. Sooner than that Maud should go away I was ready to consent to anything—almost anything. I promised to submit: all I entreated was that she would give me just one word of hope to keep me going, and that at least she would believe in the sincerity of my love. It she could not give me credit for constancy, I was sorry for it: only time could convince her that she was wronging me there. As for me, I knew that I could never change. "Whether you care for me or whether you forget me, Maud, it will always be just the same. There may be members of women in the world superior to you, as you say; but it is quite certain that I shall never think so, and I will not give up the hope of winning you some day until I find that you love another man."

I did not obtain much from her in return for a great many vows such as these; but she did not refuse to listen to me, and that, I thought, was a good sign. "It is agreed, then," she said at last, "that you are not to speak like this again."

"Until when?"

"Until—until—oh, I don't know. Until I give you leave."

"But that may be never," I said, dolorously.

"It may be never," she agreed, smiling. "Still, while there is life there is hope; and as you mean never to change, it won't matter if you have to wait some little time."

"You don't forbid me to hope, then?" I cried, eagerly.

She did not answer; but she did not withdraw her hand, of which I had managed to gain possession, and I repeated my appeal, "You don't forbid me to hope?"

I suppose that neither she nor I can have had all our faculties about us at that moment; otherwise we cannot surely have heard footsteps coming near. Certain it is that we were both thrown into the most extreme discomfiture when my uncle's voice, close to my ear, said: "I don't know whether you are aware, Charley, that it is half past eight o'clock, and that dinner is over. My mother has sent me out to look for you, preparatory to giving orders for having the Broad dragged." And I believe that it was to spare our blushes that the dear old fellow pretended only at that moment to recognize Maud. "Bless me! can that be Miss Dennison?" he speculated. "My dear young lady, your father will be in a fine fright! You must allow us to see you home. On these long evenings one is apt to forget to look at one's watch."

I was too dumfoundered to speak, for I was sure that my uncle could not have helped overhearing my last words; but Maud, who should have found the situation even more awkward than I did, recovered herself with feminine rapidity.

"My father won't feel anxious, Mr Le Marchant," she said, "because he has gone to Norwich to see the Bishop. And you must not think of seeing me home, thank you; I am quite accustomed to walking about by myself. It is much more important that you should take Charley back, and set Mrs. Farquhar's mind at rest."

My uncle, however, would take no refusal. His old-fashioned ideas of courtesy rendered it absolutely imperative upon him to escort belated ladies to their own door, and he was not the man to allow any inconvenience attendant upon walking through muddy copses and lanes in the evening shoes to deter him from the execution of his duty. Presently, therefore, Miss Dennison set off homeward under efficient protection, she and my uncle beguiling the way with bland conversation, while I remained silent, and wondered what they were thinking about all the time. Probably mother of them was very sorry when the Rectory was reached; but they kept up appearances in a highly creditable manner to the last moment, and parted with the usual interchange of polite speeches.

When we had said good night, and had turned our faces toward the Hall, my uncle did not take my arm, as it was his general custom to do when we were alone; and I knew that he was displeased with me, though he said nothing. Perhaps he was waiting for me to speak first. However, I thought I would leave it to him to break the ice; and after a while he did so in a manner which rather startled me.

"Charley," he said, "this will never do. I me sorry to have to say it; but I must say that I am disappointed in you."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"I owe you an apology for having played the eavesdropper," he went on, without noticing my interruption, "but I hope you know that I should never do such a thing intentionally."

I said I was quite sure of that.

"So: I should never have done it intentionally," he repeated; "and indeed I caught no more than two or three words. Such as they were, though, there was no misunderstanding them, and I am afraid I must take it that, when I came up, you were in the act of making Miss Dennison an offer of marriage."

"It wasn't exactly that," I murmured.

"Not an offer of marriage? Then, may I inquire what it was?"

"It was a—a sort of a—oh, you know," I answered, finding no accurate definition quite beyond me. "I didn't say a word about marriage, as never got as far as that; and of course I should have had no right to talk about marrying. One can't marry upon twopence-halfpenny a year."

"And do you think," asked my uncle, "that it is a gentleman-like or an honorable thing to speak to a girl of love when you are not able to speak to her of marriage?"

I answered, somewhat confusedly, that I had not thought of the matter in that way.

"That is exactly what I complain of," he rejoined, "you ought to have thought of it. I don't know what answer Miss Dennison may have given you—"

"She gave me no answer at all. That is to say, she only told me not to do it again."

"I am very glad to hear it. Still, it is on thanks to you that she has been preserved from placing herself in a false position. Even as it is, I don't see how she is to meet you again without great discomfort."

"But it is agreed that I am to say no more about it—for the present."

"Oh!—that is agreed?"

"Yes. And early," I went on, in a somewhat injured tone, "you don't object to her personally. You wouldn't mind my looking forward to marrying her some day. You don't want me to go in for an heiress, or anything of that kind."

"My dear fellow, I am thinking of her just now, not of you. No; I have not the smallest objection to Miss Maud; on the contrary, I think that she is a very charming young lady, and that the man who wins her will be a particularly lucky man. Only, as you will not be either old enough or rich enough to think of marrying for some years to come, I doubt whether you will be that man; and therefore I say that it was a thoughtless and selfish thing to try and get an avowal out of her. Do I understand you to say that she is perfectly free?"

"Perfectly and absolutely. She gave me nothing approaching to a promise."

"Then," said my uncle, after a few minutes of silence, "I dare say we may be able to save her from further annoyance. I must think it over."

"But I don't consider myself free," I observed. "I told her that I should marry her on nobody, and I mean to keep my word."

"I have nothing to say against that: this is a matter which concerns you alone. All I wish to impress upon you is that you should hold your peace until you have something besides fidelity to offer."

"Well, I suppose you are right," I said. "I admit that I ought not to have spoken—only I couldn't help it."

"Ah, I think you could have helped it, if you had thought a little more of her and less of yourself, Charley," answered my uncle. He added, very characteristically: "Nevertheless, it is difficult for an old man to judge a young one justly. I am afraid I can't retract the meaning of anything that I have said, but perhaps the words I used may have been too harsh. If they were, I beg your pardon."

At the time I thought he had been decidedly too hard upon me. I don't think so now; but perhaps that may be because I am no longer young myself.

(To be continued.)

DESPONDENCY.

[This sonnet was written by "Sherwood Bonner" only a short time before her death.]

A soul, which, anguish-smitten, sought release
From its own thoughts through weary hours of night
Turned with new life to greet the morning light,
And read in golden lines the longed-for peace,
When suddenly, 'mid all the fair increase
Of hope, the new found joys that round it pressed,
There stood, reproachful-eyed, a famished guest,
Whose wan, set look bade all delight to cease.
Will it be so hereafter? Shall no gain
The heaven we sought through life's long night of care,
Only to find some word, once heard in vain,
Some duty, in abuse scorning of prayer
Left unfulfilled, start up to meet us there,
Bidding us back to old remorse and pain?

WANTED—A DAUGHTER.

"An actress, sir? Never!" said Mr. Philander Greentree, in a voice that made the windows rattle in their frames.

And "Never" echoed his meek little wife, but in as faint a tone that it didn't disturb in the least the fly that was sitting on one of the pretty white puffs on her dear old head.

"And if you persist in being in love with the young woman, you must cease to be an inmate of my house," shouted Mr. Greentree. "And if you marry her, by heavens! I'll scratch you."

"Yes, we'll be obliged to scratch you," added the old lady, as mildly as she had spoken before, looking at the same time as though it would be utterly impossible for her to scratch any one under any circumstances whatever. Not that they meant scratching in the common sense of the word, scratching the young man's name from his uncle's will was the punishment they threatened.

"And I'll never give you a penny," thundered Uncle Philander.

"Oh, William, think of that!—not even a penny," said Aunt Tamasin.

"And I'll adopt a girl—I will, by heavens!" the old man went on, growing more and more angry every minute. "No more ungrateful boys for me. And she'll marry to please us, and her children shall be our grandchildren."

"My dear boy, consider," entreated the old lady. "How dreadful, how very dreadful, for us to have strange grandchildren!"

"Uncle and aunt—I suppose I must call you father and mother no longer," said the young man, slowly and firmly—"I am truly sorry to vex you, but I have plighted my faith to Miss Fieldbrook, and I can not and will not break it. She is an actress, but as good and lovely a girl as ever trod the earth—sweeter and lovelier than any girl it has been my lot to meet. And if you would only allow me to bring her here—"

"Bring her here!" repeated his uncle, stamping about the room in his rage. "Here, where your mother—I mean your aunt Tamasin—has lived in quiet, virgin—I mean quiet, holy—I mean quietness and peace, sir, for nearly half a century! How dare you even think of such a thing, sir? An actress capering around these apartments! Good heavens!"

"I wouldn't be exactly right, William, you know," said Aunt Tamasin. "I never was a capterer, and at my time of life I don't think I could get used to one. I don't, indeed."

"Oh, you dear, funny old mother—auntie—" began Will, with a smile, but encountering his uncle's wrathful eyes and frowning brow, he grew serious again, and said: "Well, if you positively refuse to receive Eva, I suppose we must part. I am very, very thankful to you for all you have done for me since I was left a fatherless and motherless boy, but give up the woman I love for a thoroughly unreasonable prejudice of yours I can not and will not. And so good-by, Uncle, will you shake hands with me?"

"No, I won't," replied Mr. Greentree, brusquely.

"Aunt, will you let me kiss you?"

"Of course I will, my dear boy," said Mrs. Greentree. "And if you change your mind, come back to us directly. We start for Greentree Cottage in a few days, you know, and I shall keep your room ready for you there all summer."

"No, don't, auntie dear," kissing her not once, but three or four times, "for I shall not change my mind, and perhaps, being one of the prettiest rooms in the house, my room may be chosen by your adopted daughter. And I hope from the bottom of my heart that she may spend so many happy hours there as I have. Good-by. Good-by, fath—uncle."

But Uncle Philander answered not by look nor word, and as the hall door closed after his nephew, he exclaimed again: "An actress! By heavens! the boy's gone mad, and I cash my hands of him forever."

"Don't say forever," begged Aunt Tamasin.

"Forever's a long time—a very long time, Philander. And, oh dear! how I shall miss him! Such a good child as he has always been ever since he came to us fifteen years ago! Better in some things even than you, Philander, for you know you always say bad words when I lose my spectacles, which he never did, but looked for them time and again with the patience of an angel." And taking off said spectacles, she proceeded to lose them once more by having them on the back of the sofa, whence they dropped to the floor behind it, where, with the dreadful "depravity of inanimate things," they remained snugly hidden, while she wept piteously in her large lemon-certain scented silk handkerchief.

A few days after Will Greentree bade them "good-by" the old couple were installed for the summer season in their comfortable country house, Greentree Cottage. And in Greentree Cottage came, before they had been there a week, the note from one of their oldest and most intimate friends—

"New York, June 9, 18—.

"My dear Tamasin and Philander,—You told me, you will remember, just as you were leaving the city, that you would like to receive into your house this summer some young girl—the more friendless the better for your purpose—with a view, should she prove lovable and entertaining, to adopting her. Strange as it may appear, you had not been gone more than two hours since I met a young girl who I think will suit you in a charm. She is pretty, of cheerful disposition, unusually well-educated, and naturally poor circumstances (her grandmother and only relative, with whom she lived, having died three weeks ago) homeless. I have spoken to her about your wish, and she is perfectly willing—nay, anxious—to come to you. And I am sure in companionship will add to your happiness and help you to forget the disobedience of your self willed nephew. Anyhow, receive her as a welcome guest for my sake, for I loved and lost in mother; that is, she married the other chap.

"Faithfully yours, James Towzle."

Mr Greentree's face brightened as he read the note. "There, my dear," he said, handing it to his wife, "Townly—he always was the best and most reliable old chum a fellow ever had—has already found our daughter. For this girl will certainly please us, being heartily approved of by him. Pretty, clever, and cheerful."

"Yes, so he says," said his wife, "but he needn't have called poor William bad names for all that. And I won't give her the boy's room. There's so many trousers and boots and lame ball and fishing things in it, that couldn't be of the slightest use to her, and would only in to in war."

"Do as you like about that, my dear," rejoined Mr Greentree, who, to tell the truth, was secretly pining for the discarded one, and anxious to have some young life in the cottage; "but see that the room she is to have is got ready immediately, for I shall telegraph to Townly to send her at once."

And he did. And the result of the telegram was that the very next morning Miss Zerelda Ardenmore made her best courtesy to the old lady and gentleman who wanted a daughter.

And never were any elderly people so quickly and entirely bewitched by any fair maiden as were Philander and Tamasin Greentree by the same violet-eyed, golden haired, sweet-voiced, petite Zerelda Ardenmore.

And on day followed day, and week followed week she became more and more dear to them. She went through the house from morn until eve, warbling like a bird, and when evening came she sat at the old-fashioned piano and sang for quaint old English ballads that Tamasin used to sing in her youth, while Philander, brave in tall low tailed, brass-buttoned blue coat, turned the pages of the music with gentle hand. She tripped lightly over field and meadow every day, and culled the loveliest of wild flowers, which with a grace that was all her own she arranged in vase and shells, and whatever she could find to hold them, until each room looked like a fairy bower.

And many a beautiful poem she repeated with rare skill in the gloaming, bringing the happy tears to the eyes of her delighted listeners. "Ah! if Will had only made Ave his choice!" the old lady would say to her husband at least a dozen times a day.

"My heavens! if he had," that impulsive individual would reply, "he wouldn't have waited long for my blessing."

The summer passed pleasantly, very pleasantly, away, and the advent of autumn found Mr and Mrs. Greentree loth to leave their cot, if that were possible, with their charming guest.

"And do you think you could love us enough to call us father and mother, and to promise that when you give your whole heart to some one else you will not forsake us?" asked Mrs. Greentree of Zerelda one sunny September day.

"I know I could—I know I do," answered the girl, emphatically. "But I have a confession to make to you that I fear will more you from me."

"My dear, it must be something very terrible to do that. But make it at once, and have it over. Philander! Philander! Zerelda has something to tell us which she fears will make us love her less. Please come and hear it."

Philander dropped the newspaper he had been reading on the ground, and stepped into the dining room through the opened window. Zerelda stood in the centre of the room with drooping head, but as soon as he had entered she tossed back the little ringlets that tried to shade the brightness of her eyes, placed her two little hands in the lace-trimmed pockets of her dainty apron, danced lightly across to where the old couple were now seated side by side, and said, in a voice fraught with innocent cheerlessness: "After all, what I have to tell isn't so very bad. I have assured you both since I came here, haven't I?" And I can go away at once if you wish me to go." And then, dropping gracefully on one knee, and folding her hands in pretty entreaty, she said: "Please, sir, and please, ma'am, I am an actress, and my stage name is Eva Fieldbrook. But all that your friend Mr. Townly told you about me is true."

"An actress!" exclaimed Mr. Philander Greentree.

"Eva Fieldbrook!" said his wife.

"Then you are the girl that Will—" began the old man.

"That Will—" repeated the old lady.

"That Will— The same," replied Zerelda, demurely, still kneeling. "Please forgive me for being that girl."

But Mr Greentree, without another word, hastened from his chair and tore out of the room. Zerelda sprang to her feet. "I'd better begin packing at once," she said, with a serious face. "I'm sorry to have caused him so much. But indeed it wasn't my scheme at all. Mr Townly and Will made it up between them. They thought that if you knew me you would—"

"And we do," interrupted the old lady, laying her hand lightly on her arm to detain her. "Don't you do anything in haste, my dear. You don't understand Mr Greentree as well as I do. Sometimes when he seems most angry he is most pleased. I'm sure he don't want you to go away."

"Of course he don't. Who said he did?" asked the old gentleman, entering the room hastily again. "I've just sent a telegram to Will telling him important business calls him here. There's another name for you, my dear—Important Business. Not so pretty as either of the others, but we'll find a fourth before we get through that will suit you best of all—Zerelda Greentree. How do you like it?"

"And I shall've brave grandchildren the least bit strange after all," said Aunt Tamsin, a bright smile lighting up her dear good old face.

MARGARET EYTINGE.

SANDS POINT.

THERE is a striking contrast between the northern and the southern shore of Long Island. The latter presents long stretches of low, sandy beach, indented with bays and marshy inlets, and with few headlands or bluffs. The whole coast is admirably adapted to sea-bathing, and from Rockaway Beach almost to the eastern extremity there is a succession of popular summer resorts.

The coast line of the northern shore, on the contrary, is most beautifully diversified. Here we find high promontories jutting out into the Sound, softly rounded wooded hills, with lovely bays wending in between. With the exception of the more romantic portions of the Hudson River, no finer region for summer residences can be found within reach of New York, and no steamboat excursion route presents more attractions than the trip from New York to Sag Harbor. For a long distance the shore on both sides is visible from the deck, showing picturesque towns and charming private residences. Leaving the dock at Peck Slip, we pass under the magnificent Brooklyn Bridge, and catch the heavy rumble of carts and wagons, and the tread of horses' feet, pass the Brooklyn Navy-yard, and Blackwell's and Ward's islands; pass Ravenswood and Astoria, and through Hell Gate, now shorn of much of its ancient peril, and wind our way around some lovely wooded points into the smooth expanse of Flushing Bay. Further on are Riker's Island and Whitestone, and soon afterward on pass under the battlements of Fort Schuyler, and out into the Sound. A volume would be required to note all the points of interest which the trip presents.

For this time we stop at Sands Point, a delightful spot, of which our artist has given some pleasant glimpses in the sketches on page 516. It is about two hours' sail from New York, and when one has landed, and driven away from the dock into the lovely roads that wind through the untrimmed woods, one seems to have been suddenly transported into a new country, hundreds of miles away from the whirl and din of city life. Ever and anon we catch glimpses of elegant private residences, surrounded by well kept grounds and gardens, inclosed by stone walls whose roughness is half hidden by luxuriant vines and plants. On every side are evidences of taste and refinement, combined with the pleasant comforts of rural life, without ostentatious display. The drives are simply charming. They wind round among the low hills, are overhung by trees, lead every now and then to pleasant and unexpected vistas, now to some picturesque village dating back to Revolutionary times, and now to some lovely expanse of bay or Sound.

The view from the bluffs immediately above the landing is one of the most beautiful along the coast. At times scores of sailing vessels and steamers, on their way to or from New York, cross the broad surface of the Sound, and present an ever-varying panorama. The scene is especially charming at evening, when the sun has gone down, and twilight deepens over the water. The stillness is broken only now and then by the splashing of some steamer's wheels, softened by distance, the call of the whip-poor-will, or the drowsy rustle of the trees. Not a sound to remind one of the din of city life invades this rural paradise.

Every year the number of business men of New York increases who see the value and the beauty of country retreats like Sands Point, and who seek them in preference to the glittering but meretricious life of fashionable resorts. The charms of cottage life, especially along the shores of sea, river, or Sound, now attract thousands of people away from the huge hotels where rent and privacy are impossible; and every year will see the beautiful situations along the northern coast of Long Island more and more thickly dotted with summer residences where men of business can find a genuine retreat from the daily drudgery of city life.

OYSTER AND CLAM FISHERIES.

WITH every returning season the wholesale cost of oysters and clams is noticeably enhanced. To this data keepers of restaurants and eating-houses have been able to supply the public at prices which prevailed for many years past. The day, however, is near at hand when the patrons of these establishments must be prepared to meet a largely augmented tariff on their favorite morsels, stews, and broils. Apart from a growing scarcity due to the increased demand for home consumption, we are called upon to supply annually to foreign consumers thousands upon thousands of barrels. It is not to be wondered at that our oyster beds promise soon to rival those of Europe in barrenness. The efforts made abroad, regardless of cost, and under the protection and care of energetic governments, to encourage and foster the artificial propagation of oysters have been attended with such slight success as would lead us to suppose that attempts in a similar direction in this country will be productive of even less satisfactory results.

Where in Europe there were formerly hundreds of square miles of oyster beds, here there are thousands, consequently we may hope for a few years longer to enjoy the oyster at a price which will not be entirely prohibitive. The demand for this bivalve, however, is here so far in excess of what it was in Europe in the best years of its myster beds that no comparison can be instituted on which to base a surmise as to the length of time necessary for the total exhaustion of our sources of supply. Whereas, abroad, oysters are always more or less a luxury for the rich, here they are consumed, rather on the shell or canned, in every hamlet of the land from Maine to the Pacific coast.

So far back as 1660 ten million bushels were annually taken from the Chesapeake alone. To-day probably thirty million bushels are withdrawn from the same beds. No natural increase can keep pace with such an exhaustive demand. What scientific research may develop in the future in regard to the artificial propagation of the oyster can not be foretold. The results so far attained do not present a particularly encouraging outlook. One locality is very much like another in the mountainous altitudinity of the criminal and reckless treatment of our fisheries, consequently in stating the case of the Great South Bay of Long Island we tell the story of them all.

When the Dutch retired from New Amsterdam, and the English secured possession of the entire territory of Long Island, large grants under royal patent were given to favored subjects of the crown. Some of these, where the land touched the edge of the numerous bays which flank the south side of the island, carried with them proprietary rights to the fishing and fowling of the adjacent waters. So slight a value was placed by the proprietors upon these privileges that in one case this right was relinquished, in favor of a town on the edge of a bay twelve miles long and two broad, for the sum of eighteen dollars. Could this privilege, later on, have been sustained and protected, it would have given to the owner a princely revenue.

In certain cases these original rights to the ownership of the products of the bays and estuaries were retained by the descendants of the first proprietor. Thus has given rouse litigation, to which as yet no end can be seen. Could the owners of these large tracts have foreseen the destruction of what promised to be of inestimable proportions? No one comparatively a few short years since could imagine that the magnificent natural oyster and clam beds of the Great South Bay should ever come so near to barrenness as is the case to-day. The actual disappearance of the oyster from these waters might have already been accomplished were it not for the fact that the planting of this bivalve on leased beds under water has for a time postponed the evil hour.

Before the demand and consumption of the oyster became so enormous, a simple method of taking this bivalve was employed. The use of tongs was universal. Under its dispensation the exhaustion of the beds was practically impossible. The opening of new and profitable markets required the employment of more expeditious methods of taking the oyster from its bed; consequently the dredge—a bag net with heavy iron jaws, towed in the wake of a powerful sail-boat—was introduced. If this instrument simply scraped up the oysters it would not be so harmful; but for every oyster which it captures the heavy iron jaws prove to destruction a dozen into the mud. Through the use of the dredge the European oyster beds have become barren. The Long Island fishery showed no signs of exhaustion before the introduction of this trap. Immediately following upon its use the price of oysters commenced to advance from forty to sixty cents a bab (rather more than a bushel) to two dollars and fifty cents for the same measure. This increase in price, it is, however, but fair to say, was somewhat accelerated by the necessities of the foreign market, which absorbed the catch of the South Bay to preference to that of all others, from the fancied resemblance of oysters from this locality to the European sorts. Notwithstanding these demands the price of the "Blue Points" of Long Island has not enhanced in proportion to that of oysters taken from other well-known coasts.

It has been supposed that the planting of oysters on beds under water, protected and cared for by particular owners, would in a measure restore the prosperity of the oyster fishery of the Great South Bay. As a set-off to this, oysters when planted as indicated appear to be subject to perils which do not assail them on their native beds. Diseases and vigorous foes, which were less destructive to the native beds, render this new industry of oyster-culture as precarious a crop as any grown upon the land. A drought is as fatal to it as to any agricultural operation, not in the actual destruction of the oyster, but in a loss of condition from the lack of supply of fresh water from the numerous streams flowing into the bay. A rainy season is followed by a crop of fat and full flavored oysters, while during one of light rain-fall they are tasteless, and more bags of water. From the washings of the streams the oyster secures the food necessary for its full development and nourishment. Modern ingenuity has devised a remedy against the ill effects of a dry season. The oysters are placed upon floats and covered with fresh-water heated to a proper temperature by steam. A few days of this treatment transforms a flabby and watery oyster into one of aldermanic obesity.

While the cultivation of the oyster by planting has up to this time been moderately successful, it remains to be seen whether in the near future, in the face of the exhaustion of the native beds, it will be able to meet the enormously increasing demand. With the experience of the yearly enhancement in the price of oysters, it will be safe to say that those raised by cultivation will not be more than sufficient, or in the case to-day in Europe, to supply to a luxury the tables of the opulent.

The future of the hard-clam fishery is even more depressing than that of the oyster. Formerly that of Long Island was famous. "Little Neck" held with clams the same significance as "Blue Point" did with oysters. Moreover, it possessed an elastic expansion which enabled it to cover a large area of territory. We have clams to-day simply because they are not dredged, but taken with tongs, or raked on flats left bare by the receding tide. Were they as reproductive as the oyster, there would be no fear of their disappearance for years to come. Unfortunately the waters in which they are taken are limited in extent. A brief statement will show the decline as the fishery. What is said of the locality mentioned will apply to all. The clam beds in the Great South Bay of Long Island were once famous sources of supply. Ten years since a good daily catch for one man fishing with tongs from a boat was five thousand clams, slightly more or less. These sold from the boats at from ten to fifteen cents per hundred. To-day one thousand clams per man is a good average, and sell at the rate of from twenty five to thirty-five cents per hundred. Coney Island and similar resorts absorb during the season vast numbers of clams. Moreover, canning factories have been established. These send to all parts of the world steamed clams, or chowder.

We can not eat our cake and have it too, as, in other words, we can not supply with oysters and clams the immense and growing population of this country as well as that of foreign lands. To accomplish this feat we shall need a more intelligent supervision and care of our fisheries than has been accorded in the past.

CLINTON FAY.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

AN Irish girl coming out of a Chinese laundry in this city said to her companion: "He mother would send me if she knew I took them collars to a Chinese laundry. She told me to take them to a citizen's laundry." And the girls went up the street discussing the merits relatively of Chinese laundries and "citizens' laundries."

The London Engineer says that if a man had in his legs the muscular energy and leverage of a flea, he could jump a mile in three leaps. But the flea would get away from him just the same.

Hanlan, the champion oarsman, naturally would be expected to know all that is worth knowing concerning shell boats, but he recently found a man in the West who could teach him something. He wagered a hundred dollars with this Western man that the latter could not stand, sit, and paddle around in a single shell from which the outriggers had been removed, and the champion lost. Years ago, when the Yale and Harvard men used to meet annually on Lake Quinsigmond, it was considered a neat but not very difficult feat for an oarsman to bend over in his single shell and drink of the limpid water of the lake without losing his equilibrium.

A person bathing on the Long Island coast waded into a pit from which sand had been taken, and was drowned. The coroner's jury made a verdict recommending that the pit be filled up, and straightway proceeded to fill it up themselves. It is not stated what fields of usefulness these good and true men occupy, but if they can be spared, they should be taken and made a perpetual coroner's jury, with unlimited powers and liberal pay.

There is in Washington a Chinese laundryman of the name of Pin, who attends to recess at a Congregational church, and refuses to become a member of the Chinese secret society there. The others of his race are trying to drive him out of the city, but he holds his own and defies them; and, in the slang of the Midcam man, that's the kind of a clothes Pin he is.

An Iowa poet has been egged by the populace. Paradoxical as it may seem, the mob was not infuriated by his poetry, but by sentiments which he uttered as prose concerning the "lynching" of a criminal.

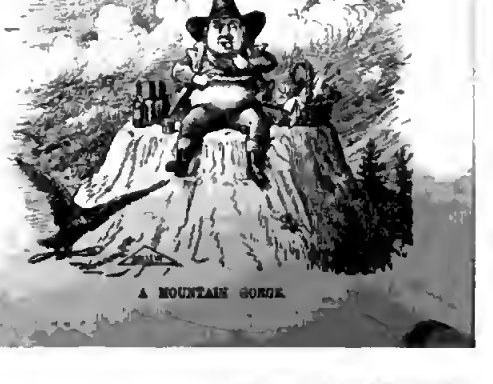
"Hunt breakfasts" are popular in Newport. They are in vogue in New York, but are not as much popular—perhaps because so many of those who are compelled to hunt for their breakfasts don't find the hunting very good.

Away off in Cape Town the relations between employers and employés seem to be arranged more nicely than they are in this country. One day in June six hundred convicts in the Breakwater cantonment "gently but firmly" refused to go to work. The account says: "With all politeness they informed the Superintendent of Police of this resolution, and he, with equal courtesy, referred them to the Public Works Department. No hint of coercion was breathed on one side, nor of violence on the other. An official of the government went down, promptly yielded the matters of diet which as most dissatisfaction, and the convicts gracefully agreed to work next day."

English visitors in the Catskill region, it is said, seldom ride in the stages, but almost invariably prefer to go on foot up and down the mountains. Some of the American visitors speculate as to whether their cousins from across the water do this for economy or because they think it fashionable to walk. The probability is that when they inhale the bracing air of the mountains they feel like walking, and that they are true to the impulse without thinking of economy or fashion.

A yarn about an Indian going down the rapids at Niagara without injury in his bark canoe, an imaginative writer in the London Telegraph displays a knowledge of the characteristic philosophic bent of the Indian mind. The red man happened to have a bottle of fire-water with him, and as he neared the angry water he seemed to awaken for the first time to a full sense of his danger. "His life probably was lost," the story runs, "but there was still time to prevent the waste of good liquor, so he raised the bottle to his lips and took a drink proportionate to the occasion." The result makes the story unfit for use in enforcing a moral, for, according to the narrator, the liquor gave him strength and courage, and, grasping his paddle, he guided his frail craft into comparatively still water.

Experiments in the use of the electric light in light-houses are soon to be made near this city. It is feared that the unerring intensity of lights thus produced will be a serious obstacle to their use, since it might result in mistaking for "flash" lights those which were intended to be continuous. Professor Morton, of the Stevens Institute, has been making tests with the view of ascertaining the highest degree of intensity obtainable in the incandescent light, which is even less than the arc light, and has succeeded in producing a lamp of four-hundred-candle intensity. This, he says, is brighter than the arc lights usually used for street-lighting, and is sufficient for light-house purposes. It has been found that the lenses now used in the light-houses are not suitable for use with the electric lamps, and new ones must be ground. It will be necessary also to provide each light-house with duplicate dynamo appliances for use in case those regularly employed should fail. It is suspected that the experiments to be made will settle the question whether the present electric lamps can safely be used in light-houses, and at an outlay within reasonable bounds. The electric light is used in light-houses both in England and France.



A MOUNTAIN SORIE.

SOUTH FROM SANDY HOOK.—Drawn by Powell and Hoban.—[For Page 522.]

THE MILL AND THE STILL.—DRAWN BY JAMES HAYWARD.—[SEE PAGE 522.]

A MEMORY OF THE SOUTH.

I see the white sails gleaming
Upon the summer sea,
And waves that pour in thunder
On isles of Caribbee.

Through moon-lit groves of orange
I hear the light guitar,
And tinkling fountains falling
Beneath the evening star.

She blew the cigarette smoke
From lips of dusky bloom,
And her dark eyes looked as me
As stars look through the gloom.

Oh, brown armed Spanish beauty,
How could I choose but say,
"My heart will still be with you
When I am far away"?

Oh, sweeter than all music
Her answer murmured low:
"My love is in your keeping Wherever you may go."

False lips that spoke as fondly!
False heart I thought my own!
She married a Hidalgo
Before the week had flown.

Ah, well, long years have vanished,
Long years of joy and pain,
Since in my day of boyhood
I sailed the Spanish Main.

But oft, when night is falling,
I feel again the spell
Of tropic seas and islands,
And her I loved so well.

Through years and over oceans
My doom is still to cry,
My heart is often with her
Though I am far away.

M. I. KING.

THE MILL AND THE STILL.

By H. H. KANE, M.D.

No staple and universal an article of diet is bread, so important and abundant an article of commerce is grain and so naturally in the one associated with the other that we scarcely ever give the subject of cereals as a source of liquor the consideration that it deserves. To the average individual corn and grain mean food, and chiefly bread, and to assert to such a one that grain is as great a curse as it is a blessing is almost invariably to call forth both surprise and indignation.

And yet it is true. Corn, typical of all grain, according to its subsequent treatment, according to the process to which it is subjected, comes forth, from mill or still, a blessing or a curse—bread or liquor. Both children of a common mother, the Cain and Abel of poor cereal life, they differ as essentially in every characteristic as do two human beings—the one bringing health, strength, and happiness to even the humblest homes, the staple food of all nations, the basis of all nourishment, the other, save in very rare instances and under peculiar circumstances, an unmitigated curse, bearing disease, dishonor, and even death into thousands of homes, blasting fair young lives, blunting every good attribute of mind and soul, prostituting honor, honesty, and integrity, deadening conscience, inciting to crime, leading to rags, squalor, and starvation, manning the gallows, peopling the poor-house, crowding the courts, and filling the prisons.

To it may be justly ascribed nine-tenths of all crime, suicide, poverty, and prostitution; from its deadly seed spring idiocy and insanity. Through its agency family ties are smothered, promising lives engulfed in debt and dishonor, friends and secrets ruthlessly betrayed, hopes and ambitions blasted, and God's masterpiece of creation—man himself—made a blasted wreck.

In no sense a food, alcohol will neither impart nourishment nor sustain life; but, on the contrary, its use invites, causes, and complicates disease, both organic and functional, poisons the blood and tissues, weakens the muscles, disorders the nervous system, and destroys the mind and faculties.

How marked the contrast between the two! the one in every sense life-giving, happiness-bestowing, body-nourishing, the other essentially a destroyer of all these, whose footsteps are invariably accompanied by misery, despair, and dishonor. Yet the difference is but a step—simply one of degree. The floured grain, moistened and kneaded, leavened with a touch of yeast, commences to ferment. The march of the flour, through the agency of the yeast, breaks down into alcohol and carbonic acid gas, the latter penetrating every part of the loaf, and making it light and spongy. Then comes the heat of the oven just at the proper moment, killing the yeast germs, putting a sudden stop to all fermentation, and giving us the brown and fragrant loaves of bread.

Huge tanks and vats in which thousands of bushels of grain are soaking. The same inventing of the mass, the same fermentation and breaking down of the starch into carbonic acid and alcohol, but so treated and favored that the latter is yielded in the largest possible amount. No restraining hand of heat to limit the process at the point where food ends and liquor begins, but every endeavor made to obtain the latter. Then the gaping maw of the still, and the serpentine coil pouring forth its steady stream of liquor, man's worst enemy. Liquor is simply one step beyond bread in the same chemical process, yet how widely, terribly different in their effects upon man!

"I was made to be eaten, and not to be drank;
To be basted in a barn, not soaked in a tank.
I come or a blessing when put in a mill;
As a blight and a curse when run through a still.
Make run up into loaves, and your children are fed;
But into a drink, I will starve them instead.
In bread I'm a servant the eater shall rule;
In drink I'm a master, the drinker a fool.
Then remember my warning—my strength I'll employ,
If mixed in strengthen, if drank to destroy."

The subject under discussion is a very wide one. Not only must we consider the evil that liquor does, but the waste of all the millions of bushels of good grain that would otherwise be made into food that it takes to feed the stills and produce the alcohol, or the thousands of acres of fertile land devoted to its cultivation that might be far better used in raising other foods if the demand for alcohol (liquor) did not exist. To how many destitute men and women and cheerless homes would their products yield plenty and happiness!

Economically, we must consider the millions of wasted lives, the unprovided, beggared, and starving families, the resulting crime, and the army of paupers, lunatics, and criminals, the heavy taxation that is required to support the prisons, hospitals, lunatic asylums, and almshouses, as well as the fact that the wages and the results of the industry of all these inebriates are lost to us, and that, were they steady, sober, industrious men, would be adding to general trade and prosperity. The sum thus lost and thus expended in restraining and providing for these individuals is enormous, aggregating billions yearly.

Who that has looked out over the acres of ripening grain, the stacks of golden corn, the sheeted white of the barley fields; who that has watched the sturdy harvesters, the busy, healthy reapers shearing Mother Earth of her bounteous crops; who that has joined in the festivities of a "husking bee"—can for a moment hesitate as to which is the proper destination of the grain, the mill or the still? How like sacrilege it seems to throw such rich and golden products, capable of yielding so much strength and health and nourishment, into the yawning mouth of the still, to come forth a poison and a destroyer!

From the quaint old mill, with its whirring stones, he muses wheel, and its sulfur flowing stream, it passes to the ends of the earth, carrying health, strength, growth, and nourishment to old and young, rich and poor—to all a blessing, in sense a curse. The hungry laborer, the poor beggar, the chubby faced golden-haired toddler with his huge slice and buttered fingers, the wealthy banker, and the homeless tramp, all welcome and appreciate it.

The reeling rain, the bright cheerful sunshine, the fertile fields, the grateful dew, the busy hum of insect life, the fragrance of the wild flower, the carol of the robin, the melody of the harvester, the creak and plash of the old mill-wheel—we, even the happy smile on the miller's face—each yields its mite to nature's ever-recurring gift, that great blessing, crowned in the loaf, that reason by reason tells the tale of "Pennsum earth, good will to man."

And so the product of the still: a deep, swift, and treacherous stream, dank with the chill of wasted lives, tainted and galled by the hopes and ambitions it has wrecked and the ties it has sundered, poisoned by the crime and lust of its victims, foul with the ooze of treacherous deeds, and clogged with clinging weeds of temptation, ever ready to engulf and swamp the thoughtless or unwary; flowing swiftly and remorselessly onward to but one end, destruction, engulfing hope, happiness and strength, making parents childless and children orphans; manning the gallows and filling the prisons, sapping strength, individual and national, and sweeping thousands of good resolutions before its resistless current, marshy and treacherous its banks, where idiocy, lunacy, and crime flourish like rank weeds.

How chameleon-like in its aspects! At first how joyous and tempting in its many allurements to both youth and age, how bright and fascinating in its promise of forbidden pleasure and joys anticipated, how apparently small and insignificant as it winds its way in and out of the events of daily life; how cheerful in its frothing, foaming conviviality, how green the fields, luxuriant the glade, and tropically magnificent the flowers that deck its banks; how easy the sailing, how unheeded the ripples of warning against the prow, as the wrecks of other lives as their fleet hopelessly by!

With what reckless hilarity and abandon the pleasure parties glide along its smooth bosom, unmindful of how swiftly the shores are receding, and how near the gloom and despair that are slowly settling over them! Then, the first froth of joy gone, and with the terrible consequences of their action staring them full in the face, they awake to a realization of their dreadful fate, and with trembling hands endeavor to steer for land. Too late: already the ill-omened nightmare birds of debt, dishonor, and disgrace perch upon and rend the frail bark, whose thin boards alone separate them from the now foaming waters beneath.

Then is the terrible force and swiftness of the current realized; then it is that hopes and promises and good resolutions so often fail to turn the doomed craft from its course; then, too late, that the foulness and pollution of the stream are seen; then that the staring and ghastly faces of dead-and-gone hope, happiness, and ambition, dropping astern, are lost to sight forever. The banks no longer green and luxuriant, but brown and scorched; the air hot and sulphurous; thirst intense, craving, deadliest; delirium imminent; the joys no longer joys, the pleasures now become burdens.

No longer the little rippling stream that the word "no" might at any moment turn from its course, but the angry, seething, troubled sea of drunkenness, the black clouds of despair, and the sullen roar of the mighty breakers of crime, disease, as dishonor, against which as many once promising lives have been dashed and hopelessly wrecked, and whose ghastly skeletons, strewing the beach as stranded high upon the shore, tell sad tales of misery, despair, neglect, and desolation.

Oh, for a breath of the cool fields where the golden grain is ripening! Oh, for a draught from the crystal stream that moves the miller's wheel!

SOUTH FROM SANDY HOOK.

THE bold New Jersey promontory rising above Sandy Hook, and grandly guarding on the south the entrance to New York Bay, was known from time immemorial as the Highlands of Navesink or Neversink; but now, and since 1879, it is the Atlantic Highlands. Here stand the twin lighthouses whose flashing rays can be seen twenty-five miles out at sea, and the country about them, which has long been one of New York's favorite pleasure grounds, is being rapidly covered with the cottages of one of its most charming summer suburbs.

At the foot of the Highlands flows the beautiful Shrewsbury River, its placid waters offering strong contrast to the restless billows of the ocean, from which it is separated by a strip of sand beach, so narrow as to barely afford room for a single railroad track, and across which ocean spray is frequently flung into the river. A little to the south, opposite the point of Rumsen's Neck, which divides the waters of the North and South Shrewsbury, the beach widens sufficiently to accommodate the pretty cottages and queer-shaped, flat-like fishermen's locations of Seabright, one of the newest and most prosperous of the many summer settlements along the coast.

From Seabright on unbroken line of brown but picturesque cottages, separated by the railroad people into three divisions, known as North, Centre, and South Monmouth Beach, extends to Long Branch. Beyond Long Branch the line is again taken up by the Elberon cottages, quaintest and most fascinating of all the odd little chalet-like structures that have sprung up, as though by magic, along this wonderful coast. They are clustered about a hotel—the Elberon—which is only a magnified cottage, offering a proportionally larger number of gables, chimney-stacks, porches, and dormers for the consideration and admiration of its guests. The euphony of the name Elberon is pleasantly significant of the beauty often concealed beneath plain exteriors, for it is a direct derivation from the name of its proprietor and founder, Mr. L. B. Brown.

Beyond Elberon for miles and miles the summer cottages and hotels extend, and the entire coast of New Jersey bids fair to be occupied in time by a vast populous cottage city. Thronging the broad avenues, by means of which these several distinct localities are connected, are vehicles of every description; probably as motley a collection as is to be seen in any part of the world. The carriage of the millionaire rolls smoothly along beside the rude cart of the farmer, and the low basket phaeton finds place beside the lumbering Tally-ho, but no point of resemblance all must give way to the village cart, a two-wheeled abomination which is generally occupied by two young girls, whose fresh beauty almost redeems its ugliness. It is cheap and popular; no horse can look well between its shafts, consequently any sort of a horse can be impressed into its service—he is especially adapted to the young, or, rather, the young are especially adapted to it, on account of their excellent digestion, that enables them to endure its wretched mal de mer ish jolting, and being devoted to the service of youth, it is freighted with more of genuine pleasure and solid enjoyment than any other style of vehicle; therefore, in spite of its ugliness and its discomforts, long live the village cart!

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

AUTHOR OF "KITTY," "EXPIATION," "HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE," "DR. JACOB," "THE SELFMADES," ETC.

CHAPTER XLII.

THUS enough, it was the lilted magician and the troop he had enchanted with his wand; every soul now as triumphantly marshalled under his banners having been brought to believe, Markham himself could hardly say how, "in the Golden Age which lies before us and not behind."

That inspiriting sound of trumpets, usually associated in our minds with state pageantries that have no meaning, but echoed tumultuous joy, stirring a thousand hearts no more accustomed to excitement of such joyous kind than were the cars of these happy people to such tranquil music. As one crowded car after another, such a veritable bower on wheels, came within the precincts, the band drawn up in readiness struck up a loud and triumphant strain. Then the garlanded and flower-bedecked carriages passed under a handsome triumphal archway, showing in golden letters the motto, "God bless the people!" whilst the banners floating on every side bore other inscriptions as new and as appropriate. What a welcome for those who had never in all their lives been welcomed before, who see even the most solemn occurrences of life daily passing before their eyes without any accompaniment to stamp them on the imagination and the memory! Alike birth, marriage, death, the greeting after long years, the supreme valedictory, all came and go as mere breaking of daily bread and girding up of the loins for daily toil.

But to-day the order of things was reversed, and instead of princes, Stephana had hidden sovereignty of quite other kind with royal circumstance to enter her gates. Want and misery were made to smile, the brows of penury wreathed with flowers, and tarped palaces quickened for the first time with wine.

"Welcome! Welcome!"

This was the word that amid a thousand more of the same joyous significance met every eye but one of the happy hundreds soon peopling Stephana's grounds in every part. Markham was compelled to realize the bewildering scene by the light of inner vision only. Perhaps, indeed, he really saw more than any other present, every presentable feature in the scene being thus heightened by the imaginative faculty. The lord, merry strains of music, the animated voices, the ejaculations of wonder and admiration on every side, must have affected him in this way as, led by a little child, he made the circuit of the place. "I see everything," she had said, heedlessly, although, indeed, her artless descriptions made him see them and far more.

"Now," she said, "a beautiful lady is coming toward us."

"You have already described so many beautiful ladies," Markham answered, smiling.

"Ah! this is the most beautiful of all," answered the child. "She has hair black as a raven's wing, and something that shines in it like a little star, and her dress is all white, with another star that twinkles on her bosom. I think it must be an angel."

"I think so too," Markham made laughing reply. "But I know that lady. Take me to her."

In another moment Stephana was by his side, and gayly disentuning the child with a kiss—she felt in the mood to embrace every one to-day—she took his arm.

"I must keep you a prisoner," she began to Markham. "You are master of the ceremonies, you know, and there is no little marshalling to be done. In the first place, how are we to get all these good people together for the banquet? It will be given at once, and as soon as all are seated I have ordered cool drinks to be handed round."

"If sitting room is provided, have no fear," Markham answered, drawing from his pocket a tiny musical instrument. "This is how I call my birds together," he said, straightway putting it to his lips.

The sound was not loud, but penetrating, and it reached the farthest recesses of the grounds. Like birds flocking at the cry of the caller came Stephana's guests, thronging round the pair, as mother a crowd as could well be convened. Seven Dials can but trick itself out for a holiday in the best it has, and the bits of finery displayed here, not only by the womankind, but by the men, were enthusiasm enough. Here might be seen gowns of a fabric and pattern in high favor several generations ago, fashions of older date still, with flowers and faded ribbons that must have been worn by brides long since laid in their graves and forgotten. There was something extremely pathetic in the persistence with which anything that could be called personal adornment had been secured on and utilized. Stephana's guests, all, be it remembered, poorest of the poor, could not, when bidden to a feast, go a-begging, no the phrase runs. They could only furbish up such gala garments and goods as they already possessed—a brooch here, precious heirloom, a moments of direst want pledged and redeemed a dozen times, a watch chain there, which had seen the same vicissitudes, with white frocks for the children, white stuff after years of lying by at a London smoke, and ribbons, dyed and redyed at home, knotting every little girl's hair. If the garb of these poor London people am pathetic, telling a tale of privation and humiliation that the more fortunate part of humankind can not realize, much less imagine, for themselves, much more to meet the faces of the wearers. Sorrow and pain you may sense, care is written at some time or other on every brow, but what painter can depict, what pen can describe, the corrugations of pinching poverty, the pallor of want, the indelible marks of perpetual struggle and grinding as entire road here? To-day a smile played on every lip, and a look of almost childish beguilement was seen in every face, but the suffering of a lifetime can not be forgotten in an hour. Even Stephana could not work such a wonder. These emaciated countenances seem to be freshened and these enfeebled frames invigorated in the happy life beyond us, but not in a day, not in a year even, hardly in a lifetime. It was a work for the all-healer Time. The crowd had now gathered round Stephana and her companion, listening expectantly for what was to come. As yet this wonderful day was an enigma and a mystery to them, but by little and little they felt that all would be made clear.

"My fellow-guests," began Markham, feeling that a little pleasant raillery and banter would be well-timed, "we all know that when we are bidden to a feast, something is expected of us. People do not give us champagne and cream for nothing. Well, we have come here, first, to be made wise, and next, to be made merry, and any one who can help us in either matter is called upon to do so. Now our first business here is to be made wise, we have all straightway to take our places demurely in yonder amphitheatre, and listen without uttering a syllable to what we shall hear."

"When the beautiful performance is over, not one who will stand up and say a few words about it and try to explain it to his neighbors will be listened to attentively. Then—But there are so many features in the programme that I am not to enumerate them all. Enough to say that the most important after the fairy spectacle we are now going to witness is the banquet. Our hostess will preside, and will say a few words to you at the close. Away, then, let us his to our places."

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1373.

In an incredibly short space of time the vast pleasure-ground was cleared of the last straggler, and, like birds congregated together before the autumnal flight southward, Stephana's happy people in one compact crowd awaited the coming spectacle. There they sat smiling and wondering, unaware of the fact that they themselves made a spectacle of deepest interest to some of the by-standers. For this artless bewilderment, this intense, almost childish satisfaction at the prospect of amusement, painted on every face, was moving to behold. The very word amusement conveyed as yet but a dim and indistinct meaning to most of them. They felt much as a handful of their members had done when sent the year before on an excursion to the sea-side. The sea, the sea, what could it be like? To-day the feeling uppermost in every mind was of curiosity. A fairy masque, an allegory with music and singing, what was that? Perplexed and delighted, all of them for the nonce turned into five-score old children, they sat with eyes fixed on the elegant stage before them, at present all silence and emptiness, soon to be turned into a scene of enchantment.

The little ones, found room for on the knees of their elders, were not more flushed with eagerness than they, as the blissful moment drew near. Even sherbet and strawberries lost their charm, and by-and-by hopefulness began to be manifested in a few timid taps of walking-sticks and umbrellas.

"Won't they ever comm?" asked one child on the verge of bursting into tears.

"What can they be about?" said another.

Impatience, indeed, had reached the highest pitch, when at last the signal was given, the band played a short introductory movement, and the beautiful show began.

Stephana had purposely withheld anything in the shape of a programme or elucidation. The best part of a poem or of any imaginative work, she said, is that part on all find out for ourselves, and if our allegory is meaningless without such aid, no amount of explanation can make it clere

And now the masquerade began.

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was not at all likely that Stephana's audience should be alive to the elaborate structure of her allegory and the thought upon thought involved in the leading idea. What they saw and enjoyed as one gorgeous procession after another with music and measure now passed before the proscenium and took its station on the stage was this:

First, heralded by joyous trumpetings, came an emblematic personage representing Britannia, superb matron and sea-queen, drawn in a car, all the insignia of empire there, and the accessories familiar to us all given on an imposing scale. As she was slowly and majestically wheeled to her station on the right hand of the stage a chorus of baby boys, dressed as Jack Tars, sang a patriotic sea song, and a gigantic union-jack was sent flying as if by magic high above the heads of the rest.

The band now struck up "Hail, Columbia!" Next came Columbia. She, as beloved imperial daughter of an imperial mother, was fair and stately to see. Her brows showed a circlet set with thirteen stars, emblematic of the glorious Thirteen, while the shield she bore was richly emblazoned with the Indian's head and the figure of Liberty. The famous motto E Pluribus Unum was given in letters of gold.

Following Columbia came a gay and motley procession: little black boys and girls in bright dresses, red Indians in their war gear, and many other impersonations. They bore the national banner, and as they crossed the stage sang lustily in chorus:

"'Tis the star-spangled banner, oh, long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!"

Rich and engrossing was the appearance of the stage now, the right side being occupied with the allegorical pageant of Britannia, the left with that of Columbia, and it seemed to the enraptured audience—although as yet not a word had been spoken by either of them majestic personages—that the spectacle was complete. Was it not enough to behold such an impersonation of Britannia, the foster-mother of every man, woman, and child present, in the spirit if not in the letter, the arbitress of every fate, the mistress of every destiny, the love of all? Fixing, too, was it that the no less majestic daughter should be there too—that blooming Columbia, emblem one of the new empire and the new destiny awaiting generations unborn beyond seas

The pageant, however, was but half over, and scarcely was the hubbub of admiration and bewilderment hushed, when a third procession was ushered in to the sound of slow and solemn music.

No part of the performance surpassed this representation of old Father Time. There was Mr Cunningham, bald as an egg, a halo round about his head, a long white beard drooping on his breast, on one shoulder the emblematic scythe, whilst from both drooped wings. Very venerable and picturesque he looked, and very impressive the utterances that now dropped from his lips.

"Hail, sweet babes and honest gentlemen all!" he said, and he leaned on his staff in the middle of the stage, and looked up with a keen, sarcastic smile. "Ah! when Time was young 'twas but a few who got these gentle names, and now every mother's son and daughter of you claims 'em, and rightly, too. Let us be jealous of 'em, for they mean nothing, or what should belong at all—independence, a high mind, a spirit to protect the weak. Every Eve shall be a lady, every Adam a gentleman, ere old Time's beard is half a yard longer. Heathen, dear babes and bantlings, 'tis old Father Time himself speaking, ye won't hear him any more! Give me, then, two ears and an understanding, and ye'll go forth the wiser, my little babes and unbreeched urchins, my pretty nurslings and stammerers, for to not the oldest white headed grandsire among you at o freshly wound puppet to Mother Time, who never had a beginning and will never have any end or all? Well," here he struck his staff on the ground, "one thing let me hammer into your understandings. There modern times have scotched a serpent, of most venomous bite too its name is Privilege. Privilege is under the head of honest men. The future of the world shall belong to all! No more prerogative except of inner manfulness and sterling worth, no more rank but of merit and virtue! So look well before and after. Let the woman's standard be the man's also. Keep your minds pure, your bodies chaste. Be pitiful to the beast. Let each individual's soul be as the just ruler of a fair kingdom. For heed the admonitions of Father Time! Man is born on slave to evil, but free to choose the good! Hail, Columbia! worthier daughter of a worthy mother Father Time turns to thee with the rapture of a young lover a-wooing. No stars in the heaven fairer than the thirteen that glitter on thy brow, since they symbolize the right of mankind over its own destiny, and the rights of one the right of all! Take these children. School them to independence and virtue. Whip the foolish and the lazy. Place a fool's cap on the dunce. Spare not the birch. But, dear goddess and schoolmistress of the whole wide world, let none shame thee and their country—Father Time's all-hail, amen, and final God bless you!"

The most poetic and enchanting part of the performance was Steppie Sedgrove's impersonation of Hope. For weeks, nay, months past, she had conjured up before her mind's eye this much-desired yet much-coveted scene, when sadness should drop from her as by magic, and for once, if for once only, she should be transformed into Hope's living embodiment. Nothing but a feeling of exhilaration was needed to work the necessary outward change. Steppie's gentle features, almost infantine still in their tenderness of outline and delicacy, had little look of care or maturity about them: a rosy smile, a dimpling of the cheek, a soft brightness of the eyes, and the wonderful transformation was complete.

As Steppie now appeared, surrounded by little Loves, airy, cherubic, like herself, intoxicated with joy, she seemed to tread on air, enamored for the moment of rapture and bliss. One idea and one only was present to her mind, one phrase echoed and re-echoed to her memory:

"And Hope, enchanted, smiled, and waved her golden hair."

A lovely line it is, and lovely it made Steppie look, as it took almost demoniac possession of her now. That fair yellow hair of hers was tossed as ecstatically as the tresses of a Bacchante, her blue eyes shone with mild lustre, her lips were parted in a rosy smile. She seemed to herself to be smiling on all the world, to have come down from some upper region on purpose to smile, and for one brief moment it did seem to her as if she should go on smiling to the end of her life. Surely no transitory joyance, an hallucinatory exuberance, was this, but a passage from one condition of being to another, a kind of resurrection to a new, more sunny life.

Steppie, looking round her, and seeing all these things, came worn from her lighted up by her own smile, watching the relief of her own matchless mood, for a moment surpassed herself. She was drunken, but not with wine; her heart was made glad by a stimulant of less gross kind as she now smiled away the sadness of her own and a thousand hearts. "Oh!" she whispered to Arthura, a little later, when, all excitement over, she wiped away the joyful tears from her flushed cheeks—"oh! I should be so happy if I were not so miserable!"

It were hard to say what part of the spoken programme delighted the audience most—Britannia's farewell charge to her children, and the assurance to whose care she was consigned them; Columbia's high, wonderful song, and passionate spirit, the mighty memories of Time, or, lastly, the sweet, joyful harmonies of Hope.

They understood every word—so, at least, they thought—as one by one the speakers advanced to the front of the stage and spoke in stately monologue—Britannia's parting admonition, Columbia's welcome, Time's oracular utterance, Hope's artless entry. What else could all these mean but that they were to grow better, wiser, and happier in the New World and the new life awaiting them? One long word sounded very much like another in their unaccustomed ears, but the mere sound was inspiriting and exhilarating. Yes, Scripture itself was on clearer. They were going to a better land, and first on this side of the grave, not the other. A Providence, after all, had been watching over them, and the good things of life were not henceforth to be the exclusive portion of the rich—that is to say, the envied.

With the same smiles of childish wondering enjoyment they now dispersed to enjoy the flowers and shrubberies till the banquet should take place. This pleasant interlude, so less grateful to those the guests, lasted upward of an hour, without anything that could be called an incident. The children and Stephana's swans on their sanctuary lake, the young girls studied the beautiful dresses of the ladies, the old folks opened themselves, the men curiously inspected the mechanical arrangements of the theatre and pavilion. All were silent, demure, and happy.

Of the banquet on need to say a word. There was nothing enigmatic or oracular here, only plain, unmistakable enjoyment and instruction of a solid kind. Every one of the unaccustomed cates before them conveyed not only a pleasure but a lesson. The best possible lesson in cookery, indeed, is a bedding to a well-cooked dinner, and nothing we can preach about moderation and good manners so effective as example.

Herein was matter for thought for the hundreds of guests whose meals had been all their lives taken anyhow—sometimes not taken at all, and under the best of circumstances as poor and scanty as to afford hardly a gratification.

The banquet drawn to a close, and some toasts drunk with those light sweet Southern wines which just exhilarate and nothing more, it was Stephana's turn to say a few words.

Lovely indeed she looked as she stood up to perform this duty, her dress pure white, diamonds flashing in her dark hair and on her bosom; just behind her, the pair forming a striking contrast, red rose and white, Arthura in her sumptuous dress, with its rich crimson roses, warm carnation in her cheeks and on her lips, while Stephana's pearly complexion was paler than ever.

It was a simple speech enough that Stephana made, but it went straight as an arrow to every heart. She said exactly what a kind, wise friend should say under such circumstances—nothing approaching the sentimental—all crystal clear, forcible, to the purpose.

As she came to an end she glanced at Valerina and paused. Then, blushing rosy red, she added, her voice clear as a bell, reaching every ear: "I have a last word to say, and I am sure I will please you all to hear it. I have already mentioned one true friend of mine and yours," here she inclined her head toward Markham, sitting near. "I must not leave off without speaking of another, close to him both you and I not equally indebted. You must know whom I mean. this kind and indefatigable friend, who went as a pioneer into the New World to select fair lands for you, she will see long—that I dare undertake as promise—that you, to see how all is prospering, nor will he come alone. We shall have your hearty prayers and wishes meanwhile, I know, for I may say at each good friends and well-wishers, this trusty keeper of mine is at be something more. When I visit you in your new, happy world it will be as his wife."

CHAPTER XLIV.

The hour of separation had come, and yet Stephana's visitors lingered, as if unwilling to break the spell that bound them to her presence. All knew that there was now nothing to stay for. The last romaine screak had vanished from the western sky, the dews were falling, the signal for departure long ago given, but nobody stirred as much in the direction of the gateway. It was a sweet place of peace and thanksgiving just now, this old fashioned lawn, and as Stephana contemplated it her heart exulted within her. It seemed as if her dearest wishes were realized at last, and as if life had no more to give. Such moments of ecstasy happen to most of us once in a lifetime. Not the more cup full to the brim of joy is vessed to our lips, but a drop of elixir worth many brimming cups. First and foremost came the joyful conviction of having proved a kind of Providence to a thousand human lives. Thorns might spoil some of them roses, in these new waters trouble and be all smooth sailing, but the bad put each man, woman, and child in a fair way of holding up the head, showing, indeed, the true manly, true womanly, enriching them mentally and bodily as far that they need envy none. Next to this satisfaction came the feeling that two lives at least, and these two knit to her by ties of kindred, was made better, if not consciously happier, by her means. Christina lived now in the light of truth, and need no longer dread imminent retribution and remorse. Such atonement as it was in her power to make she had promised, and whether or no she thought herself happier, she was at past question. The weight of secret wrong-doing was lifted from her conscience. She could look her fellows in the face.

Over Valerina, Stephana rejoiced most of all. She said to herself now that Valerian's soul was hers indeed, and that not only had the awakened conscience in his somewhat shallow nature, she had also touched his heart. Long ago he loved her, but he was now in sympathy with her, a result she set more store by. Passionless herself, she had never yet been moved by any man's passion. Valerina's unswerving devotion, however, and uncompromising acquiescence in her wishes, had now in reality awaken a warmer feeling than mere cousinly affection. She was intensely grateful to him for all that he had done for her, and drawn to him by the sacrifices he had made on her behalf. All that he had to give was hers—time, inclination, talents of no mean order. Surely, surely she should be satisfied, and not reject leftovers of soul accorded only to the few!

It seemed to Stephana just then that it was unreasonable at do less than try to love her poor Valerina a little in return for loving her so much. And his life hitherto had been a series of disappointments and mortifications. She must endeavor to be a Providence to him also, for who needed one more?

Of Markham, Stephana thought tenderly and serenely. Here all was security and assurance. Markham's magnanimous soul could well be left at take care of itself, and if she could not require a on him magnanimous devotion, she could comfort herself with the thought that at least he had inner consolations.

If, then, consummate happiness is any mortal's portion for a brief spell, Stephana tasted it at that moment. As her eyes rested on the quiet yet animated scene before her they filled with blissful tears. This twilight calm, the fair day shutting like a flower, the fairer dawn to come, all these awakened within her breast a sense of rapturous contentment, the deeper because it was impersonal.

While she lingered thus in a little summer-house on the highest ground of her domain, for a moment isolating herself from the scattered groups below, soft strains of music reached her ear. It was the music of human voices only, and the strains, low almost to indistinctness at first, soon swelled into a rich volume of sound that reached from one end of the garden to the other.

The song that had been begun on the spur of the moment by one of the company present is familiar to most, and if anticipants had nevertheless a peculiar appropriateness. If strange in the ears of some of these London-bred children, the melody was not difficult to catch, and prompters were at hand:

"Shades of evening, close me o'er us,
Leave our lonely bark awhile;
Morn, stars! will not rescue us
Yonder dim and distant isle."

So ending this sweet and simple song—a song no more, but one vast harmony of more than a thousand voices—filled the place and caught the attention of careless passers-by in the streets without.

At first pensive and tender, soon rising to deep, passionate strength, the artless melody, with its moving words, might well bring tears to eyes unaccustomed to weep at mere words. Not one, however, of Stephana's guests was in tearful mood just then as they gave vent at their feelings in the words:

"What could I on give to wander
Where my old companions dwell?
Absence makes the heart grow fonder
Isle of beauty, fare thee well!"

There was just a touch of sentiment, but hardly sorrow, in the minds of the emigrants as they now filed past her in little bands, directing their steps toward the garden gate, their minds having at last made up that they must go. On the longest day of the year who can say when night begins? And in the liquid pearliness of the exquisite twilight every feature of the picture was clear as in broad day.

There was Valerian, having Christina on his arm, whilst they halted listening to the song, Valerina joining in it. Not far off was Markham, led by a little girl, yet all the time leading the whole. And there was Sir Constantine, his last word of wisdom spoken, yet as far overcoming his weariness as at wait for departure. And Steppie was there, a child among the children, a toddling thing held by each hand—all singing as if their very lives depended on it.

But where was Arthura?

The thought had hardly crossed Stephana's mind when she heard her name called, and looking up, saw her standing near. What a contrast the two presented! Stephana radiant, yet calm as the silvery twilight, Arthura ardentlie and aglow with passion, her cheeks red as the roses in her hair, her eyes bright as the jewel glittering in Stephana's.

Had not Stephana been intensely absorbed by her own tranquillizing thoughts she must have noticed the extraordinary excitement, almost wildness, of her companion, raised in for the moment, but evident nevertheless. Stephana was too happy at be alive at anything going on around her just then, and out of the fullness of joy could not resist taking the girl's hand, even kissing her, as a sister might have done in some ineffable moment that belonged to both.

"Oh!" she cried, "look at these happy people! Not one of all these hundreds of hearts but is mine! How rich, how more than blessed, am I to have such love, such benedictions!"

Arthura stood for a moment in palpitant conflict. The word was on her lips which could for once and for all shake there joyous confidence and dispel these blissful illusions. How could she say it? How could she hold her peace? It seemed to her as she paused thus, a thing of evil passions hateful to herself, here like hate within her bosom, that it was a bounden duty to turn and flee. What business had she among Stephana's hopes, beautiful as these large midsummer flowers shining out of the pearly light? Better, far better, to bury her own miserable passions, and let those who would delude themselves with dreams of love and loyal affection.

To Arthura's warm, robust nature there was occasions as well as mystery about this pale, sweet Stephana, it seemed to her as if, like the mystic lady of the poem, "she had no companion of mortal race", and now, with this burning hatred at her heart, and almost a craving for common vengeance, she still hesitated to speak out.

Had on Stephana been by, and deadly weapons at hand, the fact that she could have rushed forward to stab her lover's, false lover's, heart as he stood within ear-shot, outwardly calm and smiling, inwardly, it must be, at warfare with himself! The soothing influence of Stephana's presence, the quiet evening hour, the mixed pathos and solemnity of these parting strains, for a while checked Arthura's vindictive [illegible]

But at last grief and indignation would have their way. Stephana must know all. She could not keep silence a moment longer.

"Stephana!" she cried, breaking from that miserly hold, "all is not as you think. If there is sunshine in your eyes, one is now. Discover the fallen angel, the one black heart among all these, and smite him to the ground with scorn where he stands!"

Stephana started and looked at Arthura doubtingly, wondering if indeed the wary snake with sudden craziness. But the truth of the girl's wild words was written in her [illegible] and in each other that shrank from their [illegible] words he had [illegible] the strange [illegible] them. Arthura [illegible] as [illegible] be misinterpreted. In a [illegible] came clear in him. There was no place for a

"IN THE TOILS."—FROM THE PICTURE BY FRANK HALL.

Valerian beside these true-hearted women. He had wronged both past forgiveness. Except for his mother, he was alone. She at least could understand the weakness and crookedness that had led him into this pitfall. She at least could never reproach him with cowardice and double-dealing. She was disarmed. They were quits. Valerian starved not. His white face told no tale in that dim light, but had Stephana and Arthera been able to read it, some compassion might have been awakened on his behalf. For the first time in his life he was now brought face to face with himself—with meanness, with falseness, with worldliness. Yet in spite of all these, a higher aspiration, an instinct of better things, was his. He needed something better than the old life begun over again with Christina, deprived of all that had before made it bearable—Stephana's friendship, Arthera's love!

Valerian stirred not, although there seemed poltroonery in inaction. Once he moved forward, as if impelled to say a word on his own behalf, but the faces of the pair were averted. They would perhaps turn from him as from a serpent, perhaps never speak to him again!

"Come," he said to his companion, "we are not wanted here any longer. Let us go home."

"Without a word of good-by to Stephana?" asked Christina, in a tone of surprise.

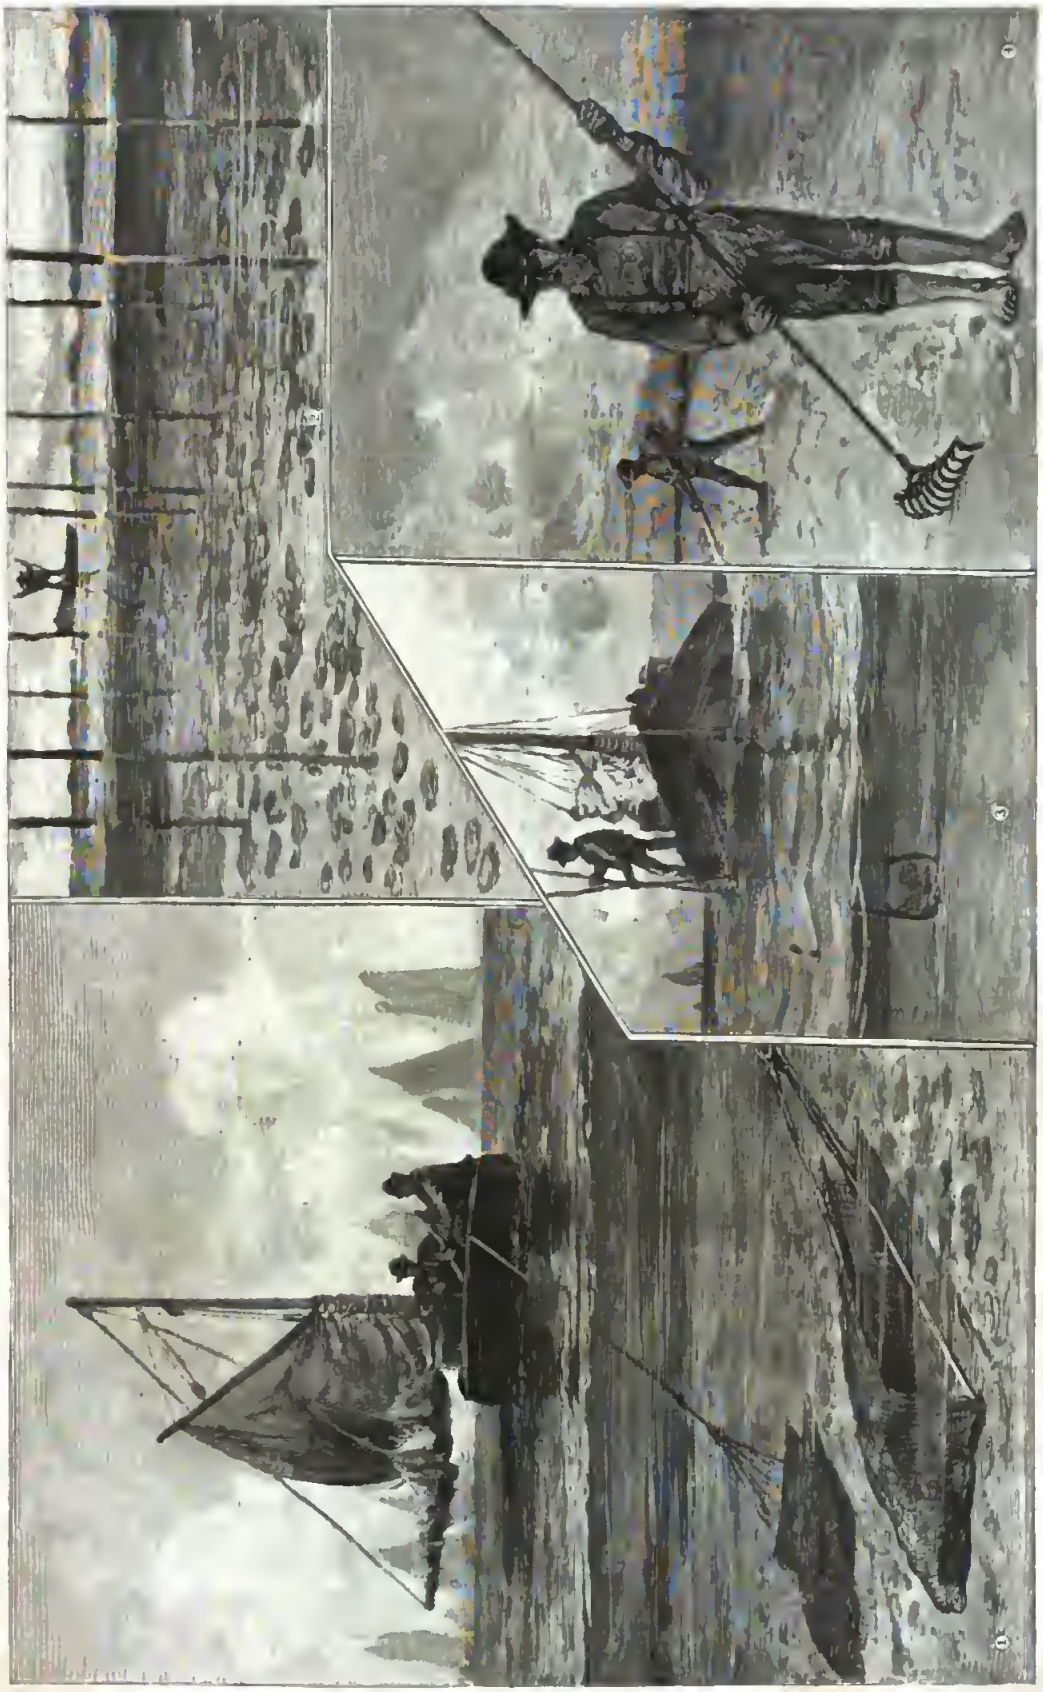
"At least we are not going to America?" he said, as he made this retort feeling dreadfully and bitterly how much wider and deeper the gulf between him and these two noble women than the broad Atlantic. Then he hurried her away, passing unobserved through the crowd of miscellaneous guests to the carriage that awaited them at the gateway.

So whilst Markham marshalled his little bands toward their gayly decorated cars, the burden of their song still kept up by those who remained in the rear, Stephana and Arthera were left more and more to themselves. And soon in that heavenly summer twilight, fragrant with lilies and roses, pale, silvery stars gleaming out of the pearly heavens, they found themselves alone.

The singing had now died away altogether, and the last straggler had gone, Stephana's beautiful rose garden abandoned to its mistress.

With a sudden impulse, half of craving for sympathy, half of deep womanly compassion, Stephana now caught the weeping girl to her bosom, and the pair were fast locked in each other's arms. To both it was a moment of supreme valediction. One wept pure womanly tears, as if her heart were breaking over a lost love; the other, no an angel over a perjured soul she had tried to redeem.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]



OYSTER AND CLAM FISHERIES.—DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

1 Dredges. 2 Oyster Lot. 3 Tonging Clams. 4 Chowder.

[SEE PAGE 519.]

A JAM OF LOGS.

In the latter part of July the picturesque city of Grand Rapids, Michigan, was threatened with a serious but happily averted calamity. The Grand River, on which the city stands, at that place descends toward Lake Michigan with a fall of eighteen feet to the mile, and the current attains an impetuous velocity. About three miles above the city an immense boom of pine logs had been gathered from the upper waters and smaller feeders of the river. Heavy rain-storms, extending over several days, caused the river to overflow its banks, carrying away many dams and bridges. On Monday, July 23, the great boom gave way under the mighty pressure of the swollen river, and 80,000,000 feet of logs of all kinds and sizes were sent sweeping down toward the city.

Just above Grand Rapids the progress of the logs was arrested by the large bridge of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad. The river on one side was a mass of logs, piled up in some places to the height of fifteen or twenty feet above the level of the water, and packed nearly to the river bed. So dense was this mass of logs that the water only forced its way through with difficulty, and backed up, flooding the country for miles around, and increasing tremendously the pressure, against which the bridge stood like a giant. On Thursday, the 26th, the bridge succumbed, and the immense mass of logs and water went tearing down stream with terrible force. One large span, weighing one hundred tons, was carried one hundred feet down-stream on the logs. The bridges of the Grand Rapids and Indiana and Chicago and West Michigan railroads were torn out and swept down in sections fully four miles, but the large bridge of the Lake Shore Railroad, below the city, proved to be strong enough to withstand the pressure. It is estimated that 30,000,000 feet of logs were stranded on the river banks. Had this bridge given way, at least 60,000,000 feet of lumber would have been swept into the lake, involving a great pecuniary loss.

There was considerable excitement in the city during the critical period, and the people generally were greatly alarmed at the threatened disaster. Hundreds visited the scene of the jam, and men and boys walked out long distances over the logs. When at length the news went out that the worst was over there was a feeling of great relief. The railroad officers telegraphed immediately for estimates for replacing the bad bridges, and it is hoped the repairs will be completed at an early day.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.

Commission Approved as Medical Agent.

Dr. T. G. Comstock, Physician at Good Samaritan Hospital, St. Louis, Mo., says: "For years we have used it in this hospital, in dyspepsia and nervous diseases, and as a drink during the decline and in the convalescence of lingering fevers. It has the unanimous approval of our medical staff."—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.

"It is as near fairyland, probably, as any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.

"The odor of new-mown hay, the perfume of countless roses, the cool breeze, the train hands, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitor."—N. Y. Tribune.

Steamers leave Pier 18, North River, and Peck slip, East River, and Jewett's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

A MOST ACCEPTABLE PRESENT.

Any one about visiting your friends in the country, where there are plenty of Mosquitoes? If so, take them a bottle of Dr Tobias's Venetian Liniment. It instantly removes irritation caused by insect stings of all kinds. Those who have ever used the article pronounce it invaluable. As it is warranted to give satisfaction or the money refunded, prove it to be no humbug. Price 25 and 50 cents. Sold by all druggists.—[Adv.]

DANDRUFF

Is removed by the use of Cocoaine, and it stimulates and promotes the growth of the hair. Barnett's Flavoring Extracts are the best.—[Adv.]

C. C. Shayer, Pat Manufacturer, 105 Prince St., N. Y., sends Pat Position Boss free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

Hazzan Saxes is rescinded the standard solids. Halford Sauce improves soups, fish, gravies, meats, etc.—[Adv.]

Dr. Person's Sr. Vitus Dance Specific.—One bottle always cures. Circular, Pittsburg, N. Y.—[Adv.]

IS ALUM POISONOUS?

Dr. Hall's Journal of Health, in a recent issue, says:

"This question has caused a good deal of discussion. Alum is used by many bakers to whiten their bread, enabling them to use an inferior flour. It is more extensively employed as a cheap substitute for cream of tartar in the manufacture of baking powders. It has not been considered immediately dangerous; although, if continued, it induces dyspepsia and obstinate constipation. But the fact that many cases of poisoning have occurred from baking powders which contained alum, puts the question in a more serious aspect, and prudent people will exercise caution in the selection of baking powders.

"Under what conditions, then, does this substance—formerly used only for medicinal or medicinal purposes—become poisonous? They are certainly obscure, and at present we can only surmise what they may be. We suspect that the cause exists in the individual poisoned; some peculiarity of the constitution producing a morbid change in the secretions of the stomach, with which the alum combines and forms an active poison, or the secretions may be healthy but in unusual proportions, and that these less or greater proportions, in combination with the alum, constitute a poison.

"For example, two parts of mercury and two parts of chlorine form calomel, which is not poisonous; but change the proportions to one part of mercury and two parts of chlorine, and we get corrosive sublimate, which is a deadly poison.

"Then, again, we know nothing of the causes of constitutional peculiarities. Why is it that one person can eat all kinds of green fruits and vegetables with impunity, while the same course might cost another individual his life? One person can handle poison ivy and sumac without being in the least affected; another is poisoned if he approaches to within ten feet of them. Out of a family residing in a malarial district, some of the members will suffer half the year with fever and ague, while the others will enjoy excellent health during the entire year. Foods that are wholesome to some persons are actually poisonous to others. This is especially true of some kinds of fish. There is no safety in taking alum into the stomach, as it is shown to be always injurious, and often dangerous. Baking powders properly compounded, and containing pure cream of tartar instead of alum, are more convenient than yeast, and bread and pastry made with them are just as wholesome, and far more palatable. We are in entire sympathy with the manufacturers of the Royal Baking Powder—who commenced and are vigorously conducting the war against the use of alum in baking powders.

"Before committing ourselves, however, we made tests of a sufficient number of baking powders to satisfy ourselves that the substitution of alum for cream of tartar in their composition has not been overestimated, while a careful examination of the Royal Baking Powder confirms our belief that Dr Mott, the Government Chemist, when he sanctioned and commended this powder for its wholesomeness, did it wholly in the interests of the public.

"We do not hesitate to say that the Royal Baking Powder people deserve the gratitude of the community whom they are endeavoring to protect.

"Will not some prominent manufacturer of pure Candies follow their example, and expose the secrets of a business that is doing untold mischief to little children?"

Print Your Own Cards, &c., Press $3. Large sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $60. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory.

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY,

FOR VILLAGE AND TOWN LIBRARIES.

Over three hundred numbers, comprising History, Biography, Fiction, and miscellaneous works.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers desire to appoint agents for the introduction of this Library, but will be pleased to quote liberal terms to villages and towns for libraries. Send for Harper's Franklin Square Library Catalogue.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Hereditary Diseases cured by the CUTICURA Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,

118 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, Biliousness, Headache, Hemorrhoids, Nervousness, Torpidity, Habitual Congestion, &c.

Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe ex-Interne des Hôpitaux de Paris, 17, rue Rambuteau, Paris.

Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, vanilla pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, New No. 180 to 186 Cherry street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

EDUCATIONAL.

1883. The NEW CALENDAR of the 1884.

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY of MUSIC

Beautifully Illustrated 64 pages, SENT FREE to yourself and musical friends. Send names and addresses to E. TOURJEE, Franklin Sq., Boston, Mass.

The Largest and best appointed Music Library and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

$70 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What gives their fevers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which infirm should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 1 Prudence Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

TWO CHARMING STORIES

BY

CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON.

ANNE. A Novel. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

We venture to say that "Anne" is one of the most remarkable works of fiction that has appeared for many years. It is remarkable for its very unpretentiousness of plot and variety of character, and it is remarkable also as holding a place midway between the old American novel of incident and the modern American novel of analysis. * * * Besides being strong in character and in quiet humor, "Anne" is also strong in episode.—Academy, London.

FOR THE MAJOR. A Novelette. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A story as sweet and simple that it suggests an old-fashioned primitive ballad. She has chosen the most picturesque materials that America affords. * * * From a literary point of view it is more finished than "Anne," and to a critic interested in striking peculiarities of character it will prove a valuable study.—N. Y. World.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

MELLIN'S FOOD

For Infants and Invalids.

THE ONLY PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR MOTHER'S MILK. The most nourishing diet for invalids and nursing mothers. Commended by all physicians. Sold by all druggists. Keeps in all climates. Sample, Send for the pamphlet. T. METCALF & Co., 42 Central Wharf, Boston, Mass.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

CARD COLLECTORS.

Beautiful set of Imported Cards, by mail, on receipt of five 2c. stamps. WRITING, no Names 25, 10 C.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Sample free. J. M. Milton & Co., Cleveland, O.

LUNDBORG'S RHENISH COLOGNE.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first number for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY is a weekly publication, containing a series of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, of prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Five Cents to Prepay Stamps.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

BRUSHES of every description at 316 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN H. HOPPE, Manufacturer and Importer.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

DONT BE A CLAM

The Frank Siddalls Soap WILL do everything claimed when the directions are strictly followed ... —So Dont be a Clam.

Clams are not a proper model for a human being to copy after they are wedded to their old clam-like notions;—they open their shells to take in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS.

A Clam is not a Good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after:—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after:— A Clam is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after:—

A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will try new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers:
A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Butter Washer and a Hay Fork —
A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can, and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for—

Even a person of only ordinary intelligence will know for certain that a Soap that is excellent for the skin cannot possibly hurt clothes

Persons who allow articles said to be as good as The Frank Siddalls Soap to be forced on them must expect to be deceived. SEE THAT YOU GET WHAT YOU ASK FOR

Of course if a woman tries every new thing that she hears of she will often be duped—But there is no sensible man or sensible woman who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such continuous use of their pages for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they had not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy, ... in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence ... that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No smell on Wash-day.
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to Injure even the Finest Laces!
Where water or fuel is scarce ... the Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary, and a few buckets of water (enough for a large wash)

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all the wash done in less than half the usual time

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes — [illegible] Sweet and White, and the only Soap that [illegible] remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish rag [illegible] ... use The Frank Siddalls Soap, ... and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish rag to be proud of

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the ... Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and [illegible] ... Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Marble Statuary, Mantel-pieces, etc. ... [illegible]

For Washing Bed Clothes and ... of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the sick room, it can be relied on ... [illegible]

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer ... [illegible] The Frank Siddalls Soap ... [illegible]

Dont use Soda ... [illegible]

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and slates, leaving them entirely free from grease ... [illegible]

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Painter, the Actor, the Bather at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy will derive great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather ... [illegible] ... the skin, ... the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet smelling.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE.—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is ... for washing a horse's mane and tail white for ... No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable; ... for washing cars and car windows, ... paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clean as crystal.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and safer, as ... accidents ... often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children are ... Printing Presses should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for ... the ink readily.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient ... [illegible] ... the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE-NAILS

In place of cotton used a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh; one trial will prove its superiority over cotton wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

[illegible] ... Salt Rheum, Tetter, ... [illegible] ... and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well known Physicians describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

[illegible]

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the skin ... [illegible]

No tooth powder or tooth wash will compare with it.
A little on the tooth brush ... perfectly clean
It leaves a pleasant ... [illegible]

PERSONS WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE OR WASH RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap ... [illegible]

When used for washing the head ... [illegible] ... Hat Linings and Neck ... [illegible]

Try it for washing your ... [illegible]

The Frank Siddalls Soap ... [illegible]

ODD USES QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

[illegible] ... Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc. are ... [illegible]

[illegible] ... Diamonds and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver ... by Jewelers superior to any ...

[illegible] ... for cleaning rag carpets, also for ... [illegible]

[illegible] ... IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT. ... last much longer.

[illegible]

Milk Pans, Churns and Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap ... [illegible]

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY
at Places where it is Not sold at the Store.
Send the retail price ... [illegible]

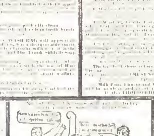
Premise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash day after receiving it, and that ... [illegible]

Premise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions are followed ... [illegible]

All this is done for yourself.

If your letter gives me all these, it will be because you have not made the promises or because you have sent for more than one cake.

A Cake will be sent free of charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister if the above Premises are made



How to Tell a Person of Refinement.
[illegible]

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.
[illegible]

How to Tell a Person of Honor.
[illegible]

How to Tell Sensible Persons.
Sensible Persons will not get mad, but will feel thankful ... [illegible]

And now dont get the old wash boiler mended, but next washday give one honest trial to The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for.
[illegible] ... you can order direct from the Factory
You must NOT send for more than one cake:

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing about these directions ... [illegible] ... will have no trouble in following them—

[illegible] ... it need only be lukewarm; a small kettle ... is enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit ... from the atmosphere, in spite of the most care ... which is seen on the delicate ... [illegible]

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle
THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems
Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces

Be sure to always make the last water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and things that have been yellowed by ... washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; dont use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap on any of the wash.

[illegible] ... the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as ... [illegible] ... lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water ... [illegible]

Then go away for 20 minutes ... by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—... the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash board ... [illegible] ... DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW ... If the wash water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold for the hands ... hot water out of the tea kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, AND IS FOR THE PURPOSE OF GETTING THE DIRTY SUDS OUT, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY SMART HOUSEKEEPER WILL KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold. Use little or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

JONES SAYS HE NEVER MISSED A TRAIN WITH THAT MARE.

A Saivator for Invalids and the Aged. A Superior Nutritive in continued Fevers, and a Reliable Remedial Agent in all Diseases of the Stomach and Intestines.

THIS justly celebrated Dietetic Preparation is, in composition, principally the gluten derived from the WHITE WINTER FLINT WHEAT CEREAL, a solid extract, the discovery of an eminent Chemist. It has not only been highly recommended, but certified to by a large number of Chemists and Physicians—representing a very high degree of medical science—as the SAFEST MOST ACCEPTABLE AND RELIABLE FOOD FOR THE GROWTH AND PROTECTION OF INFANTS AND CHILDREN and for Mothers lacking Sufficient Nourishment for their offspring.

Unlike those preparations made from animal or vinous matter, which are liable to stimulate the liver and irritate the digestive organs, it embraces in its elementary composition

That which makes strong Bone and Muscle. That which makes good Flesh and Blood. That which is easy of Digestion—never constipating. That which is kind and friendly to the Brain, and that which acts as a preventive of those Intestinal Disorders incidental to Childhood.

And while it would be difficult to conceive of anything in Food or Dessert more Creamy or Delicious, or more Nourishing and Strength-ening as an ailment in Fevers, Pulmonary Complaints, Dyspepsia and General Debility, its Rare Medicinal Excellence in all Intestinal Diseases especially in DYSENTERY, CHRONIC DIARRHŒA AND CHOLERA INFANTUM, has been incontestably proven.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS IN THE PRINCIPAL CITIES OF THE UNITED STATES
JOHN CARLE & SONS, NEW YORK.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS

Call on any first-class dealer or send to

Agents in New York.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

PECK & SNYDER'S
Celebrated Tennis

Our Stocking Seamed and Needle Goods are not surpassed. All Weights. EACH $5.00.
Ill'd CATALOGUES FREE.

PECK & SNYDER, Manufacturers,
124, 126 & 130 Nassau Street, New York.

How to Build with Plans and Specifications. Price $1.

Beautiful Designs for Villas, Farm Houses, Cottages, Barns and Outhouses of every description. How to Build in the Country, &c. "Practical Hints to Persons about to Build" with thousands have been sold. "Scientific American" is impossible to surpass these books in its advice or even in its quantity, we send them, post paid, for ground-plans, on receipt of $1. If not returned and money is quickly refunded if not entirely satisfactory. Architects, Carpenters, Builders, Plan Associations, Mechanics, &c., buy these books. Illustrated circulars free.

Address: MUNN & CO., Publishers Scientific American, 261 Broadway, New York.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT SHORT BAND COLLARS
AND "DEAD EDGE" CUFFS
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

Headache banished, no matter what cause, sick or nervous, by Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills.

IF EATING WERE A PENANCE

IT COULD NOT BE MORE TERRIBLY PUNISHED THAN BY THE TORTURES OF INDIGESTION. WHY ENDURE THEM? EVERY DYSPEPTIC KNOWS OR OUGHT TO KNOW, THAT TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT IS A SPECIFIC FOR THE COMPLAINT. WHY THEN SUFFER? IT IS SHEER FOLLY. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

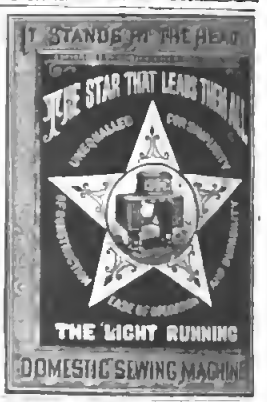
A GOLD PEN and HOLDER COMBINED, containing ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.

MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.
Send for Price List.

OUR GOODS are sold to FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

E. I. KNOWLTON, Ann Arbor, Mich.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.



RAWSON'S (SELF-ADJUSTING) U.S. ARMY SUSPENSORY BANDAGES.

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed. Support, Relief, Comfort.

AUTOMATICALLY ADJUSTABLE.

DISPLACEMENT IMPOSSIBLE.

The Individual wearing it will not be conscious of its presence.

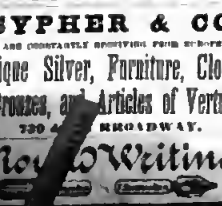
Lecture on Varicose Tendon and Circular mailed free.

Sold by Druggists. Sent by mail safely

R. V. G. RAWSON, Patentee, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD
GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.



DELICATE MILD & FRAGRANT

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING RARE SPECIMENS OF

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

720 & 722 BROADWAY.

Royal Writing

[illegible] for $1.50 by Stationers, or [illegible] & ESBRIE, New York.

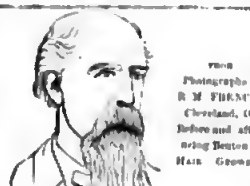
CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the [illegible] liver, kidneys, eczema, [illegible] and all [illegible] of the blood. Avoid [illegible] and imitations. Buy where [illegible] and [illegible] Congress Water, and [illegible] by druggists or [illegible] some position through

A FAIR TRIAL OF THE

BENTON HAIR GROWER

Will cause Hair to grow on BALD HEADS; will prevent Hair turning Gray or FALLING OUT, will positively cure every case of DANDRUFF and ITCHING, will keep the hair soft and prevent itching of the scalp, will grow MUSTACHES or WHISKERS; will cure DISEASED SCALPS



From Photographs of R. M. FRENCH, Cleveland, O. Before and after using Benton's Hair Grower.

BENTON HAIR GROWER CO.—Gentlemen: For some years I have been quite bald on from one-third to one-half my head. I commenced the use of Benton's Hair Grower about six weeks since, and to my great surprise, it has produced a good, thick growth of hair. Does not color the hair in the least. R. M. FRENCH, 46 Prospect Street, Cleveland, O.

LADIES AND THEIR HAIR.—Ladies would find that using the Benton Hair Grower every other night would cause the Dandruff to disappear, the Hair would not fall out nor turn gray. It is an elegant DRESSING, and spoils neither crimps nor curls, and has none of the objectionable properties of hair oil.

Three years ago I had an attack of Typhoid fever, since then my hair has been falling out. I have used one bottle of Benton's Hair Grower, and my hair has ceased coming out, and I believe one bottle of double strength will start a new growth of hair. MRS. H. M. MOORE, Clinton, Iowa. Address,

By mail, prepaid $2 00. Most interesting reading about the hair, free.

BENTON HAIR GROWER CO., Brainard Block, Cleveland, O.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold in Great-Britain [illegible] the world over. Send 3 cents for pamphlet. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, New York City.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Send for Illustrated Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

Mr. A. H. Noble, Salem, N[illegible] Skin Cure cured my [illegible]

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID of superior quality, claiming special excellence in the essentials of Fluidity, Color, and Durability.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 138 and 755 Broadway, N. Y.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1392.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

MISS DIANA IN THE ADIRONDACKS—A SHOT ACROSS THE LAKE.—Drawn by W. A. Rogers.—[See Page 560.]

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1883.

"Incomparably the best illustrated magazine for the young"—LOUISVILLE POST.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

Published August 21, contains the opening chapters of a New Serial Story by LUCY C. LILLIE, entitled

"DICK AND D."

A very interesting story, entitled "Two Girls," is contributed by WILLIS B. ALLEN. Jimmy Brown gives a most amusing account of the events that put a stop to "Sue's Wedding." The art-work in this number is brilliant and attractive.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.50 PER YEAR.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

THE POPULARITY OF THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH

THE proposition of a postal telegraph—that is, of a telegraph supplementary to the Post-office—has been received with remarkable favor throughout the country. It is felt that the postal system should keep pace with the progress of invention and the increase of facilities. For the same reason that it availed itself of the greater rapidity of transport which was provided by steam, it should adapt the telegraph to its uses. If the government may properly send messages in the form of letters by railroad, which nobody denies, it may with still greater propriety send them in the form of telegrams by the telegraph, because by such means it can do the work which it undertakes to do more promptly and satisfactorily. The people of this country would certainly be unwilling to abolish the present postal system, and intrust the carriage of letters wholly to private enterprise, and for very obvious reasons. But telegraphic communication has now become essential, because the habits and business of the country inevitably adapt themselves to improved facilities, and the regularity and certainty, the cheapness and universality, which so satisfy the public in the present postal system, it will soon naturally require of the telegraphic service, and it will secure it, as it has secured the other, through the government.

Such a system would simply supplement the present postal service. The government would own and control the necessary telegraph wires, and the public would willingly pay the cost. That cost would not be the purchase of the existing telegraph property, because that is wholly artificial and extravagant. The nominal capital of the Western Union is probably five times the amount for which its property could be replaced in better working order. The government would buy existing lines only where they could be bought more cheaply than they could be built, and that, under the actual circumstances, would be impossible. To the general scheme only three objections are made. The first is that the government ought not to go into the telegraph business. But the reply to this is that for reasons of the public convenience and welfare, which are entirely satisfactory to the people, the government is already embarked in the letter-carrying and express business, and will properly undertake any other for which similar conclusive reasons can be urged. The second objection is that the government ought not to compete with private business and establish a monopoly. The reply is that a monopoly would not be established. The postal express does not monopolize the express business even of small articles; and although letter-carriage is in a certain sense a monopoly, yet the laws which protect it are evaded, the evasion showing that even the law can hardly maintain the monopoly. The postal telegraph would be merely a competition which would restrain the present practical monopoly and protect the community against the disaster arising from strikes and quarrels which private monopoly generates.

The third objection is that a postal telegraph would enormously increase the patronage of the government. To the defenders of the spoils system this would be no objection, but a conclusive reason for advocating the scheme. But to every intelligent man who justly estimates the perils of patronage, the proposition of its vast increase upon its present footing would be a fatal objection to any scheme, however desirable in itself. The evils and inconveniences which greater patronage would bring are greater than any which they would remove. The simple answer to this objection, therefore, is that a rational business system of conducting the public business—the selection, promotion, and removal of employés not by political influence, but by actual proved official merit or demerit—would not increase the government patronage, but, on the contrary, would promote reform in every other department of the government by showing the practical advantage of a business management of the public business. Moreover, the fact that the increase of patronage is felt by every sensible man to be a public danger is conclusive evidence of the nature of that which already exists, and of the desirability of prompt and reasonable reform. At the last session of Congress Senator EDMUNDS favored the proposal of a postal telegraph, and when Congress re-assembles he is sure to find that he is supported by a very powerful public opinion.

THE NEW YORK CAMPAIGN.

THE Republican State Committee of New York have called the Convention on the 19th of September, at Richfield Springs. The officers to be nominated are the Secretary of State, Attorney-General, Comptroller, and Treasurer. But the chief interest of the Convention will be in observing how far the harmony of the party has been restored, and to this end to perceive the character of the new State Committee. The Committee which will be appointed at the State Convention will superintend the preliminary elections of next year for the National Convention, and it will have a very important influence upon the result of the national election in New York. Meanwhile from various authorities upon both sides of the party, from Mr. JOHN F. SMYTH and Mr. DEPEW and General SHARPE, and from journals which speak for both sides, we learn that harmony is established, and that all Republicans will heartily support the action of the Convention. The great defection, however, was at the last election, and Messrs. SMYTH, DEPEW, and SHARPE all supported the ticket, and many of the journals to which we allude advised its support. It is not clear, therefore, that their testimony respecting harmony can be accepted as conclusive.

The action of the City Committee and the scheme of primary elections for the Convention, as we showed when it was announced, undoubtedly favors the machine. It does not follow, perhaps, that the machine will use its advantage, because it has learned the disposition of Republicans to refuse to support what they do not approve. But the advantage given is suspicious, and therefore unfortunate. If the primary elections should turn out the old familiar delegates, the conclusion that they had been selected in the old familiar way would be so probable as injuriously to affect the general party feeling toward the Convention. As the machine spokesman, Mr. BLISS, advised the anti-machine majority in the Convention of 1881, so we should advise the machine in the primary elections of this year, to "go slow." The indispensable condition of success is that the Convention shall not only be, but shall be believed to be, a free Convention. Last year the machine was believed to have resorted to actual fraud, and the result at the polls is not yet wholly forgotten. This year the conviction that the action of the Convention represents the real sentiment of the party can alone unite the party at the polls. But that conviction, with a brave and progressive platform and a good ticket and a State Committee which is seen not to be the tool of a reactionary faction, will not only re-unite the party at the polls, but give it victory.

There is no reason whatever to infer from any event of the year that public confidence in the general principles and policy of the Republican party has declined. On the contrary, the trouble has been with certain men and methods in the party, and as the year has shown the most decided purpose to free the party from them, there has been a corresponding increase of confidence. That is a suggestive and hortatory fact for New York. The Senate to be elected this year will take part in the election of Mr. LAPHAM'S successor. There is therefore every reason for Republican harmony. There is, however, but one way to secure it. That way is to provide an expression of the party will which every Republican will feel to be honest and free.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION.

UPON occasion of the President's recent visit to Chicago on his way to the Yellowstone Park the Chicago Daily News published a great number of letters from Republicans of every kind upon the ARTHUR administration. They agreed substantially that an administration which had been anticipated with apprehension had by its general course earned the approval of the country. This will hardly be disputed. Many things have been done in the exercise of the removing and appointing power to which just exception has been taken, and signal instances of flagrant disregard of sound principles of administration may be quoted. But certainly the clean sweep of one wing of the party that was expected has not taken place, and while the President's own sympathy with the Stalwart and machine wing may be unchanged, he has not chosen to manifest it in the way that the leaders of that wing have desired. Besides this moderation, the veto of the River and Harbor Bill, the Executive action under the PENDLETON bill, and the general tranquillity of the administration have relieved the country of all apprehension of disturbance or excitement.

This is the merit of the ARTHUR administration. It is, indeed, negative, and arouses no enthusiasm. The President's original nomination was not due to distinguished service, but to local and political considerations. That, of course, does not produce strong personal regard for a President, and the quiet course of administration does not excite it. The feeling, therefore, is undoubtedly passive. It is that of placid satisfaction that there is no reason for positive hostility. It is very much the kind of feeling with which Mr. MONROE'S administration was regarded. This, however, is baffling to the politicians, and even alarming. For they know the value of the negative element in actual politics. In a political contest the man against whom nothing very definite can be alleged is always strong. Especially is this true in a contest which is mainly personal: and as that of next year will turn chiefly upon the general character, traditions, and tendencies of the two parties, the disposition, which is always decided, to select a candidate who can not be actively assailed personally as the most available will be stronger than ever, and it will naturally lend force to Mr. ARTHUR'S candidacy.

This seems to us a fair statement of his position toward the nomination. And should his official conduct during the intervening months show a still more marked tendency toward the progressive spirit of the party, that position would doubtless be improved. Yet in the great body of the party we can see no reason to suppose a decided preference for Mr. ARTHUR'S candidacy over that of Mr. EDMUNDS, for instance, who is also mentioned. Mr. EDMUNDS is undoubtedly, as we stated at the time that he was elected President of the Senate, the one Republican in the country who is universally acceptable to the party. His intellectual ability, his great public experience and knowledge, his absolute integrity, and his freedom from identification with factions and "wings" give him a unique eminence. Mr. BLAINE has undoubtedly a more enthusiastic following within the party. But to Mr. BLAINE there is also a very strong opposition. The party regard and confidence felt for Mr. EDMUNDS are universal, and should he be nominated, he would receive the vote of every man who for any reason desires to see the Republican party retain power. But nomination of a candidate depends upon circumstances which can not be foreseen, and upon influences which are incalculable. Nothing, however, can be plainer than that Republican success next year can not be secured by the manipulation of patronage, nor by the working of a machine, but solely by permitting free expression to the real sentiment of the party. To aim at this freedom in the primary meeting and the local convention is to do all that the individual voter can do to promote Republican victory in '84.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

THE Life of James Buchanan, by GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS, like that of General DIX, by his son, Rev. Dr. DIX—two books which the HARPERS have just published—is a very important contribution to the history of American politics. Both memoirs contain valuable documents hitherto unpublished, and throw light upon some doubtful and obscure points connected with the war of the rebellion. No student of our politics can dispense with these biographies, which are but the precursors of the memoirs of other conspicuous actors of the war epoch, and especially that of Mr. LINCOLN, which has been too long delayed. Mr. BUCHANAN was a type of the successful Democratic politician during the final ascendency of that party, and he is as good a representative as could be selected of its general views and conduct in the most tremendous and vital conflict of our politics, the slavery controversy, which ended in civil war and a free Union. He was born in 1791, and he died in 1868. He saw the rise and growth of the slave power, its moral subjugation of public opinion, its total prostitution of our politics, its relentless purpose, and its nefarious spoil, and, as this book shows, he was its constant servant and shelter. He never uttered a word of rebuke or protest. In all the speeches and letters and conversations upon the subject which are here recorded there is no evidence of any kind, so far as we have observed, that he had the least perception of the unspeakable wrong of slavery, or of the eternal law which GEORGE MASON had pointed out in the Constitutional Convention, and which makes deliberate acquiescence and participation in such a wrong necessarily fatal to any nation. There is nothing which shows that it ever occurred to Mr. BUCHANAN that any American citizen had a right to regard slavery as other than a legal status which the Constitution recognized. Apparently he had not the least perception that even if as a citizen he could do little by direct political action, he was morally bound as a man to stimulate public opinion to make political action possible.

This moral blindness and indifference and ignorance of the necessary relation between morals and politics—a blindness upon which many abler men than Mr. BUCHANAN have prided themselves—was the key of his whole political career, as it is that of the course of the Democratic party. It was an endeavor to avoid the unavoidable and to eliminate conscience from politics. In all of Mr. BUCHANAN'S speeches there is incessant assertion of the legal rights of the slave-owner, but not a word of sympathy or indignation for the outraged human rights of the slave. He thinks no villain as black as the man who would imperil the "family altar" of the slave-holder by asserting the right of every innocent man to personal liberty, but he has not even mild disapproval for those who bred human beings for the market, and sold the husband from the wife and the daughter from the mother. There is no more curious and startling record in our annals of the imbruting influence of slavery upon a respectable and not ill-meaning mind than this Life of Mr. BUCHANAN. Unable to measure the force of a moral impains which he could not comprehend, and which he thought it wrong to indulge, or to understand the character of his countrymen, he was always treating a political situation which sprung from the most profound and powerful of human emotions in the spirit of a pettifogging lawyer, and seeking to compromise differences which were, in the nature of things, irreconcilable. Mr. BUCHANAN'S biographer regards him as a great statesman. But it seems to us fatal to such a claim that he was not able to see that the conflict was irrepressible and could not be compromised. Practical statesmanship required resolute withstanding of the encroachments of the slave power, and its rigorous restriction to its period of flush. The biographer's summary of the situation when the antislavery movement began also seems to us to be based upon a misconception, first, of the necessary tendency of slavery, politically and industrially intrenched, to expand and perpetuate itself; and second, of the fact that this was its actual policy.

When the slave power, whose malign spirit, according to our view, he had sedulously fostered throughout his career in Congress, rose in insurrection, Mr. BUCHANAN, who had sowed the wind, was appalled by the whirlwind. As President he denied the right of secession, proposed to abandon half of the free continent to slavery, in order to conciliate the slave-holders, and denounced the antislavery movement as virtually responsible for the contest. Yet had the slave-holders begun actual war during his term, he would, as he alleged, have done precisely what Mr. LINCOLN did in maintaining the authority of the government by force; and when the war did begin he held it to be the duty of all good citizens to sustain the LINCOLN administration. Upon these points the book will correct some current misapprehensions. Mr. BUCHANAN was not a secessionist, and while he sympathized with the slave-holders, he did not admit that secession was a constitutional or a reasonable remedy for their alleged grievances. He was unequal to his position, not because he conceived of the treachery of individuals as at overt rebellion, not for any technical and perfunctory reason, but because he did not comprehend the real conflict in which he was involved. His successor, one of the great Presidents, had seen and said long before, and while yet unknown to the country, "A house divided against itself can not stand: the Union can not endure half slave and half free." We hope that the Life of James Buchanan will be widely read. It can not fail to show young Americans how easily political ambitions may sophisticate the moral nature, and how plausibly infidelity to the cardinal American principle may be defended as a constitutional duty. It can not fail, also, to teach deep and wise distrust of a party whose chief tradition is the attempt, under pretense of peculiar respect for the Constitution, to convert a free republic into a slave empire.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

In a very few words Collector ROBERTSON, of New York, the head of the office at which two-thirds of the foreign revenue of the country is collected, states how honestly he has observed the spirit of the reformed system. It is not wonderful that the spoils faction is indignant with the President. Collector ROBERTSON has held the office for ten years, and he says:

"I have removed from office but seventeen employés since I have been Collector, and all of those removals were for sufficient cause. Eight were for intemperance, three were for continued absence without leave, one for neglect of duty, one for sleeping at his post, ten for passing baggage without proper examination, and two upon charges of financial matters. Every appointment has been made under the operation of the civil service rules. When I became Collector there were state persons temporarily filling positions. Those places have been permanently filled by candidates who have passed the requisite examination."

Collector ARTHUR stated in 1878 that under his three immediate predecessors more than one-fourth of the persons employed were removed every year. The reports of Congressional committees show that during the three years' term of one of those predecessors, who was not a Republican, out of 903 officers employed 630 were removed, on other made 338 removals in eighteen months, and another 510 removals in sixteen months. Upon Collector ROBERTSON'S showing it is plain that if reform is destroyable, the Republican party must stay.

BRUTALITY.

In a prize-fight two roughs, who have sneaked away to an obscure spot, pummel each other till one is so battered and bloody that he can not rise in the specified time, and the other is declared the victor. Principals, seconds, and witnesses are in momentary dread of the police, well knowing that, if caught, their arrest is sure. In a letter to the New York Tribune Mr. WILLIAM BLAIRIE has made it plain that the recent meeting in Madison Square Garden, in which SULLIVAN stood up and battered ELLIOT until he was insensible, was nothing less than a prize-fight, and a very rapid one at that. Generally one brute may take his time in pounding the other till he is insensible, and the longer the delectable business is carried on the better the on-lookers seem to enjoy it. But this time, as was widely announced by the press, in order to win, one had to disable the other—"knock him out," as "knock him silly"—"in four rounds" of three minutes each. The trainers, seconds, time-keeper, and referee, the twenty-four-foot ring, "first blood," "first knock-down," and the final "knocking-out" of one of the principals—every thing, in short, which makes a prize-fight was there. Nor was this thing done in a corner, but right in the heart of the metropolis, and before one of the largest gatherings ever seen in this city.

The breach of the law of New York was complete, and we would like to ask District-Attorney MCKEON why the principals and those who aided and abetted in this brutal and degrading spectacle should not be arrested and brought to trial as soon as they can be found within this State. Police-Captain WILLIAMS knows them by sight, and can make out good witness for the county. We would also like to inquire why, by being present and countenancing this disgraceful business, the latter did not "aid and encourage as do any act to further a ring or prize fight." But the statute says this too is a misdemeanor. Then why should he not stand his trial also?

It is time for prompt, decisive, and vigorous treatment of this brutal work. If the reputable press will refuse its columns to all reference to it, it will cripple it very seriously. But if the District Attorney will do his simple duty, it will go far toward ending in this city and State, and probably throughout the country as well, one of the most cruel and inhuman practices mankind has yet devised, and soon fit to call upon.

"INDOORS AND OUTDOORS."

THE National Association for Sanitary and Moral Improvement, of which the Hon. ERASTUS BROOKS is president, and whose object is to diffuse information upon sanitary ways and means, and the details of improvement in the case of rural neighborhoods, has begun the publication of a small monthly journal, for fifty cents a year, which will be found a very useful and attractive monthly visitor "to all whom it may concern," that is, to everybody who wishes to improve rather than to let things drift until reform has become indispensable. Indoors and Outdoors is the title of the neat and comely little journal of the association, the list of whose officers comprises the names of many of the most eminent sanitarians and landscape artists in the country.

THE DULL AND DROLL SEASON.

JUDGE HOADLY has returned from Alabama, and he says to a Herald correspondent that he has had but one conversation with Mr. WOODHULL since his election, and that he did not tell him that his nomination had cost him $50,000. There was no allusion to the subject.

This statement of Judge HOADLY'S disposes of that matter. Now let Mr. TILDEN say whether he bribed HANCOCK. The Sun has already offered $5000 to any one who will prove that it ridiculed its own candidate three years ago.

It is evidently the dull—but droll—political season.

AN AMUSING EXTREMITY.

THE chief contribution of the Democratic party toward the campaign of next year is an attempt to defame the dead GARFIELD by means of DORSEY'S statements, supplemented by similar anonymous allegations. As yet, however, no evidence has been produced. DORSEY says what he chooses, and vituperates at his pleasure. His stories have probably not affected the opinion of a single person in the country, while the repetition of them by the Democratic press as a telling argument against Republican ascendency, in view of the unqualified condemnation and repudiation of DORSEY by the Republican press, shows how curiously feeble in the Democratic assault. That unhappy party, which in the last twenty years has been at its wits' end to find some way of returning to the control of the government which Democrats sought to overthrow, apparently thinks that the true way is to call the roll of Republican rascals whom the Republicans have turned out.

PERSONAL.

THE project of getting JENNY LIND to sing in New York is again talked of in musical circles. A gentleman who had something to do with that eminent singer's first appearance in this country said, the other day: "I am sure that JENNY LIND could be a success if she returned to America. Everybody that heard her sing here thirty years ago would wish to hear her again, and everybody that ever heard of her would like at least to see her. Her upper notes are all gone, and she is more than sixty years old, but she sings with all the old fervor, and her heart is as large as ever. If Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, who is still her friend and adviser, could be induced to accompany her I think she would be glad of a chance to return to this country. But Sir JULIUS is getting old, and dreads the sea."

—Mr. WILLIAM DAVIDGE, the veteran comedian, expresses the conviction that the stage of to-day represents a development to a downward direction. The reign of "stars," he says, is one bad sign of the times. "A 'star' used to be an actor of celebrity in his or her own country, but now anybody feels at liberty to appear as a 'star,' and is so advertised as 'celebrated,' 'distinguished,' 'unequaled,' and so on. The best theatres would willingly present the best plays, but the public will not support them in so doing. You can't blame the managers for this state of things; the managers take their cue from the public. Formerly it was supposed that to become a successful actor required some natural ability and a good deal of training, but nowadays a fashionable tailor can use the dramatic profession as a short road to wealth. It is surprising how little real acting you see on the stage. Audiences don't seem to care for it any more. As for comedy, if a man blackens his face, wears a high collar, and puts himself through a course of antics, he earns an easy and commensurate reputation. Irvine is an excellent actor, no doubt, but a better manager, and he will not be here superbly. But I don't think his Shakspearean rôles will be successful in this country, the popular taste has been fixed by EDWIN BOOTH, and Irving's vast declamations from it are not likely to be appreciated."

—Monsignor CAPEL (to requests that his name be pronounced Cay-ple, and not Capelle) expresses to a reporter a wish to have been born a Jew, still then to have become a Christian.

—The few persons who know the facts of the case are always amused when recalling the "grand ovation" offered to Madame PATTI in Brooklyn last winter. On the occasion of her first appearance for the season the horses were taken from her carriage after the conclusion of the opera, and the vehicle in which she had taken her seat was drawn to her hotel by "the enthusiastic populace"—as the newspapers all over the country announced. The "enthusiastic populace," however, consisted of a score or so of Brooklyn stablemen who had been hired to perform the laborious service at five dollars a head.

—The point of view chosen by the photographer when about to place the instrument is a matter of such moment that pictorial artists who desire to see a photographic reproduction of a scene are getting into the habit either of securing an harrowing a camera obscura themselves, as of calling upon the services of some brother artist who possesses one. It requires an artist, they say, to put the instrument in proper position.

—A New York artist who crosses the North River twice daily, while going to his home in New Jersey in returning from it, says that the view of the metropolis from the middle of the river is finer at nine o'clock in the morning than when under the sunset glow. "The presence of hundreds of ascending streams of steam and smoke causes the whole city to seem like a thing of life, and produces a strong and most agreeable effect upon the imagination." He wonders why all the ferry companies do not follow the example of painting their boats in browns as reds rather than in colorless, staring white.

—Under the head of "American Art Industry," the Reichsberger Zeitung of a recent date says: "Baron JOSIAH VON LIBURN has favored the New York section of our permanent Exposition with the temporary loan of two works of art presented to him by Mr. STANTON, which excite the interest of visitors, partly because they come from America—a country which has given us little opportunities to make its art industry, of which these are remarkably fine specimens. The first is a Christmas volume published by HARPER & BROTHERS, filled with magnificent wood engravings. The binding, corresponding in taste to the contents, is ornamented with an impression in gold, of simple but noble design, which—apart from all difference of judgment regarding ornamentation—is very pleasing to the eye. The beautiful brown leather tone of the binding contributes essentially to the effect of the design."

—Mr HENRY JAMES, to nothing the fact that ALPHONSE DAUDET, the novelist, has been accused of portraying living persons in his novels, declares that "the temptation to 'put people into a book' is one of which every writer of fiction knows something, and I hold that no succumb to it is not only legitimate, but inevitable. Putting people into books is what the smallest boys upon; the only question in the matter is a question of taste; the operation must be judged by the manner in which it is performed. DAUDET has been accused of doing the thing too boldly, and I believe that two or three of his portraits have provoked a protest."

—A few minutes after the failure of RALLIE & Co. was announced at the New York Stock Exchange, and when the members of that institution were particularly bent upon uproar, a gentleman and his little daughter entered the visitors' gallery to look upon the scene. "Are they all crazy, papa?" asked the youthful innocent. "Yes," was the quiet reply, "they are all crazy."

—Cardinal MCCLOSKEY has been resting at Atlantic City, where his chief diversion is riding to an open carriage. A correspondent describes him as above the medium height, and well proportioned, though uncommonly slight. Clear deep-set eyes born with a steady glow under heavy bushy brows. A broad, ample and strong, is crowned with beautiful silvery hair. His brow and cheeks have been deeply touched by Time; but among all the lines none are more clearly marked than those of firmness around the mouth. The rather thin lips are mobile, and nothing can be more assuring than the Cardinal's smile.

—An essayist in the British Quarterly Review for July, in an article on the relation of drugs to medicine, notices a certain trait of skepticism that has run like a thread through the whole history of medicine to the best thought of every age. There here always been found physicians of eminence who have confessed to a want of faith in their own art. "The best medicine is not to use medicine" of CELSUS has been uttered in every language by the most thoughtful men of every age. And with all the positive science of our own time, we find our best physicians saying the same thing." That eminent physician Dr. WILLIAM PARKER has observed to the writer of this paragraph that the best way of curing typhoid fever was to put the patient to the open air, under a tent, and feed him on milk.

—Mr EDWARD A. FREEMAN on the late JOHN RICHARD GREEN: "He used to say, merrily, that he wrote three kinds of articles to the Saturday Review. There were historical and topographical articles, which he said were attributed to me; there were light social articles, which he said were attributed to a lady of high rank who was believed to write in that paper; there were articles on matters in the eastern parts of London, which he said were not attributed to anybody, because nobody read them." It took Mr. GREEN only a day to write an article.

—The Rev. Mr MACKONOCHIE, the English ritualist, has tried "to prevent religion from degenerating into asceticism" by establishing a weekly dancing class in his parish in London. He professes to have shown that "dancing can be enjoyed without drinking." Every other dance on the programme is a square dance, and every dance is extremely vigorous. Most of the dancers are engaged in large manufactories during the day. On the other hand, the pastor of the Methodist church at Bridgeville, New York, has declined to receive for the purchase of a bell some money obtained at "socials" where the young people indulged in dancing.

—The Armenian convent on the island of San Lazzaro, near Venice, has been partly destroyed by fire. But the room where BYRON used to read the Armenian Bible is still preserved, as also are BYRON'S autograph, and Mr HUMPHRYS'S Moons of Venice, presented to the convent by the author, who wrote on a fly leaf his hope of being sometimes "remembered by the good brothers."

—The Westminster Review having read "with deep and grateful interest" Mr BROWNING'S latest volume of poems, finds it "impossible to deny that he is a great poet, but there will be ever a division of opinion as to whether he is a great artist or an eccentric craftsman."

—In a speech before an English high school the Bishop of Manchester condemned what he called the system of cram, and declared that the Americans had found it to be a false educational basis. The Bishop's statement, we are sorry to say, will be news to many institutions of learning.

—The Governor of Gibraltar was dining with the Italian Admiral on board the iron-clad Dandolo, when suddenly the electric-light wire fused, and set fire to a bulk head. The flames were at once extinguished, and the banquet went on. A similar accident occurred to one of the bedrooms of Mr W H VANDERBILT'S house on Fifth Avenue shortly before the edifice was ready for occupancy. Electric sparks shower one another across the apartment, producing a beautiful exhibition of fire-works, but sadly scorching the silk hangings that decorated the wall spaces. Mr VANDERBILT, on learning of the affair, and witnessing some of its results, immediately gave orders to have gas introduced into the house, and he has used it ever since for lighting purposes.

—M VICTORIEN SARDOU, the French dramatist, having been prosecuted by a literary rival on a charge of plagiarism, defended himself to court by saying that the question, though a delicate one, was by no means new. "It is more than two thousand years old, and the good sense of the public has always solved it in the same way. Literary property resides in the particular form which the author has given to a general idea. This definition is not my own; it is the definition of everybody. How can it be otherwise? Humanity is always the same. It repeats itself unceasingly. It has always the same passions, the same follies, the same vices. The drama makes use of these passions, these follies, these vices, and consequently terse is necessarily in the same circle. One can not invent a new man, one paint him other than he is. We artists are constantly talking up the work of one predecessors, who we reproduce only with such modifications as are necessitated by diversities of time and manners, language, and manners. It is not in the idea which we have made use of, but in the use which we have made of it, that the right of property shows itself. Consequently an idea, a subject, is the property of everybody. What belongs to the individual is the particular stand point from which he looks at a subject, and the manner in which he places it in relief—the way in which he arranges his plot, groups his personages, and causes them to speak and act." After deliberating over the matter for eight days—according to French usage—the judges decided to acquit M SARDOU.

Digitized by Google

A STROLLING PHOTOGRAPHER IN CHINATOWN, NEW YORK.—Drawn by A. B. Shute.

THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION—CENTRAL NAVE, LOOKING NORTH FROM THE CENTRE OF THE BUILDING.—Drawn by H. P. Fenn.—[See Page 533.]

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. E. NORRIS,

Author of "Matrimony," "Mrs. Du Maurier," "No New Times," "Heads or Tails," etc.

CHAPTER X.

SUNDRY MATTERS TO ARTY IN DISPUTE.

EARLY the next day my uncle mounted his horse and rode away for some destination unknown, leaving a message to the effect that he would probably not be back in time for luncheon. It was very seldom that he absented himself from that meal, except when called away on magisterial business; and upon this occasion both Mrs Farquhar and I were led to speculate that there was something in the wind. That that something was not unconnected with the discovery which had been made on the previous evening seemed to me more than probable, but Mrs. Farquhar, who was without that clew to the general situation, and who was afflicted with one of those restless minds which are forever probing into the reason of things, exhausted herself in conjectures, and plied me with abrupt queries, until I began to fear that, if she did not extract my secret from me, she would at least find out that I had a secret to be extracted—which would be very nearly as bad.

To escape from this danger I left the house, and walked down to the woods in search of Bunce, whom I found, as I had expected to do, in a clearing where a number of hen-coops had been set up for the young pheasants. Bunce, with his hands in the pockets of his old velveteen coat, was breaking anxiously over some of the more delicate of his nurslings, and he said that that there breeding and stooping was the very choose and all for the himitary, also that the rearing of young birds was enough to break a man's heart, let alone his back. He further remarked that some men was ignorant of their business and a many was too lazy to attend to it, but that his master was, Do you dandy, no matter what it cost to you. If you didn't get no thanks, you should have the credit, if you was a sensible man, that you hadn't neglect for to have expected none, such being the way of the world. He proceeded, with his usual modesty, to insinuate that he was in himself the only keeper worthy to be so called in the county, after which he straightened himself up and made a slow examination of me from head to foot, as though to estimate the probability of my achieving a success approaching his in my own calling in life.

"So there's a gun," he put very into the future ministerial hour were I born, Mr Chawls," said he.

I replied that I was going into the diplomatic service, if that was what he meant.

"Ah! Well, I ain't seen no Ambassadors, not as I can call to mind, but I seen some o' them Lisbon Governors with a deal o' gold lace about 'em, and their cocked hats under their arms. Shouldn't he' knowed 'em from Lord Mayors, thankee myself. Not there' it takes all kinds o' folks to make up a world, as they say. I'd rather he' been you was to went by Majesty's uniforms, Mr Chawls."

"Well I am going to wear her Majesty's uniform, Bunce."

"So you are, sir, to be sure. Though 'tis more like a livery to my ways o' thinking. And how long ought you like to stop to that trade, sir, if I may ask?"

"I pon my word, I don't know. I suppose all my life, I dare say."

Bunce stood, hit head. "Time for me to speak," said he. "Not scrupulous to my notions, are you, sir? Right—and not in fairin parts. Spare he'll be that handy, when you're gone. I don't know what we're to do with him. He do get terrible fond at times—don't seem to take what I call a interest in things. What does he want to send you off out o' sight for? 'Tis the belief as that there old woman's at the bottom of it, with her everlastin' schemes and manoeuvres. Take care as she don't play you some dirty trick or, soon as your back's turned. I bear enough it is to me what she's advisin' at and if she could get her own way you'd never have a acre o' this here property as you know, Mr Chawls."

"I know what you mean, Bunce," I said, "but I can't attempt. I'm getting rather tired of hearing my cherished old notions [illegible] property talked about, but at the present moment Mrs Farquhar is quite as anxious that I should get the place as you can be, and a great deal more so than I am myself. I don't care a straw one way or the other about it."

"So you may think, sir—so you may think. But I tell you you won't say don't much; and the party as says 'Never' is a deep one, she is. I am not at all sure as I couldn't [illegible] bee—sure, not yet so far." And as we left the wood to get Thirlby, why, that's a kind o' fools-house as you'll call yourself grow out of wonderful quick, on. There's some things in this wicked world there's little old bones and a nice estate and a good head o' game and—"

"And an unrivalled gamekeeper to look after it, eh?"

"Many a true word so, to spoke up for," chuckled Bunce, well-pleased. "Squire knows what these here events—not what they was twenty years ago though he never cared much for sport himself. And here he comes. Now I'll be half a crown to a sixpence he don't say much as such a question like 'them words, 'ords.'"

Bunce would have won his bet if he had found a taker; for my uncle, who presently joined us, contented himself with inquiring civilly after Mrs Bunce's health—one of Mrs Bunce had ever been known to do anything but well—and led me away without even glancing at his gamekeeper.

"I have been to lunch with the Warrens, Charles," he said—soon as we were beyond the range of Bunce's sharp ears, "and I am glad to say that I have concluded an arrangement which I hope you will think satisfactory. I wrote to you, as you may remember, some time ago, that I doubted whether it would be worth your while to return to Oxford and take your degree, and what happened yesterday quite decided me to carry out a plan which I had already been turning over in my mind, and to send you abroad for a year or three months. Before you can enter the diplomatic service you will have to pass an examination in modern languages and a few other subjects, which is not a very hard one, I believe, but which will require a certain amount of reading up; and I fancied that you would get through this necessary work more profitably as well as more pleasantly if you were travelling with a tutor—"

"A tutor!" I interrupted, in dismay, for the truth was that this proposition appeared to me to cast a cruel slight upon the dignity of my years.

"A coach, if you prefer the term—some one to read with you. I did not mean to suggest that he should ride a hitch in his pocket-money. Well, it occurred to me that George Warren might be willing to see something of foreign lands before settling down to his profession; so I rode over this morning and laid my proposal before him and his father. They were both very ready to agree to it, only George had some conscientious scruples on the score of his teaching capacities, which I made so bold as to overrule. Now what do you think?"

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1391.

"Oh, if it's only old George—" I said. "I suppose it is quite decided that I am to go, in any case?"

"Well, unless you can bring forward some very good reason for your remaining in England. And even then," added my uncle, with a smile, "I am afraid I should have to drive you out of Norfolk for some time to come. I deplore the necessity, and so, no doubt, do you, but it exists, and we can't escape from it."

Under those circumstances, I thought I might as well give a gracious assent. In the course of the night and morning I had considered my position, and had found fair ground for hope in the fact that Maud had not said No; which she might so easily have done if she had not contemplated saying Yes at some future date.

During the intervening period it would perhaps be rather to my advantage that I should keep myself out of sight. Moreover, since it appeared that I was to be allowed no choice in the matter, I felt entitled, without self reproach, to admit the thought that it would not be bad fun to knock about the continent of Europe with an docile and pliant a companion as I knew that George would prove. What I did not quite anticipate was my uncle's announcement that we were to start in three days' time. I pleaded for a little longer delay, but he was inexorable, and when he asked me why I wanted to put off the evil day, I had no answer to give.

Maud must have understood perfectly well the cause of my forcible removal from the scene, but she expressed her surprise and regret, when we met, as naturally as if she had never in her life sat in a punt among the reeds of Thirlby Broad, and she and my uncle bore themselves toward one another with no other sign of innocent unconsciousness than I could hardly watch them together and keep my countenance. Mrs Farquhar, on the other hand, neither understood nor approved of the hasty decision which had been arrived at, and gave it as her opinion that the world had not taken leave of its senses. Did anybody ever hear of such a thing as tearing up a young man from the University in the midst of his career, and throwing him headlong among all the temptations and dangers of those dark Papish lands? She protested against such madness with all the power of her tongue up to the end, and I greatly fear that my poor uncle had a bad time of it with her after we were gone.

At the last moment I transgressed so far as to whisper, impressively to Maud, like Charles I to Bishop Juxon, "Remember!" My exact meaning may not have been more clear to her than that of the ill-fated king has been to historians; but, for that matter, did I know very well myself what I meant, but the fact was that I had not the opportunity to say more than one word, and this seemed as comprehensive a one as could be chosen. She smiled very slightly, but did not favor me with any other response, verbal or tacit; and so we parted.

I see her now as I saw her then, standing upon the steps at Thirlby in the morning sunshine, while I scrambled up into the dog-cart in which George has already taken his place; I can see the Rector, who has just arrived, in a desperate hurry, as usual, mopping his forehead with a brilliant silk pocket-handkerchief; and my uncle, looking up at [illegible] a little sadly, and Mrs Farquhar, with her cap adrift, owing to natural agitation; and the impassive Cooper in the background. From the gates of the stable-yard hard by Bunce and half a dozen other friends of humbler position grin their farewells and their wishes for a pleasant journey and a speedy return. It is difficult to believe that this happened more than thirty years ago, and that the place which once knew all these kindly faces so well knows them no more.

Thirty years ago travelling abroad was not the commonplace, matter-of-fact sort of business that it is to-day. Railways there were; but they were few in number, and did not extend very far south; national types were more strongly marked, or were at any rate, more perceptible to the tourist, the tourist himself was a person of distinct individuality, with whom, as he strolled his leisurely way, people stopped to speak, instead of being, as he is now, one of a horde, whom they stand aside to let pass, [illegible] were good or bad, cheap or dear, as the case might be; they were not all bad nor all dear, coffee was still to be had in France; good manners had not yet gone out of fashion in Italy, nor honesty in Switzerland. In other words, I was twenty years of age in the middle of the present century; whereas the century and I are both becoming a little passé now. I say that the Continent was a far pleasanter place to wander over in the year 1853 than it is in 1883, and I don't care who maintains the contrary. As for hot rooms [illegible] and me, we set foot upon it at Calais with sensations of wonder and delight, such as I can not conceive any young man of the present day capable of experiencing. Everything was new to us, and in search of further novelty we had only to move where we pleased and as far as we pleased, east, west, or south, for our instructions had been of a vague and liberal order. The only restriction laid upon us bore reference to Paris, in which gay city my uncle remembered that a stay of three or four weeks at the outside would be enough for all legitimate purposes, and I suppose that was why we headed for Paris at once, and remained there to the last day of our permitted month.

"SHE SAID A FEW RAPID WORDS TO THEM IN ITALIAN.

At that season of the year Paris was, of course, empty, socially speaking; but its attractions were not lessened, so far as we were concerned, by the absence of the fashionable world. The streets were full of people, whose costume and gestures afforded an endless merriment; in the theatres, whither we repaired on most nights, in order to improve our knowledge of the language, were crowds sufficient to render the air almost unbreathable; the cafés were thronged with noisy politicians, who harangued for or against the tottering Republic, and whose avowed views reached us by fragments above the clatter of the demitasses and the click of the billiard balls. Once, while we were sitting on the Boulevard des Italiens, an obliging neighbor pointed out to us General Cavaignac striding by with his head in the air; and once, from our window, we saw the Prince-President driving past in an open carriage, looking gloomy and supremely ill, as usual. He was not so fortunate as to earn our approbation, I remember, in the matter of personal appearance. "There is a good deal more of the owl than the eagle about him," George said, contemptuously. "He may be a first-rate conspirator; but if he attempts to play the game of dictatorship over this disrespectful nation, he'll get that melancholy hand of his clapped off at sure as he's born!"

We were domiciled in the Rue Louis-le-Grand, in a house which was subsequently razed to the ground, together with many others, during the piping times when Baron Haussmann was Prefect of the Seine, and when the potentate whose late George had so rashly forecast had become a full-fledged eagle, and no fear of the Germanic variety of the species before his eyes. The street was narrow, as most Parisian streets were then; but it was a lively one, and I spent a good deal of the time in looking out of window which I ought to have employed in studying Wheaton's International Law, Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and Hallam's Constitutional History, all which works were spread out invitingly for me on the table every morning by George, who was more successful in getting up subjects himself than in inducing me to follow his example. "You will be plucked, to a dead certainty," he would sigh sometimes, but I assured him that there was no cause for alarm, and that, when the critical moment drew nearer, I should throw myself into my work, and accomplish what I had to do, though not after his fashion. Some people, I pointed out, overcame obstacles by tapping and mining; others annihilated them by a coup de canon—he belonged to the former, I to the latter class. I don't know whether he was convinced by this reasoning, but doubtless his commonsense showed him the uselessness of arguing against it; for, in truth, he had no authority over me. All he stipulated for was that we should at least go through the form of reading for a few hours every morning, and to this I could not reasonably object. In the afternoons and evenings we wandered abroad, studying Parisian life and manners under various aspects.

Wherever we went—and cinnre took us into some queer places—I was haunted by a vague expectation of encountering my castaway cousin. That I should come across him sooner or later, in Paris or elsewhere, I was convinced; and as often as I saw a seedy out-at-elbows Englishman I began scanning his features eagerly in the effort to trace in them some resemblance to those of my uncle. With a few of these disreputable persons I made some excuse to scrape acquaintance, and I remember in particular one red-faced, looking half-tipsy youth whom we chanced upon at a café chantant, and who responded to my advances with the utmost cordiality. I really thought he had quite a Le Marchant sort of look about the eyes and mouth, and the trifling detail of his being at least a dozen years too young did not strike me at the moment. Only after he had begun to scatter his h's about in a reckless manner was I reluctantly forced to the conclusion that he could not be the man of whom I was in search. It then seemed to be about time to shake him off, and I accordingly signaled to George to get up; but my friend would not be shaken off at all, accompanied us down the Champs Elysées, addressing me as "ole feller" in a loud voice, and finally requested the loan of twenty francs, at which price I was glad to be rid of him.

When he had stumbled away into the dark near George ventured on a mild remonstrance. "What possesses you to speak to those cads, Charley? One would think you had some private reasons for forcing your company upon every drunken loafer within reach."

I replied that I had such reasons, and proceeded to explain what they were, while George plodded along beside me and listened in silence. He knew the whole story of my uncle's calamity—indeed, it appeared to me that everybody in Norfolk except myself had always been acquainted with it—and he did not express any surprise at the quest which I had undertaken, only a sort of tacit disapproval.

"And when you have got him, what will you do with him?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know. Make friends with him, I suppose."

"Yes; and then?"

"Oh, well, then I must try to arrange a meeting between him and my uncle."

"I see."

"You don't seem very enthusiastic about my plan," I remarked, with some impatience.

"Well, I don't know, I'm sure," said George, musingly. "It's a noble project, no doubt; but then, you know, I am one of those commonplace people who don't, as a rule, appreciate noble projects. I think, if I were in your place, I should let well alone."

"If things were well as they are, I would let them alone," I answered; "but they are not. They are well for me, of course, but one isn't to consider one's own interests above one before everything. I should have thought you would have understood that. Maud did at once. She quite agreed with me that it was my duty to find out this unfortunate fellow and let him have another chance, though she acknowledged that she hoped I should not succeed."

"Miss Dennison," said George, "takes the romantic view of the case; and that is quite right, and what one would wish her to do. She has a noble and generous nature herself; the would like to be able to think that you men were generous and willing to sacrifice your prospects rather than be partner—sleeping partner even—in an injustice. And yet, you see, she doesn't go the extreme length of wishing you success; she wants you to have the glory of being disinterested, but not the inconvenience. As for me, I am quite content to follow her lead. By all means go on looking for your cousin; only I hope you won't find him. And indeed I don't think you will."

"That remains to be seen," I remarked.

"But supposing that, by some queer chance, you should find him," pursued George, "you will then, as you say, have to load him home to Mr. Le Marchant, who is not likely either to thank you or to change his mind at your suggestion; and again, supposing that he does change his mind, the odds are that the son will earn out to be altogether irreclaimable, and then there will be another quarrel and another scandal; and again, supposing that all goes smoothly, that the son behaves himself, and that the father is delighted to have him back again and consents to cut you adrift—then what will you have left to marry upon? I really do think that you had better leave well alone."

I thought this rather cynical of George, but, to tell the truth, I was no very disconsolate at my failure to discover Harry in Paris. If he chose to turn up, well and good, and I should then, I hoped, know how to do my duty; but, after all, I had no come abroad to seek for him.

When summer was fading into autumn we set our faces toward the south, journeying by rail as far as the train would take us—which, if I remember rightly, was not beyond Lyons—and thence dawdling on to the Mediterranean, stopping at places where nobody dreams of pausing a night now, and enjoying the color, the picturesque out-door life, the wines, and the songs of windy Provence as Sterne and the old travellers used to enjoy them, and as no traveller will ever enjoy them again. At Nice we made another long halt, and it was not until the last days of October that we struck a bargain with a vetturino, who was to take us by way of the Cornice road to Genoa, whence we proposed to travel by easy stages toward Rome.

I see by my Bradshaw that a railway now runs through that lovely district, and I am told by many friends that the little white villages which used to be dotted along the coast-line are now more or less lively watering-places, with the conventional big hotels and the usual winter population of invalids and idlers. I should doubt whether these things can be an improvement, but to me personally it is of no consequence. I have never revisited the Riviera, and I never shall. In the year 1852, when George Warren and I drove along its shores in the brilliant autumn sunshine, and looked down upon "hays the peacock's neck he hue," where bare-legged fishermen sat mending their nets, or cast upon distant headlands clothed with the silvery olive, I thought to myself that I would return thither on my wedding trip, but circumstances interfered with the realization of this scheme, and now I should be very sorry to destroy a happy memory by a stupid attempt to retrace it.

It was on the evening of the second day, I think, that we drew near to the little town of Alassio, where it was intended that we should spend the night. As we entered the dim, narrow street it became evident that the place was in a state of commotion. Above the rattle of our wheels and the clatter of our horses' hoofs we could distinguish a confused din of shouts and oaths and crashing of whips, which grew clearer presently, when our driver pulled up, being unable to advance further on account of the crowd of gesticulating inhabitants which blocked the way. We both stood up and looked over the heads of the excited population. In front of the inn were drawn up two travelling-carriages, facing in opposite directions, and each with its four horses harnessed; but the four postilions had dismounted, and were dancing round one another in the vacant space between the two vehicles, flourishing their whips, and exchanging threats of a most terrible and bloodcurdling nature.

"What is all the row about?" George inquired of our vetturino, who shrugged his shoulders, and said: "It is a difficulty about the horses. They both want to get on, and there are only four fresh beasts to be had, so they are quarrelling. It often happens like that—che vuole!"

"Did you ever see such a set of capering fools?" exclaimed George, who had a fine British disdain for all foreign methods of carrying on hostilities. "Why can't they set to work with their fists, if they mean fighting? Upon my word, I've a great mind to go and thrash them the way I don't suppose they do mean fighting at all, though."

However, he did them an injustice there. Even while he spoke a whip-lash, either by accident or intention, fell right across the cheek of one of the postilions, and this was the signal for a general onslaught. Immediately there was a yell and a screech, and in another moment the whole four of them were locked together in a struggling mass, making free use of their whips, and also, so far as one could see through the cloud of dust that they kicked up, of their nails and teeth. The ridiculous horses began to plunge; the occupants of the further carriage bundled out on to the road in affright; to the other one, a lady whose back was toward me sat looking on at the fray with perfect composure and indifference, paying no attention to her courier and maid, both of whom had jumped down, and were entreating her to do likewise.

"By Jove! she's a cool hand," I said, admiringly. "An English woman evidently. Ought to we to go and offer to help her?"

George's insular reserve asserted itself at once. "Oh, I think we had better not interfere," he answered; "she might not like it. I'm quite game to go and separate those lunatics, though, if you choose."

But I had an inquisitive desire to see the lady's face, and at that time of my life I was seldom afflicted with shyness. I stepped up to the side of the carriage, took off my wide-awake, with my best bow, and asked whether I could be of any assistance. "Had you not better get out?" I said. "Nobody is holding your horses, you know."

She turned her head, and took a slow survey of my humble person, which disconcerted me a little. "Thank you," she answered, in a cool, pleasant voice; "but my horses are much too tired to run away. The other people have got the fresh ones, unfortunately. No, I don't know that you can be of any use. Unless," she added, as an afterthought, "you would knock one of those men down: then we should be two to one, which ought to give us a better chance. Or perhaps your friend would like to do it, he seems to be eager for the battle."

These last words, spoken in a somewhat louder key, caught the ear of George, who was much more at home in the art of self-defense than he that of making polite speeches. He waited for no second hint; and to the twinkle of an eye one of the postilions was sprawling on his back, with the soles of his huge boots in the air.

"Oh, dear me!" exclaimed the lady, in great vexation, "he has knocked down the wrong man! How very stupid of him! Now we are done for!"

There can no doubt about that. In the midst of the uproar aroused by George's unlucky intervention the enemy quietly vacated the field. The dusty post-boys hoisted themselves into their saddles, the travellers resumed their seats, and presently the rival carriage rolled away toward Oneglia and San Remo, the crowd falling back on either side to give it passage. Meanwhile the guardians of law and order, who had hitherto kept modestly in the background, came forward in the shape of two carabinieri. These made a prompt capture of George, and were leading him away—presumably to the lock up—when the unknown lady stopped them with an imperious gesture. She said a few rapid words to them in Italian, the sense of which I was unable to catch, but which had the effect of causing them at once to relinquish their prisoner. Then she turned to George, who was looking very sorry and crestfallen.

"I have told these men that I am on my way to Turin, and that I shall see his Majesty there—which is true," she said. "I also told them that you were a personage of distinction—which is probably not true, but that can't be helped—and that they would certainly be put to death if they meddled with you. Perhaps you had better give them some money, though. Not too much; ten lire each will be ample." She added, as she stepped out of her carriage, "You should not be so hasty. If you had taken the trouble to ask me which were my postilions you could have saved your money, and I might have been able to continue my journey."

"I am very sorry," said George, half laughing, half indignant.

She smiled. "Oh," said she, "you meant well; and, after all, it does not much matter. It is only spending a night here, and I suppose they can give me rooms." With which she marched into the inn, followed by her courier and maid, leaving us to arrange matters with the carabinieri and the bruised postilion, the latter of whom was naturally much conveyed at the treatment he had received, and assessed his injuries at two napoleons.

"What an extraordinary woman!" ejaculated George, as we entered the dark, musty-smelling inn, after discharging the various claims made upon us—what a very extraordinary woman!"

"She certainly is an ordinary," I agreed; "but I don't know that she is any the worse for that. I wonder who she is? Did you notice that she said she was going to see the King of Sardinia?"

"She said she would see him at Turin, but then so might you or I, you know—in the street," observed the cautious George. "I didn't much like the look of her myself," he added.

"I am quite certain that she is a lady," said I, decisively; "one could tell that at once by her voice. And I must say that I did rather like the look of her."

"Well, I don't know, I'm sure. She has cost me a lot of money, and all the skin off my knuckle," observed George, ruefully. "I don't care if I never see her again."

I said I should be very much disappointed if we didn't see her again, and added that I was determined at least to find out who she was before she left.

I very soon obtained the desired information, for in about a quarter of an hour the courier whom we had seen below appeared at our door, and handed me a card bearing the name of Lady Constance Milner, beneath which was scribbled in pencil, will be glad to see Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Warren at dinner at seven o'clock, and hopes that they will not trouble to dress.

"H'm! it hasn't taken her long to find out who we are, anyhow," growled George. "She might have told the fellow to wait for an answer, I think. Suppose you write her a line to say you're sorry we can't go."

I replied that I should certainly not do anything of the kind. Lady Constance understood what I meant to be civil, and it was no fault of hers if George had barked his knuckles while fighting upon his friends instead of his enemies. Of course he could do as he liked; but I meant to dine with her.

At seven o'clock, accordingly, I and my reluctant companion descended to the first floor and were shown into a large bare apartment, with a stone floor, and walls painted in crude frescoes. Our entertainer rose from her chair to the window to receive us. She was a handsome woman, extremely tall, and holding herself in such a manner as to show every inch of her height. In the carriage she had not struck me as being young, but I saw now that her age could not much exceed five or six and twenty. She had a slight natural droop of the eyelids, and the shape of the corners of the eyebrows, which gave the upper part of her face a somewhat supercilious expression; but this was contradicted by her mouth, which was rather large, and which wore a bold, frank smile. One noticed these details before asking one's self whether she were handsome or not. Probably nine people out of ten would have called her so, although she had not much beauty of features. What she had was an air of distinction, an admirable figure, and a travelling dress which fitted her like a glove.

"Please sit down," she said. "I thought, as we are the only people in the inn, we might as well dine together. I can't offer you a good dinner, of course; still, you will have a little better with me than you could have done alone, for my courier, Antonio, is a universal genius, and I have sent him down to the kitchen to see what he can do. He found out your names for me, so he I don't know which is which. Is Mr Warren the one who gave my position the black eye?" Ah! thought so. You are both of you at Oxford or Cambridge, I suppose?"

Her manner was a trifle patronizing, she applied a little too clearly, perhaps, that on news and history were matters of the most complete indifference to her, yet I did not feel offended. It was evidently natural to her to talk like that, there was no affectation in her good-humored nonchalance, and if she did not care about cultivating our acquaintance, neither were we in any anxious to cultivate hers. Chance had thrown us together for one evening, and there was no reason why we should not get what amusement we could out of that chance, without commencing ourselves in any way with regard to future contingencies. I took her civilities as I supposed that she intended them to be taken, and perhaps that was why she and I got on admirably together during the dinner, which amply justified her boast of Antonio's skill.

George, on the other hand, did not get on with her at all. As a general thing, George disliked and distrusted odd people. Oddity, in his eyes, was prima facie evidence of a lack of respectability; and respectability was his idol. Besides, on he told me afterward, he had an instinctive feeling that this woman was dangerous, and when I inquired, "Dangerous in what way?" he replied that he didn't know, but that he mistrusted his opinion. While dinner was going on he scarcely spoke at all, keeping his eyes fixed upon his plate, and devoting himself chiefly to the eating of a healthy appetite. Once I saw Lady Constance give him a long look—such a look as she had honored me with when I had first accosted her—but that appeared to satisfy any curiosity that she may have felt as to my friend for she took on further notice of him, except once until the time came for her to wish him good-night.

Before that time she had heard a good deal about me and my belongings. She inquired whether my uncle was a brother of General Le Marchant's, whom she said that she knew slightly; she gratified my vanity by remembering perfectly well that I had been Captain of the Eton at Eton; she found out that we proposed to spend the winter among the cities of northern Italy, and expressed a gracious hope that we might meet at Naples, whither she herself was bound. When I told her that I was destined no long to enter diplomacy, she became more interested. "It is so amusing game," she said "perhaps so amusing a game as those in Oude to enjoy it, you should make it up as an amateur the professional people are tied hand and foot with red tape, and generally get sick of their trade before they have learned it. I know something of diplomacy from their point of view, for my brother is Minister at one of the German courts, and my husband was in the service at one time."

"And he has given it up?—your husband, I mean," I inquired.

"He has given everything up. he is dead," she answered, quietly.

I felt myself becoming hot all over. "I—I beg your pardon," I murmured.

"Don't mind me," she answered. "you couldn't be expected to know that I was a widow and mistaken of that kind are a great deal more disagreeable for the person who makes them than for the person about whom they are made. Still, if you are going to be a diplomatist, you will have to acquire the art of conversation. I'll make you a present of an excellent rule in rhyme:

> 'If you your lips would keep from slips
> Five things observe with care.
> To whom you speak, of whom you speak,
> And how, and when, and where.'

Mr. Warren would probably suggest as an amendment, 'Never speak at all,' but we can't be all Trappists."

This was the one occasion upon which she addressed herself to George, who replied that he thought it a very good plan not to speak, unless you had something to say.

Very soon after this we took our leave, or, to speak more truthfully, received our dismissal. Whether Lady Constance Milner was a great be who was accustomed or he surrounded by obedient vassals, or whether he was only that she considered or to be very little people. I had, of course, no means of telling, but she certainly treated us very much or a good-natured, easy-going sovereign might be expected to treat her subjects, and, when she had had enough of us, sent us away without any ceremony.

"Good-night and good-by," she said; "for I shall probably have started before you are up to-morrow morning. If you should find yourselves at Naples or Palermo in the early part of the winter, we may, perhaps, meet again, and I hope you will call upon me."

With these best words she turned away, and resumed the chair by the window where she had been sitting when we made our entrance, and Antonio, a grave black-bearded functionary, held the door open and bowed us out.

[or or conveyance.]

THE CROSS UPON THE SPIRE.

THE ship came slowly sailing in
Beneath a gloomy, threat'ning sky,
And round her, be the tempest lashed,
The waters of the bay rose high.
Long had she been upon the sea,
And many battles had she fought
With fearful storms and mighty winds
That her destruction cruelly sought;
And, bravely keeping on her way,
Had safely through all perils passed,
And yet nor moon nor stars shone out
When she drew near to port at last.

"It may be I have brought ill luck,"
Said one who be the captain stood,
"As Jonah did. They used to say
That o'er with me came aught of good,
And is was but the truth they spoke.
I was a wild and reckless boy.
In me my father had no pride,
In me my mother found no joy;
I grieved the hearts I should have cheered,
And spurned the help of friendly hands;
And then, disgraced, I fled to roam
For ten long years in foreign lands.

"And not one word to bids nor kin
I sent. I knew them glad to be Free from the shame and wretchedness
That in those days were part of me.
Ay! shame so heavy that at last
He weight a mother could not bear.
And he is lost indeed—almost—
Of whom a mother can despair.
Almost—not quite, thanks be to God!
For I have, friendless and alone,
With His help, striven manfully
For youthful folly to atone.

"And now I ask my doubting heart
(I know they like) still their again,
They who once loved me, smile on me,
Or do I welcome seek or ever?
All omens have forbidden hope.
Strong powers have delayed our bark,
And or we near the land to-night
Around us everything is dark."
"Not everything," the captain said,
With pointing finger. "Friend, look there!"
And lo! a wondrous cross thus seemed
By spirit hands held in the air.

Above the sleeping city, like
Stars blended in a beacon-light,
It brightly shone, and welcome gave
To all who came from sea by night.
And many hurrying on deck,
Cried, "Ever blessed be those who made
Their church uphold the sacred sign!"
And many wept, and many prayed,
And he, the wanderer, feared no more
The shadow of his early sin,
As toward the cross upon the spire
The ship went slowly sailing in.

THE YELLOWSTONE PARK.

On page 537 our readers will find a picture, engraved from a drawing by Thomas Moran, of the Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone—the finest view in the National Park. The sketch was made for Hayden & Wrenn at a spot about two miles below the Great Fall, which plunges to an unbroken volume over a precipice about 450 feet in height.

The wonderful region, where President Arthur and his party have sought recreation and sport, is yearly attracting the attention of an increasing number of American and foreign tourists. "In natural forms," says a writer in a recent issue of the London Times, "surpass the wildest efforts of the imagination in their grotesqueness, and the coloring of its rocks and cliffs, of its waters, streams, and pools, is represented by observers to baffling all description and almost defying credibility."

The same writer, referring to some unique features of the Park, says: "The whole district is a very Tophet of strange volcanic agencies. It is without exception the most remarkable region of geysers and hot springs in the world, its only possible rival being that of Waikato, in New Zealand. Besides the cold pure water springs, which are abundant throughout the district, Mr Norman enumerates the following distinct varieties: cold medicinal springs, warm medicinal springs, foaming or laundry springs, terrace-building springs, and poisoning or spouting geysers. The latter are literally innumerable and are found in every variety and in every stage of development and decay, incipient and distinct, active and quiescent, mud-geysers and 'paint pots'—where the mineral deposits dye the contents of their central receptacle with every conceivable variety of color—and geysers of the ordinary intermittent type, which constantly send forth a column of water and steam to the height of 250 and sometimes 300 feet. Even these are not or remarkable, perhaps, as the terrace-building streams, which are formed by the issue of water, heated by volcanic action, though tortuous passages in cretaceous limestone. The warm becomes charged with dissolving portions of the rock, and on reaching the surface it is discharged or pulsating throbs, each of which deposits a thin corrugated lamina of the calcareous substance held in solution. This slow but ceaseless process has resulted in building up beautiful scallop-bordered bathing-pools along many thousands of feet of terraced slopes which occupy the mountain-side. Traces of iron held or solution test these formations with their own peculiar coloring in vertical banding, and the whole effect is described as heaven conception beautiful. The Mammoth Hot Springs, on the banks of the Gardiner River, are the most remarkable active springs of this kind to be found in the Yellowstone Park, but there are many others on a smaller scale, and even the Mammoth Springs themselves are insignificant compared with those, now extinct, which in some far distant time have covered the Terrace Mountain and enormous ranges of cliff along the Yellowstone with the crumbling remains of similar pools on the most gigantic scale."

THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION.

THE Southern Industrial Exposition, which was recently opened with great eclat by President Arthur, has not disappointed the hopes of its promoters. It is the largest and most important enterprise of the kind ever undertaken in a Southern State, and has received a hearty support from every section of the country. The attendance is steadily increasing, and its influence on the commercial and industrial interests of the South can not fail to be most salutary.

MISS DIANA IN THE ADIRONDACKS

THE week's front page picture is not a fancy sketch of what might happen, but an illustration of what actually did happen last summer in the Adirondacks. The young lady who made the successful shot, and thus killed her first deer, is well known in New York society, and, were her name to be mentioned, many readers of the WEEKLY would say, "Why, I know her well; but I never heard that she was a good rifle-shot."

The killing of this particular deer was not the result of an accident, nor was the shot made at such short range as or render a miss impossible. A arduous practice had trained both eye and hand, until to make a bull's-eye at a hundred paces was an uncommon feat for Miss Diana. She had gone on several hunts, and familiarized herself with their details, so that when her turn came, and from the lonely "stand" that she had occupied for several hours one cool September morning she saw the coveted game swimming within rifle shot, she did not become so excited as to throw away her opportunity by a premature shot, as many a sportsman would have done in her place. She waited until the deer had reached shore, and half emerged from the water, then with the coolness and steadiness of a veteran she fired at the broadside so fairly presented, and before she could note the effect of her shot through its smoke a cheer from the hunters who had been following the deer across the lake announced its success.

Miss Diana might have killed a deer long before this if she had consented to assume the position often taken by the cowardly deer butchers from the city who frequent the Adirondacks, and allowed herself to be rowed in a boat up to the exhausted animal while far out on the lake, and surrounded by other boats beyond the possibility of escape. With the true instinct of a man she scorned such a method, and preferred to take the chances of a long that at a moment when one more hound would have lent the deer in sight a [illegible] shot.

Quiet [illegible] are left to the woods of the Northern wilderness of the dresses employed by certain city visitors to obtain a shot at a deer, and thus furnish a sort of foundation for a series of beautiful lies that shall last them a lifetime. One that is well couched for in of a dandy sportsman, whose only recommendations to human consideration was his money, who offered his guides a hundred dollars to place him or that he could kill a deer. As a result, they drove one into the lake, surrounded it with boats, and as one of the guides reached over and held it by the tail, the noble-minded hunter, with the instinct of a butcher, placed the muzzle of his gun to the head of the struggling animal and blew out its brains.

As a rule, the less city sportsmen have to say of their hunting exploits in the Adirondacks, the more they will be respected by their friends who are acquainted with the true history of the adventures in question.

In contrast to this unsavory incident a good story is told of the unexpected success of another shot made by a woman. Some years ago a party of ladies and gentlemen were camping in the Adirondacks, and one day several of the gentlemen engaged in pistol practice. One of them offered it to pistol, a Derringer of large caliber, to one of the ladies, and asked her to try a shot. Although she had never fired a pistol, she expressed a willingness to do so, provided he would fix a target for her to aim at. Taking the first object at hand, which happened to be his own hat, the gentleman pinned it to a tree a few yards distant, and stepped aside. The lady pointed the pistol, shut her eyes, pulled the trigger, and made a bull's-eye, the big bullet tearing out the entire crown of the hat, which was his only one, and could not be replaced until the return to civilization. To this day her cousins to marksmanship are based upon that one shot, for she her never fired another.

A short time since a Michigan school teacher was trained by a friend in the ways of woodcraft until she too succeeded in killing a deer with a fair shot. Sinking back in the canoe from which the had fired, with a sigh of relief and happiness, she exclaimed: "There! I've killed a deer. Now if I can only shoot a bear I shall be ready to die and go to heaven."

As Miss Diana has again visited the Adirondacks this summer, and is now encamped with a party of friends in one of the wildest sections of that wild region, the chances are that she will return to the city in the autumn bearing other antlered trophies to add to those already won.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Queer Misinformation.—A strange Case.—Selling a Wife.—Idiotic Anger.—A solitary Survivor.—A Case of Bathos.—Irish Anecdotes.

A FRENCH who came over in the Channel packet the other day overheard the following conversation between a French lady passenger and the stewardess:

"What is that high cliff called?"

"Shakspeare's Cliff, ma'am."

"And why Shakspeare's?"

"Oh"—after a moment's reflection—"because a lot of that name were wrecked. See, there is a hole in it which her bones made before she went down."

My friend thought it only right to undeceive the French lady as to the origin of the name of Shakspeare's Cliff, but he might just as well have spared his pains: the lady preferred to believe the local authority. The moral of the story, however, remains behind. My friend, who is a trustworthy person, though he dines not a good deal, tells me that at whosesoever table he narrates this anecdote only about one person in six sees anything ludicrous in it. As to the ladies, he finds only one in six here ever heard of Shakspeare's Cliff, one in ten is who knows where it is, and only one in twenty who knows why it is so called. I have myself put the question to a young lady who has recently taken honors at the university, and she had never heard of Shakspeare's Cliff. I wrote to you some time ago of the Harrow monitor who had "distinguished himself" at that establishment, and had never heard of Cherbourg; but that strikes me or a much less curious case. The Shakspeare Cliff matter shows no amount of ignorance in the so-called educated classes which is simply amazing, for if they know nothing about the literature and geography of their own land, what are they likely to know? And yet there is an idiotic demand from some people that ladies should be taught Greek. The fact is, the education which is really worth anything is what people teach themselves by hearing, reading, and thinking; beyond "the three R's" little to the majority of mankind can be taught with any benefit at all.

A very strange "case" has been admitted into Huddersfield Infirmary. A boy bitten by a cat, and hearing the possible consequences of it much discussed by hubub persons has developed certain symptoms of hydrophobia, but other symptoms always observed in that disease he has not developed. He "looks about in a furtive manner, and scratches the floor," but exhibits no loathing at the sight of water. It is supposed by the doctors that he is not poisoned, but frightened. Prisoners put in beds supposed by them to have been occupied by cholera patients have died of cholera; sensitive persons, sitting with their backs to a huge window frame, and thinking that the window was open, have caught cold. But can mere apprehension produce hydrophobia?

Some people are always rubbing their hands with mischievous glee at the ease with which Mr. Gladstone is "drawn," as the slang phrase goes, i.e., is persuaded to answer any accusation or remonstrance made to him. He is certainly not a badger in this respect. But there are other eminent personages who also have the weakness. Because somebody asserted that the debate upon the deceased Wife's Sister bill in the Lords was cut short because it was time for the Prince of Wales to go to his dinner, the Bishop of Winchester has actually written to say that their lordships did not rise so early "from that unworthy motive." If he had left matters there, the thing would have been ludicrous enough, but he goes on to say that the debate was shortened for the sake of peers with weak stomachs, who could not possess their usual dinner-time thereby even the Peers might have ascribed something for the sake of defending all that (according to the Bishop) is "time-honored and valuable." Or, since they have no Jew among them now, why could they not have eaten a ham sandwich to stay their stomachs?

English husbands do not dispose of their wives by auction or private contract so often as Frenchmen imagine, but they do do it occasionally. An instance of is has just taken place at Wakefield, remarkable for the very reasonable terms on which the lady went. She was offered for sixpence, and eventually parted with at the wholesale or trade price of fourpence-halfpenny, her four children remaining with her husband. This is the "lowest transaction" or yet recorded in crime—or in husbands.

Public attention has been very properly drawn to the idiotic conduct of certain young Irishmen in Liverpool, who, on visiting a representation of the Phœnix Park tragedy in wax, could not restrain themselves from knocking Mr. Carey's head off. Nothing of course could be more mischievously impotent, but it is comforting to reflect that what can only excite contemptuous ridicule was to the good old times a thing to be applauded. Folks were hung in effigy by authority, or, even the bodies of eminent men of one political party were taken out of their graves and suspended in chains by the other. It is the spread of education and intelligence which has saved us from such spectacles, and taught men to abstain from these vexatious brutalities.

The only survivor of the Waterloo Banquet is the Earl of Aldermarle, a nobleman of eighty-five. It is hardly possible to conceive the sad sense of survivorship being more strikingly brought home to one than in this case. Who of us does not remember the picture of that historical entertainment which used to take place year after year with loosening guests at Apsley House? Even to us to think all are now gone has one is a melancholy reflection: what, then, must it be to the sole survivor?

An Alderman and passed Lord Mayor has been run over by a donkey-cart and barrow. This is perhaps the most extraordinary instance of bathos that has ever been recorded. The famous epitaph—

"He lost his fate, and it was them,
He was run over by a 'bus,"

was once "capped" by a friend of mine as follows:

"She met her fate, and it was worse—
She was walked over by a horse."

It is generally very dangerous to preface a good story by saying, "I am going to tell you one of the very best things you ever heard in your life," but in this case I am not afraid to venture even that. An English traveller in Ireland, greedy for information, and always fingering the note book in his breast pocket, got into the same railway carriage with a certain Roman Catholic archbishop. Ignorant of his rank, and only perceiving that he was a divine, he questioned him pretty closely about the state of the country, whiskey-drinking, etc., etc. At last he cried, "You are a parish priest yourself, of course?"

His Grace drew himself up. "I am one, sir," he answered, with my gravity.

"Dear! dear!" was the sympathizing rejoinder; "that occurred drink, I suppose!"

It is a great consolation to feel that Ireland, despite its wine and wickedness, still supplies us with good stories. A clergyman of that nation was just before the disestablishment of the Irish Church created a bishop. The parish priest, who was a great friend of his, met him returning from grouse-shooting, immediately after his elevation, and with delicate irony congratulated him upon "the step he had gained in his profession." Then, unable to resist the temptation of giving him a keener thrust, he added, "But I can't say I remember that the apostles went out grouse-shooting."

"I don't know about that; there is on record," was the good-natured reply, "but as all events they were fishermen."

R. KEMBLE, of London.

ANECDOTES OF DOGS.

A MASTIF has a pug-dog, also a cat, of which the dog was always very jealous, chasing it about whenever it saw it. Not many weeks since the pug astonished its mistress by coming up to her, sitting up and begging, then whining, and running a little distance from her, till it appeared evident that it wished to persuade her to come with it. It continued to beg and to run on in the same manner till it led her out into the garden, to the foot of an apple tree, against which the dog raised itself on its hind-legs and barked vehemently. On looking up, the lady saw the cat with a trap on its foot, evidently in great pain. She got it down and relieved it of the trap, the dog showing the greatest joy, and on the cat having placed on the ground, the dog, which before had never done anything but hunt and worry it, licked it all over and over, and ever since they have been the best of friends.

A dog had a kennel in the yard of a house which was overlooked from one of the windows. A lady (my informant) saw this dog hiding some of its dinner in a corner behind the kennel, and this performance, she noticed, was repeated for a day or two. On the third day the dog was missing some little time from the yard, but before long it was seen to return, followed by a small, half-starved canine friend, which it took up to the store of hidden food, and stood by, wagging its tail with evident pleasure, while the strange dog consumed it.

The following is of a different nature. In Ceylon the large Lambos deer is hunted by dogs, the huntsmen going on foot. The deer generally comes to bay in a stream among the hills, and the huntsmen, guided by the sound of the dogs, make their way to the spot as quickly as they can with knife or spear to end the matter. Sometimes, however, the distance or the form of the hills prevents the sound of the dogs at bay from being heard, the huntsmen do not arrive, and the deer, if strong, may escape, or is, perhaps, killed by the dogs. On one of these occasions the owner of a pack of hounds (who related this to me) lost all sound of the hounds, and came back home to breakfast. After this he called back again, thinking he would go to a distant part of the jungle, where he imagined the pack might have taken the deer. Before he had gone a mile or two he met two of his pack by themselves coming straight for home. They on coming or saw their master than they [illegible] the greatest delight, and at once turned [illegible] went before [illegible] led him [illegible] miles of jungle, to [illegible] he [illegible] of its escape and no sooner their master [illegible] at once reconciled with their [illegible] to with renewed energy at their [illegible] knife of their master put [illegible] Now it is perfectly clear that [illegible] agreed among themselves that [illegible] her should go home and fetch [illegible] the rest kept the deer at bay

Digitized by Google

THE FOREIGN EXHIBITION AT BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—[See Page 533.]

THE GRAND CAÑON OF THE YELLOWSTONE RIVER, IN THE NATIONAL PARK.—Drawn by Thomas Moran.—[See Page 539.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Richmond no Rosemary," "Holidays in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Story-Teller; or, the Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XLV.

At the eleventh hour Markham had yielded to Stephana's request that he should accompany her little colony to their new world. It seemed to him a small concession to make after so many, and as much of his heart as was not with Stephana's self was to her work. He went off cheerfully, therefore, feeling, perhaps, a secret sense of relief as the notion of being out of England for the next few months.

Nothing definite had been said on the subject by his hearing, but he could not doubt that on his return he should find Stephana wedded to Valerian. The thought was unendurable. The vessel had sailed, then, and Markham with it. So at least Stephana believed. She had seen him, indeed, embark in the docks; she had received a pencilled farewell from the Nore, she imagined him now in mid-ocean, surrounded by the dear people he so loved to entertain, telling stores interminable, as a minstrel of old.

What was her amazement, a few days after the hoisting of the blue-peter, to hear Markham's voice in the corridor!

It was late in the evening, and she sat alone in her favorite room, an upper chamber, from which she could see only hear the turmoil of the great world of London, but could see as if from a mountain top the ceaseless ebb and flow of the busy crowds below. Generous spirits should ever live on airy heights, and thus take in larger vistas of the human bee-hive seen at work, and of which they form a section.

Stephana, catching on a sudden the voice of her blind friend, rose joyfully and went out to greet him. Never in all her life had she felt in such need of him as now. She almost forgot the inexplicable nature of his appearance in her pleasure.

"You have come back?—you have come back to me?" she cried, as she led him into the room.

"Could I stay away?" he asked. "You remember my promise made nearly two years ago? You have but summoned me, and I obey the summons."

"I did not write. There was no means of communicating with you," she answered, amazed. Then, on a sudden recollecting what had transpired on another parting in this very house and in this very room just seventeen months ago, she cried, joyfully, "I remember—I understand. Yes," she answered, taking one of his hands, and letting him feel the tears he could not see, "I have wanted you, my friend. I am very dolorate."

"There was more than a vague feeling of loneliness. There was an invocation, a summons. But let me tell you everything, and you shall then say whether or no I have been dreaming," he said, stirred with deep, unutterable contentment. "Listen, then, as our story. We were at anchor off Plymouth two nights ago, about this very time, and in another hour or two the pilot-boat was to return to shore with letters, and we were to be lazily under sail. I sat alone, my hand bowed on my breast, lost in thought, while the rest amused themselves with watching the lights and general bustle of the town. As I sat thus the confusion of voices around me seemed to die away on my ears, and in the silence and stillness—imaginary, of course, for the hubbub of voices and commotion was indescribable, only in my reverie I heard it not—all was hushed about me, then, for a little space, and on a sudden—it was as if the voice were close by—I was called by name, and the voice I heard was yours."

He raised his head, with a look of intense, passionate joy, as if light must break upon the darkness for an instant, and for once—for once only —the face of his beloved would be revealed to him.

"Oh!" he cried, "I seemed to see you then as I seem to see you now. There were tears on your cheek, as there are at this moment, and your voice was one not of farewell, but of greeting—of earnest entreaty and appeal. Once, twice, thrice I heard the words, 'Markham, Markham, will you, too, abandon me?' they said. Yes, one can not deny it. They were thine. The moment so vehemently desired, so sweet to think on, that I said it should more than console me for my misfortune, had come. In spirit thou hadst claimed me."

Stephana was silent; a sudden emotion than pride checked her utterance. All that sympathy and compassion had said so long on Markham's behalf a deeper feeling was saying now; yet the hesitated. Other promptings made themselves heard also.

Even in her lonlorness and disenchantment she did not feel wholly to belong to herself, much less on Markham. Valerian's lapse seemed a warning that all wedded to the general weal should stand alone. The work she had set her self to do needed less love than a steady purpose to aid her own uncompromising self-abnegation, as keep her company. "Oh!" she said, imploringly, leaning her wan soul on his, trying to make him understand those inner conflicts, "what does the rest matter? You and I surely should not think of ourselves."

"At least, then, tell me that I was not dreaming. Two nights ago, at this very hour, you did indeed in spirit call upon my friendship, my love!"

Ah see, for Markham that he could not see that fine blush mantling her pale cheeks! The sigh he did hear, and the just perceptible tremor in her voice told him more.

"Your summons must mean all or nothing," he went on. "You have discovered Valerian's inadequacy. All is over between you and your cousin?"

Stephana was silent.

"I felt all along that it must be so," Markham added. "Heaven forbid that I should judge another! In one point only I hold myself worthier of you than poor Valerian. My soul lies open to your own as a book. Read it by the light of a midsummer day. No words there my own love must put see."

"You are my best, dearest friend," Stephana murmured. "Is not that enough? When the best thoughts of two beings are in perfect unison there is a marriage of souls."

"But a marriage of souls is no bond," Markham answered, almost bitterly. "Your home ams not be mine. Any accident may divide us to-morrow. I measure the height and depth and length and breadth of the sacrifice I ask at your hands," went on the blind lover. "You shall not make it in vain. You will give heavenly consolation to a darkened life. Your best requital will lie the joy of another."

"If I yield I should belong to you, to the calls of duty no longer," Stephana urged.

"May not love sometimes be highest duty? And think not you can live alone. That cry of desolation I heard two days ago still rings in my ears. Stephana, beloved, you need me even as I need you."

He stretched out his hands to find her own in the night perpetually about him, and Stephana let him clasp them. He had come as her in a time of such desolation that she could not choose but cling to him. And for the first time, perhaps, she realised to the full what the loneliness of his own life must be—compelled even to trust himself as others in the least little thing, to be led hither and thither as a child, the beauty of the human face, the miracles of art, the joyous, shifting revelry of the visible world, hid from his gaze forever and forever and forever. Was she not bound to become as the light of the eyes to the much-tried, heavenly, patient soul?—whilst striving to do good to many lives, to be a guardian angel as then one? Lastly, Stephana could but feel that Markham was the only being in the world who had ever really understood her. The subtle spiritual gifts she felt conscious of were matched here. All the influence she could exercise over her fellows Markham could wield too, but by different means. That voice of his had power to fascinate and to soothe, even as her own eyes were said to do, and by some strange faculty, akin to those with which she was endowed, he could read her thoughts and anticipate her most secret wishes. Oh! was there not something better, higher, deeper even than a love here—some voice of destiny, which is the voice of God?

And in that moment of uncertain, joyous hesitancy Stephana's thoughts went farther still, for let it not be supposed that the act of turning a thousand poor London artizans into landed proprietors seemed to her more than a stepping-stone to better things. This was a mere piece of benevolence, the gratification of a magnanimous whim. Her notion of doing good had a deeper root, and was based upon keener insight into the truth of things, the hand-to-mouth philanthropy. And on attaining her purpose could she have a better helper than Markham, the man of stainless soul, of more than womanly tenderness, of a courage that dreaded on ridicule, no rebuff? Yes; they were surely brought together for good Valerian! Valerian? Was it of such poor stuff the world's reformers are made? And Stephana saw all things clearly now—the mysterious call to England, its reference to Valerian, the meaning of the heraldic emblazonry, the blank scroll. Her mission had been to restitute Valerian in his right, to enthrone Christian's bosom of secret wrong; to reconcile mother and son, and last, yet first, to newhen in Valerian—the heir of the Gaston Hermitage family—a conscience for the adequate disposal of his fortune. All this was done. Was she not free now on think of herself? Was not her deep, unconfessed love for Markham a call that should be followed also?

"You have said it," she said. "I do need you —not only now, but always."

It was surely no assumidness that brought the happy tears as Markham's withered eyes then. His hitherto irremediable ill seemed healed. He needed the light no longer. Enough of brightness, sweetness, and beauty was now to be his portion. For a moment he took her, lover-like, in his arms and pressed his lips on her forehead. "Kind God in heaven!" he whispered, "what have I done to be made so happy?"

"Nay," Stephana retorted, as she sat down by his side; "say, rather, what shall I do in return for being made so happy?—ill, indeed, the service on which you are binding yourself can be called happiness at all."

Markham smiled on the sweet task-mistress he could not see, and would fain have prolonged this lover-like confabulation—would have tried to win yet another promise ere he went.

But in love, as in friendship, Stephana enjoyed him to her will. Love is made up half of mystery, half of expectation, and she knew well enough that as lovers they should never be happier in each other than now. Seven years, and seven years more, he must serve his apprenticeship to love, if to her it should seem good.

CHAPTER XLVI.

If Stephana had vanquished herself, another victory yet remained on he won harder still. That first disillusion of her life had made her afraid of love, and at the root of her wavering toward Markham from the first was the feeling of distrust. His love for her was of long ago; but although strangely attracted to him, and only by the tenderness of his nature—have not all men been the tenderness of a woman?—but by his gentleness, she had ever repelled it, fearing lest her own, if once awakened, might suffer disillusion. A woman can understand but one man in the world—her lover; and Stephana feared that even Markham's character might not bear that fearful scrutiny, that terrible ordeal, the life of two that becomes the life of one. Now she doubted no longer. Markham's existence was to be consoled by the sweetness of home, domesticity, nearness; and his return he was to be her helper, adviser, fellow-worker. At least, if she gave much, she should receive more in return. But that other reconciliation on which her mind was bent—how should she make peace between Arthura and Valerian? The pellmole was to be spoken, the time of peace accorded. But by what means was a real reconciliation to be brought about? A few days afterward Valerian came to see her. He had nerved himself up to this interview, which was to be the prelude of one with Arthura. He must see her, must pour out his soul to her, and only Stephana could help him.

"Let us be friends, my cousin," were Stephana's first calm, re-assuring words. "And let us both forget and forgive. There can not be another syllable to say."

She held out her hand, but Valerian did not raise it to his lips. He sat down opposite to her, haggard, ill at ease, remorseful. "Perhaps you are right," he replied. "Little use to talk of what is done, and can never be undone. Thank God, we are cousins," he added, with a grim smile. "You are bound to exercise Christian charity toward me, if for no other reason, because I am of your own blood."

Stephana smiled. How Valerian's nature showed itself in every deed and word!

"To my thinking, there were a reason less hard judgment—at any rate, implacable justice," she made reply. "But what conceivable right has any human being to judge another, unless when brought face to face as criminal and judge?"

"You will not turn your back upon me, then?" Valerian asked, humbly. "You will not wholly give me up?"

"Are you not my kinsman?" said Stephana, again smiling. "Relatives are bound to each other for weal or woe." Her cheerfulness somewhat took Valerian aback.

"Have I not received you to-day friendlily as of old?"

Valerian was dumb.

"We here turned a new page. Let neither of us ever so much as once glance backward," Stephana said. "What you have to do now is to make peace with Arthure and regain her confidence."

"Will you help me?" Valerian asked, fully understanding his position with regard to Stephana. They were cousins. They would never be anything more.

"Because, if you will," he said, eagerly, "I shall take it as a sign that you forgive me and trust me still."

Stephana pressed him earnestly.

"Of course I will," she said at last, "and of course you will prove worthy of trust—where Arthure is concerned," she added, quickly, "for, dear Valerian, let us now by common consent bury this ignoble little past and think of what is coming. This very day I will go and see Arthura."

Then they talked of many things—of Christina, of her plans, of her gratification on having seen Arthure again. Stephana had to call Valerian to go, so relieved was he to be able at last to talk on her with perfect openness. And when he did go, it was with a much lighter heart than he had come. Stephana's lofty-minded passion arose, doubtless, from entire indifference to herself. That was humiliating. But it smoothed the way. It made welcome possibilities seem near.

That same day Stephana drove to Russell Square, about the time she felt sure of finding Arthura. The pair had not met since the passionate confidences of the festive evening. It often happens that the complete outpouring of heart and heart is followed by a feeling of shyness. As far as Valerian was concerned, neither Arthura nor Stephana could reveal anything more; and perhaps both felt a little sorry and a little womanly shame at having already said so much. Arthura's proud secret was out. She did, indeed—did once—love this shallow, plausible, vacillating Valerian with all her heart; and Stephana, in her indignation, had shown with what hopeful affection and interest she had for a short space clung to him, and with what whole-heartedness she had believed in him.

When they met to-day, therefore, it was with a shrinking on both sides, and, at least on Arthure's, a disinclination to personal talk. Hardly were the first greetings over before Stephana declared her errand. Sitting close to Arthura, holding the girl's hands in hers, and fixing on her those beautiful dark-brown eyes, that seemed to soothe even when they inspired a feeling almost akin to awe, she said, smiling quietly, "You will never, never guess what I have come to say to you."

Arthura lifted one of Stephana's hands to her cheek and kissed it passionately. The only strong, beautiful, righteous thing in the world just then, the girl thought, was this fair, mystic creature, whose business seemed the consolation of others.

"I have come to say that you must marry Valerian," Stephana added, still in the quietest voice, while she watched her companion.

"Ask me rather to marry the coward that has run away from battle! But not Valerian. And he would not dare to do it. He would fear me."

As Arthura uttered these words, with red cheeks and unusually bright eyes, it did seem indeed as if any one who had wronged her might tremble with fear then. Just such passion and outraged feeling on love turn trembling and heart-sad maidens into vengeance-dealing Furies. Her tall, slight figure was drawn up, and her young face dark with angry passion.

"If I am wicked, I will do other persons justice," she cried, weeping bitterly. "And I will follow your behest, Stephana, in all else. There is no evil spirit in me now. I almost feel as if it would be sweet to me to make Valerian suffer. Were he drowning, I should, perhaps, withhold the rope that might save his life. But I will do him on harm, if you keep him out of my sight; only I must here him in peace for a little while."

Stephana waited till the passion should be over, without a word. Arthura went on weeping: "I did shameful things for his sake. I lied—not with my tongue, but with my soul—out of love for him. How kind Miss Hermitage was to me, to us both! And all the time we were deceiving her. You, too, you were kinder than the angels, and he let me, he made me, act lies to you. Oh, Stephana! never talk to me of marriage on all. There may in other Valerians to the world. I can be happy no I can."

She threw herself on her knees by Stephana's side, and shaken with passion. "I will ever love you as if you were something more than a ordinary mortal," she said, laying her head on Stephana's bosom. While she lay thus Stephana leaned over her tenderly, as a mother tending a feverish child, lifting the hair from her hot brow, leaning the hot cheeks. But it was the quiet magic of her eyes that did it all, and by little and little, calm the girl's wild mood. After a time the passion spent itself, and she sat in her friend's arms, pale and listless, an image of sorrow, but of unobtrusiveness no longer.

"I am very wicked. You must drive the demon out of me," she said, looking up on her companion's face, as if sure of reading there the sentence, with it absolution.

"You will carry Valerian," Stephana repeated, as she spoke feeling the thrill of decay that no through Arthure's frame.

"Listen to me," Stephana said, using all the fascinations she was mistress of, conquering Arthura to look into the depths of her persuasive eyes. "Valerian would fain make reparation. Will you not let him do so?"

"We should hate each other. Life would be intolerable to both of us."

"Hear me out," Stephana interposed, proudly, "and when you have heard to the end on will see that I am right, and that you are wrong. Valerian was never in the spirit, only in the letter unfaithful to you, and for such unfaithfulness I was greatly to blame. I never for a moment dreamed that he might be in love when I assented to a request made years before he knew you. There was weakness, duplicity, in Valerian's behavior, if you will, but not changefulness. He never loved any woman but yourself. On marriage was as have been of friendship only. That for a moment on the various motives that may actuate a man with which love has nothing to do Valerian had his way to make in the world. There were many reasons why, at that juncture in his affairs, he could not openly go against my wishes. His very love for me drew him into double-dealing. He wanted to secure my good will—which meant worldly fortune—just because he loved you and wanted to marry you."

Arthure listened, unconvinced. Stephana went on, more encouragingly still: "I have seen Valerian. He has passed out his heart to me as brother to sister. And here in must be you, since every word is proved by his deeds. In a my heart, not yours, that resentment should endure, since he made use of my kindly feelings toward him in order to serve his own purpose. I have no rancor. He never cared for me as a woman except as a possible benefactress. I shall always be so ready to help him as I have been."

Then she added, with a generous glow on her pale cheeks:

"You must marry him, dear Arthura. You have any heart and soul at all. All is now made up between him and his mother. He will some day inherit her enormous wealth. But the only value it can have in his eyes now is the prospect of sharing it with you and yours," she said, smiling insinuatingly. "Think of it, Arthura! Those little step brothers and sisters you love so dearly are to be made partycipators of Valerian's good fortune. He will act the part of father to them."

"Did he say so?" asked Arthura, with a childish expression of contentment.

"He did indeed. And there is another consideration which I think you will understand. Would you have Valerian's wealth squandered as Miss Hermitage squanders hers? Will you not help him to use his fortune as a consecration, high-minded man should do? You are not worldly, I know; you do not care to be rich."

"Ah!" Arthura said, the bright, sudden spirit re-asserting itself at last, "I am I all, Stephana. You are using wizardry. You will make an angry Valerian, and a love on as he you will make us do exactly with his money as you like."

"Would you mind that?" Stephana said, playfully.

"Not if the children had new shoes when they wanted them, and there was never a baker's bill," rejoined Arthura. Under this new aspect of affairs cheerfulness seemed possible once more. Valerian, the benefactor of the penniless and Wynne and Baby, was suddenly transformed into a bearable person!

CHAPTER XLVII.

All that a penitent lover could say for himself Valerian said next day on his not opposite the proud, hostess Arthura. She had not at first a word to utter, but glanced at him, from time to time, with a timid, deprecatory look, much as if she were making herself (indeed he could ever become again the Valerian of old to her. It was not till Valerian began to dilate upon the children that Arthura realized the future he was building up was to be her future as well.

* Began in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

She even smiled as he spoke of Walter's prospects—how the high-spirited boy should be made a naval cadet, and have the dearest wish of his young heart realized, and he should be a gallant sailor. Then he talked of Benjamine and Baby. They should have as much money spent upon their education as she desired; a deary should be assigned to each. Nor was Stappie forgotten. Her small means should be enlarged. She should have more change, more country air, and no pinching, no bills. Then, when lovers like eloquence had done its utmost, and he also sat silent and listless, she asked, very plaintively,

"Will you be good to me?"

What a rebuke these artless words conveyed to Valerian's mind! They revealed to him all that he had lost, all that must so painfully be regained as, step by step, and little by little, he might perhaps, in some remote future, win back that generous, trusting affection.

There seemed nothing more to say: but how much he knew remained to do! To Arthura was assigned the hard task of forgiving bitter wrong; to Valerian one burden still. For forgiveness is oftimes accorded in a day, an hour; but the reparation for wrong-doing is the up-hill toil of years.

"Take me to see Miss Hermitage," said Arthura, no a sudden; and Valerian drove her back as once, and left the pair together. He knew well what she had to say to his mother.

"My dear Arthura!" cried Miss Hermitage, for so she was called still—the secret of w life-time was to accompany her to the grave—"I am very glad to see you, now that you have recovered your spirits," and with some surprise though no rebuke she let the girl clasp her round the waist and kiss her again and again.

"Dear, dear Gossip" I did want to say something to you. It was very wrong of me to deceive you about Valerian—"

"Talk of something more entertaining, my dear," said Miss Hermitage, characteristically. "I hate disagreeables. When you are married to Valerian you must live most door to me, you know. I must be amused. Why can there no many dull people in the world?"

"A world full of dunces is better than a world full of demons, anyhow," said Arthura.

Miss Hermitage laughed.

"Always no unexpected answer from you; and most people my exactly what you expect. It is so wearisome! Why do they do it?" she said, querulously. "Why so dull?"

"Because people are not made to order, I suppose."

"Ah!" laughed Miss Hermitage again. "I am not overfond of my cousin Constantine. We two have quarrelled like cat and dog all our lives. But I would give ten thousand pounds this moment to make him ten years younger. He is so unexpected!"

Arthura's fingers still toyed with Miss Hermitage's elegant ruffles, faultless head-gear, and small hands, no which sparkled diamond rings.

"I wish I were like you?" cried the girl, forgetting for the moment all about Valerian, only recalled to the humorous side of the old life with him under their patroness's roof. "So neat," she went on: "no exquisite, so perfect to look at! You will let me dress you for grand occasions, as I used to do, won't you?"

"Well," Miss Hermitage said, good naturedly, "I suppose the next fine clothes I have to buy will be for Valerian's wedding. You will do him credit, my dear, and I can not see why you two should not get on together without scratching each other's eyes out. I hope you don't expect more. But Stephana, now, she will change her mind a dozen times. An angel from heaven would not satisfy her! And I know well enough Stephana's machenations," Miss Germinge added, wickedly. "When I am gone she will make Valerian play philanthropic ducks and drakes with my money. She is bent upon that. Well, it won't matter to me. The world may wag as it pleases when I am in my grave."

"Don't talk of your grave, Gossip," Arthura said, kissing the neat, rosy complexioned cheek.

"Why, what does it concern you where I am?" Miss Hermitage said, with her little cynical laugh. "It is impossible you can care about me."

Arthura looked shocked. "I always love people who are kind to me," she said, with a flushed face and tears in her eyes.

"But you not better go and talk to Colette?" said Miss Hermitage, growing uncomfortable "she is dying to see you. But don't make her cry."

"Was Mademoiselle Colette in love with Valerian, then?" asked Arthura, again mischievous.

"How preposterous you are! But you know Colette always sheds tears when she hears of marriages. She is so sentimental."

True enough, when the warm-hearted little French woman had received Arthura's palmode she did burst into a fit of weeping.

"You will love each other dearly, won't you?" she murmured on the shed tears of joy—"like Ursula and John Halifax, in my favorite novel. Won't you, now? Christine says he is all twaddle-dee-dum and twaddle-dum-dee. But I am sure I am right and she is wrong. How can two people help being fond and happy when they have taken each other for richer for poorer, for better for worse?"

"I don't see that it follows," answered Arthura.

"But how beautiful in sounds!" went on Colette. "'To have and to hold, in sickness and health.' You will be like Ursula, won't you? And if Valerian is not precisely w John Halifax, you will try to make him so?"

"I won't promise till I have read the book," Arthura made reply. She was not addicted to the circulating libraries.

"Stumph!" said Mr Constantine, when the news was conveyed to him. "As usual! The unexpected about to happen, the unlooked for brought about! Well, women must fall in love and fall out of it. Men must take to themselves wives and sit fin the inevitable unflattering portrait. But really, now, my Prospero matched with Mr Pliable, and my beautiful Mystic with any of mortal kind! 'Tis past all bearing. Why is love ever a will-o'-the-wisp, leading into quagmires? But we wise heads may prate. No one listens to us. The true marriages are still made in heaven—the whole history of woman is summed up in the tale of Thisbe and the ass's head. There must be a compensation somewhere, if we could but find it out."

Stappie, of course, had her comments. "Oh dear! oh dear!" she cried, between laughing and crying. "I could dance for joy, although my heart is so heavy on lead. Stephana happy, Arthura happy! The poor children provided for. No more bills! Every one happy but poor me. And I am happy, if I could but know it. But I never shall know it—never! never!"

THE END.

THE BOSTON EXHIBITION.

THE Boston Foreign Art and Industrial Exhibition is rapidly getting into shape for the official opening on the 3d of September, but, like all previous experience no similar occasion, not a little work will remain to be done before its exhibits are in complete order. Although England and France for various reasons fail to do themselves justice on this occasion, other countries more remote, and with whose art, manufactures, and products no are less familiar, are sending representative exhibits of varied interest and special importance. In consequence Boston will present on this occasion an exhibition much more novel and instructive than if these great countries had taken up all the space they might legitimately have claimed. Ireland, however, is occupying the post of honor for Great Britain in almost a distinctive national sense, and her exhibit of local manufactures, art, and antiquities is likely to surprise Americans. Among the objects sent are bog-wood ornaments, hair ornaments, saddlery, a jaunting-car, furniture, marbles, mullen and lin no goods, dressings, ecclesiastical sculpture, fancy needle-work, illuminated manuscripts, national antiquities, whiskeys (of course), and an autograph letter of DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Japan makes perhaps the most conspicuous exhibit of all countries, being a governmental affair. It embraces both her ancient and modern art and art industries, giving a complete view of her past and present civilization. Among other novelties she provides a regular tea and saki house, and fourteen of her gentle sex m be engaged in work of various illustrative sorts of Japanese handicraft.

Germany forwards a large num of goods, including paintings on porcelain, china-ware, bronzes, jewelry, glass-ware, metal-work, imitation armor, wax modelling, and a number of paintings by GRAEB, SCHACHNER, MOEREN, BARNDEL, RETTICHS, to mention a few names.

France consigns some stained glass windows, furs, and skins, engraved glass, porcelain, an exhibit of the Panama Canal Company, and a miscellaneous lot of her most manufactures, besides a hundred and fifty paintings in more.

Holland indulges in one-year clocks, carpets, liquors, and Dutch candies, with one painting, Portugal, choice wines, artistic china, silver, furniture, carved wood, antiquities, etc.; Spain, clay figures, artistic lace, a loan, and a few paintings—no more yet yet received; Norway figures with a model of the famous antique Viking ship, skins, etc., Turkey, rugs and a café; Algiers, Oriental jewelry; Egypt, a model of the great Pyramid; and our neighbor Columbia forwards a collection of aboriginal American pottery, several thousand pieces, the oldest yet discovered.

The Italian section, as a whole, is confined almost exclusively to art objects and artistic merchandise, with a few characteristic products of the country. Its modern art in sculpture and paintings is represented by some of its most eminent artists. In painting, by VIOLA—a brilliant example—TITO CONTI, EDWARD GELLI, COSTA CESARE, GIUSEPPE, SALVINI, TAMAGNINI, SCOMI, TONELLI, CIPRIANI, JOVIS, SORO, BUARLEY, CAMILLA, RICCI, Professor GUIDI, ORSI, BALLEI, and other names that will do honor and distinction to its art school and whose work to our amateurs will be an unexpected revelation of its recent competitive progress as regards the French schools, which it excels in coloring. ALBANO, AMMIRATI, LAZZARINI, UCCI, TENDARA, FANTA, BIANCHINA, and others send some excellent sculpture, mostly of the modern picturesque character, although Professor LAZZARINI'S "Victory," dedicated to the American people, is of the classical type, and a spirited, beautiful work. The King of Italy has presented to the Italian section a fine marble bust of himself—no uncommon compliment, showing his interest in the exhibition and friendliness to his people. But the object that will perhaps most attract our people in this department is the late EDWARD THAXTER'S group, called "Love's First Dream." In material and mechanical execution it is entirely Italian, Mr. THAXTER, who was a native of Portland, dying immediately after making the model in clay. To my judgment, as a work of delicate, poetic fancy, harmony of motive, and workmanship, carrying out perfectly its playful idea in an original, expressive, and graceful form, it is a masterpiece of its kind, excelling in original invention and sentiment anything in this line our own school has yet produced.

Among the most noteworthy exhibits, Dr SALVIATI'S Venetian glass, both new forms and reproductions of the ancient, and mosaics, including the portrait of President GARFIELD, which he presents to the American nation, stand pre-eminent for beauty and variety. Signor GUGGENHEIM, of Venice, the eminent antiquarian, sends examples of his artistic furniture, and an album of original designs provided by him from 1874 to 1882 for the interior decoration and furniture of the palace of Count PAPADOPOLI on the Grand Canal as Venice, each room being after a separate art epoch, from the sixteenth-century classical Italian Renaissance down to the Louis XIV., XV., and XVI. French periods—a work of much interest to architects.

Besides bronzes, majolica, and the usual specialties of Italian industrial art, there is a series of masterly reproductions of the masterpieces of Maestro Antonio and his son, of Gubbio, from the chief museums of Europe, with the gold and ruby lustres and designs so faithfully reproduced that only experienced eyes can distinguish them from the originals, which now cost from $1000 to $3000 a plate.

The Retrospective Art Department is varied and valuable. In paintings, commencing with good representative types of the Byzantine period, say about A.D. 1200, it presents a fine series of genuine old masters, from GIOTTO down to the best period of Italian art.

In sculpture there are one or two unusually fine specimens of LUCA DELLA ROBBIA, "Virgin and Child," in a tabernacle from a suppressed convent near Settignolla, and, what is still rarer, a casket in glazed terra cotta of archaic, semi-Saracenic design, associating LUCA'S work, showing that he did not invent, as supposed, his famous glaze, but only improved no no older invention derived from the Arabs.

A bronze reproduction of the famous Borghese "Gladiator" in the Louvre, one of the finest Greek statues extant, will interest all lovers of classical art. But the most remarkable archæological treasures are the two famous sarcophagi found in the winter of 1642-3 no the estate of the Prince of Canino, LUCIEN BONAPARTE, in the Roman Maremma, by his widow, no the borders of the stream Fiora, one of the ancient Vulsa. Both are about seven and a half feet long by four wide and high. One is of the rare and precious Oriental alabaster, with figures in the best style of Greek-Etruscan sculpture, and the other of tufa stone, more archaic and purely Etruscan, with inscriptions, of which I have just received a translation from Professor MILANI, Director of the Archæological Museum in Florence.

There are some rare pieces of silver of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in the CELLINI style of design, a silver statuette of Ceres, antique Roman, an iron inkstand inlaid with gold, the drinking cup of MATTHIAS CORVINUS, King of Hungary, set with gems, repousse and chiselled work of the fifteenth century, with his great battles, dates, and inscriptions on it; beautiful old Vienna porcelain from M. DUSACK, Sèvres and Saxon ancient porcelains, old Moravian glass, no tiques trunks, fifteenth to seventeenth century, lines reliefs in pastwork of the Umbrian school, fifteenth century, Portuguese, Flemish, French, and Italian tapestries, some wrought in gold, fine needle work pictures in silk and gold by nuns of the seventeenth century, and what should particularly attract ladies and interest manufacturers, a collection of antique laces made by the Signors AMBROSOLI, of Milan, during twenty-four years past, of the Flemish, French, English, Spanish, and Italian schools, 100 pieces, also about 500 specimens of muffs, satin, silks, velvets, brocades, brocatelles, etc., from the year A.D. 1250 to the end of last century, with embroideries of all kinds, church vestments, Madonna robes, table covers, costumes, head-dresses—in short, a great variety of textile fabrics, some of exceeding richness and beauty, and just what is needed for our industrial museums for the advantage and instruction of our new manufacturers.

JAMES JACKSON JARVIS.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

NEARLY all the unexploded bomb-shells that were casually left on Southern battle-fields twenty years ago have been investigated by inquisitive persons. But there are a few muskets that have remained loaded since the strife ended, and these are being discharged gradually by the generation that has come into existence since 1863, and therefore doesn't know that they are loaded. The latest fatality of this kind happened in an Alabama village a few days ago.

As the science of legislative progress the advantages of having two parties in every legislative body become more apparent. The Democrats of the Georgia Legislature have been seriously embarrassed because of a lack of Republicans for "pairing" purposes no cinch days and other festive occasions.

In no Iowa county a man and his wife ran both candidates for the office of School Superintendent, the man on the Republican and the woman as the Democratic nominee. It being noticed that the honor of the position will be enjoyed in any event by the family, the anxiety of the opposing candidates matters on the problem relating to the care of the baby during the ensuing term of office.

Two sections of a railway circus train came in collision on a road in the interior of the State a few days ago. In a car of one of the trains was the large and experienced elephant Bolivia. He was not injured by the crash, but as soon as his car had come to a stop he broke it open, and gathering up with his trunk a small English camel-dog, which is his inseparable companion, he moved off to a safe distance.

Bicycling young men have taken to riding down Mount Washington on their wheels. He and by some ambitious youth will make a record that will stand, but he may not remain among mortals to enjoy his triumph.

There was held in Pittsburgh recently a meeting of proprietors of museums in the larger cities of this country, the object of which was to establish a uniform scale of salaries paid to "living curiosities," to the end that the ruinous competition which has prevailed hitherto may come to an end. Unless the curiosities combine and prove the strongest, the people may be relieved of the heavy burden imposed by those grasping monopolists, the albinos, the living skeletons, the giants, midgets, and so forth.

It is explained by competent authorities in Wall Street that the reason why a panic like that of the memorable Black Friday did not follow the recent break in the stock market was because few outsiders were interested in the results. This was as it should be. As a preventive of the recurrence of Black Fridays the absence of nerves in stock gambling proved as effective that no other need even be sought for.

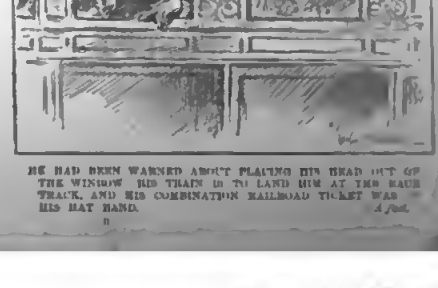
"There was a long debate," says the cable, "characterized by much obstruction no the part of the Irish members." Similar tidings are frequently sent in reports of proceedings in the House of Commons. There are certain characteristics which cling to a son of the auld sod, whether he be in Parliament in driving a dray in front in a New York street car.

Speaking of the recent festivities of a party of wealthy and exuberant young men in the Casino at Newport, which produced something of a sensation, a discriminating writer says, "The spree was English in its appointments."

The death of Captain Webb in the Whirlpool Rapids of the Niagara River seems to have intensified the fascination of that spot for the adventurous. A man is already on hand with a life-preserving contrivance in which he proposes to entrust himself to the mercy of the torrent.

One result of the President's vacation trip through the wilds of the far West is to furnish names to places along the route. It is not probable that those who come after him will try to improve the work of so illustrious a nomenclator, and it may be expected that Camp Crosby and Camp Stager and the various other halting-places of the party will some day be the city of Crosby, the city of Stager, and so on. While these names are preferable to some that have been made by translating Indian names into English, they are not picturesque nor characteristic. The preservation of the Indian names of localities in the United States has given us the nomenclature of the country a unique and pleasing feature, which will always possess considerable historical value.

Writers of gossip from the places of summer resort differ widely as to the characteristics of the visitors, taken as a whole, at any given place. But it is easy to infer, from statements that are intended to be favorable to the proprietors, what class of visitors is most desired by those pecuniarily interested. It seems to be the most acceptable to write that "the guests at this popular resort" are mainly "people whose social importance is so well assured that they feel under no obligation to make a display of their wealth." To mention the "blaze of diamonds in the spacious drawing-room" is the polite way of conveying a hint of vulgarity, and to speak of the "excursion throngs" is to put the resort very low in the scale of respectability.



HE HAD BEEN WARNED ABOUT PLACING HIS HEAD OUT OF THE WINDOW AND TRAIN IN TO LAND HIM AT THE RACE TRACK, AND HIS COMBINATION RAILROAD TICKET WAS HIS HAT BAND.—A Fact.

1. On the way to Market. 2. Berry Venders at Station. 3. Gathering Water-Cress. 4 and 5. Mushroom Culture. 6. Hot-Beds. 7. Preparing Celery for the Market.

GARDENING FOR NEW YORK.—Drawn by P Frenzeny.—[See Page 341.]

GARDENING FOR NEW YORK.

Long Island from one end to the other, Staten Island, New Jersey, Westchester County, and a large part of Connecticut are the points from which New York receives the greater portion of its vegetables. From their convenience of access farm lands within driving distance of the city are given up exclusively to raising of garden truck, consequently they have increased enormously in value. The owners of these farms stubbornly resist the encroachments of the growing city, and only yield to corporate exactions or extravagant offers of money. Many individual fortunes are the result of the tenacity with which these cultivators of the early beet and succulent cabbage hold on to their lands until they become enveloped within the limits of a great and fast spreading city.

There is probably no business in which the profits are so certain as in that of market gardening. Now and again a bad year intervenes, but prosperity is the rule. The truckman, like the sailor, is a natural pessimist: atmospheric conditions are seldom or never favorable—it is always too dry or too wet; but at the end of the year he generally finds himself the possessor of a considerable sum over and above his expenses. Taken as a whole, the percentage of failure is not so great as in trade and other branches of agriculture.

Garden truck which is raised within a radius of twenty miles of New York reaches its market by wagons. These are of large capacity, drawn usually by two horses. They are packed on the farms in the afternoon. Earlier or later in the evening or night, according to the distance of the farm from the city, they start for their destination, which for the greater part is in the immediate vicinity of Washington Market. They arrive mostly between midnight and daybreak. By sunrise Greenwich, Washington, West, and the streets adjacent and at right angles thereto are filled with truck wagons disposing of their contents. By eight o'clock the business of the day, so far as they are concerned, is usually over. Many attempts have been made by the authorities to dislodge the truckmen from the streets. Where so much capital and trade [illegible] it is needless to say that all efforts in this direction have resulted in failure. Most of the large wholesale dealers have contracts with the truckmen for a regular supply of vegetables. In this case the cultivator sends his stock directly to the shop of the dealer, but the large majority avail themselves of the street market, and dispose of their stuff to the first comer. Those who send their truck to market by wagon must necessarily invest a considerable amount in plant. It is only those who are thoroughly well established who can afford the equipment which the truck [illegible] transport necessitates. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] The transportation of [illegible] products during freezing weather requires extreme nicety in packing, for he is not assured of his pay until the articles are delivered in good condition to the dealer. In consequence he is obliged to employ special messengers to guard and protect his treasure. [illegible] frequently seen, during the winter months, at [illegible] individuals anxiously watching large hampers. [illegible] ishes at twenty-five cents for a small bunch, or cucumbers at a dollar each, or lettuce at equally extravagant figures, or strawberries at seven or eight dollars a quart. In the matter of strawberries, however, this price would seem excessive. The writer, who has a greenhouse, tried the experiment of raising them from a few plants. His success was phenomenal. With no particular care they bore most profusely, and were exceptionally fine in size and flavor. In connection with the raising of truck under glass it may not be generally known that the best pie-plant or rhubarb which comes to the New York market during the winter is cultivated at Quebec in hot-houses. Attention is also being called to the growing of asparagus by this artificial means. It is somewhat singular that the higher the latitude the finer the flavor of vegetables grown under glass.

The influx of a large foreign element has brought with it great numbers of accomplished gardeners. To them we are indebted for the improvement in the quality of our vegetables. To them we are indebted for the excellence of our celery, for the cultivation of the mushroom and of the water-cress, for the introduction of a variety of salads which a few years since were to the masses entirely unknown. These men are specialists. Some excel in the cultivation of the cauliflower, and devote themselves exclusively to that. Others are expert in the growth and preparation of celery. Only those who have as amateurs given attention to the care of this plant can appreciate the skill which gives to us that vegetable as we see it in the market, white and crisp, during all the late autumn and winter months. Its bleached quality, almost to the very tip of the stem, is the despair of the novice who does not care to pass the greater portion of his leisure in some dark cellar.

The water-cress, which is found in nearly all running spring water, was up to within a few years looked upon by most people as a worthless weed. Under the fostering care of gardeners from Europe, it is now one of the great luxuries of the market. In its natural state the water-cress is apt to have an earthy taste, unless taken from very pure water. With the care now bestowed upon it, by diverting the cold water of springs and keeping the sluices clean, it has lost that flavor, and has become crisp and pungent.

[illegible] in miniature bushel baskets. The [illegible]. Those formerly used here [illegible]. Now they are grown here in [illegible]. In its natural condition the [illegible] of sunlight. For its artificial [illegible] to be the most favorable condition for its [illegible]. Now and again the markets are profusely supplied with the ordinary field mushroom, as in the autumn of 1881, when we had a dry summer followed by a wet autumn—conditions exceptionally suitable for the growth of this fungus. It is not improbable that in the near future many varieties of vegetable fungi now rejected as poisonous will become available as articles of food. A German chemist has discovered forty sorts which are edible.

Enthusiasts are fond of extolling the beauties of a vegetable garden. The practical man will derive more pleasure from visiting one of our wholesale truck houses during the winter months, where are stored in tiers one above the other vegetables raised under glass from as far north as Quebec, and in the open air at the South and the tropics. Modern means of transportation have obliterated the seasons, so far as the enjoyment of [illegible] is concerned. Endowed with the fairy wand of wealth, [illegible] New York may enjoy in the depths of winter vegetables [illegible] which but a few years since were attainable only in [illegible]. The pleasure of anticipation is gone, but the power of [illegible] has come.

"WHAT DE OLE WOMAN SAY NOW?"

AUSTRALIAN ANTS.

The little "sugar ants" are well known to most dwellers in towns, and even in central Melbourne sometimes prove a nuisance to housewives, by invading any saccharine matters that may be left uncovered. They owe their popular name to their fondness for this article of food. If a small heap of the same is placed in their way they seldom stop to eat it on the spot, but carry the prize away, crystal by crystal, evidently for the benefit of the general population.

Fond as they are of sugar, they are still more partial to honey, and will readily leave the former for the latter. This is not carried away, but eaten wherever met with. So attractive seems this [illegible] that even the queens are tempted out to partake of it. Before depositing the honey I once or twice introduced some [illegible] ger ants, which were immediately attacked. While the fight was going on I placed the honey near the belligerents, who, as it [illegible], having more taste for the pleasures of a terrestrial Valhalla than the turmoil of the battle-field, let go their antagonists to feast with their already nearly gorged confrères. On one occasion two combatants fell into the honey. The stranger, owing to superior strength, escaped, and was followed by a little crowd of his enemies. The object of the pursuers, however, did not seem to be the further punishment of the interloper, but simply to despoil him of the dainty which he was carrying away adhering to his legs and body.

If a working ant fell into the honey he was left contemptuously alone to escape as best he could. On two occasions, however, I noticed queens who had similarly come to grief. These, strange to say, were pulled out and cleaned by three or four of [illegible] adjacent workers. With respect to queens, there [illegible] a good deal of gallantry displayed toward [illegible] independently of nationality [illegible]. I have never, [illegible] lested when placed among hundreds of a thoroughly hostile tribe. I once noticed another remarkable fact with respect to the behavior of ants toward strangers. I had placed some ants fully a quarter of an inch in length upon a board surrounded with water. Soon afterward I brought home a number of tree ants, together with some twenty or thirty queens and several hundred pupæ, placing the second find at the opposite end of the same board. I fully looked forward for a fight, and as there one, but not as was expected. The tree ants at once began to seize and carry off the pupæ, and in the direction of the stronghold of their gigantic fellow prisoners. Queens, as before stated, were allowed to pass unmolested, as also, in most instances, were unladen ants, but an ant bearing a pupa or egg in its mandibles was at once assailed and capped by some assailant. The pupa was, of course, dropped, the despoiled bearer thereof creeping away, badly, sometimes fatally, wounded. Singular to say, the dropped pupa was never appropriated by the attacking party. His object seemed to be murder, to which he was incited for some unknown reason, and not robbery.

Digitized by Google

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

COUNTRY-HOUSE DRAINAGE.

THE drainage of our city houses is not as yet made an entirely municipal affair, and regulated by the city authorities, as in the case in the larger towns of modern Europe. Yet the drainage of town houses is in an important sense a public or common interest. Unlike most country dwellings, the city house is not an independent unit. It is connected with a more or less complicated, and a less or more efficient, system of drains and sewers, which in theory are supposed to provide good drainage to the house without requiring the occupant's individual care and attention. Whether they do or not, the drainage of his house is a delegated function. It may be delegated to the city engineer or to the owner of the estate; but the occupant feels that his responsibility is at most a divided one. His house forms but a single point or node of the spreading subterranean root whose ramifications underlie the town. You often, indeed, it is rather a plant that is fed upon the odors and poison of decay from below. The city dweller, in a word, is committed to a pre existent system of drainage, and he can seldom be sure whether the drains are more active in carrying away foul matters from the house or in bringing in fouler gases from the sewers. Whether he finally survive or fall victims to typhoid fever, the city resident can not feel that the result is wholly of his own bringing about. He is comparatively powerless before all this pre-existent subterranean machinery, which, indeed, as a concealed and a complicated thing, he seldom understands. In our cities scarcely one house owner in ten, scarcely any tenant in a hundred, has any effective knowledge of what his house drainage is or should be. Nor is this surprising, the subject being one of real technical difficulties, from which the only escape is to remove plumbing of every kind from within the living rooms of the house as far as that may be possible.

But in the country the case is a very different one. The principles of good drainage are the same everywhere; but the conditions of drainage in the country and in the city are not the same. As a rule, the country resident must create the drainage of his house, whether for better or for worse. Usually no sewers or drains are near him, nor is the skilled artisan always at hand. The responsibility of the house drainage thus rests upon him, and it will be his fault of typhoid fever creeps on by his drain-pipes. Every country householder must be his own sanitary engineer. Before indicating the main systems upon which he has to depend, I may say that, for getting rid of sewage in the country the earth-closet is generally the best method, and in houses where the other drainage required is small, no system of pipes may be required.

Whether in city or country, the object of house drainage is twofold:

1. To remove all foul matter from the house the moment it is produced.

2. To prevent the return of noxious gases through the pipes which carry off the foul matter.

Except where the earth closet is in use, the drainage of a country house is usually into a vault or cess-pool — an undesirable vicinage, and one which is the less desirable as it is the closer. The cess-pool is yet in general use in quarters where it is surprising to hear that it is even tolerated. When Windsor Castle was put in order as a residence for Queen Victoria, "upward of fifty cess-pools," says Engineer Stanger, "full and overflowing, were found in the basement." Those have been removed, but London is full of cess-pits. Boston is praised as the most beautiful American city. What kind of drainage has it? In 1881, according to the estimates of its own Board of Health, as less than the almost incredible number of 30,000 vaults were still in use, and of these 20,000 are closed vaults, having no connection with the sewers. Boston is in this respect a community of the early Middle Ages. Now, in the country, cess-pits must often be used; but the question for the country householder is how he can get the benefit of the nineteenth-century engineering in avoiding their dangers, and how to do this at moderate expense.

Where sewers do not exist there are two main ways of removing the sewage from the house: (1) by the cess-pool; (2) by surface drainage.

The old form — indeed, I may still say the ordinary form — of cess-pool is a hole dug in the ground, and either not lined at all or lined with loose stone or "honey-comb" brick work, through which the sewage soaks away into the soil, or whose it is removed at longer or shorter intervals; sometimes, as in the case of barracks, at intervals of many years. During all this time pollution of the soil is going on. The filth accumulates below the absorbent range of grass roots, and quite out of reach of the oxidizing power of the air, and sooner or later the neighboring streams or wells will be polluted. A cess-pool of this sort is a more and more dangerous neighbor the longer it lasts.

What is the remedy? Every cess pool that stands near a human habitation should be made (a) as tight as puddling lined with brick work in cement can make it; (b) it should be made small, so as to require frequent cleansing; (c) it should be properly covered, with ventilation through a charcoal filtering screen; and (d) when it is connected with the house there should be a water trap in the connecting pipe. Lastly, between this trap and the house, adds Galton, the constitution of the house drains should be so arranged as to insure that any gases which may pass the trap may be diluted with fresh air

These precautions will render the cess-pool little dangerous. Without them, one is liable to such an experience — one by no means infrequent — as that which one recently described by Dr. Folsom, the Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Health. Typhoid fever had broken out among those who drank the water from a certain well. The water had no bad taste or color, but it contained the germs of typhoid, and these germs were proved to come from a privy vault one hundred feet distant from the well

Of surface drainage, the alternative method for the country house, I will speak in another paper.

THOS MORSON COAN.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,
FOR LEMONS OR LIME JUICE,
is a superior substitute, and is now is positively beneficial to health.—[Adv.]

CROUP—CHILDREN'S LIVES SAVED.
HAVERSTRAW, N. Y.
This is to certify that I have used for ten years Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment, and during that time I have not paid $5 for doctors' bills. I have used it for pains and aches, dysentery, sore throats, cuts, and burns, and by its use have saved several children's lives when attacked by croup. To the public I say, only try it and you will find its value.
JOHN T. ROBERTS.
Sold by all druggists at 25 and 50 cents.—[Adv.]

STARIN'S GLEN ISLAND.
"To go on near fairyland, probably, on any place in this part of the world."—N. Y. Times.
"The odor of new-mown hay, the perfume of roses-bloom, the soft breeze, the trim lawns, and the well-kept paths appeal to the visitors."—N. Y. Tribune
Steamers leave Pier 19, North River, and Foot of 23d St., East River, and Jewett's Wharf, Brooklyn.—[Adv.]

MOTHERS regret when too late the death of their infants, caused in many instances by improper food. There need be no hesitation in using Mellin's Food, as long trial has proved it the very best article for children deprived of the natural food. It is endorsed by eminent physicians, and may be had of most druggists.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE,
THE Best and Cheapest Hair Dressing. It kills dandruff, allays irritation, and promotes a luxurious growth of the Hair. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are invariably acknowledged the purest and best.—[Adv.]

ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the world renowned appetizer and invigorator. Used now over the whole civilized world. Try it, but beware of imitations. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS.—[Adv.]

C. C. SHAYNE, Fur Manufacturer, 103 Prince St., N. Y., sends Fur Fashion Book free. Send your address.—[Adv.]

DR. FENNER'S SY. VITUS DANCE SPECIFIC.—One bottle always cures. Circular, Fredonia, N. Y.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL
ROYAL BAKING POWDER
BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure.
This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

BRUSHES of every description at 128 Pearl Street, New York. JOHN E. HOPPEL, Manufacturer and Importer.

CARD COLLECTORS.
Beautiful set of Imported Cards, by mail, on receipt of five 2c. stamps. WHITING, 60 Nassau St., N. Y.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
Breakfast Cocoa.
Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. PUREST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which millions should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Pearl-street, Avenue, London, England.
Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SCHIEFFELIN & SANDFORD, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

TWO CHARMING STORIES
BY
CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON.

ANNE. A Novel. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

We venture to say that "Anne" is one of the most remarkable works of fiction that has appeared for many years. It is remarkable for its own sake—for its intuition of plot and variety of character; and it is remarkable also as holding a place midway between the old American novel of incident and the modern American novel of analysis. * * * Besides being strong in character and in quiet humor, "Anne" is also strong in episode.—Academy, London.

FOR THE MAJOR. A Novelette. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00

A story as sweet and simple that it suggests an old-fashioned primitive belief. She has chosen the most picturesque materials that American affords. * * * From a literary point of view it is more finished than "Anne," and to a critic interested in striking peculiarities of character it will prove a valuable study.—N. Y. World.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c.
Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor.
Pharmacien 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris,
27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.
Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, vanilla pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

"BOKER'S BITTERS." THE OLD Pure and Best Aromatic Bitters known—unequalled for their tonic and appetizing, and their flavoring as a cordial. To be had in quarts and Pints. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1929.

EDUCATIONAL.
1883. The NEW CALENDAR of the 1884.
NEW ENGLAND
CONSERVATORY of MUSIC
Beautifully illustrated on paper. SENT FREE to yourself and musical friends. Send names and addresses on a postal. E. TOURJEE, Franklin Sq., Boston, Mass.
The Largest and best appointed Music, Literary and Art School, and HOME for young ladies in the world.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE
Applies any medicament directly to parts affected, thus by curing when other remedies fail. Can be instantly carried in the vest pocket, ready for use, without pain or inconvenience, affording immediate relief. Sold by all Druggists. Circulars free. Sent by mail, postpaid, with a package of Seeley's Ointment, which is required with the Pile Pipe, or sent by mail for $1. Seeley's Trade Emblematic. 1207 Girard Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 76 Fleet Street, London, England.

"A magazine which is without a peer."
N. Y. JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE
(No. 400)
FOR SEPTEMBER

CONTAINS:

"The Night's Plutonian Shore,"
Frontispiece, from "Poe's Raven," Illustrated by GUSTAVE DORÉ;

Dalecarlia—I.,
By FRANK MILLET. Illustrated;

The Catskills,
By LUCY C. LILLIE. Illustrated;

Recent Building in New York,
By MONTGOMERY SCHUYLER. Illustrated.

Haunts of "the Swamp Fox,"
By P. D. MAY. Illustrated

Paul Potter,
By E. MAZOW. Illustrated;

Prisoners—Part I.,
A Story, by ROSE HAWTHORNE LATHROP. With an Illustration by ABBEY;

The Government of Cities in the State of New York,
By Ex-Mayor WILLIAM R. GRACE;

An Unpublished Chapter of Hawaiian History,
By General J. F. B. MARSHALL;

The Genesis of the Rip Van Winkle Legend,
By JOHN B. THOMPSON;

A Castle in Spain—Part V.,
A Novel. Illustrated by ABBEY;

A Silhouette,
A Story. By REBECCA HARDING DAVIS;

Poems
By NORA PERRY, S. E. COLMAN, and HERBERT E. CLARKE;

Editor's Easy Chair.
Duelling, Past and Present.—The Etiquette of Snubbing.—Poe's "Raven" Illustrated by Doré.—The Charity Organization Society.—Mr. Adams's Phi Beta Kappa Address;

Editor's Literary Record.

Editor's Historical Record.

Editor's Drawer.
September.—American Handwriting.—A Chinese Student in Search of a Wife.—High Life Represented by Strolling Players.—A Narrow Escape for the English Version.—An Absurd Metaphor.—A "Brick of a Boy."—Limited Baggage.—The Cracker's Retort.—A Tennessee Character.—Praying Against Time.—Uncle Washington Lark.—An Idle Idyl (MARGARET EYTINGE).—Footprints of a Lost Man.—An Old Brooklyn Barber's Sign.—An Original Dogmatist.—How Job Destitute became a Railroad Conductor.—The Old Reading Clam (WILL CARLETON).

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volume of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

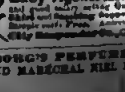
Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY is a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.



Lady Agents
LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES,
EDENIA AND MARECHAL NIEL ROSE.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

LIFE OF JAMES BUCHANAN, Fifteenth President of the United States. By Geoffrey Theodore Curtis. With Two Steel-Plate Portraits. 8 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops and Uncut Edges, $6 00.

II.

MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, Morgan Dix. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $5 00.

III.

TWELVE AMERICANS. Their Lives and Times. By Howard Carroll. Containing Sketches of Horatio Seymour, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Hannibal Hamlin, John Gilbert, Robert C. Schenck, Frederick Douglass, William Allen, Allen G. Thurman, Joseph Jefferson, Elihu B. Washburne, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

SPANISH VISTAS. By George Parsons Lathrop. Illustrated by Charles S. Reinhart. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $2 00.

V.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record, with Illustrative Poetic and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By Margaret Willson and Joanna Piercont Wilson. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

VI.

THE GREEK AND LATIN INSCRIPTIONS ON THE OBELISK CRAB in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. A Monograph. By Augustus C. Merriam, Ph.D., Adjunct Professor of Greek in Columbia College. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VII.

COMPARATIVE ZOOLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

VIII.

NAMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Compared by William Wells Newell. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $1 00.

IX.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by Thomas Carlyle. Edited by James Anthony Froude. 4to, Paper, 20 cents. Also, Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

X.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

XI.

SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS. Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, and other Poems. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; 4to, Paper, 40 cents.

XII.

MAN. By Lyof C. Laslar, Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Prudence," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XIII.

FREDERICK II. AND MARIA THERESA. From Military Unpublished Documents. 1740-1742. By Th. Von Bernhardi. From the French, by Mrs. Cashel Hoey and Mr. John Lillie. 4to, Paper, 60 cents.

XIV.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE. A History of the Brooklyn Bridge. By W. C. Conant. Illustrated from Harper's Magazine for May, 1865: The Bridge as a Monument. The Monument Secured. Illustrated from Harper's Magazine, May 31, 1865: Together with an Account of the Opening Exercises, May 24, 1883. With Views, Portraits and Twenty-eight Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XV.

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Cooperation of Fred Dickson, M. Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $10 00.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"Diantha?" By Miss Betham Edwards. 50 cents.

Robert Reid, Cotton-Spinner. By Alice O'Hanlon. 20 cents.

Sir Tom. By Mrs. Oliphant. 20 cents.

What Must Thou Done? By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. 15 cents.

A Foolish Virgin. By Ella Wass. 20 cents.

The Senior Sophister. By the Author of "St. Olave's," "Mein's Faith," &c. 20 cents.

Art Career Ant Nihil. By the Countess M. Von Bothmer. 20 cents.

The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated. 10 cents.

Yolanda. By William Black. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 25; Paper, 20 cents.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Archy. By A. Mary F. Robinson. 15 cents.

Mr. Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 12mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

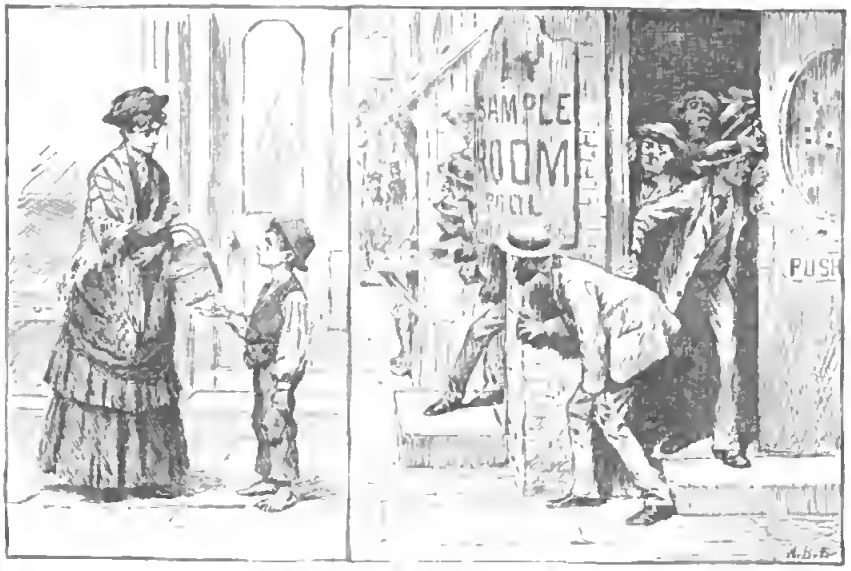
The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 12mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 60 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Ramsden Thurlow. 20 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ Harper's Catalogue mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.



"CONSCIENCE MAKES COWARDS OF US ALL."

Lady (offering workin a penny). "Now go into that saloon on the corner, and tell the man you will see us there in the gray suit and straw hat that if he don't come out of that right away his wife will come fetch him!"

The Effect of the Message.

WINE

MANUFACTURED BY THE

LAKE KEUKA WINE COMPANY.

THE PRESS SAYS:

American Grape and Wine Growing: "The quality of the goods of this Company is not surpassed."

Omaha (Neb.) Herald: "Lake Keuka Wine Company's wines are a constant temptation to the pocket and to the palate."

Syracuse Herald: "The wines of the Lake Keuka Wine Company are of the finest to be found anywhere."

Winona (Minn.) Republican: "The Lake Keuka Wine Company's wines are superior to even the famed French products."

Brooklyn Bawgaw: "The wines of the Lake Keuka Wine Company, in point of purity, flavor, and healthfulness, are equal to any imported."

WHAT WE SAY:

FOR

PURITY,

FLAVOR,

AND GENERAL

EXCELLENCE

We admit of no superior among native or foreign wines manufactured.

Our CUSTOMERS say:

W. J. Peace, New York: "One would do well to drink only American champagne of the quality the Lake Keuka Company makes."

G. S. Hosmer, Nimrod and Bolton Manufacturing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.: "Have had your claret in constant use for a year, and I am fully satisfied it is equal to the best."

Wm. Baird, M.D., West Orange, N.J.: "The claret wine you sent me was the best table wine I have had."

Dr. C. D. Aaron, Hartford, Conn.: "I tried several cases of your wine, and prefer them to any American wines I have tasted."

Geo. H. Sprague, Cashier First National Bank, Zanesville, O.: "For variety and excellence of quality, your wines are first-class."

WINES, CHAMPAGNES, BRANDY.

Send for circular to LAKE KEUKA WINE CO., HAMMONDSPORT, N. Y.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. Archer, M.D., 99 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

THE AMERICAN

Double Action Revolver,

$5, $6 and $8 Calibres, are sold at retail by the manufacturers, but by the Gun and Hardware Trade, in all parts of the North. Made by HARRINGTON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass., also manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Ejecting Guns.

$66 a week to your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding. Ride as easy on a spring seat as in a carriage. The springs lengthen and shorten according to the weight they carry. Light vehicles and heavy carriages ride equally easy. Pamphlet and full information sent free. Address

HENRY TIMKEN,

Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Dealers in Carriages, Buggies, Phaetons, Spring Wagons, &c.

Can also sell you ABBOTT BUGGY CO

WAR VOLUMES

OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the Set of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,

134 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

TWELVE AMERICANS.

Their Lives and Times. By Howard Carroll. Containing Sketches of Horatio Seymour, Charles Francis Adams, Peter Cooper, Hannibal Hamlin, John Gilbert, Robert C. Schenck, Frederick Douglass, William Allen, Allen G. Thurman, Joseph Jefferson, Elihu B. Washburne, Alexander H. Stephens. Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

Mr. Carroll writes with the practiced skill of a journalist. He knows the thing worth saying, and the effective way he which it should be said. There is a straightforward frankness about his work which interests the reader's confidence, and a breezy, wide-awake spirit that sustains interest through every chapter. Some of the papers seem like conversations enjoyed by the reader with the subject, while others shed an entirely fresh and clear light upon the careers and temperance of public men.—N. Y. Times.

It is brightly written and is rich in personal reminiscences. It will be found extremely readable.—Philadelphia North American.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

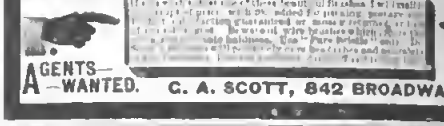
ANOTHER WAY TO ACCOUNT FOR IT

SUMMER-HOTEL PROPRIETOR (to the New Serpent). "Say, look-a-here! Boarders is all-fired scarce at my place this Summer. What will you charge for four or five first-class "Appearances" off my beach?"

NEW PRICE.

Dr. Scott's Electric HAIR BRUSH.

Only ONE DOLLAR, $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50 & $3.



AGENTS—WANTED. C. A. SCOTT, 842 BROADWAY, N. Y.

DO NOT STORM THE SYSTEM

WITH VIOLENT CATHARTICS THAT RACK AND TEAR AND WEAKEN THE UNFORTUNATE INVALID, BUT TONE THE STOMACH, RELIEVE THE BOWELS, REGULATE THE LIVER, AND REFRESH THE NERVES WITH TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT WHEN THE FIRST SYMPTOMS OF ILLNESS APPEAR. A MORE DELIGHTFUL EFFERVESCENT DRAUGHT IS NOT TO BE FOUND, AND A MORE POTENT REMEDY FOR DYSPEPSIA, BILIOUSNESS, CONSTIPATION, NEURALGIA, HEADACHE, COLIC, AND GENERAL DEBILITY DOES NOT EXIST. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

DECKER BROTHERS'

MATCHLESS

PIANOS

33 Union Square, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN'S

BOSTON GARTER.

An exceedingly useful invention, without which every gentleman should be incomplete especially during the Summer months, when less silence are worn, and when it is unbearable to one's comfort and most appearance to have the stocking fit unevenly about the ankle, as the stock of the drawers is kept confined at the bottom, all of which the Boston Garter accomplishes.

For Sale by all the leading Gents' Furnishing Houses, or a pair will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Cotton, 25 cents per pair; Silk, 75 cents per pair.

Mention this paper. Address

GEORGE FROST & CO.,

Inventors, 37 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

How Benton's Hair Grower MAKES THE HAIR GROW

The Hair-grower acts on the head as phosphates on the vegetable, strengthening and extending the tissues, giving the papilla new vitality and vigor, and adding nourishment and power to the weak, debilitated hair-growth.

Double and Triple Strength.

When the Skin is very tough and the hair and the follicle apparently effectually closed, the single strength will sometimes fail to reach the papilla; in such case the double or the triple strength should be used in connection with the single strength, using them on alternate days.

Price, $1.00 per Bottle; Double Strength, $2.00; Triple Strength, $3.00, by mail.

BENTON HAIR GROWER CO.,

BRAINARD BLOCK, CLEVELAND, O.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS.

Mailed [illegible] by Stationers, or

KRUPP & ESSER, New York.

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to [illegible] Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, [illegible] impurities of the blood. Avoid cruel [illegible] arsenic, nitre and foreign. South Wales [illegible] irritate and impair the digestive organs [illegible]. None genuine on draught.

PLACE IT IN YOUR SAFE.

Insert $8 for a $10,000 Accident Policy with $50 Weekly Indemnity in the United States Mutual Accident Association,

320 & 222 Broadway, N. Y

Are you a member of the United States Mutual Accident Association? If you are not, you may be doing yourself and those dependent upon you an injustice. Without further delay, write or call at 320 and 322 Broadway, New York, for circular and application blank. European permits without extra charge.

Paillard's MUSIC BOXES

ARE THE BEST.

They are the only ones that are sold by first-class dealers the world over. Send 3 cents for circular to M. J. PAILLARD & Co., 680 Broadway, New York City.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT SHORT HAND COLLARS AND BEAD EDGE CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

TELESCOPES Binoculars, Opera Glasses, Photographic Outfits for Amateurs, Levels, &c. R. & J. BECK, Manufacturing Opticians, Philadelphia, Pa. Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

CHANGE in TARIFF.

Popular Prices.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

TOILET SOAPS.

Hooper's Cachous.

HOWARD

Tooth Brushes.

DORCAS YARNS.

Call on any first-class dealer, or send to

Agents in New York.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings Steam Pack'g, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Send for Descriptive Pamphlet.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large size for circulars &c. $8 to $20. Five pleasant money-making evenings at once. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

"Cured of aggravated sick headache by Dr. Benson's Celery Pills." —Jno. P. Kelly, Tazewell, C. H., Va.

COOK'S GRAND EXCURSION AROUND THE WORLD.

LEAVING NEW YORK SEPT 20 1881.

Visiting Japan, China, by Malay Peninsula, India, Egypt, and Central Europe.

A SEVEN MONTHS' TOUR

Cost of Membership, $1101.

Which INCLUDES ALL NECESSARY EXPENSES of Journey from starting to the End. Personally conducted with the best facilities. COOK'S EXCURSIONIST for 1881 contains particulars; by mail for ten cents.

Address, THOS. COOK & SON, 261 Broadway, New York.

Boston, 100 Washington St.
Branches— Philadelphia, 611 Walnut St.
St. Louis, cor. of Sixth and Pine Sts.
Cleveland, 213 Bond St.

PECK & SNYDER'S Celebrated Tennis

PECK & SNYDER, Manufacturers, 124, 126 & 128 Nassau Street, New York.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and State. Please mention this paper.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS

PUBLIC, SUNDAY-SCHOOL AND HOME ENTERTAINMENTS

C. T. MILLICAN

ASK FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OF THE NEW DISSOLVING STEREOPTICON

HARPER'S BAZAR

CUT PAPER PATTERNS

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to No. 3 to 13 Cherry St., New York, and conduct it upon its own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., who have been a Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. A Dropper.

Myriads of pimples, mattings of wens, moles removed by Dr. Benson's Skin Tonic. Sold by FURNITURE.

The pre-eminent artistic merit of our productions is recognized by the leading furniture dealers of this country, and to parties who may find it impracticable to visit our works we shall be pleased to refer to establishments where our goods may be found.

THE F. GELDOWSKY FURNITURE CO.,

EAST CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

First and Second Streets.

Cars of Cambridge Horse Railway from Scollay Square, Boston, every five minutes.

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS. In 20 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial, by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 25c. in stamps.

Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1393. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE

Copyright, 1883, by HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE LATE JUDGE BLACK.

After a very painful illness, during which he manifested the fortitude, cheerfulness, resignation, and wit that his friends would have expected of him, Judge JEREMIAH SULLIVAN BLACK died at his home in York, Pennsylvania, at 2.15 o'clock on the morning of the 19th of August, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. About a week previous he underwent a severe surgical operation, the results of which superinduced pyæmia. His last words were a prayer, uttered while his wife was kneeling by his bed: "O Thou beloved and most merciful Father, from whom I had my being, and in whom I have ever trusted, grant, if it be Thy will, that I no longer suffer this agony, and that I be speedily called home to Thee. And, O my God, bless and comfort this my MARY." Having kissed his wife good-by, he turned over on his side, and in a few minutes was dead.

The Judge's strong religious convictions were frequently expressed in the presence of his family and friends during the closing days of his life, and the very hour he died he assured his son CHAUNCEY that he had no fear for the future, so far as he himself was concerned. "I only wish," he added, "that I was as comfortable about what I leave behind in this world." The grounds of those convictions he had already publicly set forth in an article entitled "The Christian Religion," in the North American Review for August, 1881, in answer to certain aspersions of Colonel ROBERT INGERSOLL, which were printed in the same number of that periodical, and had been previously dismissed by Judge BLACK. "Why," he asks, "should I, an unlearned and unintellectual layman, be placed in the position" of meeting such a challenge? "The explanation is easy enough. This is no business of the priests. That prescribed duty is to preach the Word, in the full assurance that it will commend itself to all good and honest hearts by its own manifest veracity and the singular purity of its precepts. They can not afford to turn away from their proper work, and leave willing learners uninstructed while they wrangle in vain with a predetermined opponent. They were warned to expect slander, indignity, and insult, and these are among the evils which they must not resist."

The bar loses one of its most distinguished members and the Democratic party one of its trusted representatives and advisers in the death of Judge BLACK. He received his title so long ago as 1842, when elected to preside over the judicial district of Somerset County, Pennsylvania. Nine years afterward he became Judge of the Supreme Court of that State, and still later the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth. He was appointed Attorney-General of the United States on the 5th of March, 1857, by President BUCHANAN, during the last four months of whose administration he filled the office of Secretary of State. Since that eventful epoch Judge BLACK has practiced with extraordinary success the profession of the law, earning an extended and enviable reputation both as a counsellor and a pleader.

His legal knowledge was excelled only by the astuteness with which he could make use of it, and when arguing a case before a jury the ease and dignity of his bearing were illumined by the advocate's mastery of his hearers' sense of the ludicrous. During the celebrated contest over the will of the late Commodore VANDERBILT, Judge BLACK's humor caused frequent merriment in the court-house, and constituted a chief attraction for the throng that had gathered to listen to the proceedings. In other notable forensic events in various cities of the Union his well-known figure was conspicuous.

Judge BLACK used a singularly nervous and forcible style of writing, and possessed a fine capacity for worrying an opponent. If any man ever had the courage of his convictions, he was that man. Opposition always inspired him. He was by nature a leader and commander; he set out for himself, and expected others to follow. The accomplished statesmen who thronged the White House and the national Capitol during the last months of the administration of President BUCHANAN found the attempted management of Judge BLACK a bigger contract than they could handle. Though a Democrat of the Democrats and a champion of State rights, he officially advised the President that the nation had rights too, and that one of those rights was the right of self-preservation. The presence in the cabinet, at that tempestuous and most disheartening hour, of a Democratic statesman whose heart beat to the music of the Union was worth something, as we now look back upon it; and although Judge BLACK remained a bitter and relentless foe of the reconstruction acts and of many other Republican measures, and although he continued to the last a stout Democrat of the old school, there probably is not a Republican journal in the land that has not recognized in his death the death of a true statesman and patriot.

THE LATE JUDGE BLACK.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY F. GUTEKUNST.

THE CATACOMBS OF PARIS.

At the uprising of the word catacombs our thoughts fly back to those early ages of the Church when the first followers of the doctrines of Christ hid themselves from the fury of the Roman emperors in caves and dungeons of the earth, alone thus known as catacombs, and of which many specimens are found in Rome. But the Catacombs of Paris mean nothing of this kind. It is now familiarly of recent date—namely, under the Empire—that the removal of the bones from the overcrowded cemeteries and convent burial places to these subterranean passages earned for them the name of Catacombs.

These so-called Catacombs form but a small portion of the immense excavations or [illegible] which underlie a great part of Paris. These vast quarries, of ancient date, from the white stone of which rose the beautiful city of Paris, have been from time to time the rendezvous of thieves and smugglers, who marauded the capital, retreating to their dangerous hiding place when none dared attack them. A highly interesting novel, styled Les Catacombes de Paris, written some years since, though somewhat colored with the sensational excitement necessary to attract the interest of the public, graphically describes these gloomy vaults as having been for some days the prison of a young and beautiful girl, who was seized and conveyed thither on leaving the celebrated convent of Val-de-Grâce, under which these carrières extend. The lady is sought for in vain, and at length the distracted lover penetrates into these dark caverns, where he discovers her friends among a gang of counterfeit-coiners, who for years have been the occupants of these gloomy dungeons.

During the period of the first French Revolution numbers of people fled for safety to these vaults, to seek refuge as it were in the bowels of the earth from the political strife and crime at that time so fiercely contending in the great capital. We see in the Catacombs the remains of the chapel and high altar erected by these refugees, where, with sorrowing hearts, they attended daily the service of the mass. A fable later on alarm is given; the beautiful Palace of the Luxembourg, under which these quarries extend, has been seen on fire, and in order that the loved relics of the Medici may not be engulfed in the abyss upon which it has been discovered to stand, steps are taken to form a complete staff of workmen, whose only duty consists in inspecting these ancient cavities and keeping them in thorough repair.

The visitor to the Catacombs finds himself in a court-yard facing the entrance, and one of a crowd of several hundreds of persons. Each wants his turn of admittance with in the little barred door, near which stands the ticket collector, the officer employed to count each individual who descends and duly registers the total in his ledger, and the bright-eyed little French woman who provides each visitor, for a small gratuity, with [illegible] ordinary lamps (candle), without which no one is permitted to enter; and though somewhat roughly fitted at the end of a long wooden handle, it helps to cast a ray of light into the darkness within the silent walls. There is a Babel of voices all around; and it is some time before the crowd of visitors, with the guide at the head, holding aloft his flaring torch, are fairly launched into the Catacombs. After descending fifty or more stone steps, worn and slippery with decay, we pass through long narrow passages, apparently hewn out of the stone. We dare not linger, but must follow rapidly the long line of figures wending their way through these dark vaults. Here and there in the long corridors are passages barred off, and known as dangerous. At certain curves and corners a sentinel, with torch upheld, stands to call out in deep sonorous voice, "A droite toujours" (Keep to the right), and we all, hurrying on so we hardly know what, find ourselves in a square cavity of considerable height, along each side of which are stacked the bones of those long since departed. A weird sight! Highborn descendants of noble houses may be here, yonder skull may once have worn the regal crown of France, forgotten and unknown, beside whose remains may rest those of the poor beggar boy who came to beg his bread at the convent door, and died there, tended by the Sisters' care. The taste displayed in the arrangement of the bones is truly wonderful. There is nothing to offend the eye. In perfect order, not one out of its appointed place, the dreary spectacle of human nothingness is there presented, and as we pass from one spot to another along the almost interminable passages, the eye seems to be shocked by the [illegible] picture. Upon each [illegible] from time to time, a number may be seen describing the [illegible] in the [illegible]

After having [illegible] two hours [illegible] at the [illegible] order, we started, and [illegible] narrow staircase, rejoiced [illegible] fresh air and [illegible] sunshine.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1883.

THE HARPER ART COMPETITION.

NEWCASTLE, NEW HAMPSHIRE, August 6, 1883.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

GENTLEMEN,—The committee appointed to award the prizes in the art competition for the illustration of ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn" desire to report, as follows:

We have carefully examined each one of the 338 drawings submitted to our judgment, and have unanimously agreed that, in consideration of the quality of these works, we are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever. A small proportion of the drawings were found to be of sufficient artistic merit to warrant their selection for engraving, but not one of these adequately illustrated the idea expressed in the poem.

With sincere regret at the necessity of this decision, we have the honor to be,

Your obedient servants,

R. SWAIN GIFFORD,
F. D. MILLET,
CHARLES PARSONS.

"HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE abounds with fact and fiction of the highest order for their instruction and entertainment."—ZION'S HERALD, BOSTON

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY,

Published August 28, contains a thrilling story for girls, entitled

"THIMBLE'S LAST HUNT,"

by MARIA LOUISE POOL. Stories, poems, and articles are contributed by the following well-known authors: JAMES PAYN, LUCY C. LILLIE, ELLA WHEELER, H. C. VAN GIESEN, M.D., and IRVING E. BEMAN. Among the artists represented are W. T. SMEDLEY, JESSIE CURTIS SHEPHERD, and ROSINA EMMET. Special attention may be called to a comic story in rhyme, written and illustrated by HOWARD PYLE, entitled

"YE ROMANTIC ADVENTURES OF THREE TAILORS."

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.50 PER YEAR.

A specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

THE RESULT OF THE HARPER ART COMPETITION.

SOME months since the Messrs. HARPER announced an offer to young American artists which has become famous by its publication at the head of this editorial page. It proposed an award of three thousand dollars for the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn," upon the condition that in the judgment of three most competent artists, whose names were announced, the drawing should be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The designer was to be an American artist of not more than twenty-five years of age, who should be bound by an honorable understanding that the reward should be devoted to art study in the best American schools, and to a sojourn abroad of at least six months for study of the old masters. The object of the offer was to promote the interests of American art by stimulating a generous competition, and by aiding some young American artist whose work, in the opinion of competent and impartial judges, should justify such assistance.

The chief condition mentioned was indeed stringent. The offer was not a proposition to accept the best design that should be submitted, but only some one that the judges should decide to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The announcement naturally excited great interest, and by the 1st of August, which was the date mentioned as the latest upon which drawings could be received for consideration, the committee had received three hundred and thirty-eight designs. After the 1st of August twenty-three were received, which were, by the terms of the offer, too late for the competition. The names of the judges are the guarantee, by personal character and professional standing, of their fitness for the discharge of the duty intrusted to them, and they have submitted the report which is printed at the head of this page. The Messrs. HARPER naturally share the regret expressed by the judges, but from such a decision there is no appeal. The competition, however, will be re-opened, but under conditions somewhat modified by suggestions of the judges. Among the modifications is the selection of another subject for illustration in place of the "Christmas Hymn," and announcement of the subject and conditions of the competition will be made next week.

It will be observed that the report states that only a small proportion of the drawings were found to be of sufficient artistic merit to warrant their selection for engraving, and it is therefore fair to assume that they were in great part the work of amateurs or mere beginners, and in not awarding the prize to any competitor the judges evidently decided that even the drawings which were meritorious enough to be engraved were not, in the sense of the offer, adequate illustrations of the poem, and none of them, therefore, could receive the prize. As a poem so essentially picturesque challenges the designer to cope with a rare and subtle literary skill, the young artist, conscious of a power as yet undeveloped, might instinctively shrink from the contest, and it is very possible, therefore, that some drawing which modest genius undervalued, but which might have won the prize, was not submitted. For such reasons it would be unfair to regard the drawings which were offered as an indication of the promise of all our artists under twenty-five years of age, and the re-opening of this interesting competition will undoubtedly produce results all the more satisfactory because of the unexpected results of the first trial.

BECALMED.

THE political apathy is so profound that there will be a general disposition not to regard the result of the autumn elections as indicative of the real tendency of the country. There are already signs of hedging. When Judge HOADLY was nominated in Ohio it was announced by the Democratic press that he would of course be elected, and that his election would settle the Presidential election of next year. But we observe that the same authorities now suggest that Judge HOADLY'S defeat would signify nothing, so far as next year's election is concerned, because Ohio is, after all, a Republican State. This shows a decidedly lower temperature. It is, in fact, an effort to prepare the Democratic mind for the defeat of Judge HOADLY. Such, however, is the political apathy that, should he be elected, the Republicans would doubtless find a satisfactory explanation of the result in local issues, and await with cheerful confidence the event of the national appeal to the people next year.

There is really no great national question to be determined next year except that of honest and economical administration. There is no Southern question, no financial question, no tariff question, no foreign question. We mean by this that the Democrats, whatever their probable course would be, propose no definite policy upon any of these subjects which is opposed to that of the Republicans. In fact, ever since the war they have been constantly advancing in professions to the Republican ground, and adopting the Republican policy as it was approved at successive elections by the people. What the election of next year will determine, therefore, is the party to which the country will confide the administration of a policy which is already established. The probabilities of the result may be easily inferred. For they depend upon one consideration, and that is whether the Republican party has gained or lost popular confidence since the last election. At that election the verdict was decisive. The Republican majority was not large, but it was very significant. General HANCOCK received only seventeen votes in the Northern States. It was the "solid South" that gave him his vote. May it be fairly held that the Republican course since that election has affected Northern sentiment unfavorably, and not only that, but so unfavorably that the country would prefer to take the inevitable risk of an administration whose real strength would lie in the Southern States? If the situation in this country were like that in England it would be difficult to calculate such probabilities. In England, when there is dissatisfaction with the course of one party, the professions of the other must be accepted, because they can not be tested. Fortunately with us both parties are constantly upon trial, and the voter can measure the real value of professions. The Democrats, for instance, declare that they will administer the government more economically and honestly than the Republicans. We are not obliged to take these words, because we have their deeds. The Republicans control the national government. But if we are not mistaken the Democrats are in power in twenty-six of the thirty-eight States of the Union. Let us look at their administration in one of them.

Maryland is a Democratic State. It voted for HANCOCK. It is sure for any Democratic candidate next year. What arguments does it offer for general trust in the Democratic party? The Democratic Governor, who seems to be much more of a patriot than of a partisan, states that during the last three years Democratic Legislatures have expended the State money improperly to the amount of half a million of dollars. During the same time delinquent Democratic officers have withheld from the State more than seven hundred thousand dollars. Newspapers have been practically bribed to silence by extravagant payments for publishing the laws. The Governor charges the Legislature itself with shameful extravagance in its own expenses, and he states that he reduced the cost of the public printing from $67,000 in 1879 to $25,800 in 1880, limited the allowance to each county for the publication of the laws to $600, decreased the number of Legislative employés from 108 to 54, and reduced the general Legislative expenses, exclusive of printing, from $153,070 to $105,846 77. This is one State in which Democratic economy of administration may be studied in detail. In Massachusetts the advantages of Democratic ascendency may be seen in the character and career of General BUTLER, the chosen representative of the party. But while thus the Democrats have been showing the precise value of their professions, the Republicans by their general conduct at the last session of Congress, and by the overthrow of the boss and caucus systems, have taken actual steps to purify administration, and it seems to us undeniable that upon the whole, and in contrast with the Democratic party, the Republicans have gained and not lost public confidence since the election of 1880. If this be true, there is no reason to suppose that the Republicans in 1884 will lose any State that they carried at the previous election.

THE RESULT OF THE LATE TELEGRAPH STRIKE.

THE telegraph strike ended as quietly as it had proceeded. The leaders, seeing that the movement had failed, advised a return to work wherever it was possible. They disclaimed all knowledge of the violence shown in cutting the wires, and all responsibility for it. In every such disturbance of established system there will be miscreants to turn the situation to mischief. But liberty can not be held responsible for the crimes committed in its name. The operator had no undoubted right to decline to work for unsatisfactory wages, and though illicit advantage of the situation may have been taken by others, or by some of the striking body, the strike itself was justifiable, however mistaken.

As we pointed out at the beginning, the company had necessarily an enormous advantage, because it could afford to lose time and money. At present strikes are contests of endurance, and a corporation has stronger powers of endurance than a body of workmen. A monopoly which also controls the labor market can not only determine the rate of wages, but it can do what the Western Union is now reported to have done—it can refuse to employ any person who belongs to any labor organization. Yet the result of the movement is not to be regretted. It has exposed thoroughly the methods of the telegraph monopoly, and the exposure has certainly not conciliated public favor, and it has immensely stimulated public interest in the postal telegraph. Indeed, the powerful support which that scheme received during the month of the strike showed a much more general demand for it and understanding of it than had been supposed to exist, and forecasts some Congressional action upon the subject. The argument in opposition has been exceedingly feeble and futile, and has mainly served to show how little is to be said against the proposition.

But we repeat what we said last week, that no such scheme ought to be entertained until it is settled that the increase of the number of public places which it would necessitate should not add to the existing evils and dangers of patronage. In a service requiring the special knowledge and diligent habits which are essential to the successful and profitable operation and management of a telegraph the reformed system of appointment by competition and probation would be indispensable, unless it were proposed to plunge into the utmost waste and extravagance. And should a postal telegraph under government control be established, does any intelligent man really think that it would be more American and less aristocratic, more economical, and more agreeable to popular institutions, to limit the employment of the operators to a term of four years, in order to dismiss them more easily at the end of it? There is no subject upon which it seems to be more necessary to free our minds from cant than this. If, therefore, the strike should lead, as now seems most probable, to the adoption of a government postal telegraph, it would have dealt a powerful blow at the system of monopoly which is a matter of serious apprehension to a large body of intelligent citizens.

THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR '84.

BY observing the figures of the last national election, which we mention elsewhere, it will be seen that the election of next year is sure to be very close. In this situation the part of wisdom for Republicans is to consider every circumstance and to secure every advantage. The Republican party can succeed in no other way, and the vital point to remember is, that while it must largely depend upon its general tradition and character and service, the selection of a candidate is of critical importance. The question is not so much who can be nominated, but who ought to be nominated; and that being seen, the practical aim should be to make the nomination practicable. There are several superstitions about a nomination which ought to be discarded, but which are generally and amusingly accepted as final. Under the circumstances, such superstitions must be disregarded or the result will be imperiled.

Thus there is a fancy that the candidate must not be taken from a small State, because his own local capital of electoral votes will be too small. This is a sentimental theory which the facts do not sustain. The instant that the candidate is nominated he represents the cause and the party, and he is weak or strong by his personal and public record, not at all by his State or the number of its electoral [illegible]

Mr. TILDEN was not a strong candidate because he lived in New York, nor did the fact that he lived in New York increase his vote in that State. He was strong solely because there was dissatisfaction with the Republican administration, and because he was believed to be a reformer. In 1880 General HANCOCK was no stronger a candidate because he was by his residence at the time a New-Yorker, or because he was a native of Pennsylvania. He was not defeated for local reasons, but because confidence had largely returned to the Republican party, and because he was not thought to have especial qualifications for the Presidency. The fact that Mr. BAYARD lives in Delaware, and that Delaware has but three electoral votes, does not make him a weak or undesirable candidate of his party. He would be no stronger a candidate in the country or in New York if he lived in the State. His strength would be derived solely from his public standing and his personal and political character.

This is equally true of the Republican side. President ARTHUR would not be a stronger candidate because he is a New-Yorker, nor Mr. EDMUNDS a weaker because he lives in Vermont. The question of "locality" certainly did not affect Mr. BLAINE'S candidacy either in 1876 or 1880. All the men whose position may be said to make them possible candidates owe it to their prominence. In the public mind and in the party regard they are not especially identified with any State. They are representatives of the party. In the selection of a Republican candidate, therefore, all these fanciful considerations must be dismissed. The sole considerations must be public and private character and general party confidence and regard. The man whose public course and large public ability have won for him a commanding position in the country, who is free from all entanglements of faction, and who is personally and officially without just reproach—if such a man there be—should be the Republican candidate.

THE AMERICAN LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

THE American Library Association is composed of the leading librarians of the country, who wisely meet to compare views in regard to the practical management of libraries—a subject in which the public is profoundly interested. The object of a good librarian is to devise methods of making his library in the most convenient way most useful to the largest number of persons. This includes cataloguing and arranging books and all the other details, of which the good regulation is indispensable to a prompt and satisfactory use of a large library.

There is no position in which skilled intelligence and special training are more necessary than in that of a librarian. Yet it is generally regarded as a snug and desirable sinecure for invalid scholars and professional men. The view is a most serious obstacle to the proper use of a library, and a cause of endless vexation to any efficient librarian. His assistants are very likely to be selected from motives of pity and mere favor, and the library becomes a kind of hospital for the sick and feeble.

We are glad to see that the Library Association has taken up this subject, and by adopting the following resolution has taken a long step toward securing greater efficiency in libraries:

"Resolved, That efficiency in library administration can only be obtained through application of the cardinal principles of an enlightened civil service, exclusive of all political and personal influence, appointment for definitely ascertained fitness, promotion for merit, and retention during good behavior; and that in the opinion of the association in large public libraries subordinate employés should be selected by competitive examination, followed by probationary terms."

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

THE article by ex-Mayor GRACE in the current number of HARPER'S MONTHLY upon the government of cities in the State of New York has naturally attracted a great deal of attention. The author has had the immense advantage in preparing such an article of actual experience in the administration of the government of New York, and he has tested for himself the confusion and weakness of the whole system. The laws relating to the city of New York fill a large octavo volume of more than seven hundred pages, and contain about 2150 sections—a body of legislation, as Mr. GRACE says, about as large as the entire civil code of France. The laws affecting each city in the State are different. There is no municipal system whatever.

The root of the mischief, in the opinion of the ex-Mayor, lies in the want of a wise determination of the manner and the method of State interference with the municipalities, and the remedy lies in securing actual "local self-government" by a general law applicable to all cities. This would promote the growth of the municipal spirit which is so essential to good local government as public spirit, in its large and patriotic sense, to good national government. The cities should not only elect and appoint their own officers, but they should be supreme, with due regard to the welfare of the State, over all things which affect themselves alone.

Political parties have no proper place in municipalities, because cities do not have political policies. But a community which is politically divided, and which is accustomed always to vote according to those divisions, can not easily disregard them at an election involving patronage and place and emolument. Indeed, it was to this tendency and its consequences that the modern legislative interference in the city government of New York was first largely due. But Mr. GRACE is entirely correct in his view of the indispensability of vesting great responsibility in the local Executive. That is a simple and obvious guarantee, under our general system, of efficient local administration, and it is the one of which the city of New York has never been permitted to avail itself. The paper of Mr. GRACE is a very timely and valuable contribution to the general discussion, especially as it is in the city of New York that the feasibility of any system must be tested, since any scheme which is practically successful here would be equally so in all cities.

MR. JENKINS JUSTIFIED.

A CORRESPONDENT writes, in some heat, to ask why Mr Jenkins, in announcing that a dinner is to be given to some distinguished guest, says that twenty "covers" will be laid, when he means twenty plates. Our correspondent surely forgets the old story, "Your Majesty's self is but a ceremony." He might as well ask why the list of dishes is called a menu instead of a bill of fare; or why we read upon those interesting papers, no porcelain, or satin, or silk, or other precious substance, croquettes of sweetbread, or haunch of lamb à la Mountmorency, or a fricassee of chicken à la dauphine.

He may justly ask, and with equal heat, why not print the bill of fare in the language of the guests, or at least in some one language, and not in a hotchpotch of two languages. He may—indeed he probably will—go so far as to insist that it is a ridiculous affectation. But he will overshoot the mark in so doing. To say covers for plates is a convention, and a convention is a tacit agreement that a thing shall be done in a certain way. The reason of the agreement is mostly found in convenience.

Moreover, in this special instance the word cover is given by English lexicographers an equivalent to plate. The phrase to lay a cover is therefore as good English as to set a plate, although in actual conversation if a man should ask another at table to pass him a cover, he would undoubtedly receive the cover of a dish in return. Yet in speaking of a dinner it is permissible to speak of the covers as indicating the number of the guests. The justification, however, is convention, and Monsieur CHARLES GARNIER writes to Monsieur FRANCISQUE SARCEY, only a month ago, in the Feuilleton of the Temps, in Paris, "If God invented life, man invented convention, and it is not his worst work."

THE IRISH QUESTION.

THE steady progress of Mr. PARNELL'S success in the Irish election, and his unbending hostility to the most friendly English administration which Ireland has known for many years, show how deep and strong is the Irish feeling, and that the question of Irish independence is ripening. This question is quite independent of Mr. PARNELL'S purposes or wishes. The power to evoke spirits does not necessarily imply the power to lay them, as MIRABEAU learned in France a century ago.

There is apparently no total an elimination of feeling between the two peoples that, under the circumstances, no friendly understanding seems to be possible, and the Irish question promises to supersede all others in testing the resources of British statesmanship.

A BOOMERANG.

THE Democratic campaign which is carried on by printing DORSEY'S stories about General GARFIELD, without a solitary attempt at evidence, makes havoc of those in whose interest the warfare is waged. It is not easy to see whether the chief object of the performance is to defame General GARFIELD or to assist Mr. CONKLING. But, whatever the purpose, it succeeds in presenting Mr. CONKLING in the most unhappy light. The substance of the story is that Mr. CONKLING was hired to support the candidates of his own party by the promise of certain places for his friends and a general control of patronage in New York. It would not be possible to represent a man who professes peculiar loyalty to his party in a more pitiable and contemptible position.

But, that all consistency may be wanting, the assertion is also made, equally without evidence, and we presume equally without affecting the belief of a single human being, that there was no Treaty of Mentor, and that Mr. CONKLING loftily disclaimed all knowledge of the wicked ways of the campaign. There was never any proof whatever offered of what was called the Treaty of Mentor; in other words, a corrupt bargain between General GARFIELD, Mr CONKLING, and General GRANT. Anonymous assertions at this time neither prove nor disprove it.

But that the head of the late Republican machine in New York knew nothing of naughty political tricks is a tale hardly worth telling. He may have professed to hold his nose in the lobby while the tricks were played, because that seems to have been a favorite attitude of that statesman. But that he supposed his lieutenants to be what he and they would call Sunday-school misses may be believed upon the remoter shar routes, but it is a tale which would produce a smile among "the boys" themselves.

PERSONAL.

GOVERNOR TILDEN'S new pair of alleged fast horses from Kentucky were not bought for speed at all. They are nice-looking Kentucky browns, sixteen hands high, and able to cover a mile in three minutes and a quarter. The Governor expects to use these before his carriage. He keeps twelve horses in his stables.

—The construction of the projected suspension bridge across the Harlem River a few hundred yards above High Bridge is still delayed on account of legal difficulties. The Westchester County terminus will adjoin the grounds of the late WILLIAM B. TWEED, whose beautiful and extensive country-seat is in finer condition even than during his lifetime. Mr TWEED used to consider his house a corruption of "oak-dico," that is to say, the hole in the oak where CHARLES II hid himself. It was a favorite boast of his that if by any chance he should lose his money, he had plenty of friends whose loans would soon set him on his feet again.

—The stone used in building the nearly finished Catholic church at the northwest corner of Fifty-ninth Street and Ninth Avenue was originally a part of the lower extremity of the Croton Aqueduct. It was sold by the city at public auction, when that portion of the aqueduct became useless on account of the erection of the Central Park reservoirs. It went less than dirt cheap, because the Irish contractors who were expected to compete for it declined to make any bids when they had learned that a Catholic priest wanted it to make a new church out of. Probably not a public building of any size in New York city has cost less than this large church.

—OSCAR WILDE, in short hair and a yellowish business suit, lounging about the stage of the Union Square Theatre, is believed to have parted forever with his ornamentative picturesqueness. A quondam admirer laments that the money-making aesthete should have pricked his own bubble.

—The Rev. WILLARD PARKER, of the Tribune Fresh-air Fund, has been prevented by ill health from being as active as formerly in the interests of that admirable charity, of which he may be called the father. It was when pastor of a church in Pennsylvania, about eight years ago, that he conceived and first put into execution the idea of giving the children of the teeming tenement-houses two weeks of fresh air in the country. The Tribune this year has already collected more than fifteen thousand dollars for the purpose.

—One of the oldest and most successful American caricaturists is Mr. GRANT HELLAW, whose contributions to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE have entertained millions of readers. Mr. HELLAW is about fifty-five years of age, tall and slight, and, like most humorists, grave of countenance. His pencil and pen are still as busy as his sense of the ludicrous is acute.

—The financial reverses of Mr E. C. STEDMAN, poet, critic, and broker, have awakened the deep sympathy of his wide circle of friends. One of the latter, while unearthing a lot of private papers the other day, found a printed copy of the menu of the dinner given by Mr STEDMAN at the University Club on his London publisher, Mr CHARMAN TRENCH. On the back of the menu were the autographs of the guests of the occasion. May the genial host live to give many more such dinners, and to cultivate literature afresh!

—The Rev. WILLIAM M BAKER, who died in Boston on the 20th of August, was the successful author of several novels, of which The New Timothy, His Majesty Myself, and Blessed Saint Certainty were the most noteworthy. He had been a pastor in Boston since 1874, and was a graduate of Princeton College, in whose environs some scenes in his books were laid.

—The late Mr WILLIAM WIRT SIKES was one of the number of clever journalists who have represented this country abroad. While in the midst of his duties as United States Consul at Cardiff, Wales, he took time to write the history of Welsh folk lore, and to entertain and instruct his fellow-citizens through the magazines and newspapers. Such men are better stuff for consular than pot-house politicians are. Mr SIKES was the husband of OLIVE LOGAN.

—That veteran American lamb-eater, Mr. ANSON B. DUNLAP, celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday on the 21st of August at his home in South Orange, New Jersey, in the midst of most beautiful rural surroundings. He is in the best of health, and takes his daily walk in the woodlands.

—Lord and Lady ROSEBERY having announced their intention of starting on a trip around the world, an English journalist remarks that it is not an very long ago that any one who had been further afield than the more accessible parts of Europe felt justified in posing as a professional traveller, and was an object of curious and most respectful interest in London drawing rooms. "But on here changed, and as have three round about us used to gather. Railways, ocean steamers, ample leisure, increased curiosity, good hotels, new facilities for sight-seeing, enhanced safety, fashion, and a desire to follow it, have so multiplied the number of travellers that the difficulty in nowadays to find any one who has passed his life within the bounds of his own country."

—About two weeks before his death Judge BLACK wrote to Colonel A. K. MCCLURE, of Philadelphia, respecting Mr. GEORGE THOMAS CURTIS'S new Life of James Buchanan: "I thought of having something of CURTIS'S good faith and veracity, in which I have the most implicit confidence. I have not read his book, but I am sure it contains nothing about me or anybody else that he does not believe to be true. He confided to me his general plan of treating the subject, and showed me some chapters in MS. I dare say he has not spoken well or ill of me, but he has left me without cause of complaint on either score."

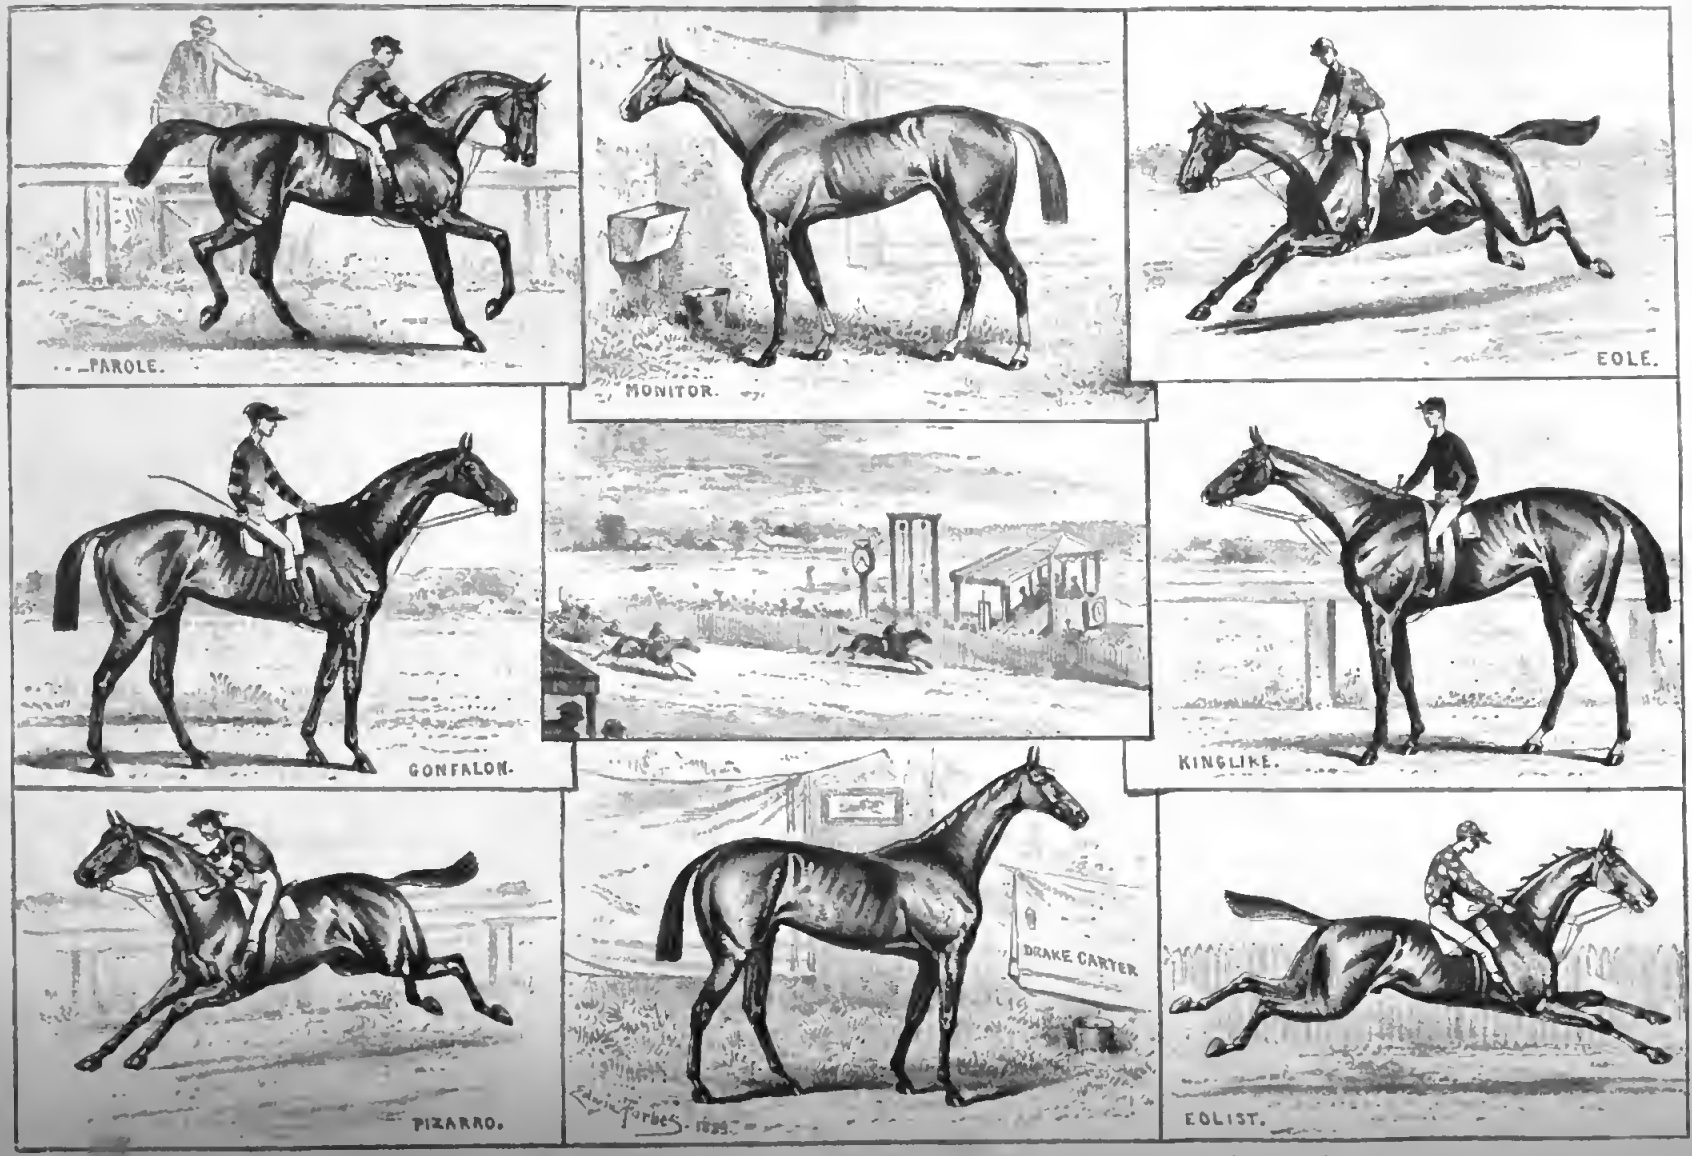
—The Duke and Duchess of Teck, who recently sold by auction their furniture, plate, etc., to the great scandal of some of their relatives, are said to be already indebted to the benefactions of those persons in the sum of £100,000.

—The host of FELLOWS which Minister JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL is soon to unveil in a town hall in England will cost only six hundred dollars, only half of which amount has yet been collected—a fact that may be offered in those who disparage American sluggishness in the matter of the pedestal for the EARTHLESS statue.

—The biographer of General SKOBELEFF, the distinguished Russian chieftain who died last year, says that he used to eat with his soldiers with the common spoon out of the camp kettles, and that on one occasion when he saw that the camp kettles were in their right places. It was not only the superb military genius which his soldiers adored, but his sympathy, his affection, his homely brotherliness. He went to visit a transport of soldiers who were badly wounded. One of the moribunds recognized him. "Oh!" said he, "there is our own one, our SKOBELEFF." The others heard the name. "Hurrah! hurrah!" they cried in cry out; but no sank and wavering were their voices it reminded one of death more than of life.

—Sixteen young ladies, aided by two young lads, played baseball at Pastime Park, Philadelphia, a few days ago. They wore jaunty little white cloth hats, those of the regulation style, untrimmed belts, and white dresses with trimmings either blue or red. The occupants of first base (according to the Philadelphia Times) did honor to her position. When the ball was carefully tossed to her, so that she could put her hands down and scoop it in, she took hold of it gracefully, and sent it back to the pitcher; but if it came at our speed she quietly stepped aside, and mellingly let it pass. So, indeed, it was with most of the fielders. The most promising "thes" slipped through their lovely little hands like water through a sieve, but still they smiled and contentedly ran after the playful ball, as though it were just as well to deliver it at one base as at another. There was no ladylike hurrying. Miss MILLER, as a pitcher, was great—more itself.

—One of the latest and most striking examples of the pernicious quality of "society journalism" is the following from the London World of August 8, addressed to Mr. EDWARD A. FREEMAN, the historian: "There is no matter so petty that you can endure to be crossed on it with equanimity. If any one—man, woman, or child—stands in your sunlight, you express your resentment with a vehemence that would have caused HERACLITUS himself to smile. The explanation probably is that dyspepsia, moral if not physical, has become to you a second nature. If your housekeeper or your hostess inadvertently presents you with any article of diet that you do not altogether approve, you owe us vituperative, of them and of it, as you chronically are of Mr FREEMAN himself. Those who have had the privilege of breakfasting or dining under the same roof have seen you explode with fury, and then relapse into a settled and—thank Heaven!—silent melancholy, because your tea has not been to your taste, or some one has anticipated you in receiving your favorite slice of bread or cut off the joint. Crabbed, harsh, and sour as the cider of your own county, you have all the susceptibilities, whims, and fancies of a hysterical girl."



MONMOUTH PARK RACES—THE OMNIBUS STAKE AND THE ALL-AGE CHAMPIONS, AUGUST 18.—DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 541.]

THIRLBY HALL.*

By W. F. NORRIS,

Author of "Mayfreedy," "Miss. Dr. Medlar," "No New Trens," "Heads of Money," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

AT NAPLES.

Lady Constance was as good as her word. The slipshod waiter who brought us our coffee the next morning told us that the Signora Principessa (that being apparently the lowest rank that his imagination could assign to her) had started shortly after daybreak, and must now be well on her way to Genoa. "For so grand a lady, she was not too generous in her presents," he said. "We poor servants prefer gentlemen like your Excellencies, who travel without a courier, and give us what you please with your own hands. Couriers are all thieves, and that Antonio is a Neapolitan, which is worse. He would not pay the bill—no, not the half of it; and the padrone appealed to the Signora Principessa herself when she came down-stairs. But she got into her carriage, paying no more attention to him than if he had been a little dog barking at her, and away she went like the wind." It seems she is in a great hurry to reach Turin, where she is to have an audience of his Majesty—so that Antonio says."

In our case there was no need for so much haste. We did not want to tear through the country like Queen's messengers, and could not have done so if we had wished it; for our heavy old equipage was not built for speed, and our horses only broke into a lumbering gallop when passing through a village, and after having been urged thereto by a great deal of whip-cord and bad language. Between-times they and their driver dropped into a state of coma, and so we jogged on, swaying creaking, and jingling through the sunshine and the dust, and did not reach Genoa until the evening of the second day after leaving Alassio.

Before we arrived in the City of Palaces I had proposed to George a slight modification of our original plan. I said vetturino travelling became rather monotonous work after a day or two, and he signified that he agreed with me. I went on to observe that the sea afforded a speedier, healthier, and really in many ways pleasanter means of reaching one's destination than the high road; to which he replied that, for his part, he should be just as well pleased to put off Florence until the spring, and to take the steamer from Genoa to Civita Vecchia.

"Yes—or Naples," I suggested. "Don't you think it would be better to see Naples first?"

He responded with a "No!" so abrupt and gruff that I was obliged to ask him what he meant.

"It's such bosh!" he said, quite angrily. "What's the good of it?"

"What's the good of seeing Naples? Well, I must say, George, I never expected to hear you ask such a question as that."

BENJAMIN SILLIMAN CHURCH, ENGINEER OF THE NEW AQUEDUCT.
Photographed by L. Colmey.—[See Page 556.]

"That's not what I mean. I mean, what's the good of following that woman about? You know very well that you only want to go to Naples because she said she would be there."

"I don't deny it for a moment," I answered. "That woman, as you rather coarsely call her, interests me. I should like to see more of her; and I'm afraid that, if we don't refresh her memory pretty soon, she will forget all about us."

"And a very good thing, too," cried George. "I should have thought that a man like you, dying of love as you always say you are, couldn't have cared so much about running after strange faces."

"I hope you don't mean to accuse me of falling in love with Lady Constance," I laughed.

"I didn't say so, though I'm not so sure that she mightn't turn your head, if she chose, for all that. She isn't very young, it is true, nor very good-looking either, to my mind, but she has a way with her which a great many people would think fascinating. You are the best judge of your own feelings, of course," continued George, pensively, "but it seems to me that if I were in your condition I shouldn't be interested in persons of that kind. In fact, I should rather avoid society."

"But you are not in my condition," I observed; "and, what's more, I don't believe you ever will be. If by any miracle you ever should forget what is due to yourself so far as to fall in love with somebody whom you are not allowed either to see or to correspond with, you will understand that a little society is exactly what one needs to keep one up to the mark. One reason why I want to meet Lady Constance Milner again is that I think she would be the sort of person who might introduce one to the best class of natives, and get one invitations to balls, and so on."

"We came abroad to read, not to go to balls," said George, still very glum.

"Then we might as well have stayed at home," I retorted. "To the best of my belief, I was sent to the Continent to get some idea of what other nations and kindreds and languages were like; and one can't do that unless one makes acquaintances."

As I have said before, my companion had no power to prevent me from following my own devices, but what strengthened my hands and completely took the wind out of his sails was a most opportune letter from my uncle, which I found awaiting me at Genoa, and in which I was strongly urged to cast aside the mixture of exclusiveness and shyness that deprives most Englishman of half the pleasure and profit of foreign travel.

"I hope," wrote he, "that you don't look upon Italy as a mere succession of beautiful pictures to be enjoyed during play hours, and that you mean to study people as well as books and scenery. Italy, like other countries, is full of human beings, and at the present time there must be some rather curious human beings among them, by all accounts. I should like you to see a few of these, if possible, and at all events to have an opportunity of talking to Italian men and women of all ranks. Tom tells me that he has written about you to some of his friends in Rome, and also to our Minister at Naples, whom he knows a little; so you must not fail to call at the Legation when you find yourself in King Ferdinand's dominions."

I read this extract aloud triumphantly. "You see, he particularly mentions Naples," I remarked; and George, in his customary practical spirit, only replied that he supposed we might as well go out and make inquiries about steamers soon.

My uncle's letter was in all respects an agreeable one. It was full of odds and ends of home news, such as I suppose he knew that I should enjoy reading, and one item in particular gave me great satisfaction. "Your trevor Scamp has shifted his quarters to the Rectory. After your departure he attached himself to Miss Beaumont, whom he now absolutely declines to leave, and, as I understand from her Pa, on intended at one time to make her a present of the dog. I presume that you will not object to this apparent transfer of his affections."

"SHE SUDDENLY APPEARED, LEANING UPON THE ARM OF OUR HOST."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1301.

It seemed to me that a good deal was implied in the above sentences. The obstacles in the path of my happiness—which, to be sure, had never been of a very formidable kind—already, I thought, began to show symptoms of tottering. I went on my way through the glowing sunlight and deep shade of the Genoese streets with a light and hopeful heart. I suppose it is because I was so happy there that I have always kept a grateful memory of the stately old city, of the busy port, of the narrow by-ways, of the chaffering silversmiths from whom we bought filigree bracelets and brooches (does anybody wear such things nowadays, I wonder?), and of the palaces and collections of pictures, every one of which George insisted upon visiting, with the conscientiousness of a true Briton. George was not yet educated up to the old masters, and honestly confessed that modern art had greater charms for him. He was, however, thong his heir, by study of authorities, to rise to a higher critical level, and he was to be seen dolly wending his way through one or other of the galleries with slow, creaking steps, with an expression of countenance at once painstaking and puzzled, and evidently trying very hard to realise in what the correggiosity of Correggio consisted.

When we had exhausted Genoa, we took ship and sailed southward, arriving at Naples, after many stoppages at intermediate ports, in the beginning of December. My first care was at once to leave my card at the Legation; and the next day I received an invitation to a ball, at which, as I heard from the head waiter at our hotel, all the great world of Naples was to be present. To this festivity I betook myself alone, George, who had not chosen to call with me, and who consequently had received no invitation, composing himself for a quiet evening with his pipe and his books, and remarking, carelessly, as I started, that he would not change places with me for five pounds.

The Minister received me in a very friendly manner, asked after the General, begged that I would not hesitate to make use of him in any way during my stay in Naples, and then handed me over to a young attaché, who conducted me into the ball room and offered to introduce me to partners. He himself did not dance; for in those days fashionable young men were supposed at in in a state of chronic exhaustion, and to be scarcely equal even at the effort of articulate speech; but he was so kind as to say that, if I liked nothing about the room like a maniac, he should be delighted to find me any number of yoke-fellows. I confessed to being fond of dancing, and after glancing at me and murmuring that he supposed I shouldn't care about married women, he presented me at various Neapolitan belles, in whose company I spent the evening pleasantly enough, although, owing to my very recent acquaintance with their language, our conversation was for the most part limited to monosyllables.

I searched in thrang in vain for the tall, commanding figure of Lady Constance Milner, and, as time went on, I was forced to the conclusion that she had either deferred her visit to Naples, or did not share my tastes in the matter of balls; and this was rather a disappointment to me, for I had quite counted upon meeting her. However, long after I had ceased to speculate upon the causes of her absence, and was in the supper-room, taking a little refreshment preparatory to nursing homeward, she suddenly appeared, leaning upon the arm of our host, and surrounded by quite a galaxy of starred and ribboned personages.

She was dressed, I remember, in black satin, with ornaments of rubies and diamonds, and as I watched her deliberately eating her ice, while a swarm of men, young and old, clustered like bees around her, I realised that, as George had said, she had "a way with her which many people might think fascinating." Indeed, it was abundantly evident that many people did think so. I drew a little nearer to the group, and caught fragments of their conversation, which was carried on in French—a language which Lady Constance appeared to speak with perfect ease and fluency. They were talking of the proclamation of the Empire in Paris, the newsof which event had just reached Naples, and I observed that every word the lady said was listened to with eager attention, and that more than one leading question was put to her; so though her interlocutors believed her to be more behind the scenes than they were. They did not, however, so far as I could judge, get a great deal of information out of her. She treated them very much as she had treated a humbler individual at Alassio—not exactly with contempt, but with a good-humored unconcern which was not very far removed from it, and she made no attempt to suppress or conceal several hearty yawns.

"No," she said, in answer to one of her questioners, "he is not going to imitate his uncle—at all events not just yet. He will grant an amnesty for political offenses, and reduce the standing army; and, now that the Republic is dead and buried, you will all feel much easier. Europe has got a reprieve, and you can congratulate yourselves upon it, if you like. As for me, I am a revolutionist."

The British Minister made a grimace, and one of the ribboned gentlemen smiled, and said, "Beware, madame; the walls have ears."

"I thought we were all carbonari here," returned Lady Constance, carelessly. "His Majesty was wearing the colors when I was last in Naples. They are pretty colors, and, after all, cela n'engage à rien. Whatever colors we may choose to deck ourselves out in, we shall not make the world turn round the other way, and sooner or later democracy will swallow us all up. It stands to reason that it must."

"Ah, dear madame," sighed a fat old man, with many decorations on his coat, "if you are to be the Goddess of Reason of the Universal Republic, I shall ask for nothing better than to play the part of Robespierre."

"I doubt whether either you or I will be in a situation to play any part at all when the Universal Republic is established," Lady Constance remarked. "Let us console ourselves with the thought that we are not likely to be hanged or guillotined. Transition periods are tedious, but they have their advantages."

While she was speaking, her eyes, roving hither and thither, had rested for a moment upon me, and she had testified to her recognition of me by a slight nod and a smile. But nothing farther than this was vouchsafed to me in the shape of notice; and presently she moved out of the room, followed by her group of satellites, while I remained behind, with an uncomfortable impression of having been slighted. She might at least have shaken hands, I thought.

But, as it happened, I did get speech of Lady Constance before going away, for while I was standing in an anteroom adjoining the ball-room, which was crowded with people saying good-night to our host and hostess, and while I was waiting my opportunity of doing likewise, she suddenly walked up to me, and in an easy, conversational tone, as though we had only parted an hour or two before, asked, "Well, what have you done with the bear-leader?"

"Do you mean Warren?" I inquired.

"Yes. He is your bear-leader, is he not? Have you sent him to bed, and broken loose for the night?"

"Warren is not exactly my bear-leader," I felt it proper to explain. "We are old friends, and he is with me just now more as a sort of travelling companion than anything else."

"I see. A guide, philosopher, and friend, appointed by the home authorities, with general instructions to keep you out of mischief. I am sure he will do his best, and almost equally sure that he will fail. Especially in a place like Naples, where there are no wholesome amusements for young men. What made you come here?"

I don't know what possessed me, but I felt a sudden impulse to tell the plain truth, and I obeyed it. "We should have come here anyhow," I said, "to see Vesuvius and Pompeii and the Museo Borbonico; but I came a good deal sooner than I had intended, because I thought that perhaps by doing so I might see you again."

At this she seemed to be greatly diverted. "Really," she said, "I begin to think that your countenance belies you, and that you are rather an original young man. By-the-bye, we may as well sit down as stand." And, stepping into the ball-room, which was now rapidly becoming deserted, she seated herself as a sofa in one of the embrasures of the windows, and motioned to me to take the vacant place by her side. "I must tell you," she began, in that high cool voice of hers, which always sounded a little above one's head, "that there are two things on earth for which I have a passion—truthfulness and originality. What you said just now sounded truthful, and it was certainly original—all things considered. That is why I led you in here, to the great astonishment of my friends, who are now craning their necks through the doorway and trying to make out what in the world I mean by such behavior. Probably, though, you will turn out a disappointment, as so many others here done. I roam about, like another Diogenes, searching high-ways and by-ways for truthful and original people, but I very, very seldom find any. Truthfulness and originality remained are a great deal more rare than you might suppose. I don't possess either quality myself, and perhaps that is my reason for setting such store by them."

I had no means of judging of Lady Constance's veracity, but I thought her decidedly original, and I ventured to tell her so.

"Oh no," she answered, shaking her head. "To strangers, I know, I have a certain appearance of originality, but it's purely superficial. I have lived all my life in a commonplace groove, and I have never managed to get out of it, though I have made frantic and even ridiculous efforts at times to strike out a line of my own."

"What sort of a line?" I made bold at inquire.

"I can't go into particulars; it would take too long. But, speaking generally, my object has always been to say and do exactly what I thought right, without regard for convention, pedantry, or prejudice."

"It seems to me," I remarked, "that one couldn't adopt a better standard."

"Unfortunately, I seldom act up to it when it comes to the push. Who does? This poor old world is smothered under mountains of stupidity and custom, like the Titans under Vesuvius and Ætna, and I don't know who is to drag it out and set it on its legs again. Every now and then there is a heave and an explosion, and some lives are lost, and orderly people are scared; but nothing comes of it, and presently things begin to smother along in the old way once more. It is inevitable, perhaps, but it is deadly dull. Individuals are like the world and the volcanoes: they can't always be in a state of eruption."

"I suppose not," I agreed, thinking to myself that it would be rather uncomfortable if they could. "I must say," I added, by way of keeping up my character for truthfulness, "that, as far as I have got, I haven't found the world so very dull."

"You will, though, some day," she returned, with one of her undisguised yawns.

"Well," I said, "of course I know very little about you, Lady Constance; but, from what little I have seen, I should have thought you led any thing but a dull life."

"I wander about and I see a great many new faces," she answered, "which is amusing in a way. The alternative would be to shut one's self up and read books; but I haven't enough patience for that. I prefer to study people, stupid as they often are. Here at Naples I am besieged by crowds of visitors, some of whom are certainly curious types, though the majority are as dull as ditch-water."

She rose as she spoke these last words, and I seized the opportunity to remind her of the permission which she had given me at Alassio. "You were so kind as to say that I might call upon you."

"Did I say that?" she asked, carelessly. "Well, come, by all means, if you choose; I am staying at the Hôtel Crocelle. But I think, do you know," she added, after a short pause, "that you had better not come."

"Why not?" I asked.

She laughed. "If I tell you, you will think it such a capital joke that you will never be able to keep it to yourself."

"I give you my honor that I won't repeat it to a soul," I declared.

"Well," she said, "after all, I don't much care if you do. It is only because I have observed that nearly all very young men, as well as old ones, and by losing their hearts to me. The mature and middle-aged generally come off scathless; but it appears that me charms have some property which is peculiarly fatal at the extremes of age and youth."

I confess that this candid statement startled me a little. Was it customary in fashionable society, I wondered, for ladies to allude to their conquests in that matter-of-course way? At any rate it would not do to look taken aback; so I said I could well believe that my only wonder was that there should be any men, or class of men, able to resist Lady Constance. "Indeed," I added, "there must be something quite extraordinarily attractive about you which is evident at first sight; for George Warren, who is not at all an observant person in general, found out at once that you were what he called 'dangerous,' and told me so. He was most unwilling to let me come to Naples on that account."

"Ah," she said, "did I not tell you that that excellent young gentleman would never be able at keep you out of mischief?"

"But I shall get into on mischief by calling upon you," I said; "because it so happens that I have the best of all safeguards against falling in love with anybody."

"Dear me? Are your young affections already engaged, then?"

I nodded. "I'll tell you all about it some day," I said, encouragingly.

She burst into a hearty peal of laughter. "Oh," she exclaimed, "there is no doubt about it!—you are a genuinely original young man. Pray come and see me very soon, and let me have a full declaration of your Dulcinea."

"I certainly shall not say a word upon the subject if you term it into ridicule," I replied, much offended. "I only mentioned it one to show you that your warning was unnecessary in my case."

"After that rebuke," remarked Lady Constance, "I had better go away and hide my confusion. I laughed at you, and you snubbed me; so now we are quits. Come and see me when you have nothing better to do, and I won't laugh again. In the mean time, will you be so kind as to go and find Antonio for me, and tell him that I me coming down?"

I obeyed; and presently Lady Constance followed me to the entrance-hall, escorted by my friend the attaché, who helped her into her carriage, and returned, looking very pale and sleepy.

"Hope you've enjoyed yourself," he said, wearily.

"Very much indeed, thanks," I answered, as I struggled into my great-coat. "By-the-bye, can you tell me who Lady Constance Milner is?"

He sighed. "Oh, don't ask me!" he asked, in a mildly reproachful tone.

He evidently meant me to understand that it was cruelly too bad to bother people with questions at that hour of the morning; but I wasn't going to let him off, for I was thirsting for information, and I thought I might very likely have an other opportunity of acquiring it. So I said, "No, I don't know anything about her. I met her for the first time a couple of months ago on the Riviera, when she was on her way to see the King of Sardinia, I believe."

"She's always on her way to see some king or other," he remarked. "That's her spécialité—feminine diplomacy, your Madame De Lieven—that sort of thing." He sighed again, and then embarked upon a condensed explanation, dropping his words not one by one, as if speaking was very hard work. "She's a sister of Rosnay's—man who's al — to — ch! What's-the-name-of-the-place, you know. Married Milner, who died of fever at Rio some years ago. Knocks about Europe now, hatching plots and getting into trouble with the police every now and then. Amuses her, you know, and don't hurt anybody else. You needn't tell her I said so, though. Must you really be going? Good-night, then, and—"

"I suppose she has plenty of money?" I observed.

"Who?—Lady Con? Lord bless your soul, no! Poor old Milner had nothing, and she had rather less, I should think. You won't take anything before you start?—brandy and soda, or something? Well, good night, if you will go. Mind you let me know if I can do anything for you while you're here."

And, having persuasively led me out into the street, my friend turned and disappeared into the house with an agility at which I should hardly have supposed him capable.

This rather disparaging account of the lady who had excited my curiosity so greatly did not alter my opinion that she was a remarkable and distinguished person, nor lessen my desire to follow up the evidently favorable impression that I had made upon her. But I was a good deal surprised, on coming down to breakfast the next morning, when George announced in a tone of satisfaction that he had "heard the whole history of that Lady Constance Milner."

"Directly after you went off last night," he said, "there came a knock at the door, and who should walk in but Mowbray! You remember Mowbray of Balliol? He is here in the father's yacht, and he happened to see your name in the strangers' book; so he came up on the chance of finding one of us at home, as he said, the morning. We began talking about one thing and another, and quite accidentally I happened to mention our friend's name; and very glad I was that I had done so, for it appears that Mowbray knows her well. He said she was a queer lot—those were his very words; a queer lot. And I must be bound to say that it entirely confirms my own impression of her," added George, triumphantly.

"Well," I replied, "I dare say she is a queer lot; I never said she wasn't, did I? It remains at his seen what you and Mowbray understand by the expression."

George proceeded to formulate his accusation deliberately. "She is very eccentric—and, the one could see for one's self. She is mixed up, Mowbray tells me, with all sorts of disreputable people and secret societies. She lives in a very extravagant style, although nobody can imagine where her income comes from, as her father was only an Irish peer with an encumbered estate, and her husband had no fortune. She seems to have married this Mr Milner, one from affection, but on account of his talents, for she is a woman of boundless ambition" (here George spread out his arms and opened his eyes very wide to illustrate the unlimited nature of Lady Constance's aspirations)—"boundless ambition, and is now generally thought that he had a great future before him. However, he had the bad luck to be appointed as Charge d'Affaires to some place in South America, where he took fever and died. Since then the widow has been searching diligently for a successor to him, but she has not taken one yet, because nobody of sufficient importance has seen fit to come forward."

"Now how can Mowbray possibly know that?" I protested.

"Oh, he says that if any rich man had proposed to her, she would undoubtedly have accepted him. But that is her affair, not ours. Why, I think, does a little concern us—or at least me, for I don't count in matters of that kind—at all, without a hint or suggestion from me, Mowbray strongly advised our having nothing to do with her. He says she is a restless, disappointed sort of woman, whose one passion in love of power. Not being able to obtain the political power which is what she covets more than nothing, she falls back upon that kind of power which I suppose that all women of certain personal advantages may possess, if they choose, and devotes a great deal of her time to getting silly people to fall in love with her. Mowbray asserted to me that he could name at least a dozen young fellows who had become half crazy about her, and whom she had cast aside like old gloves as soon as she grew tired of them. Now what," added George, rapping the breakfast table emphatically with the blade of his knife—"what is one to conclude from all that?"

"I know what I should conclude," I said, "and I should not mind laying a trifle of odds on the conclusion being a true one. I should conclude that Mowbray himself was one of that blighted dozen. And now I may as well tell you that I met this deadly enchantress at the ball last night, and had quite a long chat with her."

"Ah," remarked George, "I was prepared to hear that. And you are going to see her this afternoon, I presume."

"No, not this afternoon. But I hope I may some other day."

"Oh, very well. You can't say you haven't been warned, anyhow."

"No, I can't indeed," I answered, thinking of the other warning which I had received, but which I did not feel myself at liberty to mention; "but I should very much like to know why those reasons admonitions are addressed to me in particular. Am I so desperately inflammable that my friends must hang on to my coat-tails, and haul me back out of danger, whenever a handsome pretty woman hoves in sight? Considering everything, it does seem as on that you are at least as likely to fall a victim as I am."

"That's nonsense, and you know it," returned George. "If Lady Constance were the only woman in the world, I shouldn't look twice at her."

"Exactly; you're asbestos, whereas I'm tow-tinder. All the same, I think you might have recollected that my heart isn't my own to dispose of."

"I do recollect it," answered George, "that's the very reason why I want to keep you out of this woman's clutches."

"Upon my word, George," I exclaimed, getting rather warm, "you earn so much headed to advise me even I had to deal with! Can't you remember that women are not always thinking or understand that women are not always thinking about making conquests? At any rate, Lady Constance won't try at make a conquest of me, for I told her about Maud myself last night."

"Good Lord!" cried George, looking annoyed, and rather disgusted. "You don't mean to say that you actually mentioned Miss Dennison's name to her?"

"I mentioned nobody's name; though if she say I should have done so if she had asked me. Why on earth should I not? Is it a disgrace to love Miss Dennison?—or is she disgraced be-ne loving her? The fact is that you can't understand my nature that differs from your own. If you were in love, you would probably shut yourself up and suffer in silence, but I am not like that; I prefer to have a little sympathy and encouragement when a fellow-creature is kind enough to offer them to me. And I hope you don't disagree that I me likely to yield to Lady Constance's fascinations at the very time when I am taking to her about the only woman in the world whom I have ever cared for, or shall care for."

I fully expected that George would have been crushed by this, and would have made a proper apology for his unworthy suspicions; but not at all.

He only shook his head, and muttered that such things had happened before now. His obstinacy ended by making me really angry. I observed, with cold dignity, that I was sorry he should have as poor an opinion of me. I was not aware of having done anything to justify the notion that I was either a scoundrel or an idiot; but, of course, if that was the view that he took of my character, there was no more to be said, and we had better change the subject. Thereupon he did beg my pardon, assured me that nothing had been further from his intention than to make accusations of any kind against me, and admitted that he had been hasty and unjust.

"And since you know Lady Constance a little better," I added, "you will admit that you have done her an injustice too."

"Perhaps so," answered George; "but I don't feel disposed to admit that yet, and, to tell you the truth, I have no wish to know her better."

[To be continued.]

THE SITUATION IN UTAH.

It is more than a quarter of a century since the Republican party placed in its platform for the first national canvass in which it was seriously engaged a spirited denunciation of polygamy, as, with slavery, one of the twin relics of barbarism, which it was the duty of the republic to restrain as to abolish. For more than twenty years the Republican party has been in possession of the government, and slavery, by far the more formidable and extensive of the two evils, has been abolished, and has become, even as to its most serious effects, as much a thing of the past as the tax of ostend on the colonial aristocracy. Yet Mormonism, with its peculiar institution, is in numbers, and apparently in unity and energy, more powerful than it was when the ardent leaders of the young liberal party launched at it their bitter and sounding condemnation. Brigham Young, the great leader, has departed, and many of the apostles and disciples of his strange religion have followed him. But "the Church" has grown apace; its members have increased and multiplied and peopled the fertile valley and the hills their leader selected for their home; thousands of converts, men and women, from the hardiest races of Europe, have been brought across the seas, universal suffrage, in which even the women—the ones obviously the most degraded by polygamy—have shared, has only increased the infusion, the discipline, and apparently the stability of the Mormon organization. Nor has the Republican party failed to try to carry out its pledges of hostility to the disgusting evil against which it declared war at the outset of its brilliant career. In 1862, in the midst of the most trying difficulties of the war for the Union, Congress passed to enact a law which made polygamy an offense against the statutes of the United States, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Later laws were passed to secure juries unprejudiced in favor of the crime, by whom those accused of it should be tried. And finally, in the spring of 1882, a law was enacted intended as to take political power from the hands of polygamists, disfranchising them, forbidding them to hold office, as to act as judges of election, and providing for a Commission to conduct elections in the Territory of Utah in accordance with these requirements.

This is usually called the "Edmunds law," after the eminent jurist and legislator who was its chief champion in the Senate, and who is reported to have been its author. Whatever experience, acuteness, trained judgment, and perfect sincerity of purpose could do to insure an efficient law may be assumed to have been contributed to this one. Under it two elections have been held in Utah, one in the fall of last year for a Delegate in Congress, and one in August of this year for a Territorial Legislature. The second was by far the more important, because the Utah Commission continues in office, by the terms of the Edmunds law, only until the "Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall make provision for filling the offices"—namely, election officers, which the Commission was appointed in the first instance to fill. The result of the election is a practical failure of the law to accomplish its purpose. Those actually guilty of polygamy, it is believed, were excluded from the polls and from the Legislature, but of those who voted and of those who were chosen to the Legislature a large majority were in cordial sympathy with polygamy as a religious institution, were wholly under the influence of the leaders who preach and practice that institution, and can be relied on to assist any enthusiasm as to the extirpation of polygamy by disfranchisement as by exclusion from office. The population of the Territory is about 144,000, of whom 70,000 are females. About 100,000 are natives, and the remainder are of foreign birth. In this population, as present, the Mormon Church reigns supreme. Careful observers believe that its rule is strengthened by the laws which have been passed to break it down. The policy of the government is looked upon to be one of persecution, and those as whom it is aimed are regarded as martyrs, and the wrongs as well as the blood of the martyrs have proved to be the seed quite as much of a false Church as of a true one.

Yet in spite of the apparent failure of this last and heaviest blow directed at the offensive feature of Mormonism, there is much credible that polygamy is doomed, and that, though the immediate effect of recent action has been to strengthen it, it is surely but [illegible] giving way. The railway has opened up the secluded retreat of the Mormons to the enterprise, not to say to the greed, of the frontier population which presses toward it from both sides of the continent. The forces of free [illegible] of trade, of the press, and of political activity are working. The Mormons are not in fact, and can not long believe themselves to be, a people physically "set apart." The number of them who actually practice polygamy is believed to be growing relatively smaller. Even when it was most common it was far more of a business arrangement than a religious one, and persons had even less to do with it than superstition. Now, as an economic institution, it is far less adapted to the mode of life which the Mormons are being gradually forced to lead, the active, varied, commercial, and industrial life which is indirectly shared even by the tillers of the soil, than it was to the purely agricultural and semi patriarchal existence which prevailed before mines and railways and trade invaded the chosen land. Polygamy never has been practiced in any considerable community not either agricultural or pastoral, or else one in which the general labor was servile, and as the Mormons are forced by the competition of the restless "Gentiles" into the numerous activities of actual American life, they will be compelled to abandon the awkward and costly family arrangement necessary to polygamy. They may make a violent struggle, and polygamy may go down in blood, as slavery did, but it is as surely condemned by the resistless economic laws of modern society as was its "twin."

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

SURFACE DRAINAGE.

An eminent artist of my acquaintance lives to what may be called an eminent house, for it is perched upon a hill that overlooks one of the finest river views in the country. I can not, however, describe its beauty, as the picture will be recognized, and I shall not be left at liberty to mention a less attractive and yet a more important feature of the place—its system of gravity drainage.

It is of a kind not infrequently employed in isolated country places, where, as in this case, there are ample grounds that slope away from the mansion. The drainage is conveyed away by trapped pipes to a distance of sixty or seventy yards from the house, where it is discharged into a bucket upon the hill side, and is emptied by exposure to the air. Thus far it has proved innoxious to the occupants of the house.

This plan is a not uncommon and a very simple one, but it is not the best one. Its defect is that it keeps up a continuous drainage, and the ground at the point of discharge being thus constantly saturated, the air has a constantly diminishing chance to follow and to oxidize the sewage that soaks into the soil. An intermittent flow is much preferable, for by this system the ground is allowed to become at least partly dry between the successive discharges of the sewage. How, then, shall an intermittent discharge be procured so as to give the air and the sunlight their fair opportunity? Philbrick describes as follows a plan which he has tried with great success in a house which he occupies during the summer months. (See figure accompanying.)

Proposal to House Drainage by Surface Irrigation. (From Philbrick's Sanitary Engineering.)

"A tight cess-pool is made about one hundred feet from the house, of a capacity to hold one week's accumulation of sewage. When filled, the fact is [illegible] by an overflow discharging behind the stable, which pipe (not shown in the cut) also serves as an air vent.

"A trench was dug about one hundred and fifty feet long from the bottom of the cess-pool, its bottom graded so as to drain the cess-pool up to the surface of the ground at this distance. A four inch stone ware drain was laid and buried in the trench. Just below the point above the pipe passes through the wall of the cess-pool, is connected four inch brass faced water stop gate was set in the pipe with a four inch pipe set upright from its top to the surface of the ground, through which a key can be inserted to open and close the gate. By opening the gate the whole contents of the cess-pool are discharged at will on the surface at the lower end of this pipe in five to ten minutes. At this point of discharge how a plot of land used as a kitchen garden. While the sewage is flowing a man with a hoe guides it here and there between the rows of peas and corn, so as to secure a tolerably uniform irrigation. The soil is light and sandy, and absorbs the whole in half an hour. The garden shows the benefits of this application.

"Were this plan to be used during the whole year, it would require more land and a greater distance from the house to avoid offense. But where the character of the soil, the slope of the surface, and the direction of the prevailing winds all combine to favor this method, it has proved very satisfactory. The amount of attention required in this case is trifling, being only about ten minutes once a week. The apparatus is all durable, and not likely to get out of repair."

In cases like this the action of gravity is sufficient to distribute the sewage, but more frequently some sort of pumping apparatus is required.

Another system of intermittent distribution may be mentioned here, though it is not exactly surface drainage, it is that of Mr Rogers Field, an English engineer. It is to distribute the sewage about a foot below the surface, in porous drain-pipes with loose joints. These pipes are filled at each discharge from the flush tank or cess-pool, and the sewage soaks away from the joints of the pipe while the cess-pool fills again. Philbrick adds: "In some places this plan has worked well, while in others the joints of the pipe or the pores of the soil, or both, have apparently become clogged with the solid particles held in suspension by the sewage as such a degree that the absorbing power of the soil around the pipes has become impaired. The result is that the sewage bursts up to the surface, and becomes a nuisance near the lower end of the system of pipes. The fault can perhaps be remedied or avoided by a thorough under-draining of the soil, and by taking proper pains in laying the drains, and providing sufficient surface of land for absorbing a given amount of sewage. Different localities and different soils give very different results, and it becomes very largely a question of judgment in matters of detail to adjust the parts of this system so that it will work without annoyance."

It must be borne in mind that in any system of gravity drainage the trapping must be attended to with especial care, for the reason that sewage gases are somewhat lighter than the air, and always tend to find their way backward into the house.

The material now generally used for drain pipes is glazed stone-ware. The drain-pipes must be laid with extreme care. The builder's watchfulness with respect to them can not cease even when they are delivered unbroken, and perfect in form and quality, upon the ground. He must watch his workmen to be sure that no piece is cracked, as badly jointed, or unevenly bedded, as it goes into the ground. Careless workmen are constantly undoing the most scientific engineering; and a fault in the drain-pipes, when once committed and concealed—deeply buried away from sight under-ground—may not be detected for months or years, and then only by resulting sickness in the family. In fine, as I said at the beginning, he who lives in the city is committed to the drainage system that already exists. Whoever builds an isolated country house takes the responsibility of good drainage upon his own shoulders.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

AT MONMOUTH PARK.

One of the most interesting races of the season took place at Monmouth Park, New Jersey, on Saturday, August 18. It was for the "Omnibus Stake," so called because any one having a horse engaged for that stake could start, provided he was not disqualified by being in the Tuxedo list, or having been ruled off for wrong-doing. To encourage sales of yearlings by breeders and others, $3000 out of the $10,000 added to the race was as divided as to give $2000 to the nominator of the winner and $1000 to the nominator of the second.

On page 548 we give the portraits of the five competitors in the third race of the day—Drake Carter, Kalmi, Kingfisher, Gonfalon, and Pizarro—with those of three other famous horses, and the finish of the race which was won by Drake Carter. The scene that followed his return to the saddling paddock was one of the greatest enthusiasm. Not only did the stable boys cut up their accustomed capers, but many of the old timers found themselves shouting at the success of the Kentucky colt, whom the jockey brought back looking decidedly tired and jaded, but not as much so as some of the others. Within an hour after the race the winner was purchased by Mr PIERRE LORILLARD for $17,000.

ITALIAN EDUCATION AND AMERICAN.

It is only twenty two years since Italy was one of the worst educated of nations. Once the source of intelligence and progress, it had been suffered to fall into the extreme of barbarism. It was in March, 1861, that the first Italian Parliament assembled at Turin, and Rome and Venice were still excluded from the new nation. One by one, as when some venerable statue of antiquity is renewed piece by piece, limb by limb, Italy's dismembered members were gathered together. Piedmont, in 1848–9, formed the basis of the new structure. Lombardy, Naples, Tuscany, were added in 1861, Venice in 1866, and Rome in 1870. It is plain that in this busy and dangerous period of creation there had been little leisure to attend to the waste of education. One of the first aims of the new nations was to teach its people the value of unity and freedom. The Italian Parliament founded a system of public schools, monasteries were turned into school houses, the funds of superstition devoted to new uses, the liberality of the government directed to the cultivation of the people.

The Italian Parliament began an inquiry into the condition of education. It was found that the great majority of the people knew little more than the brutes around them. More than seventy and perhaps eighty per cent. could neither read nor write. The first educational reports were startling. As compared with its sister nations, Italy, the land of Virgil and of Dante, has done least for the spread of knowledge. In Germany nearly every one was educated. In distant Scandinavia and sunny Holland, song and contentment by the Italian lands, knowledge was almost universal. England, France, even Ireland, had their national schools and a premium of normal instruction. In Italy [illegible] seemed none. For the great [illegible] of the [illegible] it was a schoolless [illegible] if [illegible] had attempts at teaching, they [illegible] failed. Monks and priests had done nothing [illegible] people. And when, twenty years ago, the Italian government introduced its system of public schools, it found that in bed before it the unencouraged task of educating nearly a whole nation. Of twenty five millions of people two thirds had probably never entered a school.

What the Italian government sought to do was to teach its people to read and write. It aimed to lay the foundation of elementary knowledge. Its aim is still unattained. But the sincerity of its labors and the great sacrifices to the cause of the intellect have not been without remarkable results. In some parts of Italy ignorance prevails almost undisturbed. At Girgenti, in Sicily, seventy seven per cent. of the children between six and twelve were reported by the recent census unable to read and write, at Cosenza, in Calabria, seventy three per cent. But in other parts of the country, where good schools have been established, the progress is remarkable. In ten years (1871–81), at Piacenza, the number of illiterates has been reduced one half, in other provinces the results are equally great. The common schools of Italy are steadily raising the condition of the people. In the European states it is usual to estimate the progress of education by the number of conscripts who can read and write. Every year in Italy the number increases. In the conscription of 1866, sixty-eight soldiers out of every hundred were wholly ignorant; in 1880 the number had decreased as fifty two. Italy is still behind the other European nations in elementary knowledge. In Germany there are scarcely any illiterate conscripts; in France, fourteen per cent.; and Austria, thirty nine. But the active zeal of the Italian Parliament in educational affairs is everywhere evident: its public-school system at Rome and Naples is scarcely ten years old; its general system not twenty. Yet in twenty years the progress of public education has been steadily onward, and the new generations of Italians will soon be as generally instructed as those of any other land.

American educators are necessarily stimulated to new efforts by the example of European lands. In the generous race for knowledge it will not do for us to suffer ourselves to be outstripped in zeal. Yet even Italy is pressing fast upon us. In twenty years it has nearly overtaken us. Weighed down by heavy debts, covered with military and naval establishments, it has yet been able to reduce the proportion of its illiterates by about twenty-five per cent. In 1871 forty-two per cent. of men over nine years old could not read and write; in 1881 only thirty five per cent. A still greater decrease is shown among persons from six to twenty. I do not know that we have done as well. Our recent census shows a dark educational picture. Several millions of children in the United States have no teachers provided for them. And while Italy is everywhere planting its public schools in the darkest regions of ignorance, our government seems powerless to help its people.

But fortunately this great question of education can no longer be left unanswered among us. It rises above party, above sect. The cause of free education is that of the people. They are everywhere demanding knowledge, and no mental equality rests the hopes of freedom.

EDWIN LAWRENCE.

SUNLIGHT ALL THE WAY.

"Gone-er, Jennie; the road is long,
And the moor is hard in cruse;
But well you know there is danger
In the bogs and the marshy moon.
So keep in the foot-path, Jennie;
Let nothing tempt you to stray;
Then you'll get safely over it,
For there's sunlight all the way—
Sunlight all the way,
So never you fear,
Keep a good heart, dear,
For there's sunlight all the way."

The child went off with a blessing
And a kiss of mother-love;
The dahlia were down at her feet,
And the lark was singing above.
On, on in the narrow foot-path—
Nothing could tempt her to stray;
So the moor was passed at night-fall,
And she'd sunlight all the way—
Sunlight all the way;
And she, smiling, said,
As her had was spread,
"I had sunlight all the way."

And I, who followed the maiden,
Kept thinking, as I went,
Over the perilous moor of life
What unwary feet are bent.
If they only could keep the foot-path,
And not in the marshes stray,
Then they would reach the end of life
Ere the night could shroud the day.
They'd have sunlight all the way.
But the marsh is wide,
And they turn aside,
And the night falls on the day.

For better to keep the narrow path,
Nor turn to the left or right,
For if [illegible] loiter at morning,
What shall we do when the night
Falls black on us lonely journey,
And [illegible] our vain
Then meekly go ward, friends, and we Shall [illegible] all the [illegible] the way,
Till the journey's done,
And [illegible]
Of a never-ending day.

Digitized by Google

A MIDSUMMER REVERIE.—DRAWN BY HENRY S. CAREY.—[SEE "NEW CONTRIBUTORS' NUMBER," PAGE 554.]

LONG BRANCH—WEST END.—Drawn by Schell and Hogan.—[See Page 555.]

MISS COURTENAY'S NEPHEW.

By Mrs. FRANK McCARTHY.

A young girl was swinging in a hammock one midsummer day. The leaves rustled softly in the languid air, the little birds trilled low and lazily, the gaudy full-blown flowers of the faded season blazed and burned away in the noontide heat, and all the insect world piped drowsily with the music of the spheres. Perhaps the young girl in the hammock was the fairest blossom of them all. Her eyes matched the blue of the summer skies, and her hair took all the hints of the yellow grain waving in the adjoining field. Her lips were red as the lady-apples upon the favorite tree of her aunt Griselda Courtenay, whose country-seat, perched high among the banks grown thus overlooked a wide and swift-flowing river, Miss Edith Gray was now gracing with her beauty and enlivening with her wit. She was dressed—but why should I go on repeating the fashionable chronicle of the day? Upon the hour this periodical was due at the nearest post-office the young lady in question would order her village cart, would drive like mad down the steep and rocky road to the little country town, would pounce upon the rather sheaky sheet, and passing over stirring news of political significance, of flood and fire, of shipwreck and pestilence, and all the divers calamities that keep the world at its proper average, would devour with trembling lips and bated breath the latest intelligence from the fashionable world. The light in her eyes would leap to a glow, the color would deepen in her cheek, and a fluttering sigh would escape from her lips as she read of what Miss Edith Gray wore, and how she looked, and where she went, during the week that had gone by. For although this young lady dressed in purple (and any other color, for her complexion was amenable to all the shades in the rainbow) and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day, she was a poor orphan, and dependent upon her aunt Griselda Courtenay for all those luxuries. And this dependence grated sorely upon the delicate sensibilities of Miss Edith, and she hoped much from the expeditions and caprices of the aforesaid fashionable world.

When she was a little girl, and studying hard at the fashionable seminary where Miss Courtenay had placed her, she resolved to be a teacher, and in this way repay Aunt Courtenay all the money she had expended in her behalf. But as the years went on, and she found the life she had chosen for herself a grim and careless one, poorly paid, and miserable abused, she altered her mind. When she had reached the age of eighteen, and the educational resources of the seminary had been exhausted in Miss Gray's behalf, and her aunt Courtenay had come to consult her about her future, they both agreed that she had better not enter further upon the pursuit of that kind of knowledge—that there were other paths of wisdom which were more full of pleasantness, if not of peace.

Her aunt Courtenay couldn't take her eyes from the fun and form of her niece.

"I thank you will do well in society," said Aunt Courtenay, with the air of an oracle. And Edith bowed dutifully. "You have your future in your own hands, to make or to mar," her aunt added, gravely. Edith bowed even more dutifully than before.

"I will try to repay all your generosity in my behalf," she said; and from that day forth she bent all the energies of her mind and the advantages bestowed generously upon her by nature to cancel her heavy obligations to her aunt Courtenay. Every social triumph she scored as a point against this burden; and when at last she brought to book (if I may be allowed the expression) the most eligible parti of the season, and Mr Conrad Belden resolved to range himself, she lay back in her hammock and uttered a sigh of relief, and immediately began counting off upon her rosy fingers the different methods by which the promised herself not only to wipe out Aunt Courtenay's score against her, but leave a margin of indebtedness from Aunt Courtenay.

These moments were the happiest in her life; and if her future lord, as he swung gently to and fro the cords of the hammock, watching furtively the nibble the timid toying of her taper fingers, the color rise in her cheek, and the light in her eyes soften almost to tears, if he thought all this becoming emotion was due to the feelings aroused by the new bond they had entered into, he was partly in the right, as without this bond, and what lay behind it, she was powerless. And, as she was not devoid of gratitude, she was really fond of the origin of her long labored for and at last secured happiness. Her strongest passion, however, had been her hatred of obligation to her aunt Griselda, and the probability that she would be able to put that ankle took considerable of the rest out of her life. She began to take very little interest in the fashionable chronicle of the day, and scarcely knew from one week's end to the other what was the opinion of the contemporaneous Jenkins as to her appearance and attire. A faint element of boredom crept into her existence, which increased rapidly as she found always the one hand upon the cords of her hammock, inhaled the fragrance of the one excellent brand of cigars, and listened to the same prattle of manly adventure hour after hour. Once in a while, when the day was rainy, and her future husband, with his inward antenna stretching longingly to the billiard-room, still remained dutifully by the side of his betrothed, Edith Gray wandered wheel she could have to live for when her aunt's debt was paid.

It was now the height of the season, and Miss Courtenay, having secured the future of her penniless niece, turned her attention to a vagrant nephew who had been a pensioner upon her bounty a much longer time than his cousin Edith, and had devoured her substance with a far less considerate conscience. The plan of marrying this scapegrace to an heiress had sometimes presented itself to her mind, but never as strongly as now that Edith's success had established a precedent. Miss Courtenay had the promise of a short visit from a Brazilian heiress, and determined to avail herself of this opportunity, as heiresses, even from Brazil, were largely exported just then to foreign markets. Miss Courtenay resolved to give her nephew this last chance to retrieve his fortunes, and if he refused to profit by it, she told herself for the hundredth time, she would cash her hands of him forever.

"Your cousin Jack Courtenay will arrive this evening," she said to Edith, "and if you will do what you can to aid matters between him and Miss Alfiero, I shall be under great obligations to you."

These last words were pleasant to Edith's ears, and she listened eagerly to the somewhat pathetic recital of the misdoings of her irreclaimable cousin.

"He has squandered my money all these years," said Miss Courtenay, and Edith winced at the similarity of her cousin's condition to her own, "and if he refuses to benefit by the opportunity now offered him, I am done with him. Miss Alfiero is an excellent young woman, and her fortune is in her own hands."

Notwithstanding this prejudicial narration, Edith's heart warmed to her cousin. She was not so rich in relatives that she could afford to lose the hope that her luminous might at least prove worth of a compassionate interest. Did they not suffer under the same galling necessity? And if it was so unbearable to a woman, what must it be to a man? How his spirit must chafe, and his very soul grow bitter within him, under the cold and abhorrent patronage of this heartless and mercenary old woman of the world! How Edith longed to help him, to comfort him! She had never seen him, but he was her cousin, her dear cousin! Her incipient boredom was put to rout. Her hammock hung idle and empty to the languid breeze all the long afternoon. Con Belden betook himself to his male companions with the new zest born of an off-day delight. Edith, for the first time since her engagement, took a warm interest in her toilette. She decided at first upon a combination of pale blue satin and silver brocade. For jewels, the large white pearls, a princely gift from her betrothed, wound about her throat, and the silver sinuous folds of her ruby-eyed serpent coiled in and out of her yellow braids. Then she blushed for this sordid temptation, and wore a simple robe of India muil, with a bunch of pale roses at her waist; her hair was knotted loosely at her neck, and not a jewel shone upon her save the engagement diamond, as "the badge of her servitude." And lo! when the heavy carriage rolled up to the portico, there appeared but the man traveller, but he had luggage enough for ten. There were many trunks, and light dressing portmanteaus of embossed leather, and smaller ones with strong silver clasps, fishing-tackle of quaint and expensive variety in bamboo coverings, hunting gear from the plainest to the most costly description, and a man-servant, laden with the most approved wraps and traps of modern necessity.

And this was her poor cousin Jack!

A shout of delight welcomed him from the male guests, the feminine interest being none the less deep that it was not so pronounced. Even the callow cheek of Miss Courtenay warmed to the hearty embrace of her nephew, and Edith could see that her whole rigid anatomy quickened to the coming of the prodigal.

He had the cold blue eyes, the stone-colored hair, of the Courtenays, and their high nose, but his mouth was sensitive and womanish, and there was an irresistible air of almost comical appeal about him that disarmed criticism.

Scene: side balcony at Courtenay Heights. Time: early morning, week after Jack Courtenay's arrival. Miss Edith Gray reclining in her hammock, her cousin, Jack Courtenay, with one hand upon the swaying cords, in the fingers of the other a cigar cold even to the ashes.

Edith. "I am so disappointed in you! You really had your chains. The iron of this degrading servitude of ours has never entered your soul."

Jack. "I can't seem to help it, Cousin Edith. It's a beastly bad principle and delicacy an ugly part, I suppose; but I'm afraid I was born so."

Edith. "Do you never feel ashamed to accept so much from one upon whom you have no claim?"

Jack. "You hit rather hard, Edith. She is our aunt, blood is thicker than water."

Edith. "Is it thick enough to need the application of a leech? And when will you turn your attention to the forbid stream of Miss Alfiero?"

Jack (with suppressed wrath, but assumed politeness). "Thank you for reminding me of a somewhat neglected duty. You have been candid enough to explain to me your exalted motives for accepting the hand and money of my friend Belden. Such heroism is infectious." Exit Jack Courtenay.

Edith tilts the hammock perilously to look after her cousin. She sees him join Miss Alfiero upon the lawn, then throws herself back in the hammock and covers her face with her hands. Two big round tears roll from under her fingers upon the pulat appliqué at her neck. At that moment Mr Jack Courtenay passes the balcony with his companion.

Miss Alfiero. "Qu'a-t-elle, votre belle cousine?"

Jack (tramping nervously of his moustache). "Hum—ach—mal de tête."

Miss Alfiero (mockingly). "Hum—ah—mal de cœur."

Jack feels that organ of his own thumping against his ribs, but he never looks back, and holding the red parasol over the mottled complexion of Miss Alfiero, pursues his manœuvre of the French with her.

On the 23d of August Miss Courtenay proposed a picnic to a wild part of the country, where, after some tedious and rather perilous climbing, a fine view could be obtained.

Miss Courtenay had her own ideas of picnics, and used many Machiavelian ingenuity in paling people off for the drive. She also superintended the preparing and packing of the hampers. Miss Courtenay believed in combinations—the power of nature softened and restrained by the resources of civilization. Time was passing, and the polite precision of conventional life admitted of some ruinous delays. Miss Alfiero was due elsewhere in September.

Ten miles from the Heights the country was one wild unbroken forest as far as the eye could reach. The party alighted, and began on foot the ascent to the plateau. A narrow pathway had been hewn for the accommodation of pioneers encumbered with the trappings of civilization. They went singly, and in a sort of silence born of the novelty of their surroundings. It was dark, but not because of the decline of day. Invisible birds sang in the impenetrable gloom. The resinous odor of the pines mingled with perfumes unknown to the nostrils of the habitués of towns. Half way up the ascent the barricade of green gave way. They had reached an open vista in the woods, where luncheon was ready for them, served in delightful precision upon a rocky ledge which Nature seemed to have made to order for the purpose. Delicious water leaped from a rocky spring; the attendants stood with cork-screws in hand. The unloosening of the hampers freed also the tongues. Miss Courtenay was congratulated upon the delightful surprises she held in reserve. She had sent the wagon of supplies by way of a hidden path that admitted of wheels, Miss Courtenay preferred to have this informal repast prepared without the espionage of her guests. But at this point Nature had placed an impassable barrier to these gentle courtesies. She lifted a warning hand to the violators of her solitudes. The intruders upon her secret places pursued their pleasure at their peril.

Half the party remained at the ledge of rocks, a few reached the plateau, and only two went beyond. In truth only one of these went with that spontaneous eagerness in piercing untamable depths that belongs either to the hunter or the hunted. Edith's sole desire was to fly for a while from everybody and everything that reminded her of what she now considered an inevitable and eternal misery.

Jack Courtenay, without wishing to intrude upon a desire for seclusion which he could well understand after his long drive with Miss Alfiero, was unwilling to allow his cousin to venture alone into these treacherous wilds, familiar to him from many hair-breadth escapes in boyhood. He knew of a ravine, the approach to which was hidden by dense thickets of underbrush, where a slight opening to a new field of adventure beyond, veiled artfully by the parasites of the wood, might tempt his sweet cousin to a dangerous, perhaps fatal, fall to the jagged depths below. Stealthily pursuing her light footsteps through the forest, sometimes losing sight of her, then catching a glimpse of her white drapery in the distance, Jack Courtenay held steadily to the chase; and at length, as she had wandered away in a direction that was unfamiliar to him, he resolved, although reluctantly, to overtake her and compel her to retrace her steps, as at least remain within his safe surveillance. But even while the resolve shaped itself in his mind the disappeared again. A suppressed cry of terror reached him, then the crackling of dry bushes, the sudden whirr of a terrified bird over his head made his heart stand still. He plunged forward, and was himself almost precipitated to the depth of a gully that yawned at his feet. Half-way to the stony bottom he saw a crumpled mass of white drapery, and gathering his scattered wits together, he at length discovered that his cousin was clinging with the desperation born of despair to a hickory sapling that had taken root in the steep side of the ravine.

"Hold on, Edith," he called to her in as matter-of-fact a tone as he could command, "and I will come down to you." And slipping over the edge of the ravine, swinging himself from one sapling to another, leaping, sliding, catching at anything that offered itself to his fleeting grasp, he at last reached a point a half-dozen feet below her, where a huge bowlder enabled him to get a substantial footing. From that point the rock descended, sheer, and bare of even a lichen, one unbroken precipice of fifty feet, to the rocky bed of a diverted torrent.

Jack extended his arms. "Now let yourself go," he said. But Edith held on. A little while ago, although she had not courted death, it had seemed the one way of relief to her. Now it was full of terror. She was so young, and life was sweet—so strangely, wonderfully sweet, with the arms of her cousin Jack Courtenay waiting for her there below! "Come," he said; and loosing her hold, she fell fainting to what seemed to her the one refuge in the world.

Cold drops oozed from the calcareous wall beneath him. He slipped carefully to a sitting posture with Edith still in his arms, and stretching his hand to the ivy moisture, he laved her forehead, her hands. Tearing away a portion of her filmy dress, he saturated it with the icy liquid, and wrung it upon her lips. Then she opened her eyes, and became what Jack considered all of a celestial rosy red. He was sorely frightened, and shaken by all sorts of miseries. This accidents blush put him entirely at his ease.

"Don't wriggle," he said. "Keep perfectly quiet, or we shall both be smashed upon the rocks below."

"How shall we get up again?" said Edith.

"I was just wondering," said Jack. "Are you all right? No bones broken? Got any pain anywhere?"

"A little—in my ankle."

"Which one? How do you—"

"Oh! oh! I can't—"

"I was afraid so," said Jack. "That's a sprain."

"Well, suppose it is," she replied. "I don't have broken my neck."

"In that case," said Jack, "the worst might be over."

"You monster! I wish it was your neck, fiend had tumbled down the gully."

"I don't," said Jack. "She must weigh well on to a hundred and fifty pounds. We should have come to grief from sheer swordspeak."

In the mean time Jack had torn another portion off her dress, and, resting it on the rock, had bound it tightly around her ankle, first cutting away her shoe and stocking with his pocket-knife. To all of this Edith had submitted herself.

"Jack," she said, "have you asked Miss Alfiero to marry you?"

"No," he replied; "I haven't had a chance. You have spoiled a fine opportunity to-day. But don't disturb me, I'm laboring with an idea."

"Then take your arms away. I don't want to be held as if in a vise."

"Certainly," said Jack, letting his arms suddenly fall.

Edith sat erect, but an ashen pallor again overspread her face; her eyes closed.

"I am dying," she faltered.

"Oh no, dear," said Jack, "not by a long shot." He hastened to bathe her face with the water found within his reach, and saw more than a faint color creep into her cheek. The shadows were deepening around them; it was already black in the depths below. He had gathered Edith again in his arms.

"See here, my sweet cousin," he said.

"Yes, Jack," she murmured, with her eyes still closed.

"I'm going to make a struggle to take you to the top of this infernal ravine. Now I may stumble; I don't think I shall, but I may. Will you risk it?"

"Yes, Jack."

